

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

DATE DUE

STANFORD UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
STANFORD, CALIFORNIA
94305

MUSIC L
STANFORD UNIVER

DWIGHT'S
JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

VOLUME XXXI

BOSTON:
PUBLISHED BY OLIVER DITSON AND COMPANY, 277 WASHINGTON STREET, 1873.

STANFORD UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
MUSIC LIBRARY
FEB 10 1976

ML1
D993
V.31/32

Reprint Edition 1967

JOHNSON REPRINT CORP.
NEW YORK—LONDON

ARNO PRESS, INC.
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Library of Congress Catalog Card No. 67-24725

Manufactured in the U.S.A. by Arno Press Inc.

INDEX.

Abt, Franz, in America, 240, 255, (See "Peace Jubilee"); Sketch of.....264
 Additional Accompaniments to Bach and Handel.....100, 118, 121, 137, 145, 200, 300
 A Dilettante to the Death, (Lond. Mus. World) 177
 A Matter of Principle: Herr Stockhausen's letter.....210
 Ambros, A. W. Translations from his "Bunte Blaetter;" on Robert Franz, 193, 201, 209; on Music in Italy.....240
 American Art and German Magnanimity, (II. W. Beecher).....72
 A Musical Prince.....208
 Ancient Miracle Plays. (Mrs. L. M. Child).....140
 Ancient Musical Instruments. (Chas. Rend.).....230, 307, 250
 Angier, Rev. Joseph: Obituary Notice.....23
 A Parisian Institution (the Claque).....92
 Apollo Club, in Boston. (See CONCERTS)
 Apollo versus Beethoven! Reply to Harper's "Easy Chair".....383
 "Arcadian" Symphony by G. F. Bristow.....309
 Art: essential to true Opera (London Mus. World), 96; Individualism in (M. A. Coquerel), 130; in the Public Schools of Boston (Advertiser).....154, 101, 170, 235
 A Title Page: "Jonah, an Oratorio," (A. W. T.).....95
 Auber, F. E. Obituary Notices of, 27, 82; the Comedy Composer, (Lond. Orch), 41; Auber, a Study, by B. Jouvin.....50, 53
 A Warning Unheeded, (E. Naumann).....240

Bach, J. S. His Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, 0, 100; his St. Matthew Passion at Worcester, Engl. 324; at Westminster Abbey, 17, 21, 221, 234; at Boston, 22, 29, 34, 46, 48, 53, 69; at Gloucester Fest. (Engl.) 100; "cuts" in the St. John and Matthew Passions (letter from J. Stockhausen), 210; St. John Passion in London, 220; analyzed by G. A. Macfarren, 242; his Cantata "Ein feste Burg," 40; Orchestral Suite in D, 143; Organ Toccata in F, arranged for Orchestra by Esser, 181; his Chorales, 203; Chaconne for Violin, 150; his Vocal Works, and Handel's (Letter of Robert Franz, 100, 118, 121, 137, 145; what R. Franz has done for them (A. W. Ambros), 200; do. 220
 Ballada, English, and Dolby's Ballad Concerts, 120; Atlantic Monthly on.....244
 Bands, Martial and Civic, 103; French, German and English at the "Peace Jubilee," 204, 277, 283, 287

Beethoven: his Eighth Symphony, 6; Pastoral do., 134; "Eroica" do. (R. Wagner's conception of it), 257; first Symphony, 342, 344; Seventh, do., 351; his 4 "Leonore" Overt's, 143, 413; Overture "Weihe des Hauses," 214; his Piano Concertos, 191, 100, 230, 391; music to "Ruins of Athens," 224, 874; to "Egmont,".....222
 Beethoven Centennial, (by Rev. R. L. Collier, 2; at Bonn, 85, 98, 103, 110 (B. J. L.); "Beethoven" by R. Wagner, extracts from.....273
 Beethoven: Thayer's Life of, second vol. 79; (reviewed by Dr. Ed. Hanslick), 140; his interview with Schubert (Haweis), 211; Bust of, by Story.....250
 Belgian Artisans' Choir.....203
 Benedict, Sir Julius.....13
 Bennett, Sir Wm. Sterndale, 13, 202, 259 (Punch); Schumann's notice of, in 1837, 220; his "Woman of Samaria".....54

Berlioz: and Cherubini.....188
 Blind, The: Musical Education of.....227, 205
 Bologna, Music in.....309
 Boston Hubbub, The (N. Y. Albion), 267; Boston Pomposo (Lond. Orch).....207
 Boston: Musical prospect for 1871-2, 70, 115; for 1872-3, 204; Music in its Public Schools, 18, 26, 30, 52, 246, 386; Public Library: Musical Department of, 87; Singers Abroad.....94
 Braham, John: his Career, (Lond. Mus. World, 1854).....171, 178
 Brahms, Johannes: his Serenade in A minor, 204
 Brandes, Mlle. the Pianist.....13
 Bristow, Geo. F. His "Arcadian" Symphony, 309
 British Orchestral Society, The.....367
 Buck, Dudley: his Motets, 153; appointed Organist to Boston Music Hall.....205
 Buclow, Hans von: (by Ferd. Hiller), 213; his Life and Works.....65
 Burgmüller, Norbert: Sketch of; his Piano Concerto.....151
 Byrd, William: his Madrigals.....208

Campanini, Italo, the Tenor Singer.....248
 Capoul, M., the French Tenor.....71, 70, 110, 108
 Carafa, Michael. Obituary.....303
 Carreno, Miss Teresa, the pianist.....327
 Carey, Henry.....236
 Cary, Miss Annie Louise.....230
 Charity Children, the: their Singing at St. Paul's (J. Hullah), 68; do. (Lond. Choir), 241
 Cherubini: his "Water Carrier," 134, 173, 183, 200; C. and Berlioz, 188; his Overture to "Lodoiska," 214; to "Les Abencerrages".....374
 Chicago, Pyro-Musically Considered.....124
 Chickering Piano, The.....223
 Chopin: Recollections of, and Liszt. By Lenz, 377; his "Krakowiak".....308
 Chorley, H. F. Obituary sketch of.....202
 Church Music Association, The, in N. York, 102, 364
 Church Music. (J. S. D.).....238
 Cirillo, Signor, the Singing teacher from Naples.....281, 318
 Clementi, Muzio, 74; Described by Moscheles, 337
 Claque, The, a Parisian Institution.....92
 Competitive Trials of Vocal Associations in Belgium. (Ferd. Hiller).....306
 Concerto Organ Playing at the Royal Albert Hall. (Lond. Orch).....93

CONCERTS IN BOSTON:
 Apollo Club.....135, 254, 374
 Boston Conservatory.....231, 239, 247
 Cary, Miss Annie Louise.....230
 Chamber Concerts.....406, 414
 Daum, Hermann: Farewell.....7
 Dixey, R. C. Concert for Museum of Fine Arts, 15; "Lohengrin" music.....231
 English Ballad Concerts: Mr. Geo. Dolby's Troupe, 126
 Finkenstaedt, Miss Anna: Private Piano Matinee, 318
 Germania Band: Promenade Concerts.....55
 Handel and Haydn Society: Easter Oratorios ("Messiah" and "Creation," with Mlle. Nilsson), 7; Triennial Festival of 1871, 15, 22, 22, 29, 30, 32, 34, 38, 46, 48, 53, 62, 69;—Thanksgiving Oratorios ("Elijah" and "Judas Maccabaeus," with Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Patey, W. H. Cummings and Santley, 142; Christmas: "St. Paul" and "Messiah" (with same artists), 159; Stabat Mater, &c., with the English singers, 174;—"Messiah" at Christmas, 359; "Elijah" and "Judas Maccabaeus," with Mlle. Rudersdorff, Miss Fairman, Mr. Varley, Mr. Whitney, &c.....300
 Harvard Musical Association: Symphony Concerts, 6; Seventh Season, 110, 127, 134, 143, 151, 163, 166, 180, 181, 190, 204, 206, 214; Eighth Season, 295, 327, 335, 342, 343, 344, 351, 366, 374, 378, 383, 391, 397, 406, 413
 Heine, Joseph, the blind Violinist.....111, 223
 Hills, J. A. Piano Recital.....136

Kreis, Miss Marie: Piano Recitals.....7, 23
 Kreisemann, Aug., Testimonial to.....399, 414
 Kutzleb, Aug., Matinee.....230
 Lang, B. J. Chamber Concerts at the "Globe," 191, 214; Symphony Concerts with his pupils, 214, 223, 230, 239
 Leachard, Hugo, and Julius Elchberg: Trio Matinees, 127, 143, 149, 159, 167, 167, 173, 183; Concert in honor of Robt. Franz, 191, 199; Matinees, 382, 391, 407
 Listemann Quartet Matinees.....14, 23
 Mehlis, Miss Anna: Piano Recitals, 167, 175, 190, 223, 413
 Mendelssohn Glee Club of New York.....23
 Mendelssohn Quintette Club.....318, 391, 398, 407
 Messrs. Sumner, Apthorp, Adams and Tucker (B. J. Lang's pupils): Piano Concerts.....14, 23
 Moulton, Mrs. Charles.....127, 135
 National Musical Congress.....52, 56, 64
 New England Conservatory.....215, 247, 335
 Organ Concerts, Music Hall: J. K. Paine, 207; D. Buck.....207, 295
 Osgood, Geo. L., in Chelsea.....310
 Parepa-Rosa, Mme.....111
 Peace Jubilee (P. S. Gilmore's International of 1872).....84, 120, 163, 253, 262, 263, 267, 283, 290, 275, 277, 279, 282, 286
 Peck, A. P., Annual Benefit Concert, 15; Popular Concerts.....111, 335, 350
 Perabo, Ernest.....14, 23, 167, 173, 190, 414
 Petersilea, Carlyle: Piano Recitals, 167, 335;—Beethoven Recitals.....255
 Phillips, Miss Adelaide.....111
 Popular Orchestral Concerts.....333
 Public School Children.....30, 246
 Rudersdorff, Mme. Erminia, and her Concert troupe (Miss Alice Fairman, Miss Therese Liebe, Mr. Nelson Varley).....271, 285, 367, 375, 382
 Rubinstein, Anton (with H. Wieniawski, Mlle. Liebhart and Mlle. Ormyni).....326, 334, 362
 Strakosch Concerts, (Carlotta Patti, Miss Cary, Teresa Carreno, Sig. Mario and Emil Saurel).....318, 327
 Suckow, Christian: Soirée.....207
 Thayer, Eugene: Free Organ Recitals.....23, 47, 335
 Thomas Theodore: Orchestral Concerts, 15, 150, 190, 222, 350
 Zerrahn, Carl: Annual Concert.....6, 222

Concours International of Singers at Verviers, 306
 Conducting from Memory. By Ferd. Hiller, 289
 Conservatory, The, at Naples, 108, 281; at Leipzig, 252; at Paris.....300

CORRESPONDENCE:

Berlin, Prussia.....352
 Bonn, Germany.....103
 Brooklyn, N. Y.....240, 381
 Chicago.....124, 156, 244, 302, 333, 380
 Dresden.....415
 Farmington, Conn.....63
 Florence, Italy: Wagner's "Lohengrin".....185
 Hartford, Conn.....24
 London.....60, 144
 Milwaukee.....184
 New York, 16, 29, 34, 111, 128, 135, 152, 167, 176, 183, 191, 200, 204, 215, 228, 231, 245, 246, 261, 279, 311, 319, 321, 333, 341, 349, 365, 373, 381, 389, 415
 Philadelphia, 16, 136, 150, 215, 223, 224, 232, 239, 246, 340, 349, 357, 338, 366, 380, 392, 400, 407
 Washington, D. C.....255

Costa, Sir Michael: his Orchestra at Drury Lane.....86
 Crammings. Lond. Mus. World.....310
 Cramer, J. B., 74; Described by Moscheles, 312, 328
 Crystal Palace Concerts, London, 85, 190, 220, 300, 368; "National Music Meetings" at.....277
 Cummings, Wm. H., the English Tenor, 31, 80, 126, 142, 174; his "Fairy Ring" Cantata.....253
 Curwin, Rev. J. His musical influence in England.....84
 Cusins, W. G.: his Oratorio "Gideon".....106

- Darley, W. H. W. Obituary Notice of. Philadelphia Bulletin.....206
 Demorest, Miss Vienna: Concert in N. York (Sun).....27
 Distant Music. H. C. Lunn in Lond. Mus. Times.....226
 Dolby Troupe of English Singers, The, 80, 120, 142, 174
 Doria, Miss Clara.....183
 Drasdil, Miss Anna, the Contralto singer.....358
 Drayton, Henry. Obituary.....310
 Dublin University, music at 164; musical Lecture at.....165
 Duprez: his School of Singing.....25
 Dussek: his Piano Sonatas.....399
- Echo in Music. Builder.....95
 Ellerton, J. Lodge, Death of.....407
 Elvey, Sir George J.....13
 English Opera. Once a Week. (See Opera).....168
 English Schools, Music in.....236
 Erba, Dionysius: Did Handel borrow from him? Lond. Orch......107
 Esser, Heinrich. Obituary notice of.....303
 Evenings at the Theatre in Italy. E. Hanslick.....369
- Fairman, Miss Alice, the English Contralto, 351, 367, 390
 Familiar Music. Globe.....213
 Fétis, F. J. Obituary sketch of his Life, 15, 43; his Library.....228
 Fiddles, Facts about. Chas. Reade.....307
 Finkenstaedt, Miss Anna, the Pianist.....318
 Form in Music.....355, 363, 402
 Franz, Robert: his Songs, 135, 192, 199, 201, 208, 382, 398; his added accompaniments to Bach and Handel, 135, 109, 118, 121, 137, 145, 208, 398; Complimentary Concert to, in Boston.....199
 Freiburg: its Organ and Keeper (Story about Mendelssohn).....108
- Gade, N. W. His third Symphony, in A minor, 182; second do, in E.....351
 German National Hymns.....322
 German Works on Music. Recent.....184
 Gillott Sale, The, of Musical Instruments.....250
 Gilmore, Patrick S., and "Peace Jubilee," 84, 120, 163, 255, 262, 263, 277, 282, 286; his Book (Nation), 163; his "Guns" and Handel's Fireworks Music.....259
 Glogner-Castelli, Carl.....106
 Goddard, Mme. Arabella, 200, 220; her Farewell in London.....300, 408
 Goethe: and Mendelssohn, 187, 284, 339; his Frederike, 256; his Songs (J. S. D.).....347
 Godfrey, Dan., and his Grenadier Band.....283
 Gossec, From the French.....385, 393, 401, 400
 Gounod, Charles: his Mass, 36; his grievances in England.....364 Grist, Julia, (by N. P. Willis).....314
- Hagen, Theodore. Obituary notice of.....167
 Halle, Germ., described by C. Loewe.....90, 113
 Handel: as an Oratorio writer, 77; his "Israel in Egypt," 39; "Joshua," 49; "Dettingen Te Deum," 61; "Judith Macabæus," 142, 390; "Theodora," 185; "Deborah," 189, 195; "Athaliah," 195; "Messiah," 358; "L'Allegro," &c., 320; his Fireworks music, 250; Arias from his Italian Operas, arranged by R. Franz, 135, 382, 383, 398; his Oboe Concertos, 143; Organ Concertos, 259; Additional Accompaniments to his Oratorios, &c. (Letter by Robert Franz), 109, 118, 121, 137, 145, 209, 399; an Educator in England.....155
 Handel or Erba. London Orchestra.....107
 Handel and Haydn Society. Annual Meetings and Reports, 40, 44, 55; its first Oratorio performance (in 1815).....150
 "Harvard" Symphony Concerts, The, and Harper's "Easy Chair".....378, 383
 Haweis, Rev. H. R. Extract from his "Music and Morals".....265
 Hayden, Charles R., the Tenor singer.....309, 407
 Haydn: compared with Handel, 77; his Oxford Symphony, 151; Symphony in E flat, 366; other Symphonies, 183, 340; his Cantata "Ariadne at Naxos," 342, 344; Imperial Mass.....364
 "Heavy" Music.....88
- Hiller, Ferdinand: in London, 4, 11, 13; his "Nala and Damayanti," 4, 11; his "Chit-chat" in the Koelnische Zeitung, 213, 306; his 60th Birthday at Cologne.....149
 Hints on Musical Worship. J. S. D.....238
 History of Music: Mr. J. K. Paine's Lectures on the.....8, 11
 Hoffman, Richard, the Pianist.....182, 383
 Home Music. [S. M. C.].....57
 "Home, Sweet Home?" By Donizetti, or by Bishop? London Papers.....167
 Horsley, C. E. His Reminiscences of Mendelssohn, 345, 353, 360; directs Church Mus. Association in New York.....304
 Hullah, John: his influence in England.....84
 Hummel, J. N.....74
- Improvement in Popular Song Writing. Atlantic Monthly.....244
 Individualism in Art. M. Coquerel.....130
 Inside Views of the Jubilee Chorus. Daily Advertiser.....267
 Italian Opera in London: The Season reviewed. Times.....292
 Italy, Music in, by Ambros, 249; Evenings at the Theatre in [Hanslick].....369
- Joachim, Joseph: in London, 5, 209; his Hungarian Concerto.....269
 Joachim, Mme. Amalia.....13, 371
 Jullien, L. A., in England.....84
 "Jullien II" (Louis George). Eve. Gazette.....133
- Kalkbrenner, the Pianist.....74, 193, 313
 Kapellmeister Music [Hamburg].....416
 Klauser, Karl: Sketch of by L. Damrosch.....203
 Krebs, Marie, the Pianist, 7; [See Concerts].....158
 Kreissmann, Aug. Testimonial Concert to.....399, 414
- Lanner, the Waltz Composer.....314
 Laussot, Mme. J. Letter from, about "Lohengrin" in Italy.....185, 191
 Leipzig: its Fairs and Music, 133; its Conservatory, 252; its Gewandhaus Concerts, 148, 164, 175, 189, 205, 215, 221, 237, 272, 352, 359, 397
 Leopold I., Emperor of Germany: his Devotion to Music.....177
 Liebe, Fr. Therese, the Violinist.....343, 367, 383
 Light, Waves of, and of Sound. Prof. Tyndall.....371
 Lind-Goldschmidt, Mme. in Florence, 165; Libel on.....15
 Liszt, Franz: and Rubinstein, 147, 180; his Concert at Pesth, 230; his Piano Concertos, 159; "Don Juan" Fantasia, 159; his "Symphonic Poems," 180, 182; Described by Richard Wagner, 180; L. and Chopin. Lenz's Recollections of.....377
 Loewe, Carl: his Story of his Early Life, 73, 81, 89, 97, 105, 113; his Autobiography reviewed by Hanslick.....297
 Lucca, Pauline: at St. Petersburg; Letter from Olga Eisbein, 212; in London, 253; in New York, 321, 325, 333; in Philadelphia, 358; in Boston.....375
- Macfarren, G. A., His Cantata "Outward Bound".....328
 Madriale, Rise and Progress of, in England [Dr. Rimbault].....208
 Mario, Signor: Sketch of, by himself, and his Retirement, 77, 83; his Repertory, 83; revisits America.....317, 318, 327
 Mason, Dr. Lowell. Obituary Notice.....205
 Mason, William: his Piano Technics, by W. S. B. Mathews.....105
 Matthews, Charles. A Card from.....348
 Mazzini's Musical Opinions.....304
 Mehlig, Miss Anna.....159, 164, 166, 167, 223
 [See also Concerts].
 Mendelssohn. More Letters by, 57, 66; and his Reformation Symphony [M. Coquerel], 131; his "Elijah," 142, 390; "St. Paul" in St. Paul's, 355, 372; M. and the Freiburg Organ, 188; and Goethe, 187; his Songs, 193, 407; Overture to "Athaliah," 206, 343; "Meeresstille" Overture (Schumann), 284; Personal Recollections of by F. Rahles, 252; by his English Pupil (C. E. Horsley), 345, 353, 361; in Paris in his Youth, 308; My first meeting with, at Goethe's house, by Prof. Lohbe, 339; his Death [by Moscheles].....356
 Meyerbeer. his influence on the Art of Singing, 17; as a Leader.....301
- Milton and Music. College Herald.....161
 Miracle Plays, The Ancient. Mrs. Child.....146
 Modesty in Musicians.....103
 Moscheles, I. His Biography by his Widow (Hanslick), 305; in London (from the Biography).....313, 329, 337
 Moulton, Mrs. Charles.....123, 127, 132, 135
 Mozart: his "Idomeneo," 45, 260; his "Nozze di Figaro" Overture, 398; his Concert Arias, 134, 342, 344, 360, 383, 406; Symphony No. 6, in C, 143; Piano Concertos, 181; his unpublished Ballet "Les Petits Riens," 404; Sonata in D for two Pianos.....407
 Musical Festivals: The Festival Season (Ed.) 62; do. [Lond. Orch.], 115; Handel Triennial at Crystal Palace, London 59, 63, 69; Lower Rhine, at Cologne, 62, 49; Handel and Haydn Soc., Triennial, Boston, 62, 30, 46, 53; Worcester, Mass., 336; Cincinnati, 376; Gloucester, Engl., 63, 106; Worcester, Engl., 312, 319, 324; Norwich, Engl., 312, 328; Saengerfest at New York, 61; at St. Louis, 288; Beethoven Centenary at Bonn, 85, 98, 103, 119; the First at Birmingham [1768].....410 (See also "Peace Jubilee," and Concerts.)
 Musical Congress, the "National," in Boston, 52, 64; Form, 155, 363, 402; Pitch, 197; Maxims (Schumann) 217; Education of the Blind (Lond. Mirror), 227; Worship, (J. S. D.), 238; Instruments, Ancient (Chas. Reade), 266, 307; Culture in Naples, 281. Supper Party, a. [N. P. Willis].....314
 Music: its Origin and Influence, [Quart. Rev.], 90; the new German, 11; M. "Light" and "Heavy" [J. S. D.], 87; Familiar [Globe], 213; "Passion" in [Haweis] 213; Distant.....326
 Music: in Boston Public Schools. [Dr. J. B. Upham], 18, 26, 386; Annual Exhibitions, 39, 52, 246; in Boston Public Library, 37; in Spain, 139; M. and Drawing in Boston Schools [Mr. Underwood's Report], 235; in English Schools.....236
 Music Lessons, S. M. C.....79
 Music School, the "Normal," [W. S. B. Matthews].....303
 Music and Statuary in our Public Schools... 19
- MUSIC ABROAD. [See also CORRESPONDENCE :
 Baden-Baden.....384
 Bayreuth.....88, 149, 184, 205, 253, 360
 Berlin, 5, 28, 37, 46, 63, 165, 176, 189, 216, 253, 263, 317, 384
 Bologna.....149, 169, 177, 185
 Bonn.....85, 98, 119, 397
 Breslau.....149, 394
 Brussels.....117, 253
 Carlsruhe.....165, 381
 Cairo, (Egypt).....192
 Cologne.....6, 29, 37, 49, 149, 176, 189, 197, 213, 221, 312, 328, 378, 384
 Cassel.....271, 384
 Constantinople.....294
 Darmstadt.....360
 Dresden.....189, 200, 216, 384
 Dublin.....164, 165
 Dusseldorf.....165, 189, 237, 271, 272, 285, 370
 Elinburg.....205
 Elbing, Prussia.....205
 Frankfurt-on-the-Main.....6, 149, 189, 200, 384
 Florence.....165, 185, 369
 Geneva.....263
 Gloucester, England.....106
 Glasgow.....147
 Hamburg.....5, 165, 189, 394, 416
 Halle.....216, 221
 Hanover.....222
 Leipzig.....71, 86, 133, 148, 164, 165, 175, 189, 205, 215, 221, 237, 252, 272, 311, 352, 359, 384, 397
 London.....4, 11, 12, 13, 17, 20, 21, 28, 37, 45, 69, 63, 68, 71, 76, 82, 83, 85, 93, 94, 117, 144, 156, 189, 200, 205, 219, 220, 227, 228, 234, 236, 237, 241, 248, 253, 259, 269, 272, 277, 284, 290, 292, 293, 294, 312, 348, 355, 360, 367, 372, 396, 416
 Madrid.....5, 138
 Milan.....117, 184, 237, 272, 312
 Munich.....117, 149, 293, 312, 327, 360, 384, 397
 Naples.....29, 108, 241, 281
 Norwich, [Engl.].....294, 312, 328
 New Zealand.....226
 Oberammergau.....32, 67, 74, 146
 Paris.....82, 88, 117, 139, 148, 165, 189, 216, 248, 300, 312, 376, 384, 397, 415
 Pesth.....117, 230, 387
 Prague.....5, 166
 Rome.....176
 Salzburg.....117
 The Hague.....312
 St. Petersburg.....212
 Strassburg.....95, 117
 Stuttgart.....189, 397
 Verviers, [Belgium].....306
 Vienna, 5, 28, 86, 117, 149, 184, 188, 189, 222, 237, 247, 254, 256, 294, 312, 360, 371, 384, 397, 416
 Weimar.....384
 Worcester, [Engl.].....294, 312, 319, 324
 Yokohama, [Japan].....14
- MUSIC IN VOLS. XXXI. and XXXII.:
 Bach's "St. Matthew Passion Music," completed from page 18.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE: (See also CORRESPONDENCE):

- Binghampton, N. Y. 302
 Chelsea, Mass. 310
 Chicago. 303
 Cincinnati. 376
 Farmington, Conn. 63, 158, 203
 Milwaukee. 376
 New York, 27, 35, 36, 61, 70, 71, 72, 88, 93, 104, 111, 123, 128, 135, 136, 141, 157, 162, 207, 212, 240, 263, 284, 317, 325, 336, 364, 379, 383
 Philadelphia. 7, 16, 72, 111, 136, 157
 Salem, Mass. 66
 St. Louis. 298
 Worcester, Mass. 7, 336, 375
- Naples: its Advantages to the musical student, 108, 280; its Opera. 241
 National Anthems. [Lond. Standard] 295; Songs [Hon S. Salisbury]. 332
 National Hymn, Wanted a. Neue Berliner Musik Zeitung. 322
 National Music Meetings at the Crystal Palace. 277, 284
 Necrology of Musicians. 303, 309
 Negro Folk Songs. N. Y. Weekly Review. 411
 New Musical Instrument: Atkins's "Hook Harmonium". 72
 Nilsson, Christine, [Mme. Rouzaud]: in Oratorio, 7; in Opera, 119, 121, 135, 141, 152, 191, 197, 198, 212, 215, 232; her Marriage. 283, 290
 "Normal" Music School, The. [W. S. B. Mathews]. 302
 Norman-Neruda, Mme., the Violinist. 46
 "Nothing new under the Sun;" a Saxon Gilmore in 1615. 301
- Opera: a History of, by C. Schulze, 1, 10, 25, 41; O. and the Art of Singing (C. Glogner-Castelli) 9, 17, 25; Can it be dissociated from Art? [Lond. Mus. World] 96; the Earliest in England. 168
 Opera in Boston: Italian [Nilsson, Capoul, Jamet, &c.], 119, 121, 191, 197, 198; English [Parepa-Rosa troupe], 174, 183; Lucca and Kellogg, 375; in Philadelphia, 232, 358, 366; in New York, 200, 212, 215, 228, 231, 311, 321, 325, 343, 341, 349, 415
 Opera in London, 4, 13, 82, 144, 228, 238, 248, 253, 272, 285, 291, 292; in Paris, 139, 248, 300, 384, 397; in Berlin, 28, 37, 216, 384; in Dresden, 384; Cologne, 384; in Vienna, 29, 222, 247, 312, 384, 397, 416; Munich 384; Hamburg, 384, 416; Italy, 144, 238, 241, 240, 312, 369; in St. Petersburg, 212; in Leipzig. 221, 237, 252, 272, 384
 Oratorios. New: Lond. Orchestra, 76; O. Question in New York, 93; the first in Boston. 159
 Orchestra. The Soul of the, 94; of Ladies from Vienna. 104
 Orchestras in our Theatres. Atlantic Monthly. 370
 Orchestral Players. Haweis. 281
 Organs: at Royal Albert Hall 20; Handel's 259
 Organ Playing: at Royal Albert Hall 93; in Boston. 207, 295
 Organs and Organ Playing. Lond. Orch.. 251
 Organist. The Oldest in America. 381
 Orpheon Free Vocal School in New York. Letter from Jerome Hopkins. 128
 Osgood, George L., the Boston Tenor, 188, 191, 216, 263, 310, 351
- Paganini, Nic. From the German. 223, 233
 Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau. 67, 74, 146
 "Passion" in Music. Music and Morals. 213
 Patey, Mme., the English Contralto, 126, 142, 174
 Patti [Carlotta] and Mario. N. Y. Tribune. 317
 Pauer, Herr: his Piano Recital in London. 147
 Paulus, M. George and his French Band, 264, 277
 "Peace Jubilee" Gilmore's International. [See Concerts.] 287
 Peschka-Leutner, Mme. 287
 Piano-Forte Playing: Mason & Hoadley's System for Beginners. 36, 195
 Piano-Forte: The Chickering. 223
 Pierson, Dr. Henry Hugh. Obituary Notice. 396
 Pitch, Musical. 197
- POETRY:
 Ballad of the Boston Fire, Nov. 10, 1872. G. P. Lathrop. 337
 Chicago, (Oct. 10, 1871). Bret Hart. 121
 Faith: a Sonnet. 73
 Goods gone—something gone! From Goethe. 338
 J. S. D. 321
 Mozart: a Sonnet. Celia Thaxter. 321
 My Old Red Violin. Harper's Weekly. 169
 Nilsson's Madman: a Prison Soliloquy. N. Y. Eve. Post. 185
 Parables. From Goethe. J. S. D.. 345
 Regrets. 97
 Science: a Sonnet. X.. 338
 Shadows: a Sonnet. X.. 265
 Shadows: do. 265

- Tears. 108
 Telegrams. 65
 The Grand Orchestra. Henry Ames Blood. 225
 The Love of God. Mrs. Richard Greenough. 321
 The Music of the Future, by a Modern. Lond. Spectator. 273
 The Morning Glory: a Sonnet. 49
 The Organ Blower. O. W. Holmes. 161
 To Beethoven: a Sonnet, by C. Woman's Journal. 409
 When the Elves at dawn do pass. H. F. Chorley. 202
 "Where did you come from, Baby dear?" Geo. MacDonald. 113
 Poniatowski, Prince, as a Composer. 266
 Prima-Donnas. Lond. Globe. 316
 Programmes, Specimens of at Gilmore's "Jubilee". 279
 Potter, Cipriani: Obituary Notices. 122, 138
 Poultry Concert in the Boston Music Hall. Eve. Gazette. 199
- Raff, Joachim. His second Symphony, 199; 4th do. in G minor, 365; his "Forest" Symphony, 380; Quartet, op. 77. 398
 Rameau, J. P. 385, 393
 Refinement. 388
 Reinecke, Carl: Biographical Sketch of, by E. J. Butler, 101; in London, 229; his Concertstueck, op. 38. 230
 Rembrandt: M. Coquerel's Lecture. 130
 Ritter, F. L. His second ("Sardanapalus") Symphony, 307; his "History of Music," 335
 Rosa, Parepa, Mme. 285
 Rossini: his "La Gazza Ladra". 175, 191
 Rouzand, Mme. (See Nilsson).
 Royal Albert Hall in London. 12, 20, 218
 Rubini. From La Revue des Deux Mondes, 1854. 122, 131
 Rubinstein, Anton: his artistic career. Lond. Chort, 147, 331; Estimate of by Dr. H. W. Bellows, 357; his "Etude Infernale," 151; Concerto in D minor, 158, 326; in G, 181, 183; "Ocean" Symphony, 158, 222, 391; Trio in B flat, op. 52, 27; Quintet, op. 59, 399; Piano Compositions, 333, 414; R. in New York, 317, 319, 321, 325, 349, 365, 373; in Boston, 326, 334, 367; in Philadelphia. 381
 Rudersdorff, Mme. Erminia, 31; in Boston, 69, 286, 303, 343, 344, 359, 367, 382, 390
- Salem, Mass., Oratorio Society. 66
 Santley, Charles, the English Baritone, 126, 136, 142, 147, 174, 200, 253
 Sarate, Senor, the Violinist. 245
 Saro, Herr, and his Prussian Grenadier Band. 271, 283, 287
 Schneider, John, the German Organist. 93
 Schubert, Franz: Sketch of his Life and Works, by Haweis, 210, 218; Unveiling of his Statue in Vienna, 254; his Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella," 134, 342; Symphony in B flat, 190; his Songs [Ambros]. 193
 Schumann, Mine Clara. 200, 371, 396, 416
 Schumann, Robert: his Music, 11; (Arcadian) 379; his Life by Wasielewski, translated by Miss Alger, 149; his Literary Works to be translated, 149; his "Manfred" music, 134, 406; Concertstueck in G, 391; Sonatas for Piano and Violin, 150, 167; Romances for Oboe and Piano, 150, 219; Quartet with Piano, 150, 414; Quintet with Piano, 382, 414; Trio do. op. 110, 399; Symphony in D minor, 151, 398; in C, 204, 206; Overture to "Bride of Messina," 159; to "Genoveva," 166, 342, 348; "Carneval," 326; Fantasie, op. 17, for Piano, 173; "Waldscenen," 190; Etudes Symphoniques, 191, 416; Piano Concerto, 206; his Songs [Ambros], 193; his Rules for young Musicians (translated by J. S. D.), 217; his Estimate of W. Sterndale Bennett. 220
 Score, a Musical: defined by Ferd. Hiller. 288
 Simon, Jules: his address at the Conservatoire in Paris. 300
 Singing, the Art of, (C. Glogner-Castelli), 9, 17, 25, 33; Do. by W. H. Daniell, 388, 395, 404, 411; how taught in Naples, and by Italians in America, 281; in Tune and out of Tune. Guide Musical. 308
 Slave Melodies of the South. 411
 Sobolewski, Edward. Obituary Notice. 309
 Soloists, and their Perils. Haweis. 285
 Sonata Form, The. By W. G. McNaught. 402
 Song Writers: What is required of them. 129
 Song Writing, Improvement in. Atlantic Monthly. 244
 Sound Waves. Prof. Tyndall. 370
 Standbridge, J. C. B. Obituary Notice. Philad. Bulletin. 157

- "Star-Spangled Banner," &c. Its Origin, by Hon. S. Salisbury. 332
 Sterling, Miss Antoinette. 157
 Stockhausen, Julius: his Letter on 'A Matter of Principle'. 219
 Story, Wm. W. His Bust of Beethoven. 256
 Strauss, Johann: in America. 263, 270, 276, 286; the Father and the Sons. 314
 Stuttgart Conservatory of Music. 397
 Suckow, Christian, the Norwegian Violinist. 207
 Supper Party, a Musical. N. P. Willis. 314
 Symphony Concerts, The, in Boston, and Harper's "Easy Chair". 373, 383
- Taglioni, Mme. Lond. Echo. 79
 Tartini: his Violin Music. 383
 Taubert, Wm. His Overture: "Tausend und Eine Nacht". 206
 Tausen-ism. From the German of W. Tappert. 159
 Taussig, Carl, Obituary Notice and Life of 86; Do. by H. von Buelow. 116, 123, 127
 Taylor, S. P., Organist. 381
 Tenors, What is becoming of our. 260
 Thalberg, Sigismund: Obituary Notice of, 27, 43; recalled by Harper's "Easy Chair". 51
 Thayer, A. W. His Life of Beethoven, 79, 140; Visit to Boston. 79
 Thomas, Ambroise: his "Mignon," 141, 197, 198; "Hamlet". 212, 215
 Thomas, Theodore, and his Orchestra. (See Concerts.) His mixed Programmes, 150; his "Summer Nights" (concerts) at Central Park Garden, 246, 284, 311; at Steinway Hall. 341, 365, 381
 Those Names! [A "Jubilee" trick]. 263
 Three New Musical Knights, The. Lond. Orch.. 13
 To Be, or Not to Be (a "native composer"). 28
 Tune, and Out of Tune, in Singing. 308
 Turk,—as Teacher, described by C. Löwe. 97
 Tyndall, Prof., on Waves of Sound, Water and Light. 370
- Ulrich, Hugo. Obituary Notice. 303
 Urso, Mme. Camille, the Violinist. 200, 367
- Varley, Nelson, the English Tenor. 366, 383, 391, 414
 Verdi: his "Aida" at Cairo. 191
 Voice, The Human: Mr. G. V. Lee's Theory of, 315, 323; How to Use it (W. H. Daniell). 388, 395, 404, 411
- Wachtel, the German Tenor, Letter from D. E. F. Philadelphia. 179
 Wagner, Richard: his Music, 12; in Berlin, 37; in Vienna, 257; in London, 408; his "Lohengrin," 33, 149, (R. Franz), 151; do. in Italy, 169, 177, 183, 191, 369; his Festival at Bayreuth, 88, 117, 149, 184, 205, (E. Hanslick's letter), 257; his Speech on laying the Corner Stone, 258; his Kaiser March, 151; his Collected Writings, 172; his Opinion of Liszt, 180; his Autobiography, 194; his Essay on Beethoven, 273; his "Ritt der Walküren," 351; Wagner Union in New York. 415
 Waltz, the true Tempo of the. N. Y. Weekly Review. 376
 Waltz Composers. 226, 314
 Wanted: a National Hymn. Lond. Mus. World. 322
 Warning, A, Unheeded: a Frenchman on "Der Freyschuetz". 340
 Waves of Sound, Water and Light. Tyndall. 370
 Weber, Von: his Overture to "The Ruler of the Spirits," 160, 343, 344; his "Der Freyschuetz," 240; in Italy, 369; his Piano Music. 334
 Whitney, M. W., the Bass Singer. 358, 390, 406
 What is becoming of our Tenors? Guide Musical. 360
 What lack we yet, (as to Singing Societies in Boston)? 78
 What the ("Jubilee") Chorus thinks of itself. Daily Advertiser. 261
 Wieniawski, Henri, the Violinist, 317, 319, 321, 325, 326, 334, 340, 365, 267
 Wieprecht, Wilhelm: Obituary notice of, 303; Anecdote of. 311
 Wilbye John: his Madrigals. 298
 Wilhelmi the Violinist. 352
 Wizard of the G-String. The. [See Paganini].
 Wynne, Miss Edith, the English Soprano, 126, 142, 174
- Zapfenstreich, the, in Berlin. 317
 Zelter and his Pupil. 384, 339

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 783.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 1.

A History of Opera.

BY O. SCHULZE*

It is no easy task to give, in the narrow limits of a journal, a clear and complete picture of the origin, progress and development of Opera, a work of art to the production of which such different arts: poetry, vocal and instrumental music, elocution, mimicry, painting and perspective, dancing and mechanics, have with sisterly love aided each other—a work of art, which, in the course of time, has gone through the most varied changes, to whose worship men have erected, all over the globe, thousands of temples, where thousands of singers, of both sexes, raise their voices, and which, every evening, delights the hearts and senses of an endless crowd of auditors. The historical picture which I shall endeavor to place before the eyes of my readers, would, certainly, be clearer and more striking if it could be illustrated by musical examples. But, owing to the limited space at my disposal, I must renounce all ideas of this sort. My object must be only to draw, in sharp outlines, the course of development which dramatic poetry, in the closest alliance with music, has pursued for nearly three hundred years.

At the same time that, in the far West, a new world was discovered, the dawn of a higher epoch of civilization was gilding the old one. Truth and reason lighted a fresh torch; the sciences awoke from their death-sleep, and the old Greek and Roman authors once more saw the day. Men plunged with love, nay, with enthusiasm, into classical antiquity, and, among the subjects belonging to it, old music attracted the attention of scholars and educated persons. People grew ecstatic about this music, concerning the true nature of which and the manner in which it was practised, they knew about as much as a man born blind knows about colors. They placed it immeasurably higher than the music of the period, because, in the writings of ancient authors, they found glowing descriptions concerning its wonderful effects. The most profound reverence and admiration was above all entertained for the old Greek tragedies, with their choruses, which were regarded as musical models for imitation.

Greek Drama was formed out of epic (narrative) and lyrical poetry—the ode or song—and just the same process naturally took place in Germany and France. Odyssey and Iliad, Nibelungen and Gudrun, the Songs of Roland and of William, together with Greek lyrics, and the lays of minstrels and troubadours, are so many parallel links, fashioned quite independently of each other in the long chain of development followed by dramatic poetry.

The commencement of our modern dramas is to be found in the religious plays of the Middle Ages, in the Mysteries, as they were called, which used to be performed at Christmas, at Shrove-Tide, in Lent, and at Easter, in the market place, in the open country, and afterwards in the churches. This very last year, we have seen at Oberammergau, in Bavaria, the performance of one of these passion-plays, which, for centuries, has been repeated there from time to time, and in which nearly the entire village appears in action upon a natural stage. Such plays soon spread most widely in Germany, France, Italy and Spain. In the decretalia for the year 1230, of Pope Gregory IX., it is expressly mentioned that priests and deacons are to be masked in the church-plays. Music was allied at a very early period with these naïve dramatic essays. The German "Marienklage" (Lament of Mary), dating from the end of the 13th century, was actually all sung. Pilgrims returning from the Promised Land, and with sentiments elevated by the recollection of the holy places they had visited, sang Christ's Passion, the history of the Virgin Mary, and of the Apostles, and the legends of the Saints, first separately, and afterwards in chorus. But there was even dancing in these old plays, especially at Shrove-Tide.

Greek tragedy, and the religious plays of the Middle Ages, were, therefore, the two starting points of Opera in a poetically dramatic sense. What were they musically?

Vocal music had already reached the symphonic stage, and was probably also accompanied by instruments. The separate parts were, however, written according to the stiff rules of counter-point. One unison chord was neighbor of another. This produced a monotony which crushed all feeling. The melodic element was very subordinate, and the text was unintelligible to the auditors. The mind therefore was left entirely vacant by such compositions. Music was cultivated not only in churches, but in private life as well, at the courts of temporal and spiritual nobles, especially on festive occasions. As musical forms in profane music there gradually rose up the Ballad, and the Canzone, or dance-song, the Maggiolata, or May-Song, the Carnival Song, and the Madrigal, or Love-Song. If to these we add the Chorus, the Interlude, as it was called, and the dramatic Scena, we have enumerated all the steps, by which opera at first victoriously ascended. The last-mentioned forms appeared as early as in the dramatic performances got up at the Courts of the Estes in Ferrara, and of the Medici in Florence and in Rome, on festive occasions, at the end of the 15th century. The chorus was introduced into tragedies, and the prologue or intermezzo, into comedies. The intermezzo was originally a madrigal for several voices. At a later period, one or other of the vocal parts was accompanied by music, as was the case in a pastoral by Beccario, in Ferrara, about 1550, in which the priest appears upon the stage with a lyre, and sings his part. If to all this we add the important fact that, at the same time, Italian painting, imitating Antiquity, had raised itself to a height never anticipated, and imparted greater brilliancy and magnificence than ever to the Court-festivals of the above-named princes, and that the Italian language, by its clear, melodious vocalization, and its simple consonant-combinations, appeared, more than any other, as though made expressly for music, we shall not be astonished that Italy was the native land of Opera.

We may call Florence the cradle of Opera. We there find, about 1580, in the house of that lover and patron of music, Giovanni Bardi, Count di Vernico, a small literary-musical circle, consisting of men of science and lovers of the art. Three of them: Vincenzo Galilei, the father of the celebrated astronomer; Count Bardi himself; and Girolamo Mei, had written valuable works, in which they set forth their views, on old and new music. They asserted distinctly that the new music was deficient in verbal grace and expression. From theory, they quickly proceeded to practice. Galilei was the first to write songs for one voice. The performance of the scene he composed of Count Ugolino, from Dante, and some fragments from the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which he sang himself accompanied on the tenor-viol, met with unanimous approbation from his auditors. It is true that these and other like essays in composition, especially those of the singer, Caccini, who had been living at the Court of Florence since 1564, are lost, but they must be regarded as the beginning of artistic solo song. After Count Bardi removed to Rome, where he was made a chamberlain of the Pope, the central point of the musical club was the house of the Florentine noble, Giacomo Corsi, who had written on the music of the Ancients, and composed canzonets. Among those who frequented the house were, also, the poet Ottavio Rinuccini, and the musician Peri. The efforts of all these men were directed to combining the words properly with the music, to recovering the old spoken-song of the Greeks, the true ancient Recitative, and more especially, to produce the same results by means of modern music. They endeavored to effect this by making the performer recite in a singing tone, by bringing the accompanying bass part, in passionately accented passages, in harmonic combination with the melody, and allowing the instrumental part to remain quiet only when the words were not strongly accented. They called this the "Stilo rappresentivo;" we call it now-a-days, Recitative.

Rinuccini then wrote a pastoral: Daphne, for which Peri and Caccini supplied the music, and which was performed, with the greatest applause, in Corsi's house.

But Rinuccini was still more fortunate with Euridice, in 1600. This poem was written by its clever, handsome, and enamored author for the marriage of Maria di Medici, whom he adored, with Henry IV. of France. Some of the airs in it were composed by Corsi; the part of Euridice and the choruses by Caccini; and all the rest by Peri, the solos being treated as recitative, and the choruses written very simply. The novelty of the thing, and the musical expression, aiming to be true, surprised all Florence, and Rinuccini's fame was soon spread about, a result to which the presence of so many princes of France and of Italy, and the co-operation of the best singers in the world, contributed their share.

Euridice was, it is true, rather a series of madrigals joined one on to the other than a tragic poem. The language was a mixture of antique notions and affected bombastic forms of modern expression, and the music awkward and stiff. Still, the new style, which, by the element in it of earthly love, unconsciously formed a sharp contrast to sacred music, excited enthusiasm everywhere. It was called: "nuova musica," "tragedia," or "drama per musica," "melo-drama;" and "tragicomedia."

The name of "opera" was not known till much later, and appeared first, in 1656, in an English opera book. Outward splendor of scenery and costume, and the sense-entrancing arts of dancing and mechanics were in no wise wanting to the first-born of Opera. From the very origin of melo-drama, the poets manifested, in a remarkable manner, a partiality for the wonderful and the magic element, in which of course the ignorance of the great masses always takes delight. Mythological subjects predominated for a long time in the musical drama. When the mythological notions of the Ancients were exhausted, authors turned to northern mythology. Demons, gnomes, and fairies appeared on the stage; the legend and the saga were rife in all directions. This tendency towards the Wonderful, a tendency that permeates opera even at the present day, appears to be instinctive, for the magic arts of the machinist and of the scene-painter have always had to serve as beauty-patches to vapid librettos and suspicious music.

The scenes in Euridice, for instance, represented first green fields; then the wide expanse of ocean; then smiling gardens; then a thunder-storm with dark clouds, rain, and wind; then the abodes in Elysium; and then the fearful torments of the infernal regions. From beneath the bark of trees, which opened of its own accord, the forms of fair maidens came forth; forests sprang up by magic, and were populated by fauns, satyrs, and dryads. Fountains and rivers gushed out, and were animated with nymphs.

*From the Berlin Echo. [Translated for the London Musical World.]

As another example of the scenic invention of that period, I will mention an allegorical spectacle of Capponi, of Bologna, which was performed, in the Carnival of 1628, in the Royal Palace of Turin, to celebrate the birthday of the Queen of France.

At the opening of the Royal hall, amid the loud sound of instruments, there appeared all the gods in heaven who are well disposed to man; each one sang a short recitative, answered by the chorus. Then the Elements appeared, symbolized under different shapes, namely: a ship, signifying water; a theatre, instead of the earth; a mountain vomiting flames, instead of fire; and a rainbow, instead of air. In a moment, the entire hall was filled with water, like a sea, on which the ship sailed slowly round; in the forepart of the latter, was a rich throne, prepared for the sovereign and the other princes of the Court. Here and there on the sides of the ship were engraved the arms of the provinces subject to the Duke of Savoy, and in the middle of it there was a large table, laid for forty persons. The god of the sea begged the prince, the ladies and the noblemen, to come on board, where they were waited on, at a rich banquet, by tritons, who brought the dishes on the backs of marine monsters. Meanwhile, on a rock, which rose at no great distance, was represented the story of Arion, who was flung into the sea and rescued by a dolphin. The music constituted the prologue. The first act set forth the departure of Arion, from his native place, Lesbos. In the second, he was seated singing on the dolphin. In the third, he was in Corinth, where King Periander expresses a wish to hear his misfortunes, and tells the sailors who had betrayed him who he is. At the end, the Sirens danced a ballet, invented by the Duke Carlo Emanuele.

Dancing, too, was thus, at an early period, the willing attendant of Opera. Rinuccini invented, especially during his stay in Paris, several beautiful dances, which, according to the custom of the period, were combined with vocal canzonets. The rhythm was marked by long-sustained, deep instrumental tones. It was not till later that the art rose to allegorical dances and ballet.

As a matter of course, orchestral music could not, in the first half of the 17th century, either satisfy artistic requirements, nor could the mind be really and profoundly moved by the singing. There was a want of musical contrasts, produced by the conscious employment of consonances and dissonances, and by free combinations of tones, not restricted by stiff rules. Peri and Caccini despised, it is true, counterpoint, but they had not reached such a height in art as to be able to come forward as reformers. Another master completed the schism in the old traditional harmonic chord system. This was Claudio Monteverde, born in 1568, at Cremona, and a pupil of Ingagneri. In two of his madrigals, which appeared in 1598, he introduced, in order to express deep passion, free dissonances, an innovation which occasioned a great sensation and a paper war. Orpheus, composed by him in 1607 for Mantua, far surpassed Peri's music. The declaimed portion was more energetic and more passionate than any before then; there were even cantilena-like passages in the music, and they must be regarded as the beginning of the subsequent sharply-defined difference between the recitative and the air. The bass, as an accompanying part, was more mobile, and took a share in the expression of the vocal part. The orchestra, which was strengthened, had more to do; took the interludes, and attempted, by different kinds of tone-coloring, to characterize the dramatic situation. Monteverde's Ariadne, the words of which were written by Rinucci, was produced in 1608, and created as great a sensation as his former work. The monologue, delivered by the heroine of the piece, when she has been deserted by Theseus, made an extraordinary impression on the public, and was long afterwards regarded as a musical masterpiece. Monteverde's fame now spread all over Italy. In this capacity, he continued to exercise a great influence upon the development of secular music, especially of the musical drama, though that influence did not penetrate very far, till after 1640, when regular operatic performances were given in Venice, particularly under the direction of his pupil, Cavalli, who developed still further the aria, and organized the orchestra.

Monteverde's operas made the round of all the theatres of Italy, predominating, more especially, at the theatre in Venice, a town which gave such performances the preference over any others. From 1637 to 1700, 357 operas, by some 40 composers, were produced at seven different theatres there. After Monteverde's death, in 1643, more and more adherents were gained over to the opinion that a number of harmonies, simply following each other, just like colors placed side by side in painting, could not touch our inward feelings or our mind, but that it was the drawing, i. e., the melody, alone which moved, excited, stirred, and charmed us, that it was melody which breathed life into the words of the poet. We may here name, as the representatives of melodic style, Cesti, Viadana, and Carissimi. Viadana applied these principles to the sacred concertos, which he invented, and his efforts, and more particularly Carissimi's, could not fail to affect opera also. Carissimi, who had been a chapelmaster in Rome since 1649, and up to 1680 marked an epoch in musical matters, never, it is true, wrote an opera, but carried the recitative and the melody of the drama into the chamber-cantata, as it was called, and thus facilitated extremely the further development of the musical form. Up to now, polyphonic choral song had exercised exclusive sway in church music. In the chamber-cantata, solos and chorus relieved each other concertante, and, in this way, were especially conducive to the further development of oratorio. This composer rendered, indirectly, great services to opera, by his efforts to introduce more delicate accentuation in the declamation; a more rhythmical song-like construction of the cantilena, as air and duet, by canonic treatment of solo-parts for several voices, and by the harmonic sub-basis of the recitative, in which, by means of modulation, the effect of the verbal expression is increased, and by means of greater mobility in the heavy basses.

This cantata style was without more ado at once introduced into the singing-drama by Carissimi's pupils, of whom I will mention only Buononcini, Bassani, Legrenzi, and the elder Scarlatti. It was more particularly Alexander Scarlatti (born, 1650; died, 1725), subsequently upper chapelmaster in Naples, and founder of the Neapolitan school, which far surpassed the Venetian school, who continued, with credit, his master's work. It was, through him, the glory of the flourishing days of Italian music, through him, who wrote hundreds of masses, cantatas, and oratorios, besides one hundred and nine operas alone; who declared Hasse to be the greatest master of harmony in Italy, and Jomelli the greatest composer of church-music of his day—it was through him that vocal music gained that soft, noble character for which this entire period was distinguished. Recitative, to which he lent still greater effect by an obligato instrumental accompaniment, attained, under him, a perfection previously unknown. With regard to the aria-form, he introduced the innovation of repeating it, though this innovation is found, also, simultaneously in the works of German composers, Steffani, for instance. Scarlatti's operas, of which the most important one is said to be La Principessa fidele, held sway all over Italy, and gained many admirers in Germany, also, especially at Vienna and Munich. It may safely be asserted that the influence of his school is perceptible even at present in Italian musical style.

Before proceeding further in the development of opera, it may not be out of place to cast a glance on the first spread of this new form of art. Even when scarcely born, it began its wanderings through the world. In Rome, the pastoral, L'Animo ed il Corpo (Soul and Body), by Cavaliere, was produced as early as 1600, and, in the carnival of the year 1606, the Romans saw, on a Theban car, which visited all the largest open squares in the Eternal City, five singers and five performers representing a musical drama by Quagliata, for the public amusement. Bologna was one of the first cities in Italy where melodrama settled, for Rinuccini's Euridice was performed there in 1601. In Venice, opera was introduced by Monteverde with Manelli's Andromeda, in private houses, in the palaces of the Doges, and, afterwards, in the theatre. All other large towns of Italy followed with amazing rapidity. Opera then traversed the Alps. In the year 1645, Mazarin sent for Italian operatic singers, men and women, to Paris, and the first opera given there was La finta Pazzo, performed in the presence of Louis XIV. This was followed, in 1647, by Peri's Orfeo ed Euridice, got up with extraordinary magnificence. In the year 1669, Perrin obtained the exclusive Royal privilege of composing for the French opera. This was the reason why Cambert, the composer, who felt affronted at it, left his country for England, importing thither the French musical drama.

Italian music, however, very soon supplanted French music again, but it could not obtain a firm footing in London. The best Italian operatic company, and the most energetic managers were sent for: the nobility gave thousands upon thousands; Handel industriously set one Italian book after another, and yet opera suffered shipwreck. One reason was that the Italian language clashed with the taste of the proud and prudish islanders; but a still more important one was that the rapid, offensive, books, and the acrobat-like tricks of the Italian bravura style, could warm no English heart. All the operas produced in London vanished as quickly as they came. It must, therefore, strike us as astonishing, that even down to the present day, that is to say, after a lapse of more than 140 years, one English opera has kept its ground, having, when first produced, been played sixty-three successive nights. I allude to The Beggars' Opera, by Gray. This work took like wildfire, always filling the house and the treasury, so as to give rise to the joke on the manager, Rich, and the composer, Gav; "The Beggars' Opera made Gav rich, and Rich gay."

The book of this patch-work affair is thoroughly immoral, frivolous, and impudent; the music consists of well-known melodies, treated in the form of popular songs; the whole is really not an opera, but a play interspersed with vocal music.

The secret of its success at this epoch is to be found in the delight of the public at the evident satire directed against the prime minister, Walpole, and the Court, and the palpable contrast between the realistic roughness, nay, coarseness, and pretended propriety, arrogant, self-sufficient Pharisaical virtue, and despicable amorous toying depicted in the piece. This realism is probably the reason why The Beggars' Opera attracts an audience in England even at the present day. Among us, too, there is a public which feasts both ear and eye on the poison of French stage productions.

(To be Continued.)

The Centennial of Beethoven.

BY REV. E. LAIRD COLLIER.

[From Old and New, March, 1871.]

BEETHOVEN was born at Bonn, on the Rhine, and died at Vienna; and it was fitting alike to his genius and career that his day of welcome should have fallen in December, and his day of adieu in March. He came when the earth was dreary, and went himself to repose when Nature was disporting herself in lightnings and thunders and storm. In this interval, between his first day, in 1770, and his last day, in 1827, a deep monotone of spiritual sadness was the weird chord upon which all included days were strung.

This crown of thorns, the inevitable law and penalty of all genius, pierced his spirit at every point and pore; and of this he died. When he was four years of age, music became the pursuit of his life, in no sense the labor of his life; for he followed and made suit to the Muse, and so early as his eleventh year heard her voice accepting his heart. Thenceforward, this spiritual affiance was never chilled, and knew no day of jealousy or passionate accusation. This was a love where sanctity was never questioned, and so never set to words, but a matter of that deepest consciousness which knows, "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine." The musical instinct and bias, moreover, were of the quality of his nature, the only valuable inheritance which he received with his blood. His father, a tenor singer in the Elector's chapel,—a man of irregular habits, and worthless results in life,—early became the musical taskmaster of his son. The boy was impatient of his father's mechanical and inartistic methods, and impetuous to discard all laws of the letter, that his original genius might become a law unto itself. His way out to the fulness of his career had been appointed by an inspirer who needed no formal signboards of instructors. He loved music after the fashion of his own heart, and not another's. He went to the piano as a reminder, perhaps formulator, of the melodies afloat in his own soul. When driven there by the scourge of authority, the piano was but a mechanism of wires and strings, black and white keys:

He never knew the sweets of home, wrapped in the warm love of a mother, and the wise solicitude of a father. The tenderest and most potential influence which one bears on through life to make it hallowed and hallowing to all other lives was wanting to him. He cherished deep affection for the name of his mother, and bore the image of his dear good grandfather, who died when he was but three years old, and of whom he always delighted to speak with reverence and love.

But the ideal and domestic side of his nature, the highest and divinest, found a noble culture in the hospitable family of his life long friend Von Breuning. In this sacred circle, he was loved with a love always on the alert to reconcile morbidities of nature with faults of temperament,—a love never without new and adequate resources to magnify his genius and pardon his follies.

The light of love never went out upon this vestal altar; and at this hearthstone he became familiar with the great German minds through books and society. His education was scanty, and never advanced in the rudiments and technicalities beyond "a little Latin." At the age of fifteen, he was appointed organist in the chapel of the Elector of Cologne, through the friendly offices of Count Waldstein, an amateur of taste, and an appreciating admirer of the great master's genius through life.

His career in Bonn was terminated when Beethoven was in his twenty-second year; and thereafter Vienna was the scene of his studies, his achievements, and fortunes. Of his years of study, but little is told us. He was not unknown to the great artists yet living, as a versatile and originaive composer, when he arrived in Vienna to enjoy the instructions of Haydn, the most distinguished. Though ignorant, for the most part, of the science of counterpoint, he obeyed the voice of his own sense of beauty, which was the higher law of his inspiration; and, though this frequently set at naught all that was arbitrary and limiting, he did wisely to trust then, as always thereafter, his own instinct, which was always in harmony with those deepest and undefinable laws of nature. The most perceptible influence of his great master traceable in his style is in the first symphony in C major, and the sonatas dedicated to Haydn. In his later works this influence has wholly passed away, giving no indication that it ever became a part of the texture of his artistic culture. These early days, attended by hope and prosperity, were the only days of his brilliant career,—brilliant on its professional side, in which the angel of peace entered his heart, and folded its wings to abide.

At this period, it was evident that the tone of his mind was introspective, that his resources were not in the wealth of the artistic world about him, but the wealth of the artistic world within him. Already he had more to give the world than the world had to give him; for he came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. He had little aptitude as an instructor, from original distaste for the work; and he only resorted to it when in dire extremity himself, or in the hope of helping his family. Madame Von Breuning often compelled him to go over to the opposite house, and continue his lessons in the family of a distinguished ambassador. He would sulk along until he reached the door, when he would promise to come the next day. His friend would look out of her own window, and say, "Our Beethoven has had another 'raptus';"—a phrase himself was fond of using.

In these days, he was too busy for society; and, when the days came in which he could have commanded the leisure, he had no heart for it, as we shall see.

He had no flattery for rank and titles, and disdained, with inborn pride, to court the patronage of nobility.

His manners were never regulated by conventional laws; and, in defence of their singularity, he condescended to speak or write no word during life. As always, many were jealous of his rising fame, and made him the subject of unfriendly, and frequently cruel, criticism. Of these, though sensible, he was unheeding, and by inward spiritual impulse moved forward to the mastery of his art; and, during the first decade of his sojourn in Vienna, he composed his first two symphonies, over twenty sonatas, trios, quartets, his well-known septet, his only oratorio, and many of his best-known and most admired productions.

These, too, were the pictorial days of his life, when he worshipped at the shrine of love. The story of this passion is told, with all its fulness and interceptions, in the Sonata, in C sharp minor, dedicated to the Countess Guicciardi.

One may read his soul there as readily as in the words addressed to her: "My angel, my all, myself! If our hearts were still near together, that would be, indeed, my life. Great as is thy love for me, mine for thee is still greater. I can only live entirely with thee, or not at all. How I long for thee, with tears, my life!" This sonata is known as the "Moonlight Sonata," having been compared, by Rollstab, to a bark, visiting the savage sites of the Lake of the Four Cantons of Switzerland, by moonlight. This was his farewell utterance of love. She married another. And of this husband it is said that, when he was manager of the Imperial Theatre, and Beethoven was old and poor, he refused permission to have "Fidelio" performed.

When past fifty years of age, Beethoven said: "She married the count, and then sought me weeping; but I repulsed her, for I despised her." He repulsed and despised her. He thought the old and only love was gone; but love is never quite gone when the memory of it remains and is cherished.

This ideal and Platonic love joined hands with his great infirmity to shut his heart to the vulgar voices of the world, and infused into all his compositions of this period a depth of sentiment, and intensity of passion, which flowed forth in the tones of unutterable longing. No domestic felicity ever gave cheer or solace to his life; his brothers, Carl and John, were suspicious of his brotherly attachment, were exacting and demanding, until his very relation to them seemed the "evil principle" entering into his life. On one New Year's, John, who had become possessed of some wealth, sent in his card to his noble brother, as if to mortify and tantalize him, "John van Beethoven, Land-owner." Beethoven returned it, "Ludwig van Beethoven, Brain owner."

Domestic sorrows and disquietudes came like billow upon billow; and when deep was calling unto deep, his father still dissipated, his brothers still exasperating, his nephew, now his ward through long and vexing litigation, still reckless and ungrateful, the last link binding his heart to home—a link which in itself was the very heart of home—was severed; his mother rested in death. And, as if the Fates had ordained that the clouds portentous should have no silver linings, the great personal disappointment and grief of his life settled upon his soul. That sense most needful to him was deadened; and his deafness became an incurable complaint,—yes, complaint, rather than malady; for, though he strove to know the peace of resignation, he never was reconciled to the prison-house into which this confined him.

The little Brentano, like a fairy whom we see not coming or going, whose presence is known only by the gifts of spirit which are left behind, writes in one of her felicitous letters to Goethe a sun picture of Beethoven, full of happy detail, which makes open passage to his heart,—

"I could not get any one to introduce me; but I found him alone. He has three apartments, in which he alternately secretes himself—one in the country, one in town, and a third on the ramparts. It was there I found him on the third floor. I entered unannounced. He was seated at the piano; I gave my name; he was most friendly, and asked me if I would hear a song which he had just been composing, and sang with a shrill and piercing voice, that made the heaven thrill with wofulness, 'Knowest thou the land?' 'Is it not beautiful,' said he, 'exquisitely beautiful? I will sing it again.' He was pleased with my cheerful praise. 'Most people,' he remarked, 'are moved on hearing music; but these have not musicians' souls; true musicians are too fiery to weep.' He then sang another song of yours, which he had just been composing, 'Dry not, dry not, ye tears.' He accompanied me home; and it was during our walk that he said all these fine things on the art, talking so loud all the while, and standing still so often, that it required some courage to listen to him in the street. He, however, spoke so passionately, and all that he uttered startled me so, that I forgot even the street. They were not a little surprised, at home, on seeing me enter the room with him in the midst of a large dinner-party. After dinner, he sat down to the instrument, and played, un-a-ked, wonderfully and at great length."

Beethoven was now separated unto his divine function and high calling. His habits were abstracted; so that he would enter an inn, throw himself upon a seat, and order his bill, without remembering that he had ordered no food. He would stand by the hour, when in a frenzy of composing, pouring buckets full of cold water upon his hands. He was constantly removing from one lodging to another, and would frequently be paying for three or four dwelling-places at once; since his freak or fancy would drive him now to the south side of the city, and now to the north side of the city, in the full belief that he could the more fluently compose.

The quality of this man was antique. The basis of his nature was ethical, and its flowering in character pure and spotless. The society surrounding him was, by its low moral tone, unworthy of him; and he was not without wrath at the baseness of men.

Beethoven knew asperities of temper, and hurried the stern convictions of his just soul against his time and its temporizing conventionalism in harsh and unsightly sentences; but it has been said, with an exquisite clarity: "The faults of man are the night in which he rests from his virtues."

He was passionate and excitable. This temperament is the birthright of genius; culture puts the bit in the teeth of such natures; and the champing is what the world calls master strokes of genius. There were morbid moments, when he believed himself the most wretched of all God's children; yet it was both the purpose and custom of his life to set Fate at defiance.

These correlated facts of temperament and trial made his life strange and introverted; but he lives in our hearts, not the afflicted, rugged, storm-bitten genius that he was, but an image of an inspiration, and fact of an altitude, whither so often we have been led and lifted by his music, that we might catch an outlook into the infinite which has now enfolded him, and with welcomes awaits our coming.

The familiar andante of the Fifth, and the Allegretto of the Seventh Symphony; Schiller's Ode to Joy, in the Ninth; the raging, then waning storm, the outbreak of the shepherds' joy and song in the Pastoral, are to the soul only spiritual prompts, urging the spirit upward toward heights where the invisible and eternal are still only suggested.

Indeed, the Symphonies are all homilies, lifting, by their utterance, the aspirer beyond the atmosphere of sense into the world of the unseen.

Beethoven, unlike Mendelssohn, never parts company with the responsive soul at the horizon line where earth and heaven blend into one but leads through the open way into the world of light and spirit.

Although the overture to Coriolanus and the four overtures to Fidelio are brilliant and weird, offering frequent temptation to sacrifice the elevated purpose of music to the temporary effect, there is no single instance where the master surrendered to the passing suggestion of the tempter. We discover the more yielding nature of Mozart, usually so pure and conscientious, who, in the midst of the grand, even solemn music of The Magic Flute, introduces the purely superficial ballads of the bird catcher.

The music of "Fidelio" in its original inception and form called "Leonora," after Bouilly, tells with more exact literalness and lucidness the pure heroic love, the sighing, inventive, open-eyed love, of Leonora, than the libretto; indeed, the performance was delayed, because no words were to be found so full of intensity and passion as the music. And until the warm heart, magnificent acting, and overpowering voice of Wilhelmina Schröder were sought and found to carry "Leonora" abroad into the world, Beethoven wrote no other opera; for he had no hope that words, so fixed and rigid are they of import, could be put together to satisfy the demands of his higher vehicle of sentiment.

There is a "tone-tongue" and a "tone palette" higher and diviner than the word-language of the poet, or the color-language of the painter. In striking illustration of this is the unai-akable controversy going on in the allegro of the sonata in G major; it is alike sad and bewitching. There is the almost querulousness of the treble, as it turns into remonstrance at the heady, wilful ways of the bass. There is love, redemptive love, in the one, and the determined waywardness in the other, until the "resisting principle" gives out, and the music becomes as tender as the flesh of an infant.

There is always a spiritual fulness in his melody, even in its most gradual declinings, when it sinks into the whisperings of the softest summer wind, when "no leaf of nature trembles, and no wave curls in the still lake," leaving room for the suggestion, that the artist has power precise to bear away to the farthest orbit of the universe, and far beyond give glimpses of a boundless shadowy void; for his music is never the symbol of scantiness, nor yet of superfluity, but prodigality. We never fear the next measure will be sacrificed to the fulness of this; but this is a pledge of richer resource in the next.

Criticism has decided that the Funeral March of the Heroic Symphony was added after it was completed, and dedicated to the First Consul, upon the master's hearing the news of Napoleon having caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. In the absence of authentic data, we are led to believe that this famous march is no freak of resentment, but the flowering of its own fulness; and, indeed, this martial hymn, unlike Chopin's, celebrates, not the going out of a life, but an ascension to life,—the passing away, but through departed clouds, to a higher glory. Among the achievements of man, I know of none characterized by such wealth of resource and creativeness of genius as Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The literature of metaphysics has not more entirely lifted the veil from the workings of the human intellect, or the visions of poetry more vividly revealed the passions of the human heart.

This symphony, furthermore, welds into one the types of Humboldt's "Cosmos" and Tennyson's "In Memoriam."

This age of art has left us no sacred music so fraught with the richest spirit of religion as Beethoven's Missa Solemnis and the Mass in C. They are most religious in that they are least dogmatic. The faith of this music reaches unto the eternal, gives hope to the most desponding, and embraces in true catholic charity the most isolated and the most foreign.

The soul of Chopin, subtle, undulating and arabesque, was attuned to the minor key in this a branch of the true vine; for the most part sad and sombre, yet he knew parentheses of joy and gladness, and by times, as Liszt well said, was "fantastic like the playful stampings of a delicious little teasing sylph."

Mendelssohn is Hebraic, reminding one of the stateliness of the pomegranates and the bells of the synagogue.

Beethoven is a re-assurance that the canon of inspiration is not closed; for he became a point of departure in the poetry and method of music. Angels of harmony will fold their wings, and abide with other souls,—fit temples for their indwelling. In the memory of the master, there is a fitting unity; his music compares with the majesty of his face, his face with his spirit, and his spirit with the circumstances of which it was born. Beethoven poured a new current of life into the forms of music, and is the foundation, nay, the very ground in which the foundations of a new order of music is laid. He clothes religion itself in a possible language; to express which, speech, by its very formality, is inadequate.

Forced from society, its evanescent and mutable fashions had no influence upon his music; so it is divine, in that it is not the voice of a time, but all time; not of a people, but all people.

Finally, nature, by her own habit, sanctions the method of the singer. She never brings her messages in words; for words divide the world, as do boundary lines, into nations, each speaking a different language. So, too, the voice of music is universal. The German text is a confusion to the unfamiliar English eye; but the notes of the German staff are the notes of the English staff. The forms of music are the same the world over, wherever the spirit of music has taken to itself forms. Her voice is the symbol of unity and brotherhood.

Civilization has its criterion in this: that it advances as man passes from the rigidity of thought and its formal statement to the relaxation of sentiment, and its glow in art and song. So this gives hope of the re-union of the now dismembered race; when sentiment shall bear away, and music shall be its speech, the Rhine shall not divide, nor the channel separate; neither shall the great ocean be broad enough to keep asunder continent from continent. As the centennial anniversary passes, it renews the promise of one people with one language over all the earth.

Music Abroad.

London.

ORATORIO CONCERTS. On Wednesday evening Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's Nala and Damayanti was given for the first time in London. The whole work was listened to with the most profound interest and attention, and enthusiastic demonstrations of sympathy with its gifted composer must have assured him that the triumph he achieved at Birmingham was confirmed by the verdict of his London audience.

The vocalists were Miss Wynne, Miss Spiller, and Messrs. Cummings and Santley. Mr. Barnby's Choir did good service in the trying and unfamiliar choruses, and the band, conducted by Dr. Hiller, was as steady as could have been expected at a first representation.

The second part of the concert consisted of two compositions by M. Gounod—viz., a quartet, O salutaris Hostia and a setting of the 130th Psalm, De Profundis, both given for the first time, and listened to with much interest; and Handel's tenth Chandos Anthem, "Let God arise."

Dr. Hiller, M. Gounod, and Mr. Barnby divided the duties of directing the music.—Musical World, March 18.

FERDINAND HILLER'S RECITALS. Yesterday week, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, assisted by Madame Schumann, Herr Joachim, Signor Piatti, and some lady vocalists, gave a recital of chamber music to a mere handful of listeners. The scant attendance was a disagreeable fact for those who talk largely of English art-progress. It could not easily be explained away. Here was a composer and professor of world-wide renown, in co-operation with artists of the highest rank, presenting new or unfamiliar works manifestly worthy attention; and yet the amateurs of London almost unanimously refused their countenance. Are then the pessimists right?—and is there no such thing among us, in any unappreciable degree, as a genuine love of high class music? We are sometimes told that when performances of classical works do succeed in England it is only because steady persistence creates an idea that they are succeeding—which in turn suggests the desirableness of "swimming with the tide." About the truth of this we offer no opinion; but to see a concert like Dr. Hiller's given to a "beggary account of empty benches" is to be reminded of the observation.

The programme of Dr. Hiller's first recital was entirely made up of works from the distinguished professor's own pen, and included an adequate variety of selections. Of its interest there can be little need to speak in the hearing of those who know how accurately Dr. Hiller represents the prevailing phase of musical thought and expression in Germany. Without going so far as the advanced liberals, who would abolish "pure" art altogether, and make music the subservient handmaid of a sequence of ideas or emotions, the Cologne professor holds aloof from the conservatism which exaggerates form into formality, and by setting too much value upon the visible, misses that which is spiritual. In most of Dr. Hiller's works there is enough of "intellectuality" and of free expression; but at the same time they show how modern ideas can be grafted on the good old stock—in other words, how it is possible to reject the doctrine of finality in music without a resort to illegitimate practices. Therefore, as reflecting current notions in the land of free thought, Dr. Hiller's compositions have a value apart from their undeniable merit; and should be studied by all who would observe the artistic signs of the times.

The first piece in Friday's programme was an air with variations for pianoforte (Op. 98), which Dr. Hiller played so as to make it clear that he has lost none of his old executive power, nor of his well-known skill in interpreting with absolute fidelity whatever he takes in hand. Much fancy distinguishes the variations; but they struck us as being somewhat overcrowded with details, and proportionately foggy. No such objection can be brought against a Suite de Pièces—Gavotte, Sarabande, and Courante—(Op. 118), which showed how it is possible to throw upon antiquated forms the light of modern taste, and make them again attractive. The second and third movements are particularly fine; but indeed the entire set deserves almost unqualified praise. Dr. Hiller played the Suite in magnificent style; his execution of some rapid octave passages for the left hand being especially noteworthy. An operetta without words, for two performers, rendered by Madame Schumann and Dr. Hiller, presented a novel and attractive feature. In it twelve movements familiar to lyric dramas are grouped according to a certain plan; as, for example, the overture, followed by the "Air of the Maiden," a "Scolding Song," a "Chorus of Hunters," "Air of the Youth," &c. These materials may be wrought up into any fitting romance; but the different numbers have an attraction even for listeners who decline to trouble their imagination about a plot. The work, as a whole, displays abundant merit; but some of the movements are conceived and developed after a singularly happy fashion, conspicuous examples being the "Scolding Song" (encored), the "Chorus of Hunters," the "Drinking Song," and "Chorus of Women." With such artists as Madame Schumann and Dr. Hiller it is superfluous to discuss the performance of the operetta. Enough that every movement was given with an intelligence as remarkable as the execution was precise. A Duetto appassionata for piano and violin (Op. 58), in which Dr. Hiller was assisted by Herr Joachim, may be passed as calling for little observation; but, on the other hand, we could say much in praise of a Serenade (Op. 64), for piano, violin, and violoncello (Signor Piatti), without exhausting the catalogue of its merits. The last named work is in five movements, and has important dimensions; while each part, but especially the minuet and finale, reveals the hand of a master and the ideas of an original thinker. A composition so classical, in the highest sense of the term, should be better known. The vocal music, consisting of six songs, was well sung by Mlle. Draadil and Miss Fanny Chatfield; Signor Randegger doing able service as accompanist. The second recital was to take place last night.—Ibid.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—All that our London operatic managers can have lost by the war is the privilege of producing some work, novel or revived, which might perchance, but for the war, have been brought out last winter at the Theatre des Italiens. It must, on the other hand, have placed an unusually large number of singers at their choice—a fact of which we had already had indications in the many new names which have recently appeared in concert programmes. It gives Mr. Gye, as we were before saying, Mme. Miolan-Carvalho for a few months, M. Faure for an entire season, and M. Jourdan for a period which it has not been thought worth while to define.

Mr. Gye loses Mlle. Tietjens (by which the public will lose Fidelio, Medea, and some other operas and operatic parts in which Mlle. Tietjens is unrivalled), and he gains Signor Mongini who last year, it will be remembered, belonged to Mr. Wood's company at Drury Lane. This loss and this gain will set the public wondering what new operatic combination or combinations have been effected. We can give no information on the point. All we know is, as per programme, that Mlle. Tietjens is to be replaced in such parts as Donna Anna, Agata (Der Freyschütz), and Gertrude (Hamlet), by Mme. Parepa-Rosa, who since her first appearance in England some fifteen years ago, has been singing with the greatest success in the United States; and that Signor Mongini will share the principal tenor music with Signor Mario. Here, too, is another fact to be observed in the operatic politics of the day. Mme. Mombelli, the charming mezzo soprano of last season's Drury Lane company, joins the Royal Italian Opera. Signor Bettini, too—last year, with Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, of the Drury Lane Opera—is this year with Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, of the Royal Italian. Has opposition been replaced by a friendly combination, by a dual, or even a triple monopoly? Unable to answer the question, we can only say that Mr. Mapleson announces the opening of "Her Majesty's Opera" for the fifteenth of April, and in the meantime that Mr. Gye has got together a company which even for the Royal Italian Opera is unusually strong.

The first attractive feature in the programme is, so to say, of a negative character. Signor Mario, who is to sing this season, will, after this season, never sing again. Thereupon a well-merited eulogy is pronounced on the talent of the retiring vocalist, the whole enlivened by a really appropriate quotation from Moore. Signor Mario, who has been, we scarcely like to calculate how many years before, the public, has, as the programme points out, sung at the Royal Italian Opera twenty-three seasons out of the twenty-four which that establishment now numbers. Signor Mario is not even, it appears, to continue his performances until the end of the coming season. His final retirement is fixed for the last days of June. Naturally, this great artist, who for the last quarter of a century (and more) has appeared in every important Italian opera that has been produced in England, cannot in a single season go through his whole repertory of characters; but we are promised that an opportunity will be given us of hearing him once again in many of his most celebrated parts. We have said that several of the principal tenor parts are assigned this year to Signor Mongini, who will be heard, (for the first time (as Vasco di Gama) in L'Africaine, and for the first time at the Royal Italian Opera, as Otello. Signor Mongini will also appear as Arnold, in Guillaume Tell, and on the opening night (March 28) as Edgardo, in Lucia.

The list of sopranos includes Mme. Adelina Patti, Mme. Pauline Lucca, Mme. Miolan-Carvalho, Mlle. Sessi, Mme. Parepa-Rosa, Mlle. Orgeni, and others. In regard to Mme. Patti, we agree with the author of the Royal Italian programme—"that it is entirely superfluous to write any panegyric on the talents of this most gifted artist;" and the same may be said to a less degree of Mme. Patti's associates in the same vocal department. We may add on our own account, however, that nothing is more remarkable in

Mme. Patti's talent than its versatility; and of this we are to have fresh proofs during the approaching season, when she is announced to appear for the first time as Elena in La Donna del Lago, as Desdemona in Otello, and as Caterina in Les Diamans de la Couronne. Mme. Paulina Lucca, besides repeating all her celebrated parts, will undertake for the first time those of Fides in Le Prophète, Pamina in Il Flauto Magico, and Rachel in La Juive.

Among the baritones the public will be glad to find, in addition to M. Faure, MM. Graziani and Cotogni. Signor Ciampi still retains the position of primo buffo. The conductorship is entrusted to MM. Vianesi and Bevnigani, and Mr. Augustus Harris will continue to fill the post of stage manager.—Times.

JOACHIM AT THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. The most crowded audience of the season was drawn to St. James's Hall by the announcement that Herr Joseph Joachim would make his first appearance. The great violinist—greatest of violinists, indeed, both as executant and as faithful interpreter of all that is most beautiful in the art he professes—was welcomed with enthusiasm. This is as it should be; for Herr Joachim, though extraordinarily endowed, is, by his own choice, art's devoted servant, and never, like many of his contemporaries, uses art as a mere pretext for egotistical display. Give him the simplest quartet by Haydn or Mozart, and he bestows as much thought upon it as upon the most elaborate and pretentious of the later works of Beethoven. When he plays Haydn and Mozart, he makes us think only of Haydn and Mozart; when he plays Beethoven, he makes us think only of Beethoven; and this is invariably a rule with him, no matter upon what music he may be engaged. There is not in our remembrance a more self-denying, as there is not in our remembrance a more thoroughly accomplished artist, judge him from what point of view we please, than this prince of Hungarian musicians. But to discuss merits so unanimously recognized is unnecessary. We believe that the violinist does not exist who, however sensitively jealous of others, would decline to make an exception in favor of one in particular, and to admit Herr Joachim as his superior. In fact, were it not so, the world would step in and make the exception on its own account. We have said before and say again, that Herr Joachim is at this moment art's most loving and zealous, no less than its most gifted, disciple, and is thus fairly entitled to the position he has won and the universal esteem he enjoys.

The programme did not include a single piece from either J. S. Bach, or Beethoven—Herr Joachim's idols; it comprised, nevertheless, enough to enable him to vindicate his right to be credited as facile princeps among violinists. Mendelssohn's really "grand" quintet in B flat for stringed instruments (No. 2) is one of those compositions which enable Herr Joachim to put forth all his strength; and seldom has he led it more superbly. Each of the four movements was nobly set forth; but, perhaps, the adagio, in which Mendelssohn approaches so nearly to Beethoven that he might even be mistaken for Beethoven, was the finest exhibition of all. In the delivery of the theme, where the other instruments accompany the first violin, tremolando, Herr Joachim surpasses himself. His companions in the quintet were Herr L. Ries, Herr Strauss, M. Zerbini, and (the Joachim of the violoncello) Signor Piatti. It could hardly by any chance have been better executed.

Herr Joachim's solo was J. S. Bach's marvellous Chaconne with twenty-nine variations, which he has played so often at the Monday Popular Concerts, but never more magnificently. With what simple majesty he delivers the theme—with its wide spread harmonies, so difficult to express upon the instrument—and with what rare felicity he imparts to variation after variation a marked individuality, while preserving that balance which keeps together and gives unity to the whole, need not be said. Enough that the Chaconne was heard from end to end with the old delight and applauded with the old fervor. That Herr Joachim had to submit to the usual penalty for so brilliant a display will be readily believed. The audience, indeed, would gladly have listened to the theme and its many variations over again, but on returning to the platform Herr Joachim gave another piece, from the same inexhaustible source, and with the same success.

The last composition in which the Hungarian violinist took part was Schubert's quintet in A for stringed instruments—an early work, written when its author was scarcely twenty-two, but none the less attractive for that reason. In this quintet the pianist was Mme. Schumann; and a more spirited performance could scarcely have been heard.

Now that Herr Joachim has arrived, the Monday Popular Concerts may be said to be at their zenith.

CRYSTAL PALACE. The programme of the eighteenth Saturday concert contained some very interesting orchestral selections. There were included in it, for example, Cherubini's rarely-heard overture to L'Hotelier Portugaise; Berlioz's extraordinary effusion known as the overture (No. 2) to Benvenuto Cellini; Schumann's Symphony in B flat (No. 1); and Spohr's violin concerto (No. 15).

On Saturday last J. F. Barnett's Paradise and the Peri was given under the composer's direction; and with Mme. Vanzini, Mme. Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley as principals. There was a large audience, and an excellent performance elicited much applause. The cantata was preceded by Auber's overture to Zanetta and followed by the "Wedding March," from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream.

FRANKFURT-ON-THE-MAIN. The programme of the tenth Museum Concert included an entirely new Symphony, in D minor, by Herr Albert Dietrich. The Symphony affords abundant proof that its composer thoroughly understands all the mechanical details of his art, but is deficient in imagination and feeling. It was exceedingly well performed by the band, under the direction of Herr L. Müller, and the same may be said of the overture No. 4, E major, to Fidelio. Mdle. Anna Rogan, from Vienna, and Herr Benno Walter, violinist, from Munich, two young artists as yet little known, appeared on this occasion, and produced a favorable impression. The lady possesses a pleasing and carefully trained, if not very strong, soprano voice. She sang a Canonetta by Alessandro Scarlatti (1680); an air by Antonio Lotti (1700); and Mozart's "Crudele." Herr Benno Walter, with great feeling and artistic finish, Spohr's D minor Concerto, No. 9, and Ernst's Fantasia on March and Romance from Othello.

PRAGUE.—Signor Giovanni Gordigiani, who, for about the last ten years, has enjoyed a pension as retired professor of singing at the Conservatory, died lately in his seventy-sixth year. When Mme. Albani was singing here, Signor Gordigiani produced a three-act opera, Consuelo, the characters in which were sustained by Mme. Albani, Mlle. Soucup, Herr Reichel, and the composer himself, who took the part of Porpora. He composed, also, several short Italian operettas, which were well received; and published various sacred pieces, including an "Ave Maria;" a "Pater noster;" and a "Regina Cœli." He was, moreover, a libretto writer and musical critic. His younger brother, Luigi, a popular composer in Italy, died some years since at Florence.

MADRID. The London Musical World translates the following letter from the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung:

Musical life in the Spanish capital, provisionally diverted, by the tribute paid to the Carnival, into the sphere of vulgarity, will take a higher flight with the Classical Orchestral Concerts, given by Monasterio in the Circo de Madrid, at the commencement of March. It is true that the programme of these six concerts, executed by one hundred performers, moves almost exclusively in that circle which is now usually designated in new musical Germany as an "abgehaltener Standpunkt," or standpoint long since past. But it is still very new for Spain, if we only moderately assume that the musical education of Spaniards is about a hundred years behind that of the other nations of Europe. We must not then be astonished at reading in the bills: "First performance of Mozart's C major Symphony," and "for the first time, Haydn's Symphony with the kettledrum"—Schumann, Rubinstein, Raff, Brahms, Wagner, and even Mendelssohn, and Schubert, are, for Spaniards, as yet—not even names, and, in all probability, will not be born here before the next century. Were they, indeed, not composers, but bull-fighters, what brilliant popularity they would already have achieved! If we compare the very small number of concerts and the very bad attendance at them, with the bull-fights which are regularly held in all seasons, and invariably command overflowing audiences, we may form a general idea of the national feeling for art; and if the assertion is true that Spain has not yet been laid under contribution by virtuosos, it results simply from the fact that there is absolutely nothing to be laid under contribution. There are theatres here in Madrid which, to exist, charge a real (three-fourths of a franc) for a seat, and four cuartos (two sous) for admission to the gallery. You may imagine what the profits must be, especially in the provinces, where the number of places is very small. Thus, for instance, five provinces (Alava, Albacete, Alicante, Almeria, and Alcala) possess twenty-six theatres, with 6,500 places altogether, one theatre having only 90, and most of the others varying between 100 and 300.

Alicante only has a larger sized theatre, with 1,200 places. Spain can boast, it is true, of some more important theatrical cities, such as Barcelona, Valencia, Seville, Malaga, and Cadiz, but more especially Barcelona, at which latter place there was, a few years since, the best opera in the country; this year, however, they are all in a very bad state. Even the Grand Opera here in Madrid, despite the splendor in which the pieces are usually got up, and a few celebrated artistic names, such as Tamberlik, Tiberini, Ortolani, Selva, and Giraltoni, cannot by any means be considered satisfactory. The day before yesterday, Rossini's Barbiere was given, with Tamberlik for the first time as Almaviva. Good Heavens! What a heavy monstrosity they made of this charming work, which seems to have been written between a bottle of champagne and the fiery eyes of a loving Doña. Just fancy an orchestra of a hundred performers blowing and fiddling away with might and main, and strengthened moreover with trombones and ophicleides, and the vulgar sounds of the piston. If Rossini had heard the last instances of barbarism, distorting his light, sparkling and original instrumentation, he would have taken his leave of this horrible world long before he did. Fancy, moreover, Tamberlik, a heroic tenor, singing Almaviva's floriture! Fancy a Figaro, Signor Aldighieri, who always shouts as if he had to sing Verdi's Trovatore; a Bartolo without comic talent or voice; and a Basilio, who gives the "Calumny" air in the sleepest of tempos, and, without the famous crescendo—and you will have a faint notion of this melancholy Barbiere. The most successful artist was Madame Ortolani-Tiberini, not by any means because she gave a graceful impersonation of Rosina (in this respect Mesdames Artot and Patti are models of excellence), but on account of the introduction into the Lesson-scene of a Habanera, an original Spanish melody, which she was compelled to repeat three times. This was the great success in the Barbiere di Siviglia, which was in the other parts literally played and sung down. But the management thinks the artists are paid, and, therefore, bound to sing and play away valiantly; while, for the trumpeters, a part must be written, even though Mozart did not compose one, so that they may earn their salaries. And thus materialism and Spanish taste ruin even the works of genius. In a short time it is to be the turn of Mozart's Don Juan. I am curious as to how many trumpets will accompany the entry of the Governor's Statue, and whether the trombones of Spanish military musicians will be pressed into the service. A. v. Cz.

BERLIN. At the Royal Operahouse, previous to the performance of Meyerbeer's Africaine, on the 2d inst., the strains of "Die Wacht am Rhein" were first heard. These were followed by the national hymn, the entire audience standing up. The curtain then rose, and the Goddess of Peace was perceived, with the green olive branch. At her side was a shield with the word "Peace" inscribed on it, and surrounded by soldiers of the different German states. The enthusiasm of the audience was, of course, something tremendous.—Herr Taglioni has concocted a new ballet, of a military character, in honor of the German victories. The music, in which are interwoven popular old marches, is by Herr Hertel. The ballet is to be performed on the Emperor-King's birthday, and will, according to report, be preceded by Meyerbeer's Fedderlager in Schlesien, a work peculiarly adapted to the occasion.—On the 8th instant., Mdle. Hedwig Raabe, a talented actress, was married to Herr Niemann, the tenor.

VIENNA.—Herr Johann Strauss's new operetta, Indigo und die vierzig Räuber, was a great success on the first night, a fact due to the joint attractions of the music, the splendid mise-en-scène, and, above all, the admirable way in which the artists sustained their parts. With regard to the book, Herr Johann Strauss has not been more fortunate than other German composers.

HAMBURG.—Cherubini's overture to Les Abencerrages, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major, were the principal orchestral pieces at the last Philharmonic Concert. The singer was Signor Emilio Pancani from the Scala, Milan. Herr Fr. Grützmacher, from the Royal Operahouse, Dresden, played a new Violoncello Concerto, by Herr Taubert, and took part with Herren Louis Lee, Sebastian Lee, and Kiles, in Herr Franz Lachner's "Serenade."

The programme of the eighth Philharmonic Concert comprised Symphony in C minor, Gade; overture to King Lear, Berlioz; and Eighth Symphony, Beethoven.—A very creditable performance of J. S. Bach's Johannes Passion was given last week by the members of the St. Cecilia Association, under the direction of Herr Carl Voigt. The air, "Es ist vollbracht," was sung by Mme. Joachim with such depth of religious feeling and beauty of expression, that the audience were perfectly spell-bound. She produced a similar effect in the solo,

"Von den Stricken meiner Sünden." The music of the Saviour was sung very admirably by Herr Adolf Schulze. The tenor part of the Evangelist was confided to Herr Rudolf Otto, from Berlin, who performed his fatiguing and difficult task like a true artist.—Soleïée of Herr Henry Schradieck:—Nonet, Op. 81, Spohr; Octet, op. 166, Schubert; and Septet, Beethoven.

COLOGNE.—Sixth Gürzenich Concert:—Overture to Manfred, Schumann; Adagio and Allegro from the Violin Concerto, No. 6. Spohr (played by Herr Japhat); Symphony in D major, Mozart; and Missa Solemnis, C major, op. 86, Beethoven. Fourth Soleïée for Chamber Music:—Trio-Nocturne, Schubert; Stringed Quartet, A minor, Schumann; Pianoforte Concerto, E flat major, Field; and Stringed Quartet, F minor, Beethoven.

Eighth Gürzenich Concert:—Symphony in B flat major Haydn; Pianoforte Concerto, No. 3, F minor, composed and played by M. Dupont of Brussels; Bass Air, with vocal chorus, from The Seasons, Haydn [Herr Scaria]; Pianoforte Solos, Chopin, J. S. Bach, and Mr. Dupont; "Zigeunerleben," Schumann; Song, Hartmann, Gounod [Herr Scaria]; "Jubel Overture," Weber.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 8, 1871.

In this Number One of the New Volume [XXXI], we give the Title Page and Index for the past two years, instead of the usual four pages of Music. In the next number the publication of Bach's Passion Music will be resumed and continued by fortnightly instalments to the end.

Concerts.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION. The tenth of the Symphony Concerts, on Thursday Afternoon, March 23, brought a sixth successful season to a close. The audience was the largest of the season. The programme, in completion of the plan of honoring the Centennial anniversary of the birth of Beethoven by a Beethoven Concert at the beginning and end of the series, as well as by two more (one with the Handel and Haydn Society) during the birthday week, was again made up almost entirely of some of the noblest compositions of the great orchestral master; to-wit:

Overture to "Coriolanus".....Beethoven.
Fifth Piano Concerto, op. 73, in E flat....."
Miss MARIE KREBS.

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven.
Piano Solos:
a.) Polonaise in C, op. 89....."
b.) Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue in D minor....Bach.
Eighth Symphony in F.....Beethoven.

In the execution of all these works the Orchestra gave signal illustration of the benefit of a whole winter's thorough, careful training. We run no risk in saying that at this moment it is an excellent orchestra; and could it only be kept together in full force and frequent occupation with the same high class of music, we should enter upon another season next November with good auspices indeed. Mr. ZERRAHN has certainly succeeded in inspiring more of delicacy and precision, more of sympathetic vitality, into the whole band, than ever Boston orchestra has shown before; and the improvement has been manifest all along from the first concert to the tenth. Those two wonderful Overtures, with all their concentrated fire and meaning, and their subtle delicacy, were brought out in a most satisfactory manner. The smiting, startling, chords in the "Coriolanus" were instantaneous and electric; and that wonderfully compressed and brief, yet complete, epitome of the whole tragedy of "Egmont" was worked up so powerfully to its dramatic climax, as to realize the intention to a rare degree. The Eighth Symphony, full of Spring and sunshine and return of youth and joy amid the clouds and sorrows of the later years of a sad and troubled life, had a most reviving influence after the more sombre, trying pictures. Far gone indeed must one be with weariness and heaviness of heart, whom the first phrase of that buoyant Symphony will not instantly revive. To hear it is like going out of close confinement in a hot room into the pure and nimble air of a perfect Spring day. The sunshine which pervades it is intrinsic in the music, imprisoned in its clear and perfect form as they say the lustre is in the most precious diamond; in the darkest place it gives out light, and irradiates the darkest chambers of the soul. How much of light, gay, sparkling music, so-called, one may hear with but increasing sense of heaviness, like empty jokes and games prolonged to such a torturing pitch, that one would fain either go to sleep, or find a truer rest in contact with a deep soul like this! The joy which so deep a spirit can feel, even in the midst of trials, is something infinitely surpassing the capacity of joy in frivolous and careless natures; and it is such joy that thrills through every chord of this Beethoven Symphony, while in its artistic mastery it is a clear and perfect gem. This, too, was felicitously rendered.

The "Emperor" Concerto was the pièce de resistance of this concert; and in the rendering of it Miss MARIE KREBS, who had a poor chance to prove her quality in the Nilsson Concerts last November, was at once recognized as one of the best among the fine classical pianists of whom we have heard so many. Of individual magnetism, of any marked subjective quality or inspiration, less was felt than in Miss Mehlig, or in some of our older pianists, who fall far short of her consummate execution. All this were too much to expect of one so young; it requires experience of life, that sort of culture of heart, mind and soul, that growth of character, which could not come to one scarcely out of a girlhood wholly spent in laying the technical foundations of an artist life in the most solid, thorough manner. But she has rare intelligence; she has a certain eager, joyous and adventurous enthusiasm; a sincere love of her art; and the most wonderful power of musical memory that we have yet witnessed here; for indeed virtually all the great Concertos, the Sonatas, the concert pieces of Bach, the important works of all the masters, which figure much in concerts, seem to be at her fingers' ends without a page before her. These powers, aided by the admirable teaching of her father, and the impression of the best traditions, qualify her amply for the interpretation of the great repertoire of pianoforte music. Absolute certainty in every chord, phrase, passage; a crystal clearness of touch, making every tone most vividly distinct and separate; great strength and evenness; careful regard to light and shade and tempo; and, in the main, correct conception, ensured a rendering wherein the power and beauty of the great Concerto were brought home to all. We do not say that there was nothing wanting; she has of course much yet in life and Art to live for, and, so far as aptitude and study could go, is she not wonderfully well equipped for the journey?

If we noted any particular short-comings, they were these: an overpowering strength sometimes in the left hand, not keeping the unaccented middle chords enough in the shade, and thereby obscuring the melody; a certain stiffness in the beautiful Adagio, as if the teacher sat behind; and then, in the transition from the Adagio into the Rondo, a rather heavy announcement of the motivo, which although fortissimo, should be elastic. But such defects will surely disappear.

The Polonaise in C, a very bright and joyous thing, full of bravura, was heard here for the first time, and few, we fancy, would have thought it was by Beethoven. Flung off with such sparkling precision and freedom, it was as refreshing as a dash of clear spring water. But her greatest power was shown in her admirable rendering of the great Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue by Bach. The exuberance of rapid figures and foriture, which sometimes seem conventional and empty, were shown to be poetical, and in those highly charged recitative passages seemed given out in irrepressible electric flashes; nothing more real, or more full of feeling, good friends! ye who fancy these great things of Bach to be mere works of calculation and that therefore they require nothing but mechanical precision in the player! And then those marvellous successions of great chords, each striking fire! The Fugue, too, unfolds most majestically, and was so fully brought out that (even though it was a Fugue!) it appeared to enchain attention more than the Fantasia. The only blemish in the rendering did not come to trouble us until the whole was over: that rush up the whole length of the keyboard, to end on a bright high note, was not by Bach, nor in his style at all. Being imperatively enforced, Miss Krebs played the too much neglected Tarentella by Chopin, and in a manner simply perfect.

CARL ZERRAHN's Benefit Concert, on Thursday, March 30, naturally and fitly supplemented the series of Symphony Concerts, which for six years he has conducted with steadily increasing success. And it was one of the best concerts of the winter, except that it was much too long. Of course the Orchestra, if we have spoken truly of the tenth Concert, was in a condition to do justice to the following programme:

Symphony in B flat, No. 4.....Beethoven.
Piano Concerto, in A minor.....Schumann.
Miss MARIE KREBS.

Adagio and Andante from the "Prometheus" music.....Beethoven.
Polonaise, in A flat.....Chopin.
Serenade for 5 'Cellos, Contrabasso & Timpani. Schwenke.
Messrs. Sack, Rietzel, Helndl, Kaltenborn, Hoffmann, Stein and Stohr.
Overture to the Hindoo Legend, "Sakuntala". Goldmark.

The fair young Saxon made another marked success in the Schumann Concerto, which one would have thought a task as formidable as any. It was a complete, clear photograph of the work, as it is written, in a strong light. And it was carried through with unflagging fire and energy, the zeal of the strong runner. The great Chopin Polonaise, too, was an easy triumph. For an encore the lady played Thalberg's Variations on "Sweet Home" (not Wehli's!) with a liquid evenness and grace that Thalberg himself could not exceed. Beethoven's warmest, tenderest, rose-colored Symphony, yet sweeping on with rush of strong wings in the infinite unrest of love, was beautifully rendered, holding the audience spell-bound. The sweet and pastoral "Prometheus" movements, played for the third time, were by no means cloying. But Goldmark's Overture, also for the third time, and coming after so much solid matter, did seem too much. The Serenade for five 'cellos, &c., is a good rich piece of harmony and euphony, without marked originality, and was nicely played.

The feast was bountiful and choice and well served, but, we are pained to say, there were too few at the table. The Music Hall should have been filled completely. It surely was not from want of recognition of the valuable services of the beneficiary, that it was not full; but solely owing to a cause which sadly interferes just now with the support of concerts generally: the pre-occupation of mind and time and purse of almost everybody with the French Fair, and its countless tributaries in the shape of private concerts, readings and theatricals. The measure of Mr. Zerrahn's claim is clearly seen in the present excellent condition of the Orchestra. And so again we urge the importance of having its members kept together in such true work, bridging over as much as possible of the interval between now and November, so that they may not scatter and entirely lose the good routine and common understanding reached by the winter's practice. Has not good orchestral music become so indispensable a luxury to most of us, that there would be large and eager audience once a week, from this time forward into June, if the same orchestra would keep on giving concerts of a lighter kind, but good, and at an easy price? Who would not be too glad, if he could run in at a convenient hour on one day any week, and hear a Symphony alone for fifty cents? While for another class, works of a lighter kind might follow. We think it would be gain to the musicians, not only in a material, but in an artistic sense, by keeping up the morale of the orchestra as an organic whole.

MISS MARIE KREBS gave her first Piano-forte Recital, on Tuesday Evening, March 28, at Brackett's Piano-forte Hall, to a large audience (for a chamber concert). She was assisted by her mother, Mme. KREBS-MICHALES, long a distinguished singer at the Dresden royal Opera. The programme was as follows:

Sonata Characteristique, Op. 81.....Beethoven.
Song: "Der Wanderer".....Schubert.
a). Nocturne.....Chopin. b). Nocturne, No. 4.....Schumann.
Song: "Waldegespräch".....Schumann.
Prelude and Fugue, à la Tarantelle, in A-min.Bach.
Song: "Mein Hochland".....Krebs.
Rigoletto-Fantasia.....Liszt.

The young pianist more than confirmed the first impression of her complete command of all the resources of her instrument, and of a most varied and extensive repertoire of the classics of the pianoforte from J. S. Bach to Liszt. She played entirely without notes. Admirable as it was in execution, her rendering of the Beethoven Sonata: "Les Adieux, l' Absence, et la Retour" was less satisfactory in point of feeling, being somewhat cold and dry, like the recitation of a lesson thoroughly learned. It seemed all clearly mirrored in a soul unshaken; yet the swift onswEEP of the last movement was exciting. Again her greatest triumph was in Bach. The Prelude and Fugue in A minor, (to which some publisher must have put the title "à la Tarantelle," because both the Prelude and the Fugue move in whirling triplets like the Tarantelle,) was listened to with breathless interest,—a worthy counterpart to her performance of the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue in D minor. Here she seemed to enter fully into the spirit of the work. The Chopin and Schumann pieces, particularly the latter, were also very satisfactory; and in the Fantasia by Liszt she revelled in unbounded wealth and power of execution.

Mme. KREBS-MICHALES has a voice which must have been extremely beautiful in its best days, and still well preserved, of great volume and richness in the contralto tones and of good compass. The rendering of Schubert's "Wanderer," albeit a little constrained and cold, evinced an artist of a noble school. But in Schumann's "Wood Talk," and in her husband's setting of "My heart's in the highlands," there was true dramatic fire and fine expression. It would be interesting to hear more of the flowers of German song from so true an interpreter. And therefore, as well as on her own account, we trust that Miss Krebs will, later in the month, not fail to give us the two more "Recitals" which she had intended.

MR. HERMANN DAUM's Farewell Concert was not so well attended as it would have been in a more favorable season. There was much that was excellent and much that was enjoyed in the performance of the following programme; but instead of the Rondo by Chopin, Messrs LANG and PARKER played, with fine effect, a portion of the "Homage à Händel" by Moscheles; and for the Bach Concerto was substituted part of a Haydn Quartet by the LISTEMANN-Heindl party:

Fugue for the Organ.....Bach.
Madama, il catalogo.....Mozart.
Sonata in C, op. 2, No. 3.....Beethoven.
a). "The leaves are falling around me".....Abt.
b). "The Overture".....Mendelssohn.
Concerto in C major for three Pianofortes.....Bach.
Messrs. B. J. Lang, H. Leobard, and J. C. D. Parker.
Accompanied by two Violins, Viola, Cello and Bass.
Messrs. Listemann, Heindl and Regenstein.
May Song.....Hiller.
Rondo in C, for 2 Piano-fortes.....Chopin.
Messrs. B. J. Lang and J. C. D. Parker.
La ci Daram.....Mozart.
Miss A. S. Ryan and Mr. J. F. Rudolphson.
Polonaise in E flat, op. 23.....Chopin.
Mr. Hermann Daum.

NILSSON IN ORATORIO. We have not listened to the old familiar oratorios of the Messiah and Creation with such fresh interest for many years, as on last Saturday and Sunday evening. There is something individual, original, and charmingly sincere in whatever the young Swedish singer does; something genuine from within, which is even better than the purity and sweetness of her voice and her artistic modulation of it; and we were not surprised to hear from her a somewhat different rendering of the great songs in the Messiah from the examples set to us by great singers heretofore. The distinguishing quality of Christine Nilsson's singing of them was its beautiful simplicity, much of the time almost childlike, and a pervading gentleness, the expression as of a deep, interior, meditative rapture (even in "Rejoice greatly"), rather than the perpetual giving out of the full power of voice to triumph by main force. Hence when the strong, emphatic points did come out, they told with a peculiar power, because the feeling was so genuine, so uncontaminable. There was a virginal purity and sweetness, and a clear power, in her delivery of the first Recitative: "There were Shepherds," which we have not heard surpassed; it was indeed an imaginative realization of the scene, the holy peace and beauty of the starry night, with its miraculous new hope! "Rejoice greatly," given with exquisite grace and evenness, was not less truly the expression of true joy because it did not leap out into loud, bold revelry of song; it was the heart full of happiness communing with itself; something too much, perhaps, of the sotto voce, so that some of the more shaded tones may not have fully reached the ear in all parts of the hall; but still one knew how true and good it all was;—and how feelingly the words: "He is the righteous Saviour," &c., were expressed in the tearful voice!

If there was disappointment anywhere, it was in that song; but we love the Art which seeks truth rather than effect. The Air: "How beautiful," made a profound and beautiful impression. In the great song of Faith: "I know that my Redeemer liveth," it is much to say that she actually made it new to us, imparting so much freshness and originality (not sought for as such) to it, that, for the first time since we heard Jenny Lind sing it, we were not bored but happy to hear the song repeated. It was characterized, as we have said, by quiet fervor and assurance; a heart's confession to itself, rather than a bold proclamation and profession; touchingly shaded as the various reflections came up; and when the words "I know" returned again, it was not with strong, bold emphasis, but with a "still voice," far inward, as in rapt reverie and ecstasy of faith. We do not care to decide which is best; but this at any rate was true and individual; let every one sing from her own heart: if that be right (pre-supposing vocal conditions and artistic method, which no one doubts in this case) the song will surely tell.

A new spirit seemed to be infused into the whole. Never, hardly, have we heard the choruses all go so well, and they were well accompanied. The other leading singers, too, all did their best. Miss ANNE CART won great applause by her admirable singing of "O thou that tellest," and "He was despised." Mrs. WEST in "Come unto him" was worthy of herself; Mr. J. F. WINCK gave the bass solos in a most satisfactory manner; and Mr. WM. J. WINCK manifested improvement, singing "Comfort ye" quite finely, though he is not equal to the pathos of "Thy rebuke," nor the strength of "Thou shalt dash them."

The Creation also was an uncommonly good performance as a whole. Never have we heard anything more sweetly, evenly, and exquisitely melodious than Nilsson's singing of "With verdure," and in all her pieces, in the Trios, &c., the listening sense only acquired new appetite by what it fed upon; though "On mighty pens" seems better suited to the grander, soaring style of Jenny Lind, whose voice went up there like a rocket. Mr. MYRON M. WATKINS's grand, deep bass never was so telling as in those descriptive pieces; and Mr. SIMPSON sang the tenor airs with fine voice and style, though now and then a little dry. Mrs. WEST, in the trying predicament of inheriting the soprano role from Nilsson (in the Adam and Eve part) acquitted herself in a most praiseworthy manner.

CROWDED OUT.—By some strange miscalculation of space, in the hurry of going to press a day earlier than usual on account of Fast Day, half of our Editorial matter is excluded.

WORCESTER, Mass.—Mr. B. D. Allen gave the third of his chamber concerts on Tuesday evening, Feb. 28th, with the assistance of Miss M. J. Ingraham, and Messrs. Schultze, Ryan, and Fries. The programme opened with the Grand Trio Concerto for violin, viola, and cello, in D, op. 8, by Beethoven; it abounds in lovely melodies, and fresh, rich harmonies; full of happiness and sunshine, so unlike what one usually hears of Beethoven; a welcome waif from the early days of the great composer; before his spirit was so sorely troubled. Its treatment was original, and it was played con amore. Miss Ingraham sang Cherubini's "Ave Maria," (with clarinet obligato) with fervor, and rare devotional feeling; its tender, religious strains suiting well the beautiful veiled quality of her voice. She also sang, later in the evening, with charming simplicity and feeling, two of Mr. Allen's songs, "The Child's Garden" and "The Summer's Call;" and for a last selection, "Bel Raggio," giving it a triumphant rendering, which received an encore; it being answered by Franz's beautiful song "Mother, O sing me to rest." Mr. Allen's piano solo was a Fantasiestück by Schaeffer; a strange, original composition; strangely fascinating one, yet at the same time baffling one's understanding. Its performance was a masterly one, arousing a desire to become better acquainted with this strange, wild composition. The Mendelssohn Sonata for piano and cello, was great in idea, and difficult of performance; and its rendering was a telling one. The concert closed with a Mozart Trio for piano, clarinet, and viola; brim-full of Mozartean beauty and grace; the instruments in exquisite sympathy with one another, weaving a perfect string of pearls; making a happy ending to this delightful concert.

The fourth and last of the series was given at Washburn Hall on Friday evening, March 4th. His assistants were Mrs. Houston-West, and Messrs. Schultze, Meisel, Ryan, Fries, Story and Parkhurst. The programme was historically arranged, embracing music from the time of Bach and Handel, to Franz, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Gade; extending over a period of more than a century and a half. The concert opened with the Bach Concerto in C, for three pianos, with quartet string accompaniment; which proved a fresh, exhilarating opening piece, and was rendered to perfection; not a break, or a flaw in any part; the rich volume of sound flowing on faultlessly, inspiring every one with its nobleness. Mrs. West sang, with nice appreciation of its beauties, Handel's lovely aria "Lascia ch io pianga," to illustrate the vocal music of the first period. The exquisite quartet playing of Messrs. Schultze, Meisel, Ryan and Fries was a rare treat; the lovely Mozart Quartet in F, No. 8, with its delicate questionings and responses, in the midst of such rich, harmonious beauty, being a happy selection; "On mighty pens" receiving a noble interpretation; the soul of the singer fairly revelling in its delicious beauty; it was such a rendering as but few give. Mr. Allen opened the third period with a piano solo, overcoming the manifold difficulties of Von Weber's Polacca Brillante, op. 72, in a masterly manner; he was recalled, and played Träumerei, made dear to every one by the Thomas Orchestra.

We thank Mrs. West much for bringing to us the choice little gem, Tears of Love, by Beethoven, with its rare delicacy and pathos; it was treated most artistically, and would have been perfect, but for the ill effect of her recent sickness making itself known at an inopportune moment; the lady had been so hoarse all day as to hardly speak aloud; but she mastered her discomfort wonderfully. The fourth period introduced a slow movement from Schumann for clarinet, viola, and piano, two lovely songs: "The Parting," by Franz, and "The Charming," by Mendelssohn, sung with rare feeling and expression; and a Nocturne (piano, violin, and cello) by Gade, the great Danish composer, whose music always abounds in fresh, original ideas, full of buoyancy and beauty. It was a happy ending to this noble series, for which Mr. Allen has the heartiest thanks of the whole musical community.—Palladium.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Bulletin, March 31, writes thus glowingly of some of our Boston artists:—

"There was a splendid audience at the Academy of Music last evening, when Mr. Pugh brought his 'Star Course' to an end with a concert by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club of Boston, assisted by Mrs. J. W. Weston, vocalist. The stage was decorated with plants, flowers and wreaths, and this, with the arrangement of the lights, had a beautiful effect.

The performance of the Quintette Club was, of course, simply perfect. We do not think a work like Kreutzer's overture to A Night in Grenada, which was written for a full orchestra, can have justice done to it by five instruments; but so far as execution goes, there could be no complaint. The quartet and quintet pieces were all charming, and the solos by Mr. Heindl, Mr. Schultze and Mr. Fries were exquisite. All this was expected, as a matter of course; but the singing of Mrs. Weston was a surprise, and a most delightful one. Rarely has a voice so fresh, pure and delicious been heard in the Academy. It is not very powerful or of very extensive range; but for velvety sweetness and for evenness of quality, we know few voices that equal it. Add to this that Mrs. Weston has a very modest but very winning manner, and that she sings with intelligence and a most admirable method, and it is not to be wondered at that she created a sensation.

The song of "Urbain," in Les Huguenots, caused an encore, and she sang Mr. Mouton's "Beware" in a very captivating manner. She also sang a new Italian canzonetta, by Pissuti, with English words, and a very pretty English ballad, by Osborn, called "Who's at my Window?" Each of these was enthusiastically encored, and she responded to each with a well-chosen ballad—one of them called "The Merry Sunshine" being particularly animated and graceful. The other was a pretty Irish ballad called "Norah the Pride of Kildare." It will be seen that Mrs. Weston's repertoire is made up of fresh pieces, and that she does not rely for effect on hackneyed, common-place or clap-trap songs. No concert-singer that has ever appeared in the Academy has had a more legitimate success than hers of last evening, and every lover of good music, interpreted in the best manner, must hope for frequent visits in the future from this very attractive artist. She goes with the Quartette Club to the north and west.

The History of Music.

FIFTEENTH LECTURE BY MR. J. K. PAINE.

(Reported for the Advertiser.)

Mr. Paine began with a few remarks upon Mozart, and said that Beethoven—the subject of this lecture—was the greatest of the school of pianists which grew up on Mozart's model,—not on account of his executive ability, but his wonderful fire and inspiration. He was born on the 17th or 18th of December, 1770. At a very early age he was instructed by his father, and by the time he was eleven years of age had attained great skill. In his fifteenth year he was appointed assistant organist, and a few years later he was sent to Vienna to study with Mozart. Mr. Paine referred to Beethoven's sorrows and hardships in early life, and said that after spending five of the happiest years of his life he withdrew himself from the world as a performer to give himself up to an ideal world. Then followed a very productive period in his life. During this period deafness had already begun to afflict him. He proudly and patiently bore his increasing deafness, the coldness of his friends and the sneers of others. He was a staunch republican all his life in his political ideas, and did not hesitate to avow his principles. He had not only a great heart but a powerful mind, and reflected on all the great events of his time. He was not only the representative musician, but might also be called the artist and poet of the nineteenth century. Mr. Paine devoted some time to treating of Beethoven's sorrows and said that he was the great master of instrumental music as Mozart was of opera, Handel of oratorios, and Bach of Passion Music.

SIXTEENTH LECTURE.

(Reported for the Boston Journal.)

The sixteenth lecture by Mr. Paine, delivered at Wesleyan Hall, on Saturday, was devoted to a consideration of "The Opera in Europe in the 19th Century—Italian, French and German."

It was a singular fact that the land of Palestrina and Gabrieli should have long ago lost the love for their heavenly harmonies, and in secular music should have wandered so far away from the path marked out by Scarlatti. Italy's present position in the musical world is the result of almost an entire abandonment to the light, pleasing and sensuous side of the art. The Italians know what they want of the opera. This is more than can be said of the Germans, whose ideas on this subject often clash. In Italy people go to the opera simply to be amused, or to receive visits, to make appointments and even to transact business. Under such circumstances, having no higher aim than to have their ears delighted, their fancy pleased, or to enjoy the entertainment of social intercourse, it is no wonder that the Italian Opera has been a brilliant success at home, and through the wonderful voices and talents of her singers a favorite with the great mass of the public all over the civilized world. Italian Opera, since Mozart's day, has reached its climax in the achievements of Rossini, and since the close of his active career, it has gradually declined. The lecturer gave an interesting sketch of Rossini's life. A consummate mastery of the vocal style, he declared, was the secret of Rossini's power. He had the wisdom to write out all the florid ornaments, passages and cadenzas, or floriture, which before his day were left entirely to the singer to introduce ad libitum, and he showed so much taste and discrimination in manipulating the vocal part that he succeeded in limiting what had grown to be an annoyance and abuse. Rossini is unquestionably the first Italian composer of this century, that is to say in the pure Italian school. But it cannot be said that many of his operas will live. Only two, "The Barber of Seville," and "William Tell," now hold the stage. His "Stabat Mater" was described by the lecturer as very pleasing and sensuous secular music profanely set to one of the most pathetic and religious hymns ever written. Rossini had imitators and successors, the most celebrated of whom are Mercadante, Bellini, Donizetti and Verdi. We find certain characteristics common to all these masters, inherited in part from Rossini as the presiding genius of the group.

In music the French have been great only in the comic opera. The best names among her native composers are Grétry, Boieldieu, Herold, Auber and Adam, who distinguished themselves chiefly in this branch. In the grand opera they have carried off the palm. Lully, the founder of the French opera, was an Italian by birth, and Gluck, Piccini, Salieri, Cherubini, Spontini and Meyerbeer were the daring foreigners who took Paris by storm, and made the grand national opera the stepping-stone to fame. The French, like the English, have never produced a great epoch-making musician, yet, nevertheless, France, more than England, has exerted a powerful influence, at least on one branch of music. French music, like French literature, is a product of the wit and understanding. The Italians demand above everything beautiful melody and singing, the French an impressive action and plot. Singing is held secondary to dramatic expression and subordinate to the declamation. The Germans seek to unite both harmoniously and to add an important accessory in the polyphonic, architectural forms of music in a richer and more plastic treatment of the orchestra, but, with the exception of a few great masters, struggle vainly to reach their ideal.

Meanwhile the Italians and the French have gained the applause and success of the unthinking world. The French are the only people who have had a national opera in the strict sense of the term; for the centralization which makes Paris the nation, combined with that patriotic pride which amounts almost to fanaticism, and the love for the theatre which pervades all classes, has made that capital for the last one hundred years the centre of the operatic world, notwithstanding the fact that Mozart, Beethoven, Von Weber and other great masters wrote for another sphere, and, as the music testifies, a much higher one—an ideal sphere. In connection with a sketch of the French opera, the lecturer reviewed briefly the music of Boieldieu, Halévy, Auber and Gounod, the chief native composers who were Grétry's contemporaries or successors; and Antonio Salieri, Luigi Cherubini (whose compositions were highly praised), Gasparo Spontini, Meyerbeer, who had been the most eminent foreign composers to follow Gluck. The French composer Méhul, on account of his solid German style, was less appreciated by his own countrymen than by the Germans.

Germany, said Mr. Paine, has for a long time been the battle ground of various dramatic principles, not only in regard to the opera but the entire act of dramatic representation. The opera in Italy and France has had more or less connection with the political history of those countries, but the German opera has had more to do with the history of aesthetic and poetical culture of the German people than their political life. The Germans until recently have been more of a speculative than a practical people, and in their efforts to thoroughly grasp the principles that underlie the dramatic art and embody them in their works they have generally failed to realize their aims. It cannot be said that German composers as a class have shown as much productivity in the opera as in other branches of music, notwithstanding that the greatest representatives of the musical drama have been Germans. It may be truly affirmed that the one opera of Beethoven is worth more to the life of music than a score of operas by Donizetti or Auber, and that the serious thoughtful efforts of Gluck have been more fruitful of good results to the art than the prolific routine of Italian operatic composers. Yet it remains a curious fact that no German master has founded a dramatic school in his country that might be compared with the Neapolitan school, or the French comic opera. Both Gluck and Mozart had more numerous followers among the French and Italians than at home. Mozart was undoubtedly influenced by Gluck, and Beethoven by Mozart, yet neither followed in the other's footsteps so closely as to be identified as dependents. Beethoven's "Fidelio" marks a return of the opera in Germany, from its universal height accomplished by Mozart, to a national German character. Those who came directly after Beethoven in time, did not follow this truly national and modern direction, but chose instead a more narrow and insignificant course, which led to the so-called "romantic opera." In this latter connection, and in concluding, the lecturer dwelt briefly upon Louis Spohr, Carl Maria von Weber, and Henry Marschner, who were designated the representative composers of this school.

Dr. Langmaid gave very effectively two musical illustrations in connection with the lecture—an aria from Rossini's "Barbiere," and the prayer from Weber's "Oberon."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Pearl of the Isle. 3. Eb to c. J. R. Thomas. 35
A pearl of melody.
- For You. 3. D to g. M. Kaller. 30
A thought! a thought! for the rosy morn.
Sweet fancies to sweet music.
- Regret Thee! 4. Eb to f. V. Gabriel. 30
- Speak to me. 3. A to d. F. Campana. 30
Two very effective exhibition or concert songs, the last suitable for alto voice.
- Again the flowers we loved to twine. 3. Eb to c. L. B. Barnes. 30 Poetry by Rev. Theo. Dale. Music smooth, flowing, and fits well to the words.
- Ave Maria. (Holy Spirit, hear our Prayer). 4. F to g. B. F. Baker. 40
Uncommonly sweet melody. Latin words an Ave Maria, gratia plena &c. The English is not a translation but a prayer set to music.
- Oh! for the Wings of a Dove. Sacred Quartet. 4. Ab to c. J. S. Knight. 40
Original, and with great variety. Contains a fine solo, followed by a duet, then by a quartet, which has two movements. Made in five flats.
- Merry Land of Childhood. 3. A to f. C. Templeton. 30
"The merry land of childhood
How far away it seems!"
Charming reminiscence of early days, with a good chorus.
- Stay home with me to-night, dear Tom. 2. G to d. W. T. Porter. 30
"Stay home with me to-night, dear Tom,
Don't put my arms away."
Beautiful home song, as is the next.
- As Good as Gold! 2. F to d. A. Lee. 30
"My love is but a shepherd lad,
A shepherdess am I."
Has a "lady's" and "gentleman's" version.
- Over the Sea. 3. Eb to c. L. E. Hicks. 30
Fine Irish song with chorus.
- Poor little fatherless child. 3. F to c. A. Nish. 30
- Poor Child of the Drunkard. Song and Cho. 3. Ab to c. W. F. Sherwin. 30
Simple, affecting ballads, both of them, and good for anybody to sing.

Instrumental.

- Germania. Waltz. 3. Ab. W. Torsell. 40
- Muet and Chandon. Waltz. 3. C. J. S. Knight. 30
- Valce Brillante. Military Style. 3. C. Leybach. 40
- Old 96 Waltz. 2. F. E. Christie. 30
The large number of fine pieces to be noticed in this column, renders it necessary to classify, although all are worthy of separate descriptions. Torsell's Waltz is very rich and sweet. Knight's arrangement of a popular air must meet with favor. Leybach's waltz is singular, but very taking throughout, and Old 96 is simple, but very pretty.
- Summer Night Schottische. 2. G. J. H. Wand. 30
Has considerable variety and power, with simplicity.
- Eleven Chorals from Schneider's Organ School. 3. 35
Good themes for voluntaries.
- Dawn of Love Mazurka. 4. Ab. E. L. Ripley. 50
Full of rare and pretty effects. A fine Mazurka.
- Fire-Fly Galop. 2. C. J. W. Turner. 30
- Gay Galop. 2. G. C. E. Harrington. 30
- Tourist Galop. 3. F. F. Zikoff. 30
Three pretty galops, the last of which is the most elaborate and "high-class," but will not please, perhaps, more than the others, whose composers know how to make the Fire-Fly, and the Gay hours pass quickly.
- The Little Ensign. (Der kleine Fahnen.) 4. F. F. Bendel. 40
- In the Fields. (Auf den Bergen). 3. D. A. Junqman. 40
- Five Songs without Words. 3. G. D. Wilson. 75
Three very pleasing piano pieces, which will well repay practice.
- My Mountain Home. Styrienne. 4. Eb. C. Wels. 50
A semi-mountain melody, which reminds one of the Alps. Brilliant.
- Blanche March. From Kärken. 3. D. T. Bissell. 30
A pleasing arrangement of a German "gem."

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the convenience a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 784.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 2.

Opera and the Art of Singing.*

BY CARL GLOGGNER-CASTELLI.

If we follow the several phases of development, through which the Opera has gradually moulded itself into the Musical Drama, of our time, our interest will be at once directed to the Art of Singing as the chief factor of the whole kind.

The several epochs of the style of singing go hand in hand with those of the Opera. A school of singing (method) forms itself as the necessary result of a musical style, which, coming forward independently, and for some time controlling the direction of the public taste, sets peculiar conditions to the performing artists, and requires a study with special reference to its peculiarities.

Hence Opera and style of singing are so inseparable in their development, the one conditioning the other, that in the history of the Opera we can also follow that of Singing.

The distinctive national ways of feeling determine the ground color of musical works of art. Our mode of feeling and expression takes its form from the influence exerted upon us by the spiritual life of the people in the midst of which we grow up, or to whose peculiarities we are most drawn through character and inclination. Only to independent, individual creative faculty is it possible to call into life a series of Art works, whose influence is powerful enough to bring about a revolution in taste. That such an influence is not confined to talent of the most pure ideal direction, we see everywhere in the history of Opera. Even composers, whom we cannot count among those commonly called "classical," have for long periods exercised an important influence on the direction of public taste. The element of novelty and of surprise, the power of sensual charm, has lifted their works into notice; and the prevailing mediocrity, the want of fresh productive talents, has made them indispensable to our stage repertoires for years. This circumstance alone passes with many for the trial (as it were) by fire, if not, in certain cases, even for the stamp of classicality.

"This opera is really good; it has already kept its place so many years upon the repertoire," we often hear it said. This properly is no proof of its goodness; it only shows how destitute a great part of the public is of any sort of judgment in matters of Art, since it will not open its eyes to the shallowness of these mere manufactured articles, after they have been performed for years. But great and lasting as the influence may be of talents, often in themselves significant, but moving in eccentric paths, still for the history of Art they have merely the value of every ephemeral manifestation, that of a mistaken direction, jacking the propagating element, the intrinsic necessity, which alone can give the basis for a wider development.

Of the three main tendencies in Opera, presented by the style of different nations, the French have exerted the most local influence; the German, the latest, but artistically the most widely operative; the Italian, the earliest and the most long-lived. While with the French composers the fundamental feature of their style is found in the tone of the popular ballad, in the songs of the troubadours, the German tone-poet, like a genuine son of his people, draws something original and individual out of the depths of a rich spiritual life. The style most influenced by the beauty of the given material is that of the Italian Opera. So rich is this material, so pliable the organ of the natives of that land of paradise, that Art has only to continue what Nature has already begun; the voice, endowed with the highest euphony and flexibility, reaches a degree of technical culture seldom found in other races.

Thus we have seen the Italian Opera and its style of singing, down to the second decade of our century, control the taste of the whole European public. All the great singers who had come before the world till then, were mostly formed in that school, whose fatherland can truly be called the cradle of song. Neither the French masters of the latter part of the 18th century, nor the reformer Gluck, were able essentially to lessen the taste of the great public for the Italian Opera and its artistic interpreters. Even Mozart, whose "Magic Flute" rears itself like a sublime monument of German Art out of the midst of a fermenting mass of heterogeneous tastes, could not overcome the sensuous intoxication which held the whole theatre-going public captive. Far beyond its own time stretches the dominion of the Italians; nay, a new period of splendor was developed for their Opera when Rossini came upon the stage.

A later German master, Carl Maria von Weber, was the first to succeed in breaking a path, at least in Germany. His popular music, and particularly the success of "Der Freyschütz," (first performed in 1821), penetrating into all classes of the people, contributed essentially to place the German Opera in the foreground and establish a new current. Then men began to give room to the thought, how much nearer the native Art stands to the spiritual life of the German people, than all the sensuous charm of the foreign virtuoso opera. But, though the feeling for the simple and the true forms such a leading trait in the character of the German people, still the great public was too much accustomed to the splendor of Italian Opera, and too much carried away by pomp and externality, for any decided revolution to be looked for then. The epoch, which was destined to crowd out the empire of the Italians, surpassed in brilliancy of execution and of scenic display all that the Italians ever had produced. The triumpher of this epoch is Meyerbeer; the man who had conceived the bold idea of combining the style of the French Grand Opera with that of the Italian,—of making the one in a certain manner the foundation for the other.

Meyerbeer had studied at the same time with Weber (1810-11) under the Abbé Vogler. Widely as their paths diverged, and different as their efforts subsequently were, yet they have reached a common result, in so far as it was vouchsafed to both of them to lead the taste of the theatre-going public into new paths. The startling, almost stunning effect produced by Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil" marks the tendencies of that composer, just as clearly as the far-reaching influence of Weber on the development of German Opera gives the true measure for the appreciation of the artistic individuality of the latter.

After Meyerbeer had brought out "Jephtha" and "The Two Caliphs" without much success, in Germany, he turned, at the suggestion of Salieri, to Italy. "Romilda e Costanza," "Margherita d'Anjou," "Emma di R-aburgo," and "Il Crociato in Egitto" are the fruits of his sojourn beyond the Alps. With the last named opera he succeeded in establishing a reputation for himself, not only in Italy, but also in Paris and in Germany. So he returned, in the year 1825, to his Fatherland, where there was at last a hope of seeing from his talent works of a German tone and spirit. But how far Meyerbeer still was from fulfilling the hopes entertained of him in Germany, he showed in the year 1831, when he entered the lists with his "Robert le Diable."

As with a stroke of magic came the effect of this ensnaring opera, so perfectly new in style, with its unwonted brilliancy of instrumentation, and all its pomp of decoration and machinery. Rossini's star began to pale; and when Duprez, the famous tenor, came back from Italy and, in a grandiose, till then unheard-of manner, departing from the traditional style of singing, made his rôles so effective, Meyerbeer had fully conquered; the Italian Opera and its method of singing was from that moment thrown into the shade. Rossini quitted the arena and went immediately back to Bologna. From that time he composed no more operas.

We still hear, from many sides, how prejudiced the public mind is, in regard to Rossini's retirement and perseverance in the resolution to write no more operas, with the mistaken notion that he felt that his creative faculty had become exhausted, that the spring from which so much that was beautiful had flowed, was dried up. And yet this man only a few years before had written his finest work, the "Tell," so wholly different from his earlier operas, so fresh in invention, and all the purer in style that it seemed quickened by the breath of the German muse; so that the appearance of this work might well be regarded as a turning point in Rossini's creative activity. That he should have "written himself out" with the completion of this opera, can hardly be supposed else in a work of its great compass; traces of such a diminution of the inventive gift would certainly have shown themselves. But here we seek for such in vain, and even the later composition, the Stabat Mater, betrays no symptom of exhaustion. Rossini's withdrawal had a wholly different reason: He, who for nearly twenty years had reigned over the whole world of opera, saw clearly enough how great was the attractive power of the new talent now in the ascendant, how a new epoch was preparing, against which he could not make head, and he wished to retire while at the zenith of his fame. Doubtless Rossini might have kept on writing works still worthy of his name, and had he been a German artist, as he was an Italian composer, he would have been still faithful to his banner, and have held it up, though thousands turned away from him to do homage to the new colors. The German self-denial, the impulse to create for the sake of creating, is what the Italian Rossini did not possess. To turn aside into the paths of Meyerbeer, to compete with him for the favor of the crowd, would have been a sin against his own artistic independence; to go on in the way already chosen, to see his old fame obscured, and his new works rewarded with a succès d'estime, to experience a slow dying out of his splendor,—that Rossini would not, could not, simply because—he was Rossini.

* Translated, for this Journal, from the Musikalisches Wochenblatt (Leipzig).

[To be Continued.]

A History of Opera.

BY C. SCHULZE.

[Continued from page 2.]

In Germany, the introduction of opera was greatly facilitated by the love for art and magnificence characterizing the Emperor Leopold, the Electors of Bavaria and Saxony, as well as other reigning princes, who frequently used to get up brilliant dramatic performances at their respective courts. The first German Singspiel, or play interspersed with songs, was Rinuccini's Daphne, translated by Martin Opitz in 1630, that is to say, in the midst of the turmoil of the Thirty Years' War, which might have been supposed to scare away anything in the shape of art. The piece was produced with the music of the Capellmeister, Heinrich Schütz, at the marriage of Sophie, sister of the Elector Johann Georg I., with the Landgraf of Hesse, Georg II.

Among the oldest musical pieces really German, the first place is held by the religious sylvan poem, Scelewig, composed by the famous organist, Joh. Gottl. Stade, at Nuremberg, in the year 1644, for three treble voices, two alto voices, and one bass voice, and scored for three violins, three flutes, three reed pipes, a big horn, and a theorbo (bass lute), as a foundation for the whole. A peculiar trait of this German work was the characterization of the personages by the vocal parts assigned them, and the intentional employment of the German rounded form of the song, which moreover was enlarged into the air and the concerted piece.

German was not, however, retained in the service of opera, Italian singers of both sexes being yet employed. It was not until after 1678, when the first German theatre was erected in Hamburg, that our mother tongue succeeded to its rights upon the operatic stage. We find mentioned as the first musical piece at this theatre: Der geschaffene, gefallene, und aufgerichtete Mensch (The Creation, Fall, and Regeneration of Man), words by Richter, and music arranged by Theile, a pupil of Heinrich Schütz. The book, like those of the operas represented up to the year 1690, was treated, it is true, as regards its purport and language, exactly like the coarse Shrovetide pieces, and the music composed, solely by amateurs, was doubtless appropriate.

In Spain, it was the custom, even during the earliest years of Philip II.'s reign, to sing duets and trios in comedies, but it was not till the nuptials of Carlos II. with Maria von Neuburg that the first opera, Lully's Armide, was brought out. Italian music, however, was preferred, and soon afterwards, singers and composers were sent for from Naples and Milan.

In Russia it was, of course, not until a late period that opera took firm root. The Empress Elizabeth built the first Russian operahouse in Moscow. At her coronation, in 1762, Hasse's Clemenza di Tito was performed in this theatre with all imaginable splendor. Metastasio's three poems, Alexander in India, Semiramis and Olympias, with music by Manfredius, enjoyed the same honor.

The first Russian opera mentioned is Cephalus and Procris, words by Sumarokov, music by Araja, only Russian singers and players taking part in the performance. But in this case, also, the Italians retained the prize. Catharine II. gave a large salary to the celebrated Galuppi, whom she sent for from Venice, and his music to Metastasio's Dido achieved an immense success.

We have seen how Italian music and Italian poetry subjected all the countries of Europe beneath their sway. But the greater the sphere of their dominion became, the more depraved grew the taste displayed by them. The books became worse and worse, being a confused mixture of historical and mythological, real and allegorical, sacred and profane, subjects, while the language was stilted and high-sounding, sentimental, full of empty phrases, and purportless. The poetic art was no longer the royal sister of music; it was degraded into a Cinderella. Though, about 1650, Cicoginini combined the serious with the comic, the elevated with the low and common, and poetry with the loosest prose, he was considered a reformer of the drama and a model for imitation.

It must not, however, be supposed that the progress which I have mentioned as taking place in composition, melody, harmony, and instrumentation, found favor with all the musicians of the period, and excited them to follow in the same path. The case was then exactly what it is now. The progress made was itself, too, insignificant. Not a single composer, till shortly after 1650, advanced true musical expression. The contrapuntal-periwig style continued to flourish bravely. Fugue and canon still attempted to carry on their soul-murdering game: musical riddles and eye-music could not satisfy the thirsty feelings, and the narrow-minded system of harmonics did not budge from its own ground. The melody suffered seriously from being overloaded with ornamental shakes, slurred notes, tremolos, interrupted cadences, and Rückungen; noisy instrumentation became more and more a perfect curse on the land. Dances, good scenery, and artistic machinery, such were the birdlime with which it was attempted to catch the public. We are indebted to French opera for the first improvement in this respect. The success obtained by the performances of the Italian singers whom Mazarin had invited to Paris, excited in a high degree the emulation of French authors and musicians. In 1659, the Abbé Perin wrote a pastoral, for which Cambert, organist at the Church of St. Honoré, composed the music. They did the same in 1661. Both pieces appear, however, to have excited only a passing interest. Perin, to whom, as I have already mentioned, was granted the privilege of erecting permanent theatres in Paris, and other towns of France, was more fortunate with his melodrama of Pomone, which, with Cambert's music, entranced the Parisians for eight successive months, and brought the author in the respectable sum of 30,000 francs. The privilege conceded to Perin was, however, obtained the following year, 1672, by Lully, who founded French opera, and thus represents a step in the development of opera generally, preparing most creditably the path for the ideas of a great master who came after him, and who understood better than all other musicians to turn his ringing thoughts into ringing coin.

Lully began his career at Paris as a scullion, and died a royal chapelmaster, leaving behind him property to the amount of 630,000 livres. He was born in 1633, at Florence, and went to Paris when he was a boy of twelve. His opera of Cadmus, for which Quinault wrote the book, was produced in 1673 as the first lyrical tragedy of the French theatre. In that same year he obtained the theatre in the Palais Royal. A Royal order forbade at the same time more than two singers and six violins to be employed in any other Parisian theatre.

The new theatre opened with Lully's Alceste, the words of which were written by Quinault. This was followed in 1675, by Thésée; in 1676, by Atys; and, in 1677, by Isis. As Lully ascribed the small success of these operas to Quinault, he allied himself with Corneille, who wrote for him Psyche in 1678, and Bellerophon in 1679. In every subsequent year, however, we again find Lully in faithful alliance with Quinault. The last opera, namely, Armide, was produced in 1686. It pleased, however, neither the public nor the Court. Under these circumstances, Lully had it performed for himself alone, the only other such instance, only with a contrary motive, being one that occurred not long since in Munich. The plan succeeded, for it caused King Louis to think there must be something in the opera after all. He ordered it to be revived, and the Court and public went into ecstasies of delight. Even after Lully's death, which took place in 1687, his operas were the favorites of the French, and continued to be so for more than half a century.

His music, it is true, enjoyed a higher reputation than its value deserved; Lully's recitatives are not so pleasing and characteristic as those in the works of many of his predecessors. The choruses were generally treated in one uniform manner, although more carefully than before; his airs were really nothing more than chansons, and this is why they soon spread about as street ballads.—But airs, chorus, and ballet were skilfully dovetailed into one another. It was Lully who developed the heroic and historical ballet, as it is called, and composed the music for it. His scoring, too, is clever. His instrumental basis for the orchestra, especially in the choruses, is the stringed quartet. His overtures for stringed instruments used for a long time to be played, even in Italy, before every opera, until they were displaced by Scarlatti's. They consisted mostly of two movements in the same key, one of which moves homophonously in the Largo, and the other figured in the Vivace. Besides furnishing the music to Molière's Princesse d'Elide and L'Amour Médecin, Lully composed nineteen operas. His greatest merit was the fact of his constantly endeavoring to obtain good poems, which Quinault, who was very talented, wrote for him. Armide and Atys are, in their way, masterpieces of poetical expression. Quinault's have been used down to the most recent times, though the recitative is brought rather too prominently forward in them. The whole stock in trade of mythological wonders was flung overboard; the public wanted to see reasonable beings speak and act. The great characters of Greek and Roman history became henceforth the supports of opera. The acts were reduced from five to three; the wearisome prologues were lopped away; the recitatives were curtailed; the airs and duets were removed to the end of the scenes; and the choruses previously introduced at the end of every act abolished. The scenery and changes of scene became much more simple. Apostolo Zeno, too, of Candia (born 1750), the founder of magnanimous opera, contributed as much as Quinault to the improvement of operatic text books. His characters were elevated, though their expression of passion appears frequently somewhat flat; the action was always based upon sufficient motives, though rather involved, and in many scenes too long, so as to render the music fatiguing. But still higher than Zeno stood Metastasio (died 1782), whose soft, harmonious language seemed expressly created for composition, to which it excited even Mozart. As we are aware, the book of Titus is by Metastasio. He employed in a skilful manner long and short lines, different metres, and even rhyme; he introduced, with equal skill, the lyric into the dramatic style, and strove to attain truthfulness of character, a greater rapidity in the events, and animation in the scenery. We must, it is true, sometimes overlook the fantastical nature of his mode of expression, the frequent and cloying recurrence of amorous toying, and the invariable sameness of the dramatic complications and crises.

(To be Continued.)

Dr. Ferdinand Hiller.

[From the London "Times."]

The temporary sojourn among us of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, one of the most distinguished representatives of the musical art, and Spohr's successor as the honored "Altkaiser" of Germany, is conferring upon some of our public performances just now a special interest. The junior of Mendelssohn by about three years, Hiller was one of the most intimate of the few very intimate friends of that great musician, and ranked high in his esteem among the companions who strove heartily with him towards a common end. A reference to Mendelssohn's published letters will suffice to acquaint all previously unaware of the fact upon what terms Hiller was with their illustrious author, and what Mendelssohn himself thought of Hiller. But even this honorable testimony is not required on behalf of one who has labored so assiduously and effected so much for art in various ways. There are few branches of musical composition which Dr. Hiller has not, from time to time, successfully essayed. Oratorio, opera, and orchestral Symphony have come to him with like facility; while his numerous additions to the repertory of the pianoforte, upon which he is still one of the most masterly of living executants, have contributed no little towards the preservation of the "universal instrument" as a medium for upholding and strengthening a taste for that genuine art which meets with such formidable antagonists in those who look upon self-display as the beginning, the middle, and the end. Against the egotism of pure "virtuosity," Dr. Hiller, although from the earliest himself a virtuoso of exceptional acquirements, has argued with unbending severity, and thereby earned among lovers of music for its own sake a high and durable reputation. Further than this he is one of the most deeply-read and accomplished critics of our day, and by the exercise of his literary pen has done scarcely less for the cause of healthy art than by the example of his musical productions. Dr. Hiller, in short, deserves the hearty recognition which is everywhere the admitted prerogative of honest and earnest labor; and he comes so rarely among us, we are glad to find that his present visit has not been past by unheeded in certain influential quarters. The familiar friend and in some respects the rival of Mendelssohn is no ordinary man. Such was Hiller; and that he is now something more has been satisfactorily proved since his recent arrival in England.

At the third Oratorio-Concert the first piece in the programme, and indeed its most important feature, was Dr. Hiller's Nala and Damayanti, written expressly for the Birmingham Festival of 1870, and produced with entire success. In St. James's Hall the other night, as in the Birmingham Town Hall last September, Dr. Hiller directed the performance. We need not again describe the cantata. It will be remembered, by all who take an interest in the matter, that the poem is founded upon an episode in the ancient Hindu epic, the Mahabharata, and that it turns upon the loves of Prince Nala of Nishadha and Princess Damayanti, daughter of King Bhima, who, enamored of each other by hearsay, although they have never met, are, with certain supernatural aids, ultimately brought together and duly wedded. Such a subject would have possessed little interest at the present time were it not on account of the fanciful and richly-colored music which Dr. Hiller has invented for it, and by means of which he has, if we may employ the phrase, galvanized a corpse. No one cares for Nala; no one cares for Damayanti—in spite of the renown of her beauty; least of all does any one care for King Bhima. But every one with an ear attuned to harmony must care for Dr. Hiller's music—and particularly for that part of it which illustrates the opening scene of the cantata (in the Gardens of King Bhima). The execution, on the whole, was even better, perhaps, than at Birmingham; and for this the utmost credit is due to Mr. Barnby, who, although he had prepared the work for public performance, resigned his conductor's stick, with excellent taste, to Dr. Hiller on the occasion. The principal singers were Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley (the same as at Birmingham), against not one of whom could a single objection be raised; the orchestra, with Mr. Carrodus, our admirable English violinist, as leading violin, was all that could be wished; and the choral portions, with an exception here and there, were given in such a manner as must have satisfied Dr. Hiller himself, difficult to satisfy as he notoriously is. Under any circumstances he could hardly have been otherwise than pleased with the very cordial reception he experienced at the hands of Mr. Barnby's audience.

At Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert, a still more important share of the programme was awarded to Dr. Hiller, who not only conducted the performance of his grand orchestral Symphony in E—"Es muss doch Frühling werden" ("It must soon be spring"), but played the pianoforte part of Mozart's concerto in D, as well as two solo pieces composed by himself. The Symphony has been more than once described. It was originally introduced, six years ago, at the concerts of the unhappily defunct Musical Society of London and was also played at the Crystal Palace under Mr. Manns about this time twelvemonth. Ambitions in design, large in proportions, and, for the most part, thoroughly original in the method of its development, one or two hearings are scarcely enough for amateurs, however attentive and intelligent, to grasp the purport of the whole, as a whole. Each new performance, however, helps to disclose fresh beauties, and establishes more and more clearly the fact that while Dr. Hiller, in the composition and working out of this really noble Symphony, has been to a certain degree influenced by his famous contemporaries, Mendelssohn and Schumann, he is a vigorous thinker on his own account, and had Mendelssohn and Schumann lived, might in some measure have also influenced them, Schumann (who was very impressionable) in particular. But Mendelssohn died in 1847; Schumann in 1854—somewhere about the period at which the Symphony in E was composed; and thus Dr. Hiller, whose talent, enormously developed since the death of Mendelssohn, had, when Schumann obtained possession of the musical mind of Germany, undergone a fresh metamorphosis, was not allowed a chance of taking his revenge. It matters little, however; the Symphony—"Es muss doch Frühling werden," to which, by the way, we see no reason for attaching a political significance, is a splendid composition; and it was agreeable to find it thoroughly appreciated by the Crystal Palace audience, who applauded every movement, and called back the composer with enthusiasm at the end. Better played, we say it advisedly, the Symphony could not by any possibility have been. One word must describe Dr. Hiller's performance of Mozart's concerto in D (the so-called "Coronation Concerto"); and that word is "perfection." It was really as if Mozart himself was playing his own concerto. All of Hiller consisted of an elaborate "cadenza" in the first movement, improvised in masterly style, and a shorter one in the finale, so completely in keeping with the text that any one might have believed it to be Mozart's. We have seldom heard the work of a great master given with more utter self-abnegation or more religious devotion to the author.

Of the pianoforte solos introduced by Dr. Hiller (one of his pianoforte "Studies," and a little caprice, "Zur Guitare") we need only say that they were played with exquisite delicacy and taste.]

The History of Music.

SEVENTEENTH LECTURE BY MR. J. K. PAINE.

(Reported for the Boston Journal.)

The seventeenth and last but one of Mr. J. K. Paine's lectures on Music was delivered at Wesleyan Hall on Saturday, the particular division of the subject treated upon being Music since Beethoven, with critical sketches of Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann and other modern masters.

The lecturer said that through the controlling power of Beethoven's genius the various forms of concert and chamber music have remained the central point of all subsequent development as represented by the younger masters, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin and others. The works of the older masters, Haydn, Mozart, and particularly Sebastian Bach, whose compositions have become thoroughly known even to musicians only during the last forty years, have had a full share in forming the musical life of the present age; but Beethoven is the presiding genius of the century, and the grand forms he perfected remain the ideal types, inasmuch as the free, thematic structure of the Sonata and Symphony was made the vehicle of his conceptions. He elevated the forms to match his grand personality, and no successor has yet appeared to carry the dimensions of the art beyond the limits he set. Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann and others have developed music in single, separate points, but no one of them has enlarged the collective form as represented by Beethoven's symphonies or Handel's oratorios. Beethoven's only pupil, except the Grand Duke Rudolph, was Ferdinand Ries; but this excellent musician and pianist was not endowed with genius to follow in the footsteps of his master. This was vouchsafed to the wonderfully gifted Franz Schubert, who was born at Vienna, Jan. 31, 1797, and died in 1828.

Mr. Paine gave an interesting sketch of Schubert's life and music. After bestowing praise upon his instrumental compositions, and especially upon his Seventh Symphony in C, which Schumann drew out of its obscurity, he remarked that it was as a song writer, however, that Schubert stands forth as an original master. He is the creator of the modern German song, and this was the sphere of his best activity and significance as an artist. His productiveness in this branch was something marvelous. Three hundred and sixty of his songs have been published and nearly as many still exist in manuscript, making over six hundred in all. The first successor of Schubert as a song composer, was Carl Loewe, who was born near Halle in 1786. This master enjoys a high reputation in Germany.

Already in Spohr, Von Weber and Loewe, we witness a change in the musical leadership from South to North Germany, but the lifeless period in German music that set in with the era of Rossini and Bellini, did not come to an end until the appearance of Mendelssohn. Under his guidance and example a new school of German music was founded. The names of Schumann, Chopin, Gade, Hiller, Hauptmann and others well represent a bright epoch in the further development of modern music. The lecturer gave an account of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who was born in Hamburg in 1809, and died in 1847, paying a high tribute both to his works and to his high and noble devotion to his art. Mendelssohn's genius was exercised in almost every form of musical composition, except the opera, from the Lied to the oratorio and Symphony, and the easy mastery he exhibited on every side renders him comparable to the universal Mozart, with this difference, that Mendelssohn remained strictly faithful to the national and individual type, while Mozart transformed the different European types into harmonious unity; although Mendelssohn did a great work as the collective result of his activity, it cannot be said that he opened any new paths of development, or enlarged any of the important forms of music. His oratorios, "St. Paul" and "Elijah," are the greatest works in this department that have appeared since Handel's day.

A sketch was next given of Robert Schumann, who was born June 8, 1810, and died in 1856. His services as a critic and as a composer, were in turn dwelt upon somewhat elaborately. Mr. Paine awarding him a high place in both connections. The closing days of this master were rendered unhappy by mental disorder, and he died in an insane asylum. Like Beethoven, Mendelssohn and others, he made the piano the starting point of his music. All the productions of the first ten years of his artistic life are piano compositions. Then followed a year of songs (1840), and then a year of Symphonies and other orchestral music (1841). The next year was devoted principally to quartets and other chamber music, and in the following years appeared his great vocal works among all kinds of compositions. Bach, Beethoven and Schumann are the most German of German composers. It is doubtful whether Schumann's music will ever be liked in Italy and France, where Mozart and Mendelssohn find a place, and even the English who are allied by race with the Germans have not fully accepted Schumann's or Sebastian Bach's music. Schumann, like Mendelssohn, was an earnest student of Bach's music. In his songs he shows a progress beyond Schubert and Mendelssohn, in giving powerful and characteristic expressions to the text. Of all composers since Beethoven he is the least of a mannerist. Among the talented artists who were identified prominently with Mendelssohn and Schumann were Niels W. Gade, Sterndale Bennett, Ferdinand Hiller, Julius Riets, Carl Reinecke and Glinka. In closing, Mr. Paine remarked that there were two remarkable artists who also demanded attention: Chopin and Robert Franz; but the limits of the lecture prevented any extended account of them.

At the conclusion of his lecture Mr. Paine performed upon the pianoforte, with fine skill and taste, two compositions by Schumann—a piece from his "Wood music" (Op. 82), and a nocturne in F major (Op. 21).

EIGHTEENTH LECTURE.

Mr. J. K. Paine delivered the eighteenth and last of his series of University lectures, on the History of Music, at Wesleyan Hall, Saturday noon, taking for his special theme "The New German Music."

He said the lamented deaths of Mendelssohn and Schumann arrested at its full career the onward course of the traditional art of music. Had these leaders of the musical world lived to the present hour in the active practice of their art, the relative prominence of later musicians, like Wagner and Liszt, would doubtless have been modified by their living influence and example. No one can doubt that Mendelssohn would have exerted all his power and influence in a different direction. Before his death the various public attempts made by Berlioz and Wagner failed to strike any root. Robert Schumann wrote in his private journal on the 5th of August, 1847, concerning the new opera of "Tannhäuser:" "It is an opera which cannot be so easily described in a few words; it is certain that it possesses a touch of genius. If Wagner were as melodious a musician as he is an intellectual one, he would be the man of the time." This precisely describes the present opinion of a large class of people in regard to the musical abilities of Wagner. The premonitory symptoms of the violent revolution in the musical world, which was fairly inaugurated soon after the political revolution of 1848, were witnessed in the acts of Hector Berlioz, a Frenchman by birth and education. This remarkable character was born in a small town near Grenoble in 1803, and died in Paris in 1869. Berlioz was not content that music should suggest or characterize in a general way a poetic idea, or intellectual thought, but strove to make it take the place of words even in points of detail. He would make music secondary or subordinate to mental conceptions. As pure instrumental music is solely the language of the emotions, he would fain make it intellectual by means of a programme of the poetic contents. Berlioz was a brilliant musical journalist, and for many years was connected in this capacity with the Journal des Debats. His valuable work on modern orchestration is distinguished by a vast amount of technical knowledge and poetic talent.

Richard Wagner, the leading figure of the group, was born in Leipzig in 1812. His early youth was spent under different artistic impressions, but at the age of fifteen his attention was turned to music, and at the age of nineteen he began his life as a practical musical director. After some years passed in connection with different theatres in Germany, he went to Paris, where he was unsuccessful. In 1842 he returned to Germany, and his "Rienzi" was brought out for the first time at Dresden. It met with distinguished success, and the author found himself suddenly the favorite of the Dresden public. The music did not break away from the traditional style, and this fact, together with the pomp and display of the stage spectacle, an element which Wagner had borrowed from the French opera, insured the favorable reception of his work. This was speedily followed by his "Flying Dutchman" and the "Tannhäuser," but neither of these operas was well received by the public. He had departed too far from the path marked out by his predecessors. As a fierce radical in politics as well as in religion and music, Wagner became, of course, a very active participant in the revolution of 1848, and in consequence of the failure of that movement, he was compelled to flee from the country. In his exile he published those writings which were destined to cause a greater commotion in the musical world even than his music. Meanwhile Liszt published an able analysis and eulogy of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin," and brought those works out with brilliant success at Weimar. It was not long after this that Wagner's name and music became universally known, either to be honored and loved, respected and admired by a friendly class, questioned by a more wary and critical class, or despised and execrated by still another class of the inharmonious sons of music. Wagner's personal history since this time is well known. The great aim of Wagner's theories is an entire revolution in art, society, politics, and religion. The general features of this scheme are announced in his first pamphlet—"Art and Revolution." The theory is developed as a whole in the following pamphlet, "The Future Work of Art," and its especial discussion and application to poetry and music form the subject of the third pamphlet, "The Opera and Drama." He says that modern life is founded on hypocrisy; that the industry of modern nations is perverted or degenerate, and draws a parallel between the artistic life of the Greeks and ours, unfavorably to the latter. He holds that the development of genuine art is incompatible with Christian knowledge or consciousness, and also that man is his own god and stands above nature, corresponding, in his inward and outward life as an emotional and reasoning, as well as an impressionable creature, to that grand and complete art which is the result of all the separate branches or modes of art. His object, in a word, is to reunite the various branches of art as they were united in ancient Greece, but on a higher plane. In his last pamphlet, Wagner proceeds to the special application of those principles. He reviews the opera and drama of the past with sharp, unsparring criticism. Poetry and music must be equally and happily wedded in order to constitute the ideal work of art. It is contended that there is no true opera or true drama, and Wagner would abolish the literary drama as well as the opera, substituting for them a work of art addressed to the senses and feelings alone. He denounces what is usually termed melody, that is, the traditional form of the air. This must be done away with, and the infinite melody, hinted at in Beethoven's last works, must be introduced. The only genuine melody, he declares, is that which arises from the heartfelt delivery of the language—melody that does not attract any attention on its own account, except as the sensuous expression of a sentiment which is clearly manifest in the language. Wagner did not apply these principles to full practice at the outset. He was too shrewd for this. In his "Flying Dutchman" he approaches this aim from a safe distance. In "Tannhäuser" he goes further, but still retains the air, concerted pieces, and other traditional forms. "Lohengrin" comes nearer to the ultimate goal of his desires, since he selects for the first time a mythical subject, it being his creed that the myth is the beginning and end of all true poetry. "Tristan and Isolde" marks the nearest attainment of his ideal. "Rheingold" and "Die Walküre" are operas founded on the Nibelungen myths. His only comic opera, "The Master-Singer of Nuremberg," brings to light many pleasant reminiscences of the venerable traditions of old-fashioned art.

Having drawn a sketch of Wagner's views and works, the lecturer passed to a consideration of the counter-views which have become universally current among reflective minds. Wagner's denunciation of modern life, and the declaration that our present religion, society and politics must be completely revolutionized before the future work of art can be appreciated, is so far from any possibility of realization, that we may dismiss it as the vagary of a wild dreamer. His scheme of uniting all the fine arts in order to form a grand comprehensive art, such as the Greeks are said to have had, looks promising enough at first, but reflection does not lend wings to our faith. There is, in fact, nothing eminently new or original in the idea. Music, poetry and dancing have long appeared conjointly in the drama in some form, accompanied as far as can be considered practicable by other fine arts. Even the Greeks did not combine the arts equally, and perhaps the nearest approach to a grand ensemble of the arts was afforded by mediæval religious performances, like the dramatic representations of the Passion of Christ. This sprang from the very soul of Christianity itself, a religion incapable of future art, according to Wagner. Every one of the arts has its particular province, in which, as soon as it reaches its highest attainment, it excludes the others. A concession robs each art of its highest prerogative. To banish the air from the opera is unjustifiable, because its æsthetic influence is too great. On the same grounds the chorus and concerted movements are fully justifiable, even if they arrest for a moment the further action of the drama. The ground taken by Wagner that the genuine source of the ideal drama is the myth, will not stand the test of criticism. No one will doubt that Wagner is a man of remarkable character and a genius, but neither his head nor his heart have been altogether right. He has been led astray by vagaries. His pernicious theories have marred all his later music, yet here and there wonderful beauties come to light in his scores. His best music has an element of popularity in it.

The concluding part of the lecture was devoted to a brief consideration of Liszt, and to a general view of modern music. Who knows, asked the lecturer, but that another and younger people may yet rejuvenate the life of music? As patriotic and art-loving Americans, added he, let us hope that this will be the mission of our own land. May it lift the veil that now shrouds the future of this beautiful art.

The musical illustrations consisted of two tenor airs by Wagner, one from "Tristan and Isolde," and the other from "The Master-Singer of Nuremberg," both of which were finely sung by Dr. Langmaid.

At the close General Henry K. Oliver, of Salem, offered a series of resolutions, recognizing the real and valuable instruction derived from the lectures, and expressing thanks both to Mr. Paine and Harvard University, together with the hope that future efforts may be made in the same direction. The resolutions were adopted unanimously.

The Royal Albert Hall.

Few characteristics of modern cities are more noticeable than the improvements which are constantly making in the edifices devoted to public amusement. Only one or two of the many large audience rooms in this city now consecrated to music and the drama, have a history dating back twenty years, and those which they replaced were vastly inferior to the new in size, in comfort and in general adaptability to the purpose designed. The same is true of every large city in America. In the great European cities the edifices of the past are many of them noble structures, but constant improvements have nevertheless been making for many years. The large and costly Grand Opera House in Paris, yet unfinished, is but an example of a tendency that is to be noticed everywhere. Modern requirements have been directed not only to richness of design and perfection of internal arrangement, but to an increase of capacity. The immense crowds of London have been ill-accommodated, in default of a better place, in the Crystal Palace, but the huge choruses and overflowing audiences have found ample room under its roof. During the past few years a vast structure has been rising in Kensington, designed specially to supply the place which the Crystal Palace has so poorly filled. The Queen laid the foundation stone in 1867; on the 29th of March she declared it formally opened.

The Royal Albert Hall of Arts and Sciences, as this structure has been named, is in the form of an ellipse, with a major axis of 272 feet and a minor axis of 228 feet. The material is dark red brick, relieved with terra-cotta. The latter material forms a broad and massive base thirteen feet high; above it is a high brick story pierced with two rows of windows deeply recessed in terra-cotta, and at the top of this story is placed a balcony passing entirely around the building; still higher is a masonic frieze in buff upon a chocolate ground, with outlines in black, six feet six inches wide, and also belting the entire building. Within an outer shell of staircases, corridors, retiring-rooms and other apartments, is an immense hall, elliptical in form, with a major and minor axis of 219 and 185 feet respectively. At the end opposite the royal entrance is an organ, said to be the largest in the world, built by Mr. Willis of London. This organ has five clavers, four manuals and one pedal. There are in all one hundred and eleven stops, besides fourteen couplers and thirty-two combinations. The number of pipes is close upon nine thousand and the wind is supplied by two steam engines. The orchestra is placed in front of the organ, and leaves to the public an auditorium in horse shoe form. The auditorium is divided into an arena covered with movable chairs, an amphitheatre, boxes, balcony, and the picture gallery, which runs completely around the hall. The total seating capacity, not including the orchestra, is 7266. The estimated cost of the building was two hundred thousand pounds sterling, and this amount has not been exceeded. It was built by subscription without any aid from the government, and has no debt to incur it at the outset. Reserved seats are sold in this building for the season of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, and as the auditorium room is so arranged as to leave almost no choice of seats, the price is uniform at one hundred pounds sterling for each seat. If all the seats should be sold there would be a fund of nearly three million dollars to provide entertainments, but it is not expected of course, that more than a small fraction will be absolutely sold by subscription.

The uses to which it is proposed to put the hall are various. It is expected to provide meeting-places for the learned societies, and to be the scene of cattle-shows. It is adapted even to public lectures. At the opening the Prince of Wales read his address in a loud voice, and was not only distinctly heard throughout the building, but every one in the hall was aware that he was speaking in a loud tone. It would not be necessary for any one who heard the noble voice of Madame Parepa-Ross in the Coliseum, to be told that the size of the Royal Albert Hall would be a slight difficulty for a powerful vocalist to overcome; but the London Hall was formed with a special view to acoustic properties, and so perfectly has this object been accomplished that a position in the picture gallery is not only equal to any other for seeing, but is, although the most distant from the orchestra, inferior to no other part for hearing. The first public performance in the hall was to have taken place on Wednesday evening last, and was announced to be the first of a series of evening concerts to be given by the Society of Arts in aid of a national training school.

There are many interesting facts in connection with the building which might be noticed; as, for example, the mosaic work above the balcony on the exterior, the symbolic designs for which were contributed by several artists, enlarged by photography, and constructed in two years by ten men at a cost of nearly five thousand pounds; the beautiful roof of glass and iron, obscured at the opening by an awning of unbleached calico to shut out the glare of the sun which did not show his face; the admirable convenience for entrance and egress without crowding or confusion; the excellent arrangements for lighting, heating and ventilating; and the imposing ceremonies of the opening. The vast and beautiful structure is a monument to the progress of the age. No building has yet been dedicated to public amusement which has not at some time been found too small to accommodate all who wished to be present, and the same experience is undoubtedly reserved for this monster edifice. It is not to be supposed that the Royal Albert marks the limits of possibility in the construction of an auditorium wherein every person shall be able to see and hear well, and when once so long a step is made as has been taken in this case, further progress is easy.—Advertiser.

The Three New Musical Knights.

It is a consolation for the loss of national recognition of the importance of music in early education, that some appreciation is shown in high places of the merits of musicians. That two English musicians are thought worthy of knighthood is quite phenomenal; and indeed Sir Julius Benedict is as much an Englishman as his own habits and tastes and the laws of naturalization can make him. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT is a native of Stuttgart, where he was born in 1805. He began his studies under Hummel at Weimar, and subsequently received the tuition of Weber, upon whose recommendation, at the age of 19, Benedict was engaged to conduct the German operas at Vienna. In 1827, his first dramatic work, an opera in two acts, entitled "Giacinta ed Ernesto," was produced at the Fondo at Naples, but being essentially German in style, it met with but little success on the Neapolitan stage. In 1830, he returned to his native city, where his opera, "I Portoghesi in Goa," was warmly received. After paying a visit to Paris and a second residence of a few years in Naples, Benedict came to London for the first time in 1835, chiefly at the instance of Mme. Malibran, and in 1836 he undertook the direction of the Opera Buffa at the Lyceum. Here his operetta, "Un Anno ed un Giorno," was performed with great success. In 1838 he produced his first English opera, "The Gipsy's Warning," which was remarkably successful. His subsequent operas, "The Brides of Venice," and "The Crusaders," had each a long run at Drury Lane, when under Mr. Alfred Bunn's management. In 1850 he accompanied Jenny Lind as conductor and pianist to the United States and Havana, and on his return to England he formed a choral society called the Vocal Association. During the seasons of 1859 and 1860 he conducted the Italian Operas at Drury Lane and Her Majesty's Theatre, when he brought out an Italian version of Weber's "Oberon." At the Norwich Festival in 1860 he produced a cantata entitled "Undine," which obtained a very great popularity. His "Lily of Killarney" was produced in 1862; and about two years after his charming operetta, "The Bride of Song." His later works are a magnificent concerto for the pianoforte, published about three years ago; "The Legend of St. Cecilia," and his oratorio of "St. Peter," of which an excellent performance has been given by Mr. Barnby's choir during the present week.

The present Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, Professor Sir STERNDAL BENNETT, was one of the earliest of the Academy pupils. He is the son of the late Mr. Robert Bennett, who was for many years the organist in the parish church of Sheffield, and his mother was Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. James Donn, F. L. S., curator of the Royal Botanical Gardens at Cambridge. He was born at Sheffield in the year 1816, and having lost both his parents in his infancy, he was brought up by his grandfather, Mr. John Bennett, by whom he was entered, when eight years of age, as a chorister in King's College, Cambridge. Two years afterwards he was placed in the Royal Academy of Music, where he began his regular studies by taking the violin as his instrument; but he shortly abandoned it for the pianoforte, upon which he received instruction. He soon began to turn his mind to composition, and, as a pupil of Dr. Crotch, produced his first symphony in E flat at the Royal Academy, which was followed at short intervals by his pianoforte concertos. Having formed an intimate friendship with Mendelssohn, he went in 1836 to Leipzig, where several of his works (particularly his overture to the "Nutcracker" and his concerto in C minor) were performed at concerts under Mendelssohn's direction. His published works are numerous, including his overtures, the "Nutcracker," the "Waldmynthe," "Parisina," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor," concertos, sonatas, and studies for the pianoforte, songs, duets, and other vocal pieces. His charming cantata "The May Queen" is possibly the best known of his vocal works. In 1856 he was appointed Professor of Music at the University of Cambridge, and received the degree of Doctor of Music in the same year, and M. A. in 1869; and he was also created D. C. L. of the University of Oxford in 1870. From 1856 till 1868 he was conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts, and in the latter year he was appointed Principal of the Royal Academy of Music. Professor Sir Sterndale Bennett is as well known for his suavity of manner and kindness of heart as for his musical abilities. He married in 1844 Miss Mary Ann Wood, daughter of James Wood, Commander R. N.

Sir GEORGE J. ELVEY is a son of the late Mr. John Elvey, of Canterbury, by Abigail, daughter of Mr. Samuel Hardiman. He was born in 1816, and was educated at the Cathedral School of his native city; thence he passed to New College, Oxford, where he took his degree as Bachelor of Music in 1831, and in due course his Doctor's degree. In 1835 he was appointed organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor. Sir George Elvey is a good specimen of a florid cathedral organist. His talents and taste do not lie in the way of the grand mechanical and contrapuntal effects obtained by Bach in his magnificent fugues, but he greatly excels as an accompanist, and as an extempore player in the free style—more acceptable to and more appreciable by persons of ordinary musical cultivation. His introductory voluntaries at St. George's Chapel—with his favourite combination of full swell and diapasons—were always most effective, and the choirs of the Royal Chapel and of Elton College owe their excellence chiefly to Sir G. Elvey's taste and industry. Sir George has composed a great deal of Church music, chants almost innumerable, good and effective "Services," and anthems of which it will suffice to name two, "In that Day," and "Behold, O God, our Defender." He has also written much secular music, but it has generally been for Court occasions, and therefore its popularity has been shortlived, and by no means in proportion to its merits.—Orchestra.

Music Abroad.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA.—Mr. Mapleson's prospectus of the Grand Opera season, to take place at Drury-lane Theatre, commencing on Saturday, April 15, promises a more than ordinary array of novelties, both in respect to the artists engaged and the representations to be given. With few exceptions the prime donne will be importations of celebrity from foreign establishments. Mlle. Marie Marimon, who heads the list, appears for the first time in England; Mlle. Cecile Fernandez is announced as a debutante. Mlle. Ida Benza, a lady with a high Italian reputation, also appears for the first time to claim the suffrages of an English public. In addition to the sensation of these interesting novelties, several of the most esteemed favorites of the lyric stage in London will return to gain fresh laurels in the scenes of their past triumphs. The public will rejoice to number amongst the most distinguished of these Mlles. Titiens and Ilma di Murska, Mlle. Leon Duval and Madame Sinico, at the head of the contralto list Madame Trebelli-Bettini. Equally unfamiliar, but none the less welcome as celebrated novelties, are the announcements of the principal tenor—Signori Fancelli, Vizzani, Bentami, Sinigaglia, and Nicolini from the Italian, Parisian, and Spanish Operas, who appear for the first time. Signor Rinaldini is also added. The bassi and baritoni are numerous, and present high claims to distinction. Signor Mendioroz, from San Carlos, Naples; Signor Moriami, from the Teatro Regio, Turin; Signor Sparapani, from Genoa; Signor Rives, of the Academie de Musique, and Signor Bignia, of the Imperial Opera, Vienna, are all first appearances in London. Signor Borella, of the Italian Opera Buffa, has already won golden opinions from his English admirers, and his engagement amongst the Drury-lane Company will be gladly hailed. Signor Rocca, Agnesis, Antonucci, Celli, Casaboni, Caravoglia, and Foli, complete the long and shining list. A more promising one has, perhaps, never before been put forth, at least in the direction of abundant novelty. The director of the music will be Sir Michael Costa, whose return to the post he formerly filled with such distinction will doubtless be a source of general satisfaction. The new or rather revived representations promised include Donizetti's delightful opera of Anna Bolena, too long a stranger to the London opera boards; Il Matrimonio Segreto, introducing Signor Borella in one of his most successful characters; Oberon; Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera; Cherubini's magnificent but unfamiliar opera of Medea; L'Ombra, by Flotow and Wagner's opera L'Olandese Dannato; Les Huguenots, alternately introducing Mlle. Titiens in her great character of Valentine, and one of the novelties of the season, Mlle. Ida Benza; it will also afford Signor Nicolini an appearance in the attractive role of Raoul. Faust will be given with three different heroines—namely, Mlle. Ilma di Murska, Mlle. Leon Duval, and Mlle. Marie Marimon. L'Elisir d'Amore, La Favorita, Don Giovanni, Il Barbiere, I Puritani, Figlia del Reggimento, Fidelio, Der Freyschütz, Semiramide, Il Flauto Magico, Rigoletto, and a host of other grand operas, by the most celebrated composers, from Mozart to Meyerbeer, are promised in almost overwhelming profusion. A long and brilliant season indeed must that be which can carry into fulfilment such a splendid array of promissory announcements. Even the half exploded ballet shines in revived lustre on this prospectus, several eminent members of the Terpsichorean art being announced to appear in the incidental ballets, as well as selected pieces. A band and chorus corresponding in all respects to other departments of the enterprise are engaged, and the whole scheme is set forth in the most attractive and liberal form. No one can read this prospectus without extending to Mr. Mapleson the same cordial wishes for hearty support and abundant patronage with which we greet Mr. Gye in his equally interesting Convent Garden announcements.—Standard, March 27.

FERDINAND HILLER'S RECITALS. The second and third of these highly interesting musical entertainments took place respectively on the Friday evenings, March 17th and 24th. It is no slight praise to any composer to declare that his genius alone can sustain the interest of a highly select and critical audience for an entire evening, yet such is not the only or the least meritorious feature in Dr. Hiller's recitals. They are eminently instructive, and prove how faithfully tone pictures can depict ideas, and how susceptible music may become of interpreting scenes and events. Descriptive composition is Dr. Hiller's forte, and this was very clearly demonstrated by the second performance of his Operetta without Words, repeated by desire, and growing by repetition into still more favor with all who listened to its pleasing and characteristic strains. The second concert opened with Dr. Hiller's third sonata in G minor—a fine scholastic though somewhat abstruse work. Selections from the Operetta without Words followed, including the overture, "Air of the maiden," the irresistible aria-buffa "singing song," the charming "chorus of hunters," "Chorus of Women," and the march. A serenade for pianoforte and violoncello, consisting of three movements, was magnificently played by Dr. Hiller and Mons. Paque; but one of the most striking features of the recital was given by Dr. Hiller in a group of three numbers, consisting of two "ghazels," described in the programme as a musical imitation of that form of Oriental poetry in which the same word or rhyme returns continually during the whole poem, a canon (also a fine scholarly piece of writing), and some rhythmical sketches, in which double and triple time is cleverly yet pleasingly commingled in the same piece. Each of these remarkable morceaux formed a complete study, and afforded subjects of equal interest and pleasure to the musician and amateur. The choicest gem of the performance, however, was a pianoforte improvisation by Dr. Hiller, which served to display all his great powers as a matchless executant, and his remarkable inspiration as a composer.

Although this was the closing number of the programme, it was listened to with the most rapt attention, and deservedly called forth hearty plaudits, and an enthusiastic recall from a highly-gratified audience. Madame Rudersdorff varied the evening's entertainment with several vocal pieces, and Signor Randegger accompanied. The third recital on Friday evening was no less successful than the previous two, the programme again consisting of Dr. Hiller's delightful compositions. Dr. Hiller will return to London at the end of April to take part in the opening ceremony at the Albert Hall in May.—Ibid.

Mlle. Brandes and Mme. Joachim. The Daily News speaks as follows of the ladies who appeared at the Monday popular Concert:—

"Mlle. Brandes has performed with great success on many occasions, notably at some of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts, where the audience is highly critical, especially on instrumentalists. Her enthusiastic reception here on Monday night was largely due to her undoubted merits, and perhaps somewhat to her juvenile appearance. Her principal display was in style and sustained power. Three detached pieces, albeit charming in themselves, do not give the same scope for intellectual grandeur and poetical sentiment that is offered by one of Beethoven's great solo sonatas; nor indeed, are such special qualities to be expected from one so youthful as Mlle. Brandes. Perhaps therefore, she did wisely in choosing the presto movement in A major from Scarlatti's Harpsicord pieces, Schumann's Arabesque, and Weber's Moto continuo (as the finale to his first sonata is called), for her inaugural performance. In all these Mlle. Brandes displayed much brilliancy of execution, an especially crisp and elastic touch, and great decision and clearness of rhythm and accent. The young lady was warmly applauded after each piece and, on being recalled, she played the third number of the first book of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte. In Beethoven's Sonata in C minor, for piano and violin, the co-operation of Herr Joachim at the latter instrument was so important a feature that we must await Mlle. Brandes' solo performance of this master's music before pronouncing on her qualifications for interpretation. Another speciality at Monday's concert was the first appearance of Madame Joachim, whose admirable singing has long been renowned in Germany. The fine mezzo-soprano voice and excellent declamation of this lady were displayed to high advantage in music of very opposite styles. In the air, 'Erbarme dich' (with the accompanying violin obligato of her husband), from Bach's Mattæus Passion Musik in Schubert's 'An die Leyer,' and Mendelssohn's 'Gruss' (the latter enclosed). In the calm religious feeling of the first, and the romantic expression of the two modern lieder, Madame Joachim was alike successful and the applause in each case was general and earnest."

MADAME PAREPA-ROSA's indisposition, our readers will regret to learn, has become so serious that her physician has ordered her, at least, two months' rest, and to give up all engagements for that period. Madame Parepa will leave London shortly for the south of Italy.

MUSIC IN JAPAN. We mean civilized, not Japanese music. A friend has brought us copies of three different journals (in the English language) published at Yokohama, from which it appears that the musical art is cultivated with considerable zeal, and to good purpose, among the English and American residents of that city. Here is a programme of a concert given in aid of the wounded French:

Trio: "Le Roi des Aulnes".....Calcott.
Duo (piano and cello) from "Romeo and Juliet".....Schubert.
Duo: "Angiol di Pace".....Mercadante.
Song: "Si tu savais".....Balfé.
Piano Solo: "Le Dernier Sourire".....Wollenhaupt.
Gounod's "Meditation" on the first Prelude of....Bach.
Violin, Piano, Organ and Violoncello.

Vocal Quartet: "Souve Immagine".....Mercadante.
Song: "Le Lac".....Niedemeyer.
Trio, No. 1, in G, for Piano, Violin and Cello.....Haydn.
Song: "La Camella".....Gordigliani.
Solo and Chorus: "Nazareth".....Gounod.
"La Marseillaise," [chantée par les Soldats Français de l'Infanterie de Marine].

The performers, it appears, were mostly amateurs, so that their names are omitted in the highly complimentary mention of their deeds. One of them, however, as we chance to know, is a Boston lady, the oldest daughter of our old friend, the late Thomas Comer (musical by birthright therefore), and the wife of Capt. Henry W. Burditt, also of this city, now in command of steam packet ship "Ariel," belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., running between Yokohama and the various ports of Japan. Mrs B. is an accomplished pianist, and the notices before us speak of the "extreme delicacy of touch," the "finish and precision" of her rendering of the piece by Wollenhaupt.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 22, 1871.

Chamber Concerts.

With all the plethora of the past musical season, our city has hardly known so sparing a supply of quiet "Chamber Music" since the Mendelssohn Quintette Club set the first example. This club has gathered up its laurels of so many years to take them upon "starring" tours throughout the Union. Only one Quartet have they let us hear at home this winter, and that one was Beethoven's last, produced in honor of his hundredth birthday. Mr. Perabo, before New Year, gave one series of four Piano Matinées: that, with the exception of "Conservatory" concerts, is all we can recall in this kind until now that the "great season" is over. Nor has it been much better, we believe, in New York as to string Quartet playing. Philadelphia seems to have taken the lead in this kind of entertainment, by its Jarvis, and its Wolfsohn series, and perhaps more especially by the high-toned classical "Parlor Concerts," of Miss Anna Jackson, with their constantly improving Violin Quartet.

But now that the "great season" is over, our chamber concerts come like April showers. We have no less than six to record since the month began, and before our next issue there will have fallen at least six more. First, as being hitherto the rarest, and supplying the most serious want, come the LITEMANN QUARTET MATINEES. Three of the four have now been given, in Wesleyan Hall, on successive Wednesday Afternoons. Here are the first two programmes:

April 5.
Quartet in E flat, No. 1. [First time in Boston] Cherubini.
Adagio and Allegro. Larghetto. Scherzo. Finale.
Song: "Qui s'adorno." [Il Flauto Magico].....Mozart.
Mr. Myron W. Whitney.
6th Violin Sonata, C minor, comp. 1681.....H. Biber.
[First time in Boston].....[1638-1698]
Largo. Passacaglia. Gavotte. Allegro agitato.
Bernhard Listemann.
Song: "The two Grenadiers".....Schumann.
Mr. Whitney.
Grand Quartet in D minor, op. posth.....Schubert.
Allegro. Andante con moto. Scherzo. Finale.

April 12.
Quartet in G major, No. 5.....Haydn.
Allegro con brio. Allegretto. Menuetto. Finale.
"Folies d'Espagne." Var. in D minor. Arcangelo Corelli.
[First time in Boston].....[1653-1713.]
Bernhard Listemann.
Trio in D minor, op. 68.....Schumann.
Mit Energie und Leidenschaft. Lebhaft.
Langsam, mit inniger Empfindung. Mit Feuer.
Meisters H. Leonhard, B. Listemann, A. Heindl.
Quartet in E flat, No. 12, op. 127.....Beethoven.
Allegro teneramente. Adagio. Scherzando. Vivace.
Finale.

This is admirable matter, and the interpretation was all highly satisfactory. Finer quartet playing we have never heard in Boston than this by the brothers LITEMANN (violins) and brothers HEINDL (viola and cello). Mr. Bernhard Listemann in the first violin part brings his marvellous power of execution to the service of fine feeling and conception, and leads off with great fire and energy, keeping the whole thing alive. The middle parts are uncommonly good; musical and full in tone, not dry and wooden; and the 'cellist, if not up to the finish and expression of Wulf Fries, has sterling qualities and shows the spirit that ensures continual improvement.

The Quartet by Cherubini is a noble work, which should not have remained so long unknown among us. Masterly in classical form and treatment, it is full of poetry and happy fancies. There are strains of fairy music in it quite as delicate and fine as Mendelssohn's. Of the great Schubert Quartet, with its profoundly sad and solemn march in the Andante, we need not speak, except to say, that never were its power and depth and beauty brought home here more palpably.

Better contrast could not have been offered than that of the light-hearted, clear, delightful Haydn Quartet with that great work of Beethoven, the first of the six Quartets of his last period, which is so deep in mood, and yet so changeable, so pregnant with exhaustless meaning, so crowded with beauties which only many hearings can reveal completely. Though it came last on the programme, and after an exciting Trio, it riveted attention throughout its whole great length, the Adagio making a profound impression. It was the best proof of the efficiency of the performing party that this difficult and complex work came out so clear and even. Were it placed on every programme, it would so gain in beauty each time as to justify the repetition.

It was a capital idea of Mr. Listemann to give us in each programme a specimen from the old masters of the violin. His first selection, the Sonata by Biber, with which David begins the historical series in his "High School for the Violin," is indeed a noble composition, in the breadth and grandeur of its introduction, and particularly of its Passacaglia movement, suggesting comparison with the great Chaconne by Bach.

It seems to show how much the music for the violin, owing to the sympathetic, free, suggestive nature of the instrument, has kept in advance of other music. So too Beethoven in his violin quartets seems to anticipate later periods of his own development. David's piano accompaniment, in which he had only the figured bass of the original to guide him, is faithful to the spirit of the whole and quite felicitous.

It was well played, as are all the accompaniments in these concerts, by Mr. WM. F. APTHORP, a young gentleman who graduated two years ago at Harvard, of various gifts both literary and artistic, but in whom the passion and the aptitude for music has proved strong enough to draw him into that profession; and this is the beginning of his public artist life. Mr. Listemann played the Sonata superbly, and there is that in it that taxes all the modern arts of virtuosity. The Variations by Corelli, which likewise forms the second of David's selections, less grand than the Sonata by Biber, are also quaint and full of invention, though hardly of the genius of the other. Here David has modernised the work somewhat, adding an elaborate Cadenza, &c., and particularly by inventing figures in the piano part, though for the most part he either only makes the most of those already hinted in the figured bass, or, in the true contrapuntal spirit, he offsets the figure and the motive of one half of the violin melody against the other as accompaniment.

Mr. WHITNEY's vocal contributions were of course most satisfactory, his grand bass tones sounding superbly in that hall. Mr. KESSELMANN was to have sung in the second matinee, but, he being ill, the Trio in D minor by Schumann, a splendid novelty, was substituted. It is all that the German headings of its different movements indicate: full of fire and passion in its quick movements, and of subtle depth of meditative feeling, although somewhat sickly in the slow movement; yet this too has a fascinating beauty. It was finely interpreted, Mr. LEONHARD bringing out the force and meaning of the piano part, which bristles with difficulties, strange rhythms, &c., with masterly emphasis and fervor.

Of the third matinee we must speak next time. The Quartets were by Mozart (E flat) and Raff (A major); the Violin Solo was Tartini's "Trille du Diable."

These admirable concerts have not had the audience they deserved, though the number steadily increases. It is to be hoped that the fourth and last, next Wednesday, will crowd the hall. The programme includes a new Quartet by Svendsen (a Dane, we believe); another old Violin Sonata, by Rust, sung by Mr. KESSELMANN; and the first of Beethoven's "Rammowsky" Quartets.

PIANO FORTE CONCERTS. Not the least interesting record under the head of Chamber Concerts should be that of the Four Concerts undertaken by four young pianists, pupils, all, of Mr. LANG. Their names, already beginning to be well known, are Mr. G. W. SUMNER, Mr. W. F. APTHORP, Mr. G. A. ADAMS, and Mr. H. G. TUCKER. They are given on successive Monday afternoons, before large and cultivated audiences, in Bumstead Hall. The programmes of the first two were as follows:

a. Prelude in C. [Well tempered Clavichord, No. 1]. Bach.
b. Fugue in E minor, from the fourth Piano-forte Suite. Handel.
Three Diversions, for Piano-forte, 4 hds. Op. 17. Bennett.
Concerto in F minor. Op. 21.....Chopin.
"Festspiel und Brautlied" from Wagner's "Lohengrin." Liszt.

Concerto in E flat. Op. 73.....Beethoven.
Fantasia Cromatica e Fuga, D minor.....Bach.
Concertstück, in F. Op. 79.....Weber.

The young knights summon witnesses to see that their spurs are well won, for they shrink not from the highest tasks. It must be acknowledged that so far they have acquitted themselves with honor. There was a certain grace and loyalty in choosing that Bach Prelude for the beginning, which, with the Handel Fugue, was neatly done by Mr. Adams. Mr. Apthorp took the upper part, and creditably, in the charming little pieces by Bennett. It is saying much for Mr. Sumner, that he won the hearty recognition of that audience by his rendering of so formidable a work as Chopin's F-minor Concerto, after such masterly interpretations as we have heard. Mr. Lang himself (teacher and "head centre" of the group) outlined the orchestral parts upon another piano. Mr. Tucker, with young giant strength and brilliancy, performed the "Lohengrin" transcription.

Mr. Adams was disabled, by an accident to his hand, from playing the great Beethoven Concerto, and Mr. Sumner was prevailed on to repeat the one by Chopin, in which he was even happier than before. Mr. Sumner also gave a very clear, although a little stiff, interpretation of the Bach Fantasia, &c. The Concertstück was triumphantly achieved by Mr. Tucker, Mr. Apthorp supplying the accompaniment.

MR. ERNST PERABO. The first of four Complimentary Matinées to the young artist, arranged by his friends and pupils, completely filled Wesleyan Hall on Friday afternoon last week with the best kind of audience. The object was, of course, to hear Mr. Perabo play his own selections out of the wide range of piano music in which he is so much at home. And it were needless to tell, even if we had room, how beautifully he rendered every number of the following programme:

- Suite, op. 31, G minor, [first time].....Wold. Bargiel.
 { a. "The Mill," op. 17, No. 3.....Adolph Jensen.
 b. "Albumen," op. 7, No. 2.....Theodore Kirchner.
 c. "The happy Wanderer," op. 17, No. 2.....Adolph Jensen.
 Impromptu, op. 90, No. 1.....Schubert.
 Serenade for 4 hands, op. 8.....Anton Krause.
 [Arranged by Ernst Perabo.]
 Sonata, op. 2, No. 1, F minor.....Beethoven.

Orchestral Concerts.

Mr. A. P. Peck's Annual Benefit Concert, April 12, was a remarkable occasion, the Music Hall being crammed to overflowing at high prices. For the careful and obliging superintendent of the Music Hall has made friends of all the concert-goers and the concert-givers. And artistically it was the best concert of the kind that we remember, the choice of programme and of artists signally illustrating the improvement of the public taste, when even the most popular caterers must have an eye mainly to the "classical" in their bills of fare. THOMAS's Orchestra played the Overtures to Tannhäuser and Tell, the Allegretto from Beethoven's 8th Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Scherzo and Wedding March, and a Strauss Waltz, all in their admirable way. Miss ANNA MEHLIG played the Liszt arrangement of a Weber Polonaise, and a four-hand Capriccio (with Mr. PERABO) by Mendelssohn. Miss KELLOGG sang a serious and very interesting Scena and Aria by Ant. Rubinstein, and Rossini's "Bel raggio" in her best manner. And Miss ANNIE CARY, with her rich and cultivated contralto, won new favor in Rossini's "Fac ut portem" and a song by Donizetti.

On Saturday the THOMAS ORCHESTRA gave a Farewell Concert for the season. Beethoven's 4th Symphony; a rich and interesting introduction (new) to "Loreley," by Max Bruch; Weber's Jubilee Overture; the "Kaiser Franz" Variations (by all the strings) from Haydn's Quartette; a Strauss Waltz, and a noisy, rather common new march by Reinecke, were the orchestral pieces, played with the usual spirit, delicacy and precision. Miss MEHLIG gave a most perfect and poetic rendering of the Larghetto and Rondo of Chopin's F-minor Concerto, besides a "Concert paraphrase," by Liszt, on the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

HANDEL & HAYDN FESTIVAL. The great Triennial Festival will begin on the 9th and close on the 14th of May. The chorus, 760 strong, are zealously rehearsing, three nights every week, upon the Oratorios, &c., and some of the new work which they have in hand is worthy of their utmost effort; particularly Handel's "Israel in Egypt," and the copious selections from Bach's "Passion Music." For principal solo singers, Mme. RUDERSDOFF, soprano, and Mr. CUMMINGS, tenor, eminent in the London Oratorios, have been engaged, besides Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, and others of our best at home. The Orchestra will number 100 performers, largely from New York. There will be five Oratorio and four Orchestral Concerts, the latter in the afternoons, in which there will be grand Symphonies, including the Ninth (with Chorus) by Beethoven, and Concertos by such artists as Miss Mehlig, Miss Krebs, and it is hoped, Vieuxtemps, the great violinist.

The Festival will open on Tuesday, at 8 o'clock, with Nicolai's Festival Overture, a Mendelssohn part-song (unaccompanied) by full chorus, and the "Hymn of Praise." On Wednesday evening, "Elijah"; Thursday evening, "Israel in Egypt"; Friday afternoon, "Ninth Symphony"; Saturday evening, selections from Bach's "Passion," and Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" [new]—There is every prospect of a finer Festival, even, than that three years ago.

FOR THE MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS. It is most fit that Music should step forward with alacrity to aid and cheer the noble movement for the establishment of a great free collection, for the good of all, of all the Art treasures that exist in our community, and of whatever else can be procured. We are glad to learn, therefore, that our townsman Mr. R. C. DIXEY, with the aid of Mr. LISTEMANN, and Mr. B. W. CROWNSHIELD, amateur violoncellist, have arranged a choice concert for that purpose, to be given in the beautiful Mechanics' Hall on Bedford Street, on Thursday, April 27, at 8 P.M. Tickets two dollars each. The programme includes a Trio by Rubinstein: Andante and Variations from Beethoven's Trio in C minor, op. 1; two piano pieces by Raff; and two movements of Schumann's Piano Concerto, played by Mr. Dixey, with Mr. Lang accompanying. There will be Songs also.—The Editor of this Journal will be happy to receive orders for tickets.

Death of M. Fétis.

This distinguished musical scholar, critic, teacher and historian, after a life of remarkable industry and influence in the world of music,—at all events in France and Belgium—has just died, in the midst of his labors, on the completion of his eighty-seventh year. How formidable these labors were, may be judged from the following summary, which we translate from Le Guide Musical, of Brussels, of the 30th ult.

FRANÇOIS JOSEPH FÉTIS was born at Mons, March 25, 1784. and died at Brussels March 26, 1871.

His father, an organist, professor of music and director of concerts at Mons, gave him the first lessons in the art and sent him to Paris at the age of seventeen. The young Fétis had already composed a Stabat Mater for two choirs and two orchestras. Three months after his arrival in Paris he was appointed répétiteur in Roy's class of Harmony, and he obtained there the first prize. He was taught the piano by Boieldieu. In 1803 he undertook a journey for the study of counterpoint and fugue according to the theories of the German School.

From the year 1806, he imposed upon himself the difficult mission of preparing a purified edition of the chants of the Roman church. From 1818 to 1818 he filled the functions of organist of St. Peter's, as well as of professor of singing and of harmony, at Douai. There he wrote "La Science de l'Organiste." In 1823 he published an "Elementary Method of Harmony," which became much in vogue in France, in Belgium, and many other countries.

Returning to Paris, M. Fétis wrote there seven operas: "L'Amant et le Mari," "La Vieille," "Les Sœurs jumelles," "Marie Stuart en Ecosse," "Le Bourgeois de Reims," "Le Mannequin de Bergame," and "Phidias."

In 1821 he succeeded Elzer as Professor of Composition at the Conservatoire of Paris, and his teaching won the approbation of Cherubini. From 1827 to 1835 he published his musical journal, La Revue Musicale de Paris which was afterwards remodeled and for which he still wrote assiduously. In 1828 he bore off a second prize for his Memoir on the Netherlands Musicians; and in 1830 appeared his little book: "La Musique mise à la portée de tout le monde," which passed through several editions, and "Les Curiosités de la Musique," forming a sort of complement to it.

His "Treatise on Harmony," as well as his "Treatise on Counterpoint and Fugue" won him a great renown. These two books serve as the basis of the instruction at the Conservatoire of Brussels. He was called to the direction of this establishment in 1838. At the same time the King, Leopold I., conferred on him the title of master of his private chapel.

Apart from his labors at the Conservatoire, M. Fétis devoted himself to the publication of his "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens" (Brussels, 1835—1844), of which a second edition appeared from 1850 to 1855.

Among his other works we count a "Méthode de Plain-chant"; "Progressive Solfège"; a "Traité de l'accompagnement de la partition"; a "Manual of the Principles of Music"; a "Treatise on Singing in Chorus"; a "Manual of Composers"; a "Method of Methods for the Piano"; a "Method of Methods in Singing"; a "Sketch of the History of Harmony"; a "Notice sur Paganini"; a "Traité élémentaire de Musique, on Théorie de toutes les parties de cet Art"; a "Memoir on the simultaneous Harmony of Sounds among the Greeks and Romans."

After so many serious labors, Mr. Fétis retained sufficient vigor to undertake still more important works. Of this number is "The General History of Music," his exegi monumentum, in some sort, of which two volumes out of eight have seen the light.

We have still to add his musical productions: Motets, Masses, Cantatas, Symphonies, pianoforte works, &c. What he himself considered his best production was a Mass for voices, organ, violoncellos and double-basses. Great praise has been bestowed upon another of his Masses, that which he composed for the funeral service of the Queen of Belgium.

He was one of the most active, as he was the oldest, of the collaborateurs of the Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris.

Do we ever see a career more full? The rigorous discipline to which the celebrated musician had subjected his faculties, and the obligation which he put upon himself of working invariably sixteen hours a day, explain how he was able to produce this long series of works as erudite as they are various. A letter, which he addressed on the 1st of March, 1867, to a Parisian musicologist, proves the rare vigor with which this old man, then of eighty-three years, was equal to the manifold occupations of his profession. "I am at this moment," he says, "engaged with the administrative affairs of the Conservatoire which I direct; with my course of composition; the direction of the rehearsals and concerts of this institution; those of the Court also; the commencement of the printing of my Histoire générale de la Musique, and with the continuation of this work. Moreover, I have not been able to avoid my nomination as a member of the jury on musical instruments, which will oblige me to be in Paris from the first of April till the end of May. I must be at Brussels on the first of June for the grand Concours of musical competition, of which I am president, and for the examinations of the Conservatoire. At the end of that month I shall return to Paris for the historical concerts, and shall come back to Brussels in the beginning of August for the Concours of the Conservatoire."

We came near forgetting the rehearsals of "L'Africaine," over which M. Fétis presided, at the Grand Opera at Paris, with a solicitude worthy of that posthumous work of Meyerbeer.

Our illustrious compatriot has been actively concerned in too many ideas, theories and facts, to allow the possibility of giving here even a summary appreciation of them. History, theory, instruction, criticism, all the branches of musical bibliography have been treated by him.

"His Investigating spirit," says M. Félix Clément, "voluntarily attached itself to all parts of the musical art, but it is principally at setting out from the fifteenth century that he truly deserves the name of an encyclopedist, having left no question unexplored from the dawn of the Renaissance to our day. Within these vast limits, with the sole exception of George Kastner, we know of no musician to be compared to this Belgian savant, whose labors are the glory of his country and the education of our own."

THE LIND-GOLDSCHMIDT LIBEL. From time to time, ever since the great singer left this country, there has been a renewal of certain slanderous and false reports about her husband,—started of course by jealous, mean, malicious spirits, in disreputable newspapers, and thoughtlessly copied or alluded to in other papers—which it must have cost no little patience to endure. All good people will rejoice that the libel has at length been brought before the Lord Chief Justice of England, where the lie was promptly nailed to the counter. The report of the trial, which we find in the Orchestra, is highly interesting, and we had hoped to copy it entire, but must abstain for want of room. The following brief abstract is from the Transcript:

MR. OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT, husband of Jenny Lind, has recovered damage from three English papers, that copied the silly story about him in this country, that he gambled, and had lost all his wife's earnings. In one instance the damages was placed at $2500, and in the others at $3750 each. It appears from the evidence that the charges made were utterly groundless; that the plaintiff had carefully settled his wife's money upon her.

Madame Goldschmidt testified that her fortune had not only been unimpaired since her marriage, but had been actually more than doubled. Her husband was addicted to no expensive tastes or habits whatever, was not a gambler, and did not even smoke, and his life was absolutely blameless, and had been so ever since their marriage. Further, she declared that they had lived together in entire concord and harmony and had never lived apart. Mr. Goldschmidt gave similar testimony.

Among the witnesses whose testimony was the strongest was the Earl of Leven and Melville. The Goldschmidts have for many years lived at Rochampton, a beautiful suburb of London, on the confines of the far famed Richmond Park, and Lord Leven and his family, who reside at Rochampton House, have become intimate with their accomplished neighbors, who are always to be met during the summer at the fêtes with which Lady Leven—a daughter of the celebrated Wilberforce's friend, Henry Thornton, M. P., author of the world-known "Family Prayers," of which the profane have said, alluding to their enormous sale, that no prayer was ever so efficacious—entertains her friends.

We give a report of the testimony of the wife in full:

Madame Goldschmidt was then called as a witness, and examined by Mr. Pollock, and stated that she was a native of Sweden; that in 1852 she married Mr. Goldschmidt in Boston, United States; he pursued the profession of music; for some years they resided at Dresden; in 1858 they came to reside in England; in 1862 they built a house at Wimbledon, where they still resided; they had three children, the eldest of whom was at Rugby School; on their marriage her fortune was considerable, and legal arrangements were made as to it with the advice of her friends; since their marriage he had assisted her in the management of her property, "most carefully and judiciously," added Madame Goldschmidt, with emphasis; he has attended to the expenditure also, she said, "most conscientiously."

He had also employed an accountant, and from time to time he had clear information as to everything connected with her property; my property, she said, has remained intact, and we have earned more than half as much again, and the whole is under the care of my husband and my former guardian. I have had perfect freedom as to my expenditure, and, on the other hand, Mr. Goldschmidt has never expended any money upon himself, except in the ordinary expenses for a gentleman in his position. His habits have been simple and inexpensive. His amusements and occupations have been with me and our family. His time is a good deal occupied. We have never been separated.

Mr. Pollock—Is there any ground for saying that you and he are ill-matched as husband and wife, or that your marriage has not been happy?

Mme. Goldschmidt (in a tone of deep and tender feeling)—not in my heart. We have never lived apart. She went on to say, with emphasis, that they had suffered persecution ever since their marriage—"silent persecution," in consequence of these calumnies. She had seen (she said) Mr. Goldschmidt received everywhere as if he were a scoundrel. She stated, in conclusion, that they lived upon terms of intimacy with persons of good position, many of whom, she was happy to say, were present in court to-day.

NEW YORK, MARCH 27.—The two farewell Nilsson concerts were the only concerts of interest during the past week. They took place at Steinway Hall on Wednesday evening and Saturday afternoon. She was assisted as usual by Miss Cary, M. Vieuxtemps, Signor Brignoli, and a poor orchestra under the direction of Max Maretzek. The audience at each one was very large. It is reported here that Miss Nilsson is to remain in this country all next summer and winter, and sing in opera in the fall. Her engagement with Mr. Strakosch expires very soon.

A miscellaneous concert for the benefit of the Hahnemann Hospital took place on Saturday evening at the same hall. Miss Kellogg and several other artists appeared.

Miss Krebs's usual piano matinee did not take place last week. Pianoforte recitals are becoming very numerous, for Mr. S. B. Mills is to give three on April 8th, 15th and 22nd at the Brooklyn Athenæum.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic will play at their last concert, for the first time, a Symphony in F-sharp minor by George F. Bristow.

The Lieberkrantz Society gave their fourth concert at their hall in Fourth Street last night. Mr. Von Inten and Mlle. Rosetta were the soloists, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was performed.

APRIL 3D.—The only concert during the week was the fifth of the Philharmonic Society, which had the following attractive programme:

Symphony in B flat.....Beethoven.
Concerto in D minor.....A. Rubinstein.
Overture "In the Highlands" Op. 7.....Gade.
Scherzo "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn.
Symphonic Poem: "Tasso: lamento e trionfo".....Liszt.

Beethoven's fourth Symphony was perfectly played by the orchestra. Gade's Overture is a very fine and picturesque work, but was not as well played as the Symphony.

Liszt's "Tasso" is an uncouth, uninteresting work, full of cymbals, drums, tambourines, &c.; and why it was placed on the programme is a mystery. Mr. Bergmann deserves great credit for placing it last; for at least one-third of the audience got up and left during the intermission, before the last piece.

Rubinstein's work, though not an original, is a very interesting composition. There are three long and difficult movements. Miss Krebs played both pieces from memory. Her merits are a faultless execution and wonderful memory. Her playing of the Mendelssohn Scherzo was better than that at the Concerto; but it loses its charm when taken from the orchestra. She was recalled, each time, the second time playing a piece by Schumann.

The audience was as large as usual, notwithstanding the unpleasant state of the weather.

The next concert offers for a novelty a Symphony: "Im Walde," by Raff. M. Henri Vieuxtemps, the great violinist, will perform.

APRIL 10.—There were several concerts in New York and Brooklyn during the past week. Those in Brooklyn, however, were much better than those in New York.

Mr. S. B. Mills gave the first of a series of three pianoforte recitals, at the Brooklyn Athenæum on Saturday afternoon. He was assisted by a large number of well known soloists. The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society gave their last concert at the Academy of Music, on Saturday evening. The programme was faulty only in its extreme length. It was as follows:

Symphony, F sharp minor.....Bristow.
Aria, from "La clemenza di Tito".....Mozart.
Concerto in A minor.....Schumann.
Overture: "Leonore, No. 3".....Beethoven.
"Una Voce Poco Fa".....Rossini.
Andante and Rondo (violin).....Vieuxtemps.
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini.

Mr. Bristow's Symphony is a fine work and should be heard more often. Miss Phillips and Miss Krebs fully sustained their reputations as first-class artists. Miss Toedt's playing was not particularly interesting. The overture to "William Tell" has been heard so much that it would be advisable to lay it aside for a few years. The audience was unusually large. The programme was much too long, lasting until near eleven o'clock.

Wagner's "Lohengrin" has just been produced at the Stadt Theatre, and is to be given again this week. According to newspaper accounts it met with great success.

Last night there was a concert given at Steinway Hall, for a charitable purpose, by the "Aschenbroedel-Verein." Miss Krebs played Liszt's concerto in E flat, and Mr. Wenzel Kopta a concerto in A minor (No. 8) by Spohr and a Romance in F, for the violin, by Beethoven. A large orchestra (of 100 members) played the overture to "Ruy Blas" and two minor pieces. Whatever the charitable purpose, it could not have been benefitted much, as three or four hundred persons was the most that could be got together.

J. M. W.

APRIL 17.—The concerts last week were all of a miscellaneous character. Miss Vienna Demorest, who appeared in a private concert some six weeks since, made her first appearance in public at Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, previous to her going to Europe to study.

On Thursday and Saturday occurred the two concerts of Miss Casale Reus, a vocalist from Philadelphia, whose voice reaches the high note of G sharp. She sang, among other pieces, the "Caro nome" from "Rigoletto," and in the quartet from the same. Miss Adelaide Phillips, Signors Leon and Roneoni, and a small, but good, orchestra under Carl Bergmann, assisted her.

The Euterpe concert which was to have taken place on the 21st inst. is postponed for two weeks.

Mr. Charles Werner (violinist) gives a concert at Association Hall to night. A large number of well-known artists and an orchestra, also appear.

The Philharmonic Society give the first rehearsal for their last concert on Friday afternoon. A new symphony, "Im Walde," by Raff, Mozart's overture to "Idomeneo," and Berlioz's overture "The Roman Carnival" will be played.

An Opera Company from Havana, with Miss Kellogg as prima donna, commence a short season of Italian opera, about May 1st, at the Academy.

Miss Nilsson has just been engaged for another one hundred nights, by Mr. Strakosch, to appear in opera, next season. It is not announced yet whether the performance will take place at the Academy or the Grand Opera House.

J. M. W.

PHILADELPHIA.—The second concert of the "Beethoven Society," organized a year ago by Carl Wolfsohn, and conducted by him, took place last Saturday evening in the Academy of Music, with a chorus of 150 voices and an orchestra of 50 instruments. The newspapers are full of praise of the performances, but complain of the programme as too long. It was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony.....Schubert.
"Song of the Spirits over the Waters" Chorus.....Hiller.
Concerto for Piano.....Mendelssohn.
"King of Thule," Chorus.....Taubert.
"Wanderer's Song," Chorus.....Schumann.
Concerto for Violoncello.....Gottmann.
Mr. Rudolph Hennig and orchestra.
"The Water Lily" Chorus.....Niels Gade.
"Gipsy Life," Chorus.....Schumann.
Cantata, "95th Psalm".....Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Rienzi".....Wagner.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Lover and the Bird. For Soprano. 4. F. to a. Guglielmo. 35
Full of melody, and is an effective concert song. The "Duet" part, where the instrument imitates the bird, and the "lover" responds in similar notes, is very fine.
- Only a little Brook. Song and Cho. 2. Bb to f. M. W. Huckelton. 30
"Nay, 'tis but a narrow stream,
Sunshine glides the tide,
And the East-er lilies gleam
On the other side."
May be added to the list of those sweet, sunshiny songs that aid in depriving the passage "over the river" of its terror.
- I love to sing. 3. C to f. E. L. Hime. 30
I love to sing,—I love to sing,
But why, I cannot tell.
May be made a degree harder or easier, by adding the small notes, or omitting the triplets. Smooth, rich and classical.
- God bless the little children. 2. C to c. Denniker. 30
"So winning in their helplessness,
How sinless, and how fair!"
Poetry by Mary Grace Halpine, and is a genuine expression of womanly, warm hearted love for the little ones. Sing it at home.
- Fold your arm around me, Papa. Song and Cho. 3. Bb to f. M. Loesch. 30
"Fold your arms around me, papa,
Lay my head upon your breast,
Darker grow the evening shadows,
And your darling longs for rest."
Beautiful farewell song of a dying child.
- Some Day. 3. G to e. H. Schoeller. 30
"You smoo'h the tangles from my hair,
With gentle touch and tenderest care."
Words by Florence Perry. Poem and music perfectly charming.
- Row us, Row us Swift. For three Ladies Voices. 3. G to g. Campana. 75
Voga, voga, marinaro,
Row us swift, O boatman, row us."
For 1st and 2nd Soprano and Alto, and has an easy swinging, rolling progression. Will be seized eagerly by seminary teachers.

Instrumental.

- Emperor William March. 2. D. A. T. Muller. 40
Simple and brilliant.
- Souvenir de Memoire. Waltz. 2. C. L. H. Hatch. 30
- Bridal Garland. Waltz. 4. Eb. W. Krizan. 35
- Humming Bird. " 2. G. J. W. Turner. 30
Three very pleasing waltzes, the first and last of which will make excellent instruction pieces, while the Bridal Garland is brilliant and powerful,—almost triumphal in character.
- Les Adieux Valse. 4. Gungl. 75
Famous set of waltzes.
- Sunrise Galop. 3. Eb. H. L. Eddy. 30
- Starring Galop. 3. G. J. M. Deems. 35
Both are light, tripping and "dance-exciting."
- Three Divertimentos. 4. hds. 4. W. Sterndale Bennett. 75
Have a character between organ pieces and studies, and are very ingeniously constructed. Played with spirit, will be effective.
- Little Kitty Nocturne. 3. G. W. Busenius. 30
Little Kitty and all her tribe are much obliged. A very sweet Nocturne.
- Home, Sweet Home. Transcription. 4. F. Oesten. 50
The "old sweet story" in a new and very pleasing form. Warmly commended.
- La Soothe. (The Soothing Strain.) Reverie. 4. D. W. T. Porter. 40
Will earn its name as a "lulling" piece, and has an unusually pretty melody.

Books.

- SYSTEM FOR BEGINNERS. In the Art of Playing upon the Pianoforte. By Wm. Mason and E. S. Hoadley. 3.00
These gentlemen, both accomplished teachers, have done a good thing for their brethren in the craft. They believe in abundance of Five Finger Exercises, Runs, Scales, and the like, and furnish abundant material, with a sufficiency of pleasing "amusements." The "accent" exercises are peculiar and very useful.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 785.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 3.

Opera and the Art of Singing.*

BY CARL GLOGGNER-CASTELLI.

[Continued from page 10.]

II.

The controversy of the "Gluck-ists and Piccin-ists," the war between Ideality and Realism, between Art and Virtuosity in Opera, did not, as a question of principles, come to an end with the lives of the two rivals. What concessions even Mozart had to make to the taste of his time, to the demands of his singers, who cared too little for the dignity of Art to serve it at the expense of virtuosity, is well enough known from his operas. Through the greater part of the Rossini period (1807—1819—25) Spontini kept the stage, who, in simple treatment of the voices and truth of expression, had taken Gluck for his model. But neither the sovereign protection of the empress Josephine, and later that of Frederic William III., nor the astonishment of the musical world, availed to win the victory for his brilliant music from Rossini's muse. Weber's success in Germany and England contributed essentially to pave the way for a more ideal tendency; in France his "Freyshütz" was not quite understood, nor is it yet under the name of "Robin des Bois."

The reign of the Italians on both sides of the Rhine was first overcome by the appearance of MEYERBEER. For the history of Opera as well as of singing, Meyerbeer's appearance forms a decisive chapter. From this time onward we see the importance of the Italian Opera gradually step into the background, its very works, one after another, vanish from the repertoire. The number of operas of Rossini, Bellini and Donizetti (originally more than a hundred) which are performed now-a-days, has melted away to comparatively a few. Verdi has never been able to quite make his way in Germany and France, and of his many operas only the Trovatore has kept its place upon the repertoire. But the Italian school of singing, the cultivation of the instrument, such as Rossini sought and found it for the performance of his operas, has nearly vanished. Just as fast as Rossini's Operas (of the period before "Tell") became forgotten, was the Method also lost which was peculiar to the singers of that epoch. What we still hear of it, is either decaying relics of that great school, or single ephemeral manifestations. Even in Italy the performances of Rossini's operas are no longer every day occurrences. The great public finds no longer any relish in them; and the singers, who have been formed in the school of Verdi's later style, for the most part cannot sing them. Verdi has crowded out the "Swan of Pesaro" in Italy; he is the Italian Meyerbeer. The loss thereby to the art of singing in Italy, is analogous to the influence which Meyerbeer's operas have exerted on this art on this side of the Alps.

To be able truly to appreciate the Italian art of song, one must have heard Italian operas sung by Italian singers, particularly those of the Rossini period.

* Translated, for this Journal, from the Musikalisches Wochenblatt (Leipzig).

When Rossini began to develop his peculiar style, which gives the singer opportunity to make all the excellencies of a well cultivated instrument available, voices were raised against him even in Italy. The complaint was made that, instead of taking his predecessors, Cimarosa, Zingarelli, &c., for his models, and letting the singer produce his effect through the beauty of a sustained tone, he has turned the human voice into an instrument and destroyed the natural power of tone. If we compare Rossini's demands upon the singers with the style of the older Italian opera, if we consult the traditions which have come down to us from that epoch, it will become clear enough to us, that the charm felt in the fulness and power of the human organ in its highest development has been perceptibly weakened by Rossini, in order to make room for a more one-sided culture of mere technical facility. To be sure, the older Italian singers trained themselves to a facility in passages, which scarcely fell short of that of the newer singers of the Rossini school. But their chief aim was the tone itself, and the effect produced upon the hearers purely by this. What we read of the formation of the tone, the cultivation of the breath, the flexibility of the voice, in the singers of that time, judged by our present ideas, sounds almost fabulous. The singer Ferri, for example, who died in 1710, is said to have possessed such a control over his voice, that in the delivery of passages of feeling he actually thrilled his hearers. Yet at the same time he had developed his technical facility to such a degree, that he executed consecutive trills, for instance, through two octaves, up and down, in one breath,—such passages requiring fifty seconds time.—Similar things are told of Sassaroli, soprano castrato of the King of Saxony, who sang as late as 1820 in a musical festival at Grolitz. Farinelli (died 1782) executed in one breath passages requiring fifty seconds time. Moreover, it is said that he could increase his tone to such a degree of strength, that it completely covered up the sound of a trumpet.

It is known that the famous masters of that great Italian period of song, such as Bernachi, Pistochi, Porpora, &c., regarded the study of tone, and the control of it through all the phases of emotion, as the foundation of the art of singing, and that they based the entire study upon that. If at the same time the instrument, as such, was brought to the highest perfection of flexibility, it was not at all at the expense of power and fulness in the organ, which had been gradually built up by the thorough study, through a long period, of the tone itself. On the contrary it lay in the whole character of that school to give the voice the highest possible development on this side also, and at the same time the most perfect self-control.

If the old Italians considered the expressive power of tone as the main thing, and used the highest technical facility as something aesthetically legitimate to the human instrument by way of artificial frame or setting; in the Rossini school the art of embellishments has placed itself in the foreground, and crowded out the sustained Cantabile, and its effect in and through itself, by a wealth of passages, frequently not calculated to lend greater art and sharpness to the dramatic expression, but which seem for the most part merely intended to give the singer opportunity to show the astonishing flexibility of his throat. Not without reason therefore has it been said, that most of Rossini's operas are concert operas. As such, this kind of opera, however, has outlived itself, and so has this kind of virtuosity in general; and it has come to pass that we can only enjoy the operas of that epoch relatively, at the most, when a performance of them gives us an opportunity of admiring one of the distinguished singers of that school, who are becoming every day more rare.

[To be Continued.]

Bach's Passion-Music at Westminster Abbey.

[From the London Daily News, April 7.]

This great work—analogue in sublimity and grandeur to Handel's Messiah—was heard last evening for the first time in this country according to its original and proper purpose; as a portion of a religious celebration of the most solemn occasion in the Christian year. The special service held in the Nave of Westminster Abbey included Bach's music, or rather selected portions thereof preceded by the commencing prayers of the evening service (read by the Rev. Flood Jones, Minor Canon); the two parts being divided, as intended, by a sermon special to the occasion—in this instance preached by the Very Reverend the Dean.

Of the characteristics of Bach's Passion-Music to the text of St. Matthew (one of several similar works by him); of its sublime grandeur in conception, and gigantic power and science in execution, we have more than once spoken, and may therefore now dispense with lengthened notice. It is but just, however, to recall attention to the fact that the first efficient performance of the "Passion-Music" in this country was at the sixth of last year's series of Oratorio Concerts, in April, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Barnby, by whose fine choir the noble choruses were sung with grand effect. Its first public hearing in England was due, many years since, to the defunct Bach Society, and the exertions of its president, now Sir Sterndale Bennett; but, from various causes, the arrangements and preparations were then insufficient. Last year's special performance was given in Exeter-hall, and produced so profound an impression that the work was repeated in February this year at St. James's-hall, the usual locale of the Oratorio Concerts. On both occasions one of the finest choruses, "O man, thy heavy sin lament" ("O menach, bewein' dein' Sünde gross"), which closes the first part, was omitted, from an impression (we believe) that, following close after the highly dramatic choral movement, "Have lightnings and thunders," its serious and penitential tone would have formed an anti-climax when deprived of its proper sequel—the sermon applicable to the occasion, by which the first and second parts of the music are intended to be separated in church use. It is to be regretted that this omission was again made last night, as the calm and solemn expression of the chorus is well calculated (and doubtless intended) to prepare the congregation for the discourse which follows.

The sermon was preached by the Dean of Westminster, who took for his text the 12th Chapter of the Gospel of St. John—"I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." After remarking that the Evangelist here spoke of the death of the cross, and the spectacle which it presented of humiliation and of glory, of moving tenderness and of awful majesty, the Dean said those words, like many others which occurred in the Gospels, rose high above their outward signification. They expressed, when considered truly, how the passion of Christ, beyond any other scene upon earth, combined these two great characteristics—on the one hand, elevation above all that is vulgar, poor, base, mean, ordinary, commonplace, earthly; on the other hand, the attraction of the best and deepest feelings, not only to one class of mind and heart, but to all. Christ was "lifted" above the earth. The cross and the crucified had no relation with selfish passions, with worldly policy, with ecclesiastical forms, with petty quarrels, with false declarations, with narrow fanaticism, with fierce controversy. It might be questioned how far the leading minds of poetry, philosophy, and history had yet rendered their full tribute to the sublimity of what one of themselves in one of his great works had called "the Divine depth of sorrow." But as respected the arts, there could be no doubt that they had lifted up that sacred figure to the highest pinnacle to which they themselves could reach. Never had the genius of the painter soared to a higher point than when it presented to the admiration of every age the likeness of the heavenly babe in his mother's arms, his countenance already kindling with the prospect of the death conflict, or the Master at the Parting Supper, or the solemn spectacle of Calvary. And so, in like manner, the highest elevation attained by music had been in those marvellous creations of sound in which it had labored to convey through the listening ear to the listening soul the holy thoughts, and the blessed memories, and the colossal greatness, of that wondrous scene which lifted those strains above themselves, because it was itself lifted above the world by its own intrinsic divinity. The effort of musical genius to represent the sacred story was one means of advancing religion which in the present state of Christendom seemed especially vouchsafed to them for that purpose. In proportion as the Christian religion had become more spiritual men had shrunk from those processions and sensual images which in Southern countries had been and were still used at that season. But the divine faculty of song and music was by universal consent the most ethereal, the least material of all imaginations or representations, in its full development the pure creation of modern times, the especial product of the Reformation, the darling offspring of the great German race, which had been for many generations the first in conscientious and truthful learning, as it was now in force of arms and in energy of will. There it was that out of the depth of the despised 18th century, under the guidance of a pious Lutheran pastor, that noble music which they were that night hearing was called into existence to stimulate the devotion of the people to the faith and the spirit of Luther. Through him the rising genius of Sebastian Bach was encouraged to undertake the lofty mission of rousing his countrymen to the worthy celebration of the dying love of their Divine Redeemer, the reasonable worship of their Heavenly Father, "in spirit and in truth." This was the true Protestant commemoration of Good Friday; this, he would fain hope, was the frame of mind in which those who had lent themselves to that good work now offered their best faculties to the highest of causes—the increase of a true, sober, manly sense of spiritual religion; this was the frame of mind in which he trusted those who were there, had listened, and would listen, to the most solemn of all words represented in the most vivid and most touching form that human inspiration had produced. The remainder of the sermon consisted of a practical application of the text in connection with the occasion.

Besides the chorus above specified, many other numbers were omitted; some justification for which may be found in the fact that the service, which began at seven o'clock, did not terminate until very nearly ten. The choruses, and especially the sublime Lutheran chorales (unaccompanied), were very finely sung by a chorus comprising many members of Mr. Barnby's Choir, in addition to that of the Abbey, with reinforcements from various sources, including choristers from the Chapel Royal, the Temple Church, Windsor, Eton, Rochester, &c., the treble parts sung entirely by boys, and all having been arrayed in surplices. The soprano and contralto solos were extremely well sung by Master Hildersley, of the Temple, and Master Coward, of the Chapel Royal, their prominent pieces having been the air of the former, "Although mine eyes with tears overflow;" and that of the latter (with the elaborate violin obbligato well played by Mr. Pollitzer), "Have mercy upon me, O Lord." The important tenor recitatives were sung by Mr. Cummings, as at the two previous performances referred to; and again his delivery of the phrase, "And he went out and wept bitterly," was one of the most impressive passages in the solo music. The principal bass solos were assigned to Mr. L. Thomas, who gave the recitatives and the air, "'Twas in the cool of eventide," with much earnestness. The sublime final dirge, for double chorus, "In tears of grief," was followed by the blessing delivered by the Dean; and thus closed an event of special interest as recognizing among us the importance of music as a portion of religious worship. The orchestral arrangements were similar to those of the performance in February, some features in which, including occasional use of the drums, as we then mentioned, were derived from the modernized score of Robert Franz. The instrumentalists and choristers were ranged in ascending rows on each side of the organ screen—that instrument having been very efficiently used generally, and especially in accompanying the recitatives by Mr. Jekyil, assistant organist of Westminster Abbey. Mr. Joseph Barnby conducted. The effect of the whole service, amid the solemn surroundings of the building and in association with the awful occasion commemorated, will not soon be forgotten by those who attended it. Long before the commencement the nave was crowded to excess, and even other parts of the building, where hearing was difficult, were thronged by many who had been unable to gain nearer approach.

Music in our Public Schools.

A Paper Read at the Meeting of the American Social Science Association, April 3, 1871, by Dr. J. Baxter Upham.

In accordance with the request of this Association, I will state, very briefly, my views as to the practicability of some easy and inexpensive plan of elementary instruction in music, which might be readily engrafted upon the system of Common School Education, as we find it in New England and in many other sections of our country. As to the benefit of such instruction,—if properly carried out,—its agency in the formation of a refined and melodious speech, its efficiency as a means of recreation and of discipline in the school-room and its humanizing influence upon both teacher and pupil, the best educators in other countries and our own are now agreed. The almost universal ability of children of the school age to appreciate the sounds of the scale, and acquire some knowledge of music in its simpler forms, has been abundantly proved. Said Mr. Shelton, a late master of the Hancock Grammar School, speaking upon this point: "In my school of about 1000 girls less than a dozen were unfitted, from all causes, for attaining to a fair degree of success in this department of culture." This was before the introduction of music as a required study in our primary schools. Very recently the question was tested in the primary and younger classes of the grammar department in the Boston schools, by a delegation of the committee on education from the State Legislature. The result showed that in the lowest primary classes of about 40 pupils, whose average age was 5½ years, some half dozen pupils were found who could not sing in time. As you proceeded upward in the school these instances became less frequent; and when the second year of the grammar course was reached, in a class of 108 pupils of the average age of 12 to 13 years, not a single discordant voice could be found. Mr. Mason assures me that he is accustomed to disregard these exceptional cases among the smaller children and to require them to participate in the musical exercises with the others, feeling confident that the voice and ear of such delinquents will be brought up to the standard in due time.

Without discussing the many interesting bearings of my subject in an artistic sense, I will come at once to the practical issue. Can music, in its elementary and simpler forms, be generally taught in the common schools of our land? Can it be taught effectively and at the same time economically? and if so, how can it be done?

In reply to the first two branches of this enquiry I say unhesitatingly, yes. It can be taught as universally and as effectually as reading, writing, geography or arithmetic. For proof of this it is only necessary to drop in at any of the public schools in Boston, in Salem, in Lowell and some other of the larger towns in this Commonwealth, and examine the pupils in music and the other studies I have named (so far as they have been pursued), and the proficiency of the pupils in music will be found as good as in anything else. That it can be taught as economically as the other branches will appear when I state that the cost per scholar need not be greater than the price of the text book which is required in reading, in writing, in geography or arithmetic; the only condition for this economy being, as I shall state more particularly further on, that a town or group of towns shall be large enough to allow the employment, at a reasonable salary, of a person competent to set in operation and generally to direct the plan of musical instruction.

In answer to the latter part of the enquiry—How can these results be attained?—I will attempt to describe, in a few words, the plan of musical instruction, as at present carried on in the public schools of this city, it being allowed upon competent and impartial testimony that the plan as here adopted is, on the whole, satisfactory and successful.

The chief points of this plan have been briefly and correctly stated by Mr. Philbrick in his last semi-annual report to the School Board. "On entering the primary school at five years of age," says the report, "the child is at once taught to produce musical sounds and to sing little pieces adapted to his capacity. From this point the course of musical instruction is continued by an easy and just gradation all the way up through the primary, grammar and high schools." "There are two features of the system," continues Mr. Philbrick, "which produce a strong impression upon the minds of competent visitors from other States and countries,—the thorough scientific training imparted to the pupils, and the provision requiring the instruction to be given mainly by the regular school teachers, aided and superintended by a limited corps of professional teachers of music."

At first but very little is done with text-books. A black-board, a piece of chalk and a pointer are the implements mostly required. Very soon a series of charts is had recourse to by which the teacher fixes the attention of the pupil upon the signs and characters employed in musical notation, and leads him by gentle and progressive stages up to the point at which it is as easy for him to read at sight and express in singing tones a musical phrase upon the staff as to understand and articulate in words a paragraph in his School reader.

The organization of the musical department of the Boston public schools is now as follows:

The general control and supervision of the whole plan of musical instruction rests upon one responsible head, who is called the Supervisor of Musical Instruction in the Boston Public Schools, &c., whose duty it is to exercise a similar care and responsibility over the whole musical department of our educational system to that now exercised by the master of a grammar school over the various classes in the district under his charge. He is at the same time teacher of music in the High Schools. The grammar department, which, under the new arrangement in gradation, consists of six classes in each school, is under the charge of three professional teachers of music, each of whom is responsible for the teaching in two of the classes of the same grade in all the schools of the city, with the exception of those in the newly annexed district of Dorchester. The primary schools are in like manner placed under the charge of one professional teacher, with the exception of Dorchester, as before mentioned. In this last named district all the classes of the primary and grammar departments are for the present under the general charge of a single professional teacher; this provision is only temporary, it being intended another year to merge these schools in the Boston organization. All the officers and teachers above alluded to are subject to the executive authority of the Standing Committee on Music, who derive their power from the School Board.

Ten minutes in each session in the primary schools and fifteen minutes each day in the lower classes of the grammar schools are required to be devoted to instruction in music by the regular teachers of the schools. The 1st and 2nd classes of the grammar department devote one half hour each week to this study, under the personal instruction of the professional teacher, and it is hoped that the Board will allow the further provision that ten minutes each day shall be given to such instruction by the regular teachers in these classes, in like manner as in the classes of a lower grade. In the high school a specified number of hours each week is given to this study under the personal tuition of the professional teacher, and, in addition, in the Girls' High and Normal School such instruction is required to be given as shall qualify the pupils to teach in their turn this branch of study in our common schools.

The number of pupils whose musical instruction is under the general charge of the various professional teachers may be stated as follows:

In the primary schools, under Mr. Mason.....	14,337
In the two lower classes of the grammar department, under Mr. Alexander.....	7,914
In the two middle classes, under Mr. Holt.....	4,511
In the two upper classes, under Mr. Sharland.....	2,428
In the high schools, under Mr. Eichberg.....	1,355
Besides which there are in the primary and grammar schools in the Dorchester District, under Mr. Wilde.....	1,978

—this in August, 1870.

A definitely arranged programme of the course of instruction, so far as the primary schools are concerned, has been adopted and printed in the rules and regulations, and a similar programme is in progress for the grammar schools. Pianos, the best of their kind, have been placed in the high and grammar school-houses, and to a considerable extent, in the properly graded groups of the primary schools; which pianos are required to be kept in order and in tune, and to be used as aids, to, not as substitutes for, musical instruction. The rooms without pianos are being supplied with a simple pitch pipe, which can be made to give any sound of the middle octave in the treble clef.

An important point has recently been made in the establishment of classes for normal instruction in music among the teachers of all the schools, which is being carried out more or less faithfully by the professional teachers.

A combination of vocal and physical training, in connection with their musical tuition, has been devised for the younger pupils by the joint effort of the teachers of vocal and physical culture and of music. This proper training of the voice, it has been well remarked, is the best possible preparation for singing. A systematic and progressive course of musical instruction is thus given to all the pupils of the public schools in the city of Boston, except the boys of the Latin and English High Schools, where the plan is not yet fully in operation, commencing with the children of 5 or 6 years of age, when they first enter the primary school-room, and ending with the highest class of the pupils of the Girls' High and Normal School, who are themselves preparing to become teachers in their turn.

Let us go over this method of instruction in somewhat of detail. And I will confine your attention more particularly to the stages of instruction during the period of primary and the lower half of the grammar school pupilage, i. e. a period extending from the age of 5 to about 12 or 13 years, this being the compass within which the large majority of the children attending our public schools may be found, and, to my mind, by far the most important age for public musical instruction.

The first attempt of the teacher is to gain the attention of the children by singing to them some easy melodic phrase within the range adapted to their voices and asking them to repeat it after him—to imitate the sounds he has given them, in their proper order. This, after a few trials, the majority of the class will do. Some ten or fifteen minutes is spent in this way and they have taken their first lesson in music. It is purely a matter of rote singing, of the easiest and simplest kind. The interest of the children is excited, their attention aroused, their appreciation of musical sounds for the first time perhaps awakened. A few lessons are given in this way at the outset.

But true rote singing, as Mr. Mason has happily expressed it, is "a very different thing from the ordinary 'hap-hazard' singing we too often find in our Sunday schools and in common schools where no regular instruction in music is given." It is an appeal to the imitative faculty, which young children possess in so great a degree of perfection;—and hence the utmost care should be taken that the example be a proper model for imitation as regards method and style and purity and correctness of tone, even in the utterance of the simplest musical phrase. These preliminary rote lessons should therefore be given, when possible, by the professional teacher himself. And they must needs be few and not long continued.

Even at this early stage in the musical instruction great attention is given to the formation of a proper quality of voice. The difference between a good and bad quality is illustrated by examples. The child is called upon to use a smooth and pleasant intonation in speaking, in reading, in recitation and in singing. Above all, he is taught to avoid a noisy use of the voice.

As preliminary to the exercises of the voice in singing—and it applies to reading as well—the young children are trained in the following points:

1. A proper position of the body.
2. Right management of the breath.
3. A good quality of utterance, as just mentioned.
4. A correct sound of the vowels.
5. A good articulation.
6. Intelligent expression.

Care, too, is to be taken in the singing exercises of young children that a too great compass be not attempted. The child is allowed to sing only in the middle register or where he makes the tones with the least effort. Commencing our instruction with the rote singing, as already stated, the first five sounds of the G scale are only attempted at the outset. Even within this range many of the best juvenile songs may be found. After the voice has been well practised in this compass it may be extended upward and downward to a judicious extent, taking care not to strain the voice in the least degree.

The pitch and compass of the voice having thus been attended to, musical phrases of easy rhythmical structure are next taught in double and in triple time, the rote method still being used. Various devices are resorted to to attract and keep the attention of the child to the lesson, (i. e., marking the movement by a curve upon the blackboard, holding up the hand and pointing out the motives, sections and phrases upon the fingers in turn, &c., &c.) At this stage musical notation in its simplest form is begun. The teacher explains—gives examples which the pupil is required to imitate. With all these, practical exercises upon the sounds of the scale are intermingled.

In the second year of primary instruction the pupil is taught to know the different kinds of notes and rests, to understand the nature of quadruple and sextuple time and the manner of beating the same, the accentuation as applied to music, etc. He is also mildly indoctrinated into the mysteries of the chromatic scale, so far as the simple changes from the natural into the keys of G and F major is concerned.

In the third and last year of primary instruction he is taught to describe by its intervals the major diatonic scale, &c., &c.

[Conclusion next time.]

Music and Statuary in Our Public Schools.

DEDICATION OF A NEW BUILDING.

[From the Boston Daily Advertiser, April 30.]

The new building of the Girls' High and Normal School, the largest and finest public school building in this country, located between Pembroke and Newton streets, was dedicated yesterday, with exercises in the usual form, but of unusual interest. At ten o'clock a large audience assembled in the school hall, where the young ladies of the school were also gathered. They sat in a body at the left side of the hall, and under the direction of Mr. Julius Eichberg sang during the morning several difficult selections from the works of the masters. Mr. Sharland assisted at the piano, and with the aid of a large orchestra Mr. Eichberg succeeded in furnishing the best music ever heard at a school dedication in this city. "The March of Priests" from Athalie was performed as a prelude, after which the Rev. Warren Cudworth read from the Scriptures and offered prayer.

TRANSFER OF THE KEYS.

Alderman J. E. Jenkins, in behalf of the city government, then addressed Mayor Gaston, the president of the school committee, as follows:—

Mr. Mayor:—As chairman of the committee on public buildings, it is my simple duty, as well as pleasure, to surrender to you the keys of this noble edifice, which has been erected and furnished at a cost of $308,000. This is a very large sum to expend on one building, I am aware, but it must be remembered that this is a very large structure, I am told the largest free public schoolhouse in the world. Then why may we not look for results commensurate with its cost and size? It surely has been erected at the proper time, for education has become a political necessity. Your committee desire me to say that they consider this a thorough building in every particular, and in their judgment much credit is due to the architect and builders, as well as to our efficient superintendent.

REMARKS OF MAYOR GASTON.

His Honor, Mayor Gaston, in receiving the keys, said:—"In behalf of the school committee, I accept from the city government, which you to-day represent, this beautiful and elegant structure, for the purpose of dedicating it to the great use for which it is designed. The contribution of so expensive and elegant an edifice to the cause of learning in this city is faithful testimony that Boston remains true to her traditions and history, and that she still believes that in the cause of popular education she can spend her money freely and yet not unwisely. [Applause.] While such a spirit shall prevail in your councils her safety and honor will be assured. We accept this beautiful gift with the same spirit of satisfaction and pride with which it is offered.

Turning to the Rev. Henry Burroughs, the chairman of the Normal school committee, His Honor said: "I will now with pleasure transfer the keys of this building to you, and by this act dedicate it to the great charge which you and your associates have been selected to guide. It requires no spirit of prophecy to see that under your wise direction there shall proceed from this building influences which shall not only elevate the city but the State at large. The trust which is implied in the delivery of these keys I now give to you, with the full assurance that it will be executed with fidelity." [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF MR. BURROUGHS.

Mr. Mayor:—In behalf of the committee on the girls' high and normal school, I accept the trust, of which these keys are the emblem, with a deep sense of our responsibility to the citizens who maintain this school and to the parents of the pupils. We avail ourselves of this opportunity to express our grateful acknowledgments to you, sir, and to the city council, for the munificent liberality that has provided so thoughtfully and generously for the wants of this institution in this magnificent edifice, to the committee on public buildings and the superintendent of that department, to Mr. Ropes, the architect, and to those friends who have selected this hall as the depository of these classic works of art. When we see five hundred young ladies receiving in this school the highest education in science and literature, it is hard to believe that girls were not admitted to the public schools of Boston until 1789, that even then they were only permitted during the summer to occupy the seats vacated by boys who had gone out to work, and that it was not until 1823 that they were allowed to attend during the whole year. A high school for girls was organized in 1825, but it met with great opposition, and continued but a short time, and only twenty years ago the opinion was quite prevalent that a grammar school education was enough for the daughters of the citizens of Boston. This seminary of learning was established in 1852, chiefly through the persevering exertions of Dr. LeBaron Russell, and in accordance with the recommendations of Mr. Bishop, then superintendent of public schools. Its design was to prepare young ladies to become teachers, and its hundred pupils were assembled in the second and third stories of the old Adams school-house in Mason street, under the charge of Mr. Loring Lothrop, the first master and now a member of our committee. Believing that the most thorough and liberal culture is one of the essential qualifications of a good teacher, the founders of the normal school framed a course of study embracing those branches of learning usually taught in schools of the highest order. Their aim was not so much to fill the storehouse of the memory, as to develop and cherish the faculties imparted by the Giver of every good and perfect gift, to strengthen the reason and to give readiness and accuracy in the expression of ideas by words.

When the second attempt to create a high school failed, in 1853, the course was extended from two to three years, and pupils were received who did not intend to teach. From that time to the present the girls' high and normal school has steadily increased in numbers. In 1857 the removal of the public library gave it the use of the lower floor of the building. In 1861 the rooms of the adjacent edifice, vacated by the natural history society, were added to the old school-house, and very soon afterward even these accommodations were found to be too small. The erection of stores in the neighborhood, excluding air and sunshine, the noise of the street and noxious gases of the furnaces combined to render it imperative to remove to a more quiet place. A lot on Berkeley street was selected and approved by the school committee. But so many obstacles intervened to prevent the accomplishment of the design that the erection of a school-house on that site was finally abandoned. We are indebted to the very efficient secretary of our committee, Mr. Henry C. Hunt, for the selection of this high and open lot of ground on which the city council has erected an edifice unequalled in size and convenience,—a monument which commemorates not only the wise and far-seeing liberality of our citizens, but also the recognition of the duty of the city to give to girls as good an education as we give to boys.

While we have endeavored to afford every possible facility for the acquisition of mathematical, scientific and literary knowledge, we have not forgotten the primary object of this institution. A training department was added in 1894, and placed under the charge of Miss Stickney, its present superintendent. Here young ladies are instructed in the theory and practice of teaching, and are prepared to become assistants in our public schools. And since there are among our scholars some who have not the peculiar qualifications requisite for success as teachers, the committee, in 1896, made bookkeeping one of the elective studies. It is now proposed, in view of the increasing work of the regular course, to allow pupils to remain during the fourth year to continue their scientific or literary studies, or to receive such special instruction as will fit them for mercantile and industrial pursuits. It seems to me not to be the language of exaggeration when we call this the crowning glory of our Boston schools. In eighteen years that have elapsed since its foundation, 2339 pupils have been admitted, of whom all but 719 are from our grammar schools. 668 have graduated, and 648 have become teachers; and many of these have received more than one appointment, making the whole number of appointments 897. This school has supplied 238 teachers for the primary, and 310 for the grammar schools, and has numbered among its own instructors sixteen of its graduates. The first plans for this new school-house were drawn at the desk of one whose memory is fresh in our minds to-day. To see such a building as this in this section of the city was one of his most cherished hopes, and I should be false to the dictates of my own heart, and to the expectations of his pupils and friends, if I should let the occasion pass away without the mention of the name of William Henry Seavey, that ripe scholar, in whose well proportioned mind all powers were harmoniously blended; that unsurpassed teacher, whose clear ideas found utterance in the most simple language; that judicious counsellor and sympathizing friend, whose influence over his pupils was unbounded. The solemn trust which he laid down with his life has been committed to you, Mr. Hunt, with your accomplished and faithful assistants. We present to you these keys as our recognition of your authority as head-master, and as the token of our confidence. Under your guidance our school is expanding its programme to keep pace with the progress of the age. Science has been called the doubting element in human progress, and it should be the aim of every teacher to give the scholar a firm hold on what she has learned, and to cultivate a confidence in the truth, that cannot be shaken by ingenious cavils or unanswered question. While you open to these young minds the wonderful discoveries of the telescope and the microscope, and the revelations made by spectrum analysis, and trace out the history of geological changes, show them in all these marvels one great design manifesting the presence, everywhere and in all time, of an intelligent mind working with Almighty power, steadfastly pursuing a single purpose, the creation of man and his redemption from evil. In this school, above all others, by the side of the inductions of science should be placed the truths revealed in the gospel of Him, who, by his teaching and the example of his tender reverence for woman, has given her the exalted position which she justly holds in the great family of our Heavenly Father.

The head-master, Mr. E. Hunt, upon receiving the keys, replied on behalf of himself and associates, thanking the city government for the ample means of instruction it had provided. He said they would prove an inspiration in their future labors, and an incentive to the young to renewed efforts in the attainment of useful knowledge.

The following dedicatory ode, written by Miss Mary G. Morrison, music by Eichberg, was then sung by the pupils of the school, with piano and orchestra accompaniment:

"Raise now a joyful song;
Let it be borne along
By love and praise upon the air;
And louder swell more clear,
Now sweet to listening ear,
As music lends its charm to prayer."

THE STATUARY.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the exercises was the presentation of the works of art in the hall, which have been placed there through the instrumentality of the Social Science Association, with the hope of arousing the attention of the friends of education in this country to the importance of the æsthetic culture which may be introduced into the public schools. The works referred to were procured at a cost of about $1500, from London, Paris and Rome, and are described as follows:—

The fixed portion consists of what is generally known as the Panathenæa frieze, the original of which once embellished the external walls of the Parthenon, or Greek temple of Minerva at Athens, a considerable portion of which is now in the British Museum, and forms a portion of the collection called the Elgin Marbles. The casts which now embellish the walls of this hall are from the above-named collection. The plates or slabs are three feet four inches high, and occupy the space directly under the cornice at the intersection of the walls and ceiling, and extend entirely around the hall, a length of 375 feet. Among the casts of statuary are a full-length statue of Demosthenes, also of Diana, Polyhymnia, one of the muses, Pudeitia, a female figure representing chastity, one of the Caryatides, from the Erechtheum of the Acropolis, Amazon, the Venus of Milo, and a colossal statue of Minerva. Of busts there are two Apollos, a colossal bust of Juno, the same of Jupiter, a bust of Pallas, same of Homer, Pericles, Æsculapius, Zeus, Bacchus and Augustus, a half-length figure of the Genius of the Vatican, the same of Psyche, and a piece of statuary called the Bone-player.

The President of the Social Science Association, Samuel Eliot, LL.D., presented the Statuary, with the following remarks:

REMARKS OF MR. ELIOT.

Mr. Chairman:—It is my pleasant office to offer, in behalf of all those who have contributed toward placing this collection of casts here, their contribution toward the success and the development of this school. We have thought that while there is enough controversy in the educational world as to the proportion which different studies should take in it, while some of us are very much on one side and some on the other, and not so many of us, perhaps, between the two, with regard to the prominence which should be given to one study above another, there is an opportunity for those who believe in its influence to advocate one study not generally advocated and to press its claims upon the thoughts and the affections of this educated community. Fair as our school system is, and adorned as it is with all the light and beauty that stream in from the past upon the present, there is one ray which has not yet penetrated far, one that comes from the art of the ancient world, one that, if it comes, comes here, as everywhere, fraught with light and benediction. About the place that should be assigned to Greek language or literature in a programme of study, there may be a question, but about the place to be assigned to Greek art, there is no question, and there can be no question among those who know what that art is and what power it is susceptible of wielding. If it were only as a mere negation of that high pressure put upon our children, if it were only as a softening element introduced into study that needs to be softened and shaded down—

"Quam neque longa dies nec pietas mitigat illa,"—

Like the harper who lays his open palm upon the harp to deaden its vibrations, æsthetic education, if it found its place among us, would soften and sweeten the whole course of study. But it is not merely as a negation that art should be welcomed among us; it ought to come full of that positiveness, full of that inspiration which we all stretch out our arms to accept and open our heart troubles. Greek art is the expression of the finest culture and the deepest thought that have ever found an abiding place upon this earth. It was the pursuit of the best men in Athens and throughout Greece. It ought to be cherished by us, it ought to be made more of for the lessons, not merely æsthetic, but intellectual and moral, which it conveys. In its simplicity, in its idealism, in its unbroken and unshaken truthfulness it is a teacher of principles which no scholar can learn without being the better for them, and no community cherish without being benefited by them. If we welcome it here we shall welcome something which will make our school brighter, our home dearer, and our whole lives nobler. We shall welcome something which we can take into our breasts and cherish there, and, while we cherish it, it cherishes us and gives life and breadth and purity.

Mr. Chairman, I offer in the name, not merely of the American Social Science Association, but more particularly in the name of those members of the association, and those friends of theirs not members, who have taken part in this work, the collection which we see on and about these walls. It has been carefully chosen under the guidance of one who will follow me in explaining his choice. We owe to him, I am free to say, a large share of what will make this collection valuable here, and will lead, as we trust, to its being imitated elsewhere, and I beg the teachers and the pupils of this school to feel that we ask them and depend upon them to help us in this experiment which we are trying. If they value these expressions of art, if they think well of them and speak well of them, if they get that good from them which we believe they will, the ripple which is stirred here to-day will spread far beyond this school and this city to every part of the country; and there will gradually come into the education of the United States an æsthetic element which it now wants, but which is as sure to come through this experiment, or through some better experiment, as the sun is sure to rise to-morrow. I beg your permission, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, to read a part of a letter, which was addressed to me to be read to-day. It comes from the friend who gave this frieze which runs about these walls, a friend who was the first to propose this work, whose sympathy and enthusiasm have encouraged it at every step, and who ought to be here to-day in the flesh, as I doubt not he is in the spirit, to witness the result of his efforts and his hopes.—Mr. James M. Barnard:—"A great interest is felt here," he writes from Italy, "in this movement, particularly in the plan which has been adopted for the public schools by this association. I wish I could be present to rejoice with you in the inauguration. Receive my profound sympathy. Mrs. Barnard unites with me in presenting to the girls' high and normal school, through the association, the frieze of the Parthenon, reproduced by Brucciani, from the originals in the British Museum." And now, Mr. Chairman, not only the frieze, but the statues and busts become the property of this school; and as long as they stand here, may they stand as silent but not the less effective teachers of all that is good and pure in the human heart, and all that is truest and noblest in human lives. [Applause.]

Mr. Charles C. Perkins, to whom Mr. Eliot referred in his address, was then called upon to explain the frieze and statuary; and he did so in a very interesting way, remarking that they were but the forerunners of what might be expected when the Art Museum was completed.

A letter from Hon. Charles Sumner, expressing his regret at not being able to attend, was read.

The 23d Psalm was sung, music by Schubert, and addresses were subsequently made by ex-Governor Washburn, Superintendent Philbrick, Messrs. Charles W. Slack and Loring Lothrop, interspersed with some fine instrumental and vocal music, including a theme and variations from Beethoven's quartet in A major, "Ye sons of Israel" from Mendelssohn, also the trio "Lift thine eyes" by the same composer.

The exercises were closed by the singing of a hymn, written by Miss Eliza G. Swett.

The Organ of the Royal Albert Hall.—International Exhibitions in Music.

Although her Majesty's Commissioners have not included in their official programme music as one of the fine arts capable of exhibition, or musical instruments as a class, it is yet contemplated to make use of, to the fullest extent, the exceptional facilities that will be afforded in the coming Exhibition for the display of musical execution. The Commissioners, with the view of making this display thoroughly international, have taken steps to secure, if possible, the attendance of the best organists and military bands of the Continent, and have issued a circular to the effect that each foreign country taking part in the Exhibition should be invited to send its most celebrated military band to perform at the International Exhibition, and that a sum of money, at the rate of £5 for each member of the band, not exceeding forty in number, shall be allowed to the band selected by each foreign country. The Commissioners will, also, further provide the members of the bands with free lodgings in barracks, and with soldiers' rations for ten days. Each band so selected will give two performances every day for a week, at times appointed, during the hours the Exhibition will be open to the public. Each foreign country is also invited to send its most celebrated organist to perform on the organ now in course of construction for the Royal Albert Hall, to whom an honorarium of £50 will be allowed. Each organist so selected will give two performances every day for a week, at times appointed, during the hours the Exhibition is open to the public. By this means, the public visiting the Exhibition will have an opportunity of hearing some of the most celebrated Continental organ and other instrumental performances, it may be added, without extra charge, and the capabilities of the grand organ of the Albert Hall will be developed as far as the most talented performers can do so. This instrument, which the builder, Mr. Henry Willis, claims to be the largest in the world, consists of five claviers extending from CC to C in altissimo (in five complete octaves or 61 notes), and that of the pedale from CCC to G (two octaves and a fifth, or 32 notes). The pedal organ consists of 21 stops—1, double open diapason (wood) 32 ft.; 2, double open diapason (metal), 32 ft.; 3, contra violone (metal), 32 ft.; 4, open diapason (wood), 16 ft.; 5, open diapason (metal), 16 ft.; 6, bourdon (wood), 16 ft.; 7, violone (metal), 16 ft.; 8, great quint (metal), 12 ft.; 9, violoncello (metal), 8 ft.; 10, octave (wood), 8 ft.; 11, quint (metal), 8 ft.; 12, super octave (metal), 4 ft.; 13, furniture, 5 ranks; 14, mixture, 3 ranks; 15, contra posauone (wood), 32 ft.; 16, contra fagotto (wood) 16 ft.; 17, bombarde (metal), 16 ft.; 18, ophicleide (wood) 16 ft.; 19, trombone (metal), 16 ft.; 20, fagotto (wood), 8 ft.; 21, clarion (metal), 8 ft. The first, or choir organ, comprises 20 stops—1, violone, 16 ft.; 2, viola da gamba, 8 ft.; 3, dulciana, 8 ft.; 4, lieblich gedact, 8 ft.; 5, open diapason, 8 ft.; 6, vox angelica, 8 ft.; 7, principal (harmonic), 4 ft.; 8, gemshorn, 4 ft.; 9, lieblich flöte, 4 ft.; 10, celestiana, 4 ft.; 11, flageolet, 4 ft.; 12, piccolo (harmonic), 2 ft.; 13, super octave, 2 ft.; 14, mixture, 3 ranks; 15, corno di bassetto, 16 ft.; 16, clarinet, 8 ft.; 17, cor anglia, 8 ft.; 18, oboe, 8 ft.; 19, trompette harmonique, 16 and 8 ft.; 20, clarion, 4 ft. All the pipes in this organ are of metal. The effect of wood is imparted by the harmonic construction, and the disadvantage of using wood for small pipes is therefore avoided. The stops numbered 1, 3, 6, 8, 9, 11, 14, and 17 are intended to represent what is called the "echo organ" in some large organs, and in them placed on a fifth clavier. The second (great) organ contains 25 stops—1, flûte conique, partly harmonic, 16 ft.; 2, contra gamba, 16 ft.; 3, violone, 16 ft.; 4, bourdon, 16 ft.; 5, open diapason, 8 ft.; 6, open diapason, 8 ft.; 7, viola da gamba, 8 ft.; 8, claribel, 8 ft.; 9, flûte harmonique, 8 ft.; 10, flûte à pavillon, 8 ft.; 11, quint, 6 ft.; 12, flûte octaviante harmonique, 4 ft.; 13, viola, 4 ft.; 14, octave, 4 ft.; 15, quinte octaviante, 3 ft.; 16, piccolo harmonique, 2 ft.; 17, super octave, 2 ft.; 18, furniture, 5 ranks; 19, mixture, 5 ranks; 20, contra posanne, 16 ft.; 21, posanne, 8 ft.; 22, trompette harmonique, 16 and 8 ft.; 23, trombe, 8 ft.; 24, clarion harmonique, 8 and 4 ft.; 25, clarion, 4 ft. Of the above stops, only the basses of the bourdon and claribel are of wood. The third, or swell organ, contains 25 stops—1, double diapason, 16 ft.; 2, bourdon, 16 ft.; 3, salcional, 8 ft.; 4, open diapason, 8 ft.; 5, viola da gamba, 8 ft.; 6, flûtes & cheminées, 8 ft.; 7, claribel flûte, 8 ft.; 8, quint, 6 ft.; 9, flûte harmonique, 4 ft.; 10, viola, 4 ft.; 11, principal, 4 ft.; 12, quinte octaviante, 3 ft.; 13, super octave, 2 ft.; 14, piccolo harmonique, 2 ft.; 15, sesquialter, 5 ranks; 16, mixture, 5 ranks; 17, contra posanne, 16 ft.; 18, contra oboe, 16 ft.; 19, baryton, 16 ft.; 20, voix humaine, 8 ft.; 21, oboe, 8 ft.; 22, cornepean, 8 ft.; 23, tuba major, 8 ft.; 24, tuba, 4 ft.; 25, clarion, 4 ft. Of these stops, only the basses of the bourdon and claribel flûte are of wood. The fourth, or solo organ, contains 20 stops—1, contra basso, 16 ft.; 2, flûte à pavillon, 8 ft.; 3, viola d'amore, 8 ft.; 4, flûte harmonique, 8 ft.; 5, claribel flûte, 8 ft.; 6, voix celeste, 8 ft.; 7, flûte traversière, 4 ft.; 8, concert flûte, 4 ft.; 9, piccolo harmonique, 2 ft.; 10, cymbale, 11, corno di bas-setto, 16 ft.; 12, clarinet, 8 ft.; 13, bassoon, 8 ft.; 14, French horn, 8 ft.; 15, ophicléide, 8 ft.; 16, trombone, 8 ft.; 17, oboe, 8 ft.; 18, bombardon, 16 ft.; 19, tuba mirabilis, 8 ft.; 20, tuba clarion, 4 ft. Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, and 17 are inclosed in a swell box. Couplers:—1, solo sub octave (on itself); 2, solo super octave (on itself); 3, swell sub octave (on itself); 4, swell super octave (on itself); 5, unison solo to great organ; 6, unison swell to great organ; 7, unison choir to great organ; 8, swell to choir; 9, solo to choir; 10, solo to pedals; 11, swell to pedals; 12, great to pedals; 13, choir to pedals; 14, sforzando. A double-acting vertical movement, struck by the heel of either foot, instantly detaches and connects the movement of the pedal organ from all but bourdon, violone, open diapason (metal), and octave, and also draws and withdraws the pedal coupler to great organ. Eight patent pneumatic combination pistons govern the whole of the stops of each manual organ. These 32 pistons appear immediately below and in front of each clavier, concentrated so as to be at all times within reach of the hands of the performer. Six pedals govern the stops of the pedal organ by means of vents. Two pedals apply and detach a movement that causes the aforesaid six pedals governing the pedal organ to act also upon the combination movement of the great organ. Six pedals govern and combine in various ways all other accessories, and thus, by one instantaneous operation of the performer, vary the effect of the whole instrument at once. Two tremulants, governed by pedals (one to the swell, the other to the solo organ), are applied. These tremulants act only upon suitable stops. The sforzando is brought into action by means of a pedal. Two pedals govern the great to pedal coupler. The patent atmospheric contrivance of 1862 for actuating the swell independently of the swell pedals is also applied. The internal metal pipes consist of 5-9ths lamb-stamp commercial tin, and 4-9ths soft lead, and the scales of these, as well as those of the front, are suitable to the proportions of the building. All the front pipes are made of tin 90 and lead 10 in 100 parts, and are burnished and polished in the same manner as those in the best continental organs. The main reservoirs in which the compressed air is forced are placed in a chamber prepared in a clean and dry locality. The feeders supplying the air by steam power are of the most ample size, and constructed to receive their wind from the room above, and not only from the locality in which they are placed. To carry out this arrangement (of the highest importance) passages are provided for the windshafts to and from the organ to the chamber in which the main reservoirs are placed. The main reservoirs deliver their wind to numerous reservoirs in immediate connection with the pipes.—Orchestra, Feb. 3.

Bach in Westminster Abbey.

It is just upon forty years since Mendelssohn, at the organ in St. Paul's Cathedral, revealed to the English public that there was a school of instrumental music infinitely more powerful and intense than any that entered the ears of a mere worldly audience. Up to that time Sebastian Bach was considered as a composer that the professor might blame without injustice, and the amateur altogether despise. It was not that his music was weary, stale, and unprofitable—but it was felt to be too intellectual for ordinary minds to comprehend—and altogether wanting in that mysterious beauty by which great souls lead up the hearts of their contemporaries to the conception and admiration of the new rapture, the further vision, hurling down the throned opinions of the present times, and setting up a new poetry in music's kingdom hitherto untold, uncommunicated, and undreamt of.

The mission of Mendelssohn in this country was to teach the English nation the sanctity of art in divine worship, and the real use of music as the truly legitimate and primal means of adoration—the expression of the voice within the heart to eternal love, in gratitude of praise for the prospects of eternal life.

Bach's music to the English ear was as it were a light set upon a hill; but mists and darkness prevented its rays from penetrating to those living below. It was the beacon indicating belief in immortality, communion with the divine intelligence, the unravelling of mysteries, the utterance of the secret spirit, the contemplation of unseen realities, and assurance of undying hope—some short insight into the very regions of the blessed.

Our musical historians and professors of the practical art of music had condemned Sebastian Bach as the visionary, the dreamer, the morbid solitaire, wasting existence on stern dialectics and startling complexities. In his music they could see nothing natural or simple, nothing sweet or consoling, distinct or lifelike; it was a confusion worse confounded. And the hint that this composer was a great dramatic writer, a teacher of exalted feeling, and a sure guide in the strongest and most wonderful of all passions—the passion of love—would have been received with scorn and incredulity. But the times have changed; the doors of Westminster Abbey have been thrown open to him and his service-music—the nave, the transepts, the choir, every nook and cranny of this grand old fane has been crowded with worshippers; and Sebastian Bach lives again to give life to the soul, and to present, in a masterpiece of truth and tenderness, the sublime history of the divine love resigning life to conquer death and to set up the doctrine of a happy immortality as the one great hope and security to the struggling soul. And yet the idea of a musical performance, never, we vouch to say, crossed the mind of any one present. The music seemed the one great essential necessity of the service, absorbing all mere notion of mode and manner. The solo playing of the violin was most exquisite, but no one thought of the leader of the band, highly gifted as he is. The power of the music as worship had deposed all consideration of its art. To follow the stream of such harmony as something "composed" was impossible.

We owe it, we understand, to the kind thoughtfulness of Dr. Stanley, the Dean of Westminster, that the return of Maundy Thursday should have been commemorated in St. Peter's, Westminster, in a manner so becoming the solemnity of the season; and at the same time hearing upon the great objects now in discussion at the Educational Temple in South Kensington. If music is to make any real progress in this country it can be only after the old and good fashion of first dedicating it to the duties and exigencies of divine worship. The musician has been one of the great disseminators of the Gospel, one of the "lovely messengers," with "feet all beautiful," ushering in the glad tidings of the Mission of Peace. In these days of mistaken action and restless activities, the ingenuity of our professors has been tortured to the invention of a school which is of the earth earthy, without either power, beauty, or majesty; a treading among the dust, a mere dream of consolation, it rarely looks upwards, and never pierces beyond the cloud. Dr. Stanley in giving the English people an opportunity of hearing the greatest example of didactic music that ever breathed from the soul of man—a work unrivalled in its lofty and deeply sought out images—has marked no ordinary day and given point to no ordinary epoch. What may be the result of this realization of a school of music that heart, in this country, had never conceived, and ear never heard, it is impossible to prophesy. How many of those strange and weird chords floating upwards among the dim, mysterious arches of our hallowed minster, sank into the souls of the worshippers and communicated with fresh force the unfathomable love, and the depth of sorrow manifested on that awful night—the one preceding the Day of Death—we know not. But this we know, if judgment may be relied upon from the expression of feature, the vivid harmonies of the loving old master flowed into very many hearts and brought up before the mind's eye a right contemplation of that mystery, which angels themselves desired to look into, but were unable fully to comprehend. For nearly three hours the scene in the Abbey was as an ethereal light thrown over the cares and troubles of the earth. We heard the voice of the aged solitaire at Patmos repeating in solemn and sustained tone the history of the greatest event which ever happened upon this earth; and there was Our Saviour speaking for himself, surrounded by his Disciples, arrested, hurried here and there, belied, insulted, tormented, and finally led off to the mount of execution; and there made the meek sufferer in that darkest of all human actions.

With Handel, the Messiah stood as in the period of distant ages even before the times of prophecy. We hear him saying:

"Lo, I come to do Thy will, O Lord."

But with Bach, the scene is in time and space; the Messiah himself is before us, and we hear Him say:

"Father, unto Thee all things are possible; take away this cup from Me; nevertheless not what I will, but what Thou wilt."

Handel deals with the Prophets and their promises of the future doings of Divine love. Bach deals with the present action; the facts that hallowed the words of the Ancient Seer. His work is the real and solemn grandeur of the drama, the deep mystery—the action present of the Incarnate life. With ordinary composers we should have heard much pedantry, stiffness, and straining after effect; but not so with Bach. His wealth of invention, his elevated feeling, and ever-present power of sustaining it, makes this work of his the most majestic of all musical conceptions. He stands on higher ground than the prophet of old; for the prophet of ancient times looked through the glass, and his sight was dim, and he saw but darkly; but with Bach, the scene is before him in all its depth of gloom, its fierce cruelty, its terrible atrocity, its marvellous and immeasurable love. No mere fertility of genius, no mere wealth of learning could have led him to realize such a scene, unless made distinct and conscious by the presence of a true and firm faith—faith in the subject—faith in his art—faith in his own power and will. Here is the true secret of the effect that this music produces upon the mind of the Christian in worship. It is the outpouring of one of the greatest of great musicians upon the highest objects of human hopes, the deepest thoughts of human intellect, a communion with the slumbers of the dead, and glimpses of the half-unveiled glories behind the gates ajar. Dr. Stanley in his sermon gave his hearers a slight sketch of the power of music in divine worship, and its true status as the chosen handmaid of religion. But where the reality is, the commentary is unnecessary. On the part of Sebastian Bach, love to his Saviour had given him the heart and the tongue to describe and communicate the love of his Master; and his art was of that electric character that it created a sympathy with band, chorus, and congregation.

Every re-hearing of this marvellous work brings before the mind its herculean difficulties. How it was done on Maundy Thursday let the huge assembly then present say; we wonder that it was done at all, and that so many great things were so easily and spiritedly rendered. We thought of old Bach and his children, the schoolboy, the young men of the town, his chorus, the orchestra of amateur tradesmen—and, hearing in Westminster Abbey what we heard, we could only say, "It is the same story, the same spirit, the same energy, the same affection. Nothing short of all this could get such results."

"All the world shall sing of Thee." There is no higher conception of the grandeur of music, and it has no higher theme for its operation. Such theme and such music is truly "peace on earth, and prospect of the skies."

The one grand and continuous charm of what may be termed the evening function was the use of the "stringed instruments." Of course no organ could have given adequate expression to the deeply-wrought harmonies of Sebastian Bach—relations so tender and true, as to lie infinitely out of the range of the temperament indulged in by our organ builders. Throughout this great work Bach takes as his platform the three chords of the key with their four minor thirds, thus prominently soothing the ear with the minor third, the sweetest of all concords, and the luscious combination of the double tritone. A chain of harmonies of this kind and character, if heard on the organ alone, would soon irritate the ear, and put the choral force all out of tune. We may say with respect to the use of "stringed instruments;" in church service—"the Scriptures cannot be broken"—and their absence in such a church as Westminster Abbey is to be deeply regretted. The violin was made for church use, and it is only in such places as minsters and cathedrals that its marvellous beauty and utility become apparent. But we argue not its use as a matter of æsthetics, but as one of direction and command. "Stringed instruments;" are again and again alluded to in the pages of Holy Writ, as the "instruments of God," the "holy instruments," the "musical instruments," whilst in the first Temple Church there was a choir of two hundred and forty-eight singers—the orchestra numbered no less than four thousand. The prophet Habakuk inscribes his sublime ode to the chief singer on "my stringed instruments," and the grandest and oldest of hymn-books, the one hundred and fifty psalms of David and his brother poets concludes with the command to "Praise Him upon the stringed instruments."

The true beauty of the orchestra is its life; life in opposition to mechanism—sounds made by the will and heart of living men, and not the utterance of the wood and metal of the organ-builder left to the mercy or caprice of one individual—one thousand fingers in place of so much bellows and tube.

The "Passion" of Bach accompanied on the organ would have proved insupportable, whilst the band threw a purity and serenity of well balanced harmony over the scene which the glorious old minster might be almost imagined to rejoice in. Nature will not repeat imperfection; and in music where the tones vary to the degree commonly called "out of tune," she declines any re-echo; there comes a choke but no stream. Whereas with all harmony, whether from voices or instruments in tune, or near enough to be considered in tune, nature assists the imperfection of man, and draws the sounds into perfect accord. The echoes in Westminster Abbey are those of perfect harmony. The stream of unbroken echo on Maundy Thursday night, so soft, so gentle, so plaintive, and so tender, completely subdued the worshippers, and when the voice of Dr. Stanley first broke upon the ear in his opening prayer before the sermon, the gulf between absolute harmony of sound and the disjointed tones of ordinary human utterance was made most transparent. May we be permitted to indulge the hope, now that Westminster Abbey is fitted up for its double choir, the services in this splendid fane between this Easter and Whitsuntide seasons may be made rich and solemn by the use of some large orchestral compositions in the course of the forthcoming services. The Magnificat is of course the great feature of the Office of Evensong, and it stands in the place of the Creed and Gloria in the Holy Communion.

Sebastian Bach never wrote a more joyous, spirited, and delightful composition than his Magnificat in D major. It is beyond measure brilliant and exhilarating, and has been put into ordinary and effective score by Franz, who has so well transcribed the "Passion." We feel sure there would be no difficulty in gathering together a strong and competent chorus to sing this great movement, and we have no doubt that any necessary expenses attending the presence of a band would be cheerfully met by the many friends and advocates for the employment of an orchestra in our Church services.

We have not alluded to the exceedingly beautiful appearance of the immense choral body all clothed in white. We have no need to quote Acts of Parliament, Injunctions, or Rubrics with regard to use of the White Robe, the "raiment of the Angel"—the "garment of him who is to receive the white stone"—and of those who are "to walk with Me in white." The aspect of these white-robed ministers of song was beautiful exceedingly, and at once took away all idea of an ordinary "performance." Here was no Exeter Hall, no gathering together of great musical talent for the mere purposes of personal gratification; but it was the numerous choir of rightly attired ministers about to offer their services as a pure act of worship to the Divine Being.

And now, to find fault, there was only one blemish in this noble and holy undertaking, and this was the absence of the women's voices. The "daughters of Zion," the "maidens of Jerusalem," were selected and instructed in the songs of the temple; and the command for the "daughters" to rejoice is certainly co-extensive with that of the "sons." And here again the exigencies of human nature are in harmony with the behests of the Bible. The boy's voice is one in an imperfect condition, without any real body of tone, and wanting in that which is the great charm of vocalization, the utterance of feeling. Without the women-soprano, a choir, however numerous, is divested of that most beautiful characteristic, the tone of the sex. Nothing can make up for its absence, nothing can supply its variety, its richness, its magnificence. The choir on Thursday night was every way excellent as to character and degree, but utterly wanting in that brilliancy and loveliness—that sweet ring which proceeds from the throats of women-singers.

In advocating the revival of the use of the orchestra and of a numerous trained body of choral voices, we may appeal to the glorious services to be heard in the Netherlands and in both Southern and Northern Germany.

Something has been said touching the Protestantism of this remarkable service. The only distinctive variation of the Lutheran form of service from that of the old Church consists in the introduction of the Hymns and Chorals as an act of common or congregational worship. Luther was determined to make his new Office Book a book for common worship, a book for the people, containing music the people could and ought to sing. The congregational hymn tunes in the great work of Sebastian Bach were not sung by the congregation in Westminster Abbey. There was good reason for the silence of the congregation; but we trust the time is coming when the "Passion" of Bach will be rendered in its right way, and that the congregation may take their just co-operation in the task. The chorals were well and beautifully given by the choir, but the weight of congregational tone and the effect on the spirit of some three thousand worshippers joining in the expression of song was not there. But this is to come; and come it will.

Westminster Abbey has witnessed Sebastian Bach in the expression of the passion of grief; it remains that Bach should be heard there in the passion of joy. His Eastertide and Christmas music will do this.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 6, 1871.

The Musical Festival.

The hum of preparation and of expectation has for some time filled the air for many miles around, and music lovers from all parts of the Union are setting their faces towards this musical Mecca which is called "the hub." For on Tuesday next, May 9, begins the Second Triennial Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society, which will last through the week, embracing nine great Concerts (five) of Oratorio, and four of Symphony, &c., ending with Handel's "Messiah" on Sunday evening. The whole affair will be on as great a scale, and even greater, than that of 1868,—which is not a matter of so much importance,—but what is more to the purpose than either scale or quantity, it bids fair to outdo the former Festival in quality, both of selection and performance, as much as that outdid all earlier attempts here in America. The chorus numbers over 700 voices, properly balanced and of better average quality than heretofore; and the work of rehearsal has gone on steadily and earnestly all winter long, under the animating, thorough drill of CARL ZERRAHN, at first once a week, then twice, three times, and just now almost every evening of the seven. The Orchestra will include that of our own Harvard Concerts, with many of the best musicians of the Philharmonic and Thomas's Orchestras of New York, others from Philadelphia, &c., to the number of one hundred. The list of principal vocalists is as follows:

Soprani: Mme. RUDERSDORFF, than whom no soprano for a dozen years has shown herself more thoroughly qualified ("fertig" as the Germans would say) for the Oratorio tasks of the Birmingham and London festivals; besides Mrs. J. HOUSTON WEST and Mrs. H. M. SMITH, whose merits are well known of all.

Contralti: Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, Miss ANNIE L. CARY, and Miss ANTOINETTE STERLING:—a noble list, but it would be still nobler if it included Mrs. BARRY.

Tenori: Mr. WM. H. CUMMINGS, expressly from London, and Mr. WM. J. WINCH.

Bassi: Mr. MYRON W. WHITNEY, Mr. J. F. RUDOLPHSEN, and Mr. J. F. WINCH,—all of Boston, and hardly to be beaten.

Miss ANNA MEHLIG and Miss MARIE KREBS are engaged as Solo Pianists. (Unfortunately M. Vieuxtemps was not to be had to play Beethoven's violin Concerto; well, it would have been good, but there was danger, on the other hand, of too much riches). Mr. ZERRAHN, of course, conducts the whole, and Mr. B. J. LANG presides at the Great Organ, all whose 5,700 pipes have recently been tuned up to the reigning concert pitch, so that there will be no more lack of the entente cordiale between orchestra and organ.

It remains to indicate the several stations in the round of the week's pilgrimage, at each of which the devotee will pause and find a new refreshment for his soul.

I. On Tuesday afternoon, the Opening. First, Nicolai's Festival Overture (which has done like service in several of our Festivals before) on Luther's Choral: "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." We trust that, in the next festival, it will be Bach's Cantata on that subject; but this will show the whole choral and orchestral force with an imposing splendor. Then, for a novel and most beautiful effect, the singing by the vast choir, unaccompanied, of Mendelssohn's part-song, "Farewell to the Forest"; then the "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and finally, for the main feature, Mendelssohn's Symphonic Cantata, "The Hymn of Praise," which never fails to be inspiring. On this occasion Mme. Rudersdorff and Mr. Cummings make their first appearance before an America public, and Miss Cary will be welcomed back.

II. Wednesday Afternoon. First Orchestral and Vocal Concert. Principal orchestral pieces: the light and lively Symphony in G, by Haydn, and the heavy "Les Preludes" by Liszt. Miss Mehlig will play a Concerto, we suppose, and Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Phillipps and Miss Cary will contribute Arias and Songs.

III. Wednesday Evening. Oratorio: "Elijah." Mme. Rudersdorff, Mrs. West, Miss Phillipps, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Whitney for the Prophet.

IV. Thursday Afternoon. Second Concert: the great Schubert Symphony in C, and other great works; Piano Solos by Miss Krebs; Songs by Mme. Rudersdorff and Miss Cary.

V. Thursday Evening. Handel's sublime Oratorio, to be given for the first time here in its completeness and after full and careful preparation: "Israel in Egypt." In this, if all well founded hopes are realized in the performance, the choral enterprise of Boston will reach a higher tide-mark than it has yet left on record. We have given extended descriptions of this great Handelian mountain chain of choruses on former occasions when the work has been attempted here; but doubtless now it will explain itself.

VI. Friday Afternoon. Concert. Part I. Unfinished Symphony (B minor), Schubert; Songs by Miss Sterling and Mr. Cummings. Part II. Ninth (Choral) Symphony of Beethoven, the quartet of solo singers to consist of Mrs. Smith, Miss Sterling, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, and Mr. Rudolphsen. The great mass of the Handel and Haydn chorus really love to sing this work, trying as it is to voices; it is one of their sure triumphs.

VII. Saturday Afternoon. Concert. Beethoven's Fifth (C minor) Symphony; Singing by Miss Phillipps; Piano Solos by Miss Mehlig.

VIII. Saturday Evening. Selections from Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music, and Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," entire; both for the first time in this country.

This beginning upon the Passion Music of Bach, the greatest work of the greatest of all composers of religious music, is an important step in the history of the Society, although they only give sections, amounting in all to perhaps a fourth part of the whole work. Doubtless it is the wiser way to master and present now only the more practicable portions of it; these, we have no doubt, will interest the audience, as they have already interested the singers, and the whole task will after this appear less formidable. The selections include: 1) a very few passages of the Recitative, or Gospel narrative, on which the whole is based, (for a Tenor voice, according to the tradition of the Passion service, but with the words of Jesus by a Bass voice). Among them, however, is the unspeakably tender story of the Supper; that in which Jesus says: "My soul is sorrowful"; and that where "He fell down on His face and prayed: My Father, if it be possible," &c.

2) Three of the unaccompanied Chorales, which represent the participation of the worshipping congregation in the service. These are: the first in the work, prompted by Christ's first announcement that he is betrayed to be crucified: "Say, sweetest Jesu," (Herrlichster Jesu, was hast Du verbrochen); then one which follows the prediction of the denial by Peter: "I will stay here beside Thee"; and, near the end and consummation of the tragedy, the old hymn, "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden" ("O Head all bruised and wounded");—the same melody with the last, but presented in a new light by Bach's wonderful skill in four-part harmony.

3) Of the third, or reflective, element, which enters into the composition of the great work, namely, the Arias for solo voices and the great Choruses with orchestra, the following have been selected:

No. 9 and 10. The Alto Recitative: "Thou dear Redeemer" and Aria: "Grief and pain" (Miss Sterling), which are the comment of the pious heart upon the story of the woman with the ointment. Both have the simple accompaniment of two flutes with string quartet, as in the Symphony Concert a few months since.

Nos. 25 and 26. (After "My soul is sorrowful"). The wonderful Tenor Recitative: "O grief" (Mr. Winch), with intermittent strains of that first Choral melody, now to the words: "Why must Thou suffer," &c., and harmonized with wonderful suggestiveness; the whole profoundly beautiful and touching. Then the Aria: "I'll watch with my dear Jesu always," alternating with soft, rich choral strains: "So slumber shall our sins befall," &c.

Nos. 28 and 29. Bass Recitative: "The Saviour falls before his Father kneeling," and Aria: "Gladly will I, all resigning, Cross nor bitter cup declining, Drink in my Redeemer's name," &c. (Mr. Whitney).

No. 33. Duet for Soprano and Alto: "Alas! my Jesus now is taken," with interjectory chorus: "Leave Him, bind him not!" and followed by the indignant and terrific outburst of double chorus: "Ye lightnings, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanished!"

The above pieces include the greater portion of the First Part, the principal omissions being the immense double chorus at the opening: "Come, ye daughters, weep for anguish," and the final chorus, in form of figured Chorale: "O Man, bewail thy sin so great"; besides a couple of Soprano Arias, two or three short choruses of Jews and Disciples, and most of the narrative Recitative.

From the Second Part only two pieces have been taken, besides the Choral: "O Head," &c.; namely:

No. 47. The Aria with Violin Solo—most beautiful of all—"Erbarme dich" ("Have mercy, O my God"), commonly given to the Alto, but this time to be sung by Mme. Rudersdorf.

No. 78. The concluding Double Chorus of the disciples at the tomb of Jesus: "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping,"—a heavenly strain of tears and peace and rest.

A fourth element in the work, which adds vastly to the vivid reality of the scenes, and here entirely omitted, consists in those fierce choruses of the Jewish crowd, such as "Crucify him," which in the old Catholic Passion service were called Turbe, vulgarly mob choruses.

All the Arias and Choruses, which are given at all, will have Bach's wonderfully expressive orchestral accompaniments, as completed sometimes from the figured bass by Robert Franz.

IX. Sunday Evening. Closing Oratorio: "The Messiah," with Mme. Rudersdorf, Mrs. Houston West, Miss Phillips, Mr. Cummings and Mr. Whitney.

Verily a great week of music now invites us! How shall we be able to report the half of it?

Concerts.

The fortnight past has offered more, mostly in small halls, than we have room to barely mention. But we must not omit, at all events, to make some sign of grateful acknowledgment, in behalf of hundreds of invited and delighted guests, for the rare feast given us in Horticultural Hall, on Tuesday evening, April 25, by some thirty gentlemen of the MENDELSSOHN GLEE CLUB, of New York. It was a graceful act on their part. The hall was entirely filled by musical families and friends of the singers, and the invitations would have been much more general but for the limits of the hall. The company was of the most refined, and the whole thing had an air of ease and elegance as of a private drawing room. The singers were a modest, quiet, gentlemanly set, who mingled socially with their guests between the parts, and one chief beauty of their singing was that no one seemed in the least to think of putting himself forward personally, but each sought only to promote the purest harmony of all. The average quality of voices was very fine, there being not less than half a dozen pure high tenors among them, mostly light, but very sweet and musical. Their Conductor, Mr. MOSETHAL, is evidently a superior man, and the influence of a true musician is felt in the perfect ensemble, the beautiful precision, light and shade, and true expression of the whole. Better part-singing by male voices we have never heard than the specimens here given by this club of amateurs. Here we heard, with the larger volume of a choir of thirty, the same perfection of which we have had example in the eight or ten voices of our own "Chickering Club."

The pieces sung by the Club were "Welcome, Joy," by Gregor; "Silent Night," by Weber; "Parting," by Jansen; "Love and Wine," Mendelssohn; a very interesting "Ritornello," for five parts, by Schumann; and a "Serenade," by Abt; besides several encore pieces. Miss STERLING found enthusiastic audience for her songs (Cansonetta, by Mozart; No. 15 of Schumann's "Dichterliebe" cycle; and an English ballad by Sullivan); never have we heard her rich voice tempered to such true expression. Mr. MILLS, also, contributed some admirable piano playing: three characteristic little Schumann pieces, and a most brilliant "Waltz Caprice d'après Strauss" by Taubert. It was altogether one of the most charming musical treats of the season, and we only wish we were sure that we had something as good to send them in return. Would New York, perhaps, accept some of our big "Jubilee," of which we have enough and to spare.

Two more LISTEMANN QUARTETS matinees completed the series. The third began with Mozart's perfect Quartet in E flat, No. 4, which was finely rendered, and closed with a Quartet in A, No. 2, op. 90, by Raff, which we found far less edifying. For Violin Solo, Mr. L. played Tartini's "Trille du Diable" Sonata, and exceedingly well. Miss F. G. PERBY sang Mozart's "Deve sono" and Schubert's "Post," with good voice and style, though not much animation.

The fourth concert opened with a very fresh, fantastic, Northern sort of Quartet, the Op. 1 of a young Dane or Swede, named Svendsen. It was much enjoyed. Mrs. H. E. H. CARTER, having a sweet, high, flexible soprano, contributed some fair vocalism in a song by Sponholtz, and Eckart's "Echo Song." Beethoven's Quartet in F, first of the Razoumowsky set, was an excellent thing to end the series.—These concerts must be given earlier in the season next time, for they are worthy of the best attendance.

Mr. PERABO was particularly happy in his selections, as well as his interpretation in his second matinee: Schubert's Sonata, op. 142 (F minor); a graceful "Rondo Piacetole" by Sir Sterndale Bennett; an interesting Andante and Scherzo, arranged by himself, from the D-minor symphony by Volkmann; a Preludium, Menuett and Toccata, op. 13, by Anton Krause; and Beethoven's Six Variations on an original theme, op. 34.

The third matinee opened with a Beethoven Sonata, (in D, op. 10), in which the solemn grandeur of the Largo movement was most impressively brought out. Mendelssohn's fairy Scherzo d'Capriccio (F sharp minor); a fine Andante, arranged from the unfinished Symphony, op. 11, by Norbert Burgmüller; and the splendid Sonata in D, op. 53, by Schubert, completed another rich and satisfactory programme. The young artist never had the sympathy of his large audience more fully than in these concerts.

The last concerts by the four young pianists (pupils of Mr. LANG) two more Piano Recitals by Miss MARIE KREBS, Mr. DIXEY's pleasant and successful evening of music in aid of the Art Museum, Mr. THAYER's first Free Organ Recital (Bach, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Handel), and several other concerts, worthy, all, of notice, have to wait a fortnight longer! Man is finite, and our capacity even of hearing all the good things which invite one in such crowded times is limited. Bad luck it was that robbed us of Miss Krebs's performance of Bach's "Italian Concerto."

The Late Rev. Joseph Angier.

[Remarks of Rev. JOHN WHEAT at his funeral in Milton, April 15, 1871.]

I remember so many pleasant days spent with our friend and brother who has gone, at home, or standing with him in the sea's breath, whose murmurs he made me forget with a more subduing voice, that I hardly dare speak lest friendly appreciation should transgress the limit of modesty, and I should affront that pale face with the fault of eulogy which he liked least of all. No man was more generous than he with praise, no man advanced so few pretensions. His nature was delicate and noble, founded upon purity, illustrated by sincerity. He had that greatest virtue of sincerity, and it always came quickly to arm a very critical moral opinion. For if he ever became aware that impurity was in his neighborhood, or some untruthfulness, he would turn his back upon it with a gesture so abrupt that it was converted into heat, but it was wholesome and refreshing. Some persons could note his petulance who were too coarse to credit its scrupulous and gentlemanly origin. This warmth and scorn of disposition was an excellence more often than a defect. In the place where he is to-day he prefers to have me use the word defect. But, if sometimes he had to blame himself, I think that others might more frequently extol. And I am sure, if dead hands could ever be lifted from coffins to extend a reconciling touch, his would be the first to shake off that marble coldness and beckon to our generosity.

No man's mind was ever more thoroughly cleared of cant, no man was more sensitive to the commission of cant, or treated it with a more pardonable discourtesy. But he had real beliefs, not to be paraded, but nourished quietly, in that Divine Person whose warm hand holds him safe to-day, in that Person's love, in the excellence of truth, and in personal immortality. Is there anything of belief that you can add to this—anything of much consequence? His whole nature came simply and modestly to the surface in his preaching, which had a level that never lifted into any striking peculiarity either of fancy or speculation, for he depended mainly upon a recommendation of plain and salutary sentiments. He never tried to enhance it with phrases, to add a cubit to its stature. Nor was he ever anxious to enforce a creed. I remember that in his prime he had a style which was the expression of a harmonious taste that prevailed in everything he did. What he was in the scenes of your private experience it is not for me to say. Who can explore that domain of intercourse between a pastor and the fluttering flock of hearts that expect his coming? Doubtless there are many yet left in this parish, and who may be here, to recall how pleasantly he went up and down these hillsides fertile with growth and with men and women, listening for the hours when life or death knocked at the door. His sympathizing hand opened it, hushed the pain enter, but checked its turbulence. Your hearts must be the chroniclers and interpreters of this. No man can go back of the heart, or tell it any news of such experience. But wherever he went he carried a genial clime. Young people were especially fond of him, and this art of attaching them was always fresh in his enfeebled frame.

So, early one spring morning, when God was hinting newness of life over all the earth, he fell asleep, softly as the lately released Neponset underneath his window went lapsing to the sea. What a precious seed is the human body, that can stir and throb for two and sixty years, though the nerves are exasperated with a subtle illness and the whole temper overclouded by debility, as the man struggles to set free his germ of immortality! So that the bare being alive, with personal identity linking all the hours, is a proof of the primeval and costliest kind that we shall continue to be; especially if the person have, as our friend had, some pre-eminent gift. Not that a gift is necessary to support the fact of personal continuance; it seems to me that plain-dealing is good enough for that—any superiority of ordinary minds. Nothing so convinces us of the boundless air as these innumerable common breaths we draw. But still a gift is a symbol; it makes the idea become pictorial; the senses are attracted and delighted; they are subsidized, and have to conspire against their own mortality. Such a gift was our friend's exquisite sensibility for harmony, his perception of melody and power to give it expression by that most delicate yet commanding voice. Indeed, of all the gifts, there is not one to compare with this, not one function of earth like harmony, to import such a suspicion of personal continuance into our poor life. For just as God put evil into the world to feed his ultimate purpose, harmony prepares discords to resolve them into perfect accords, so that a dissonance becomes prelude and hint of a completer marriage. Music is the creature's earnest expectation; with it we can afford to wait for the manifestation of the sons of God. Music is continually saying, "Not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality may be swallowed up of life." It is prophecy, perceiving that not here, not in these limits of partial chords and grating combinations, is there an opportunity for the soul's confirmed expression. Harmony is a guaranty to every man of the continuance of his opportunity: it is a proclamation of some great symmetrical plan. In his mature days, and long after disease had begun to sap his strength, his organ was the wonder of every one who felt its sweet and firm vibrations. He rivalled the quality of famous names, and would have plucked dangerously at their laurels. How his mood of tenderness stilled the circle; how he shivered with pain, thrilled with triumph; how he tossed us the quaint and homely phrase of some people's dear air; how we all came together in his "Dulce, dulce domum!" And here are his classmates who can recall well enough how he sent the brave blood of friendship flashing through the chain of hands that met for Auld Lang Syne.

The time of the singing of birds has come, but that voice is mute, that flattering tongue is cold. No, not so, dear friends, I am faithless to my subject when I say so; let me recall that, for I am sure that the fibre and quality of his musical soul, which built the tongue and freighted it with such expressiveness, is even now allied with some finer substance of the universe, and sings the joy of living. The tongue is not yet cold. Death waves its staff; the movement releases ampler measures, the feeling musters toward some solution; his surmises and anxieties break into the rapture of personal security.

Then, as we bury him, and yield all right of possession in him to the spring flowers, let us have a fair confidence that he intones the praises of immortal life.

Musical Correspondence.

HARTFORD, CONN., APRIL 19.—On looking over the index for Volume XXX. in your last number, I was sorry to find so slender a record of musical events in this State. The love of the divine art, however, has not been slumbering, nor sleeping. Crowded houses and enthusiastic audiences have greeted all the great artists that have honored us with their presence, particularly the entertainments given by Theodore Thomas. This splendid Orchestra has been listened to with the greatest delight. Their programmes have been similar to those given by him in Boston, and I question whether in your city, so justly famed for its love of the classic, Beethoven's Symphonies have ever been more thoroughly enjoyed than in the city of Hartford.

Next to the Thomas Concerts in importance, have been those by Mlle. Nilsson. Her first was secular, and drew a five thousand dollar house; the second was in Oratorio, and given in connection with the Beethoven Society; the pecuniary receipts thereof, as well as the audience, being very large.

The Beethoven Society is in the thirteenth year of its existence, and is now in splendid working order; their faithful study and singing of Handel's, Haydn's, Beethoven's, Mendelssohn's, Spohr's and Costa's Oratorios, proves how industrious they have been, and how well they have earned the reputation of being second only to the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, and even to that only in point of numbers. The credit is due to the able and skilful teacher and director, Dr. J. G. Barnett. It is therefore hardly necessary to say that the time-honored "Messiah" was splendidly given by the Beethoven Society under the conducting of Dr. Barnett. The singing of the grand chorus was truly sublime. Mlle. Nilsson, unfortunately, was not in good voice or spirits, and therefore did not satisfy the audience; but the solos of Miss Annie Cary and your noble basso, Mr. Whitney, were little short of perfection.

There have also been other musical entertainments all tending to advance and further a love for the science in our community. The churches in the city and vicinity do much to stimulate a taste for good music. Some of the pastors also, take great interest in the choir, and the result is that music can be heard which has the character of true devotion,—a pouring out of the heart in sacred song.

It may interest your readers to know how music in some of the churches in Connecticut is conducted. I will therefore mention one example. It is a church in which the music is under the sole direction of the Organist, Dr. J. G. Barnett, and consists both of choir and congregational singing. In this church also they have frequently a service of song, in which the congregation take an active part, singing hymns of praise; and the choir, which numbers twenty-four, with four fine voices for the Solos, performs Motets, extracts from Oratorios and other sources. The object is to make the people familiar with a high class of devotional music, and thus elevate their tastes. The scheme is attended with the most happy results. At these gatherings I have heard several short Cantatas, amongst them "The Christian's Supplication," "The Life of the Blessed," composed by Dr. Barnett for the choir. On Sunday last I listened to his last effort, a work having for its subject "Christ's Resurrection and Ascension." The incidents are described by air and chorus linked together by a series of narrative passages delivered in recitative. These Recitatives are models in construction, from the fact that they are melodies based upon rich and varied harmonies. The character of our Saviour, Mary Magdalen, and the faithless Thomas are intensely individualized. The music is full of feeling, and truthful expression, and so admirably fitted to the words that it seems to be their very echo. The scene with the Disciples immediately before the Ascension: "Peace be unto you," "Feed ye my sheep,"—the music of which is very pathetic and impressive—was listened to with the most profound attention, and as the voice of the singer in subdued accents breathed forth the words: "And now I ascend to my Father in heaven," every heart throbbed in sympathy, and seemed to follow the risen Saviour to the gates of Heaven. Dr. Barnett's music is deeply imbued with the spirit of religion, simple, melodic, yet full of character, and contains all those traits which are accepted as the evidence of a deeply inspired musician's intentions. The Cantata, or short Oratorio, was admirably and expressively sung, and as accompanied by himself upon a magnificent organ, the tone and combination found a language suggestive, with singular delicacy, clearness, and force, of the sublime subject. It is to be regretted that Dr. Barnett does not give up his teaching, and make an effort to have some of his many useful works, written for church purposes and small societies, published. I am confident that they would be received with very great favor by choir and musical organizations in the country, and supply the material that is now very much needed. Dr. Barnett's works have all the elements of popularity, very melodic and simple in construction, and are admirably fitted to the voice and intelligence of the singer. Written and arranged to words of a marked character, they have an intensity of meaning, that interests and enlists the sympathies of the singer, and thus by their truthful and natural expression appeals to the heart of the listener.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- "Tis but a Lock of Hair. F to c. E. Christie. 30
"Tis but a lock of hair she left me,
When angels bore her far away,
O, how I love that simple treasure
That brings me still one glimpse of May."
- Au Revoir, Louise. 3. Eb to d. T. J. Lippitt. 35
This song, written with French words, by Mlle. Panseron, has been nicely arranged and fitted with English words, and was one of the attractions of the recent French fair. A fine French song.
- The Beggar Boy. 2. F to d. F. Campana. 30
One of the series "Souvenir of London," and while it retains its Italian and English words and is an "Italian" song, it is a very easy one, and well fitted for the first study of the kind.
- Chiquita. (Bret Harte). 3. G to e. F. Boott. 30
Upon the Stanislaw. "2. G to d. " 40
"Then Brown he read a paper, and he reconstructed there,
From those same bones an animal that was extremely rare;
And Jones, he asked the chair for a suspension of the rule,
Till he could prove that these same bones was one of his lost uncles."
- Easy and good melodies. Who will adopt these singular efforts for concert songs? They will be very effective.
- Darkly the Shadows press on my Eyes. 2. F to c. H. B. Farnie. 30
"Ah! now there breaks a dawn afar, Streaming from out the 'gates ajar!'"
Good sacred song.
- Thy Will be done! Solo and Quartet. 3. E to G. O. Lob. 40
One of Lob's six quartets. Add it to your list. Well worth singing.
- She's just about the age. 2. D to d. S. Franks. 30
Comic. Pretty melody.
- Baby and I want to kiss you good-bye. 2. Eb to c. W. O. Perkins. 30
"If you must go, said the wife drawing nigh, Baby and I want to kiss you good-bye."
And it did him "lots of good. Very pretty little poem, and excellent song.

Instrumental.

- Happy Memories. Rondo. 3. Bb. W. Busenius. 35
Good instructive piece.
- Road to Luck. Grand Galop de Concert. Chas. Wels. 4. Ab. 2 hands. 60
3. Ab. 4 " 1.00
A very powerful and brilliant piece. The "single" arrangement is full of octaves, but easy to persons with an "octave" grasp.
- 2d. Marche Hongroise. 6. G. F. Liszt. 75
Of the same character as the preceding, only immensely "more so." Quite simple in construction, but rendered difficult by the rapid succession of thirds, octaves, tenths and chords, and the abundance of "springs." Very effective.
- German Triumphal March through Paris. 3. G. E. Pabst. 40
Very full and inspiring. Contains the singular arrangement of the "Marsellaise" in minor, the French air in mourning, contrasted with bright German airs.
- Virginia Military Institute March. 2. D. C. M. Stephens. 30
Sprightly melody. A quick march.
- Sparkling Sc'ottische. 3. F. J. R. Muth. 30
The title sufficiently describes it.
- Julie. Mazurka Brillante. 5. C. C. Kölling. 30
May be called a "Concert Mazurka." Has many original effects and is excellent practice for the left as well as the right hand.

Books.

- MESSA SOLENNELLE. For Four Voices. L. Niedermeyer. 1.25
Niedermeyer, a friend and protégé of Rossini's, has produced a very graceful and interesting work, which shows decided talent and taste in the composer. Well worth adding to the library of musical societies and choirs.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 786.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 4.

Opera and the Art of Singing.

BY CARL GLOGGNER-CASTELLI.

(Continued from page 17.)

III.

With the entrance of the Meyerbeer period, then, the taste of the great public was at length decidedly diverted from its exclusive idolatry for the Italian opera. Even the mass began to strip off the fetters of long habit, and give room to the thought that it is really absurd to "go to death" with trills and variations. Meyerbeer sought truth of expression in the union of all the means afforded by an effective manner of singing, and an expanded and finely elaborated instrumentation. His cantilena is of thrilling effect, the more so that he understands how to treat the human voice in an exceedingly effective manner. To be sure he has not troubled himself to inquire how long the singer can endure the exertions which he demands of him. His operas are nearly as long again as the Italian; he requires of the voice a compass, a richness throughout, even in the highest registers, a power of endurance, only found in a few singers. Passage work, as such, Meyerbeer has written only exceptionally in his greatest operas; and whole pieces in this style only where the number happens to lie out of the course of the action, as, for example, the florid arias of Isabella in Robert, the aria of the Queen in the second act of the Huguenots, both of which may be regarded as it were as concert intermezzos. Meyerbeer had broken with the traditions of the Italian school, and created a new style for himself as German-French-Italian master.

The influence of his operas on the art of singing soon made itself felt. The singers, compelled to accommodate their voices and their manner of singing to the requirements of a new school, forgot the earlier method which had been respected as a model. The injurious consequences to the art of singing have come clearly enough to light: a pressing of all means into requisition; an unrelaxing and exhausting strain upon the highest energies; a vehemence of passion overstepping all æsthetic laws. Meyerbeer has on his conscience all this screaming and unlovely exaggeration of the effects of song; all this feverish excitement of the nerves in over-refined declamation; this abandonment of all naturalness and (even in the height of passion) artistic moderation of song. To the consequences of his direction must it be ascribed, that our singers no longer sing, but scream; that so many singers of the present time fall victims to this manner,—school it cannot be called, but rather a distorted image of the most beautiful in Art, for which Nature has given us such wonderful means.

"It gropes about my ears indeed,
But to the heart it goeth not!"

As in the opera Rossini was crowded out by Meyerbeer, so likewise in the field of singing a new man arose, who, like Meyerbeer, in spite of great personal attributes, worked destructively for the future, and whose influence upon the later manner of singing is seldom truly recognized. I mean the singer Duprez.

Hisssed off at first in Paris, he turned to Italy, where he staid several years, and then returned to the French capital. Gifted with a splendid tenor voice, he had become developed into a dramatic singer such as had not been known before. His recitatives, delivered with the fullest outlay of energetic declamation, found the liveliest echo in the French. When he came to use his magnificent vocal resources as he did in the Allegro of the Aria in the fourth act of Tell, the famous "Suivez moi" (commonly omitted on the German stage), where he brought out the high C in the chest voice with all the might of his colossal organ, it was all over with the fame of all his predecessors. Nourrit, till then the favorite of the Parisians, a distinguished tenor singer, recognized the rival's power. His day was over, and in despair over his lost and irrecoverable glory, he flung himself from an upper window down upon the pavement, and so made an end to his life.

Duprez may justly be considered one of the greatest dramatic singers of our time. His manner of singing was identical with the Meyerbeer style of grand opera, and the main features of his method soon spread themselves all over Europe. It possessed brilliant qualities enough to throw the old way of singing into the shade; but it did not last long, as singers soon became aware of its injurious influence upon the voice. Organs already ruined during the period of study, singers who had sacrificed their voices after two or three years of public singing, became from that time nothing rare. Most destructively, perhaps, have the consequences shown themselves among tenors. After hearing of Duprez, and how the chest register could be cultivated even into the highest regions of the voice, the public were no longer contented with the use of the falsetto. Soon it became one of the impossibilities to be engaged as a "heroic tenor," without at least possessing the high B flat in the chest tone. The singers found it a more thankful task to humor the taste of the public, than to pay exact regard to the intentions of the composer; for often Meyerbeer himself indicates, by pp, his design that the falsetto and not the chest tone should be employed. That every tenor singer, whether such high pressure suited his natural compass or not, strove to screw his voice up and make effect, was very natural; for Art goes after bread, and a high C with the chest voice ("Do di petto") often realizes an income of thousands to its fortunate possessor. Roger has made a laudable exception; his beautiful use of the falsetto certainly produces a more agreeable effect than the forced high chest tones so unnatural to the organ of many a singer. How wide-spread is this mistaken notion, that the use of the falsetto is entirely contrary to Art, we hear frequently enough in the expressions of individuals when some unlucky tenorist happens to get caught on one of these tabooed falsetto tones. Thus the school founded by Duprez, important in itself, has called into life a manner of singing the ruinous consequences of which we can see daily even now.

(Conclusion next time.)

A History of Opera.

BY C. SCHULZE.

(Continued from page 10.)

The Italians learned a great deal from their countryman Lully. Rossi and Corelli took the improvements in French opera to Italy, namely a more correct distribution of the separate divisions, as well as the limitation of vocal extravagancies. Most overtures were henceforward treated on the French model. The cumbersome Netherlandish style was gradually quite supplanted by that of Cassati and Melani in Rome; of Colonna in Bologna; of Bassani in Ferrara; of Stradella in Genoa; and of Legrenzi in Venice; of Leo, and, after him, Greco, Caldara, and Buononcini, in Naples. We must likewise mention Vinci, the model of our own Graun and Hasse, the perfecter of the obbligato recitative, i.e., the recitative vigorously supported by the orchestra; Pertti of Bologna; Porpora of Naples (died in 1767), for his expressive and genuinely artistic employment of the instruments; Rinaldo of Capua; and Pergolesi, whose skilful application of counterpoint, animation and fervor in duets, and sweet melody, excited universal envy among his fellows in art.

Instrumental music, also, had advanced some steps, a fact especially due to the schools of Corelli and Tartini. The first of these schools was distinguished by the simplicity and beauty of harmony and modulation, by contrast and art in imitation; the latter for practical experience in the construction and powers of the violin, for coyness, grace, and unity in the musical ideas. The art of accompaniment entered—thanks, also, to these schools—on a new stage of its career. The similar instruments in the orchestra had their especial places assigned to them; their playing was brought back to a more correct dynamic standard; the employment of them was regulated by greater attention to the purport of the text; and the direction of the orchestra was marked by greater precision. Hasse's instrumentation then held a high place in art.

With all these things, increasing virtuosity among the singers of both sexes went, of course, hand in hand. Singing schools were established in all the large towns of Italy, the most flourishing being, about 1690, those at Naples and Bologna; and Ferri of Perugia, one of the most famous teachers. Rousseau says, in his Dictionnaire de Musique, of this singer: he could run up and down, in one breath, two full octaves filled with shakes, and give correctly every chromatic note without an accompaniment. When he left the theatre, his carriage was strewed with roses; and when he entered a town, the people went to meet him, as though he had been a prince. A similar musical meteor was Carlo Broschi—surnamed Farinelli—of Naples, a pupil of Scarlatti, Porpora, and Bernacchi. He could execute in one breath passages lasting fifty seconds, and his voice was so strong that it completely smothered the sound of a trumpet. Of female singers, I will mention only Vittoria Tesi and Faustina Bordoni, subsequently the wife of the great Hasse.

Rameau was the first to improve upon the style of Lully, by combining the separate efforts and ameliorations of his predecessors. At the age of fifty he wrote, in 1734, his first opera, Hippolyte et Aricie, which proved an unusual success. By this opera, and his other twenty operas, he swayed for thirty years the French stage, for which he became a second Lully. As regards form, he returned to primitive Italian opera: the air, for instance, reappears as rondo; but, on the other hand, he especially raised the capability of expression by a more richly fashioned system of harmony and declamation.

His instrumentation is more polyphonic, especially in the choruses, and likewise more delicate, than Lully's. Although Hiller cannot see much that is good in Rameau's music; although Marpurgh thinks it deficient in natural melody; and although Mattheson would send it to the Iroquois Indians, Rameau must be designated the first who strove to combine the melodious Italian with the declamatory French style. His endeavors divided Paris, from 1752 to 1754, into two hostile camps, that of the Buffonists, who exalted comic Italian opera above everything else, and the Anti-Buffonists, who preferred national French opera. The latter at last triumphed, and the Italians had to leave Paris. In consequence of this, opera comique was subsequently developed, side by side with grand opera, into a national production. In connection with this fact Grétry, a Fleming (1741—1818), the composer of about forty operas, must be especially mentioned. His Richard Cœur-de-Lion has been favorably received even very recently. As imitators of Grétry, I may name d'Alayrac (died in 1809); Catel (died in 1830); Berton (died in 1844); but more especially Isouard (died in 1818), the rival of Boieldieu, the composer of Cendrillon, an opera which was performed for more than one hundred successive nights in Paris, and made the round of Europe, and Jocunde, a work long popular in France and Germany.

But this combination, which Rameau endeavored to effect, of Italian and French opera is to be found in some German composers, who naturally exercised a material influence upon the foundation of a German opera. Among them was Steffani in Hanover (died in 1783); Küsser in Hamburg (died in 1727); and more especially Reinhard Keiser, also in Hamburg (died in 1739), the first great German operatic composer; furthermore, Handel (died in 1759); Mattheson (died in 1764); and Telemann (died in 1767), who all wrote for the Hamburg stage. Of these composers, Keiser, who possessed a fertile fancy, is favorably distinguished for pleasing and graceful melody and oratorically-musical accentuation. He was a genuine German composer, for, of his 116 operas, which for forty years, from 1694 to 1734, were the favorites of the Hamburg stage, not one was written to an Italian book, though German poetry was not then in a condition to provide a musician with particularly agreeable materials to work upon. The other Hamburg composers generally selected Italian books, or German adaptations of them. Even Handel could not permanently hold the public captive; he was deficient (?) in the idealistic element. His operas are a chain of airs connected by a thread of recitative, sparingly interrupted by choruses and stiff duets, without any truth in the personages or the situations, and without any logical consistency in the plots.

The Italian style was equally, or even more, cultivated by Hasse, in Dresden, who wrote fifty-two operas, and Graun, in Berlin, who wrote more than thirty, among which the first, Rodelinde, was composed, in 1742, for the Carnival in the latter capital.

Hasse's strength lay in the Susceptible and Emotional. He attached the highest value to bravura. But Graun's music excels Hasse's. It is far more dramatic, and his airs are, both melodically and harmonically, far more important.

Keiser made upon the Hamburg stage the laudable attempt to render comic opera something national. His efforts proved, however, a failure soon after the year 1740. The same fact must be recorded of the German opera opened at Mannheim in 1777, and of that started by Joseph II. at Vienna, in 1778; the latter collapsed as early as 1783. But thoroughly to transform the Italian style and guide it into a genuinely artistic path, was a task which only one man then understood, that man being Gluck, born 1714, died 1787. With him there began a new and bright feature in the musical drama—the earnest, ideal conception of it. Gluck's profound feeling and perseverance produced works which surpassed aught previously known.

In Vienna, where, since the commencement of the 17th century, Italian opera had grown into great favor, Gluck had enjoyed the opportunity of seeing many a sterling master's work admirably performed. Fux, Porfio, Caldara, Buononcini, and others, were engaged there. The celebrated Sammartini became his master in Milan. After staying in that city for four years, Gluck wrote, in 1741, his first opera, Artaserse, which soon spread his name about. During the five years following, he wrote operas for Milan, Venice, and Cremona; produced, 1746, in London, La Caduta de' Giganti, and then settled permanently in Vienna. He there composed industriously, but always after the Italian model. It was with Alceste, the book of which was supplied by Calsabigi, that, at the age of fifty-three, and after having already composed twenty operas, Gluck deliberately left the broad Italian highway, and entered upon a new path. Being more inclined to national French opera, he abandoned the Italian language, and had Racine's Iphigenie in Aulide arranged for him. It was produced, under the patronage of Marie Antoinette, at Paris, in 1774, and awoke, nay, worked up into fury, the slumbering party feud of the Buffonists and Anti-Buffonists.

On the 2nd August, in the same year, his transition opera, Orpheus, remodelled, was produced. Soon after this, he set out for Vienna. The Italian party profited by his absence to send to Naples for the celebrated Piccini, who certainly was very strong in comic opera, and a respectable composer generally, who was not equal to Gluck. The performances of Iphigenie en Tauride, in 1779 and 1781, were crowned with the most brilliant success, and considerably thinned the ranks of the hostile party.

Gluck at last remained the victor. The success achieved by Echo and Narcissus was not so great. Now, in what did the reforms consist which have caused Gluck to be reckoned among the greatest artists of our nation?

An opera is for Gluck a musical work of art, one and indivisible. The operatic stage is not a concert-room, and still less an arena for musical rope-dancers. The previous traditional musical forms were destined to undergo manifold alterations. The overture to Alceste already shows the thinking artist; instead of so much pretty toying on a fixed model, it contains significant thoughts in logical connection. Gluck's chorus is rather a genuine choral song. His air is closer and more rounded off than that of other composers. The declamation and the internal truth of the verbal expression are perfect. The harmonies are rich and dignified; the instrumentation is delicate and full of color. The music is subordinated to the text and the psychological truth of the action, and does not interrupt the song of the latter by a system of ornamentation. Gluck was and still is our master in heroic opera. Every person whose taste has not been ruined by modern musical caricatures, and Italian dalliance, still delights in Gluck. What two hundred years previously was attempted by the Florentine musical club of Bardi and Corsi, namely, to combine the spirit of antique tragedy with modern sentiment, that did the German master Gluck happily effect.* He was the creator of what is termed classical opera.

For the satisfaction of those gentlemen who, to show they know nothing of German, will constantly substitute "u" for "u" in the composer's name, we beg to show them, by citing the original of the above passage, in which Herr Schulze indulges in a sort of pun not to be rendered into English, where their pet disclaimer is correct: "das ist der deutsche Meister Gluck mit Gluck zu Stande gebracht."

[To be Continued.]

Music in our Public Schools.

A Paper Read at the Meeting of the American Social Science Association, April 3, 1871, by Dr. J. Baxter Upham.

(Concluded from page 19.)

In the lowest class in the grammar schools the pupil is rapidly led over the whole ground taken in his primary course, now and hence forward by reference to the musical characters; rote-teaching and rote-singing being for the most part abandoned.

The child is now expected to begin to read the notation of simple musical phrases at sight. I cannot better explain the progress and method of instruction in the lower grades of the grammar classes than by quoting the words of Mr. Holt, in his recent report of his doings, to Mr. Kichberg, and which appears as an appendix to the Semi-Annual Report of the Standing Committee on Music, under date of 20th December last. He speaks as follows:

"In my sixth class is commenced an intellectual study of the sounds of the scale.

"To illustrate: Children are taught to recognize any sound of the scale, by its scale name; as 1, 2, 3, 1, 4, 2, 5, 6, 5, 7, 8, &c.; and they will produce the same at the dictation of the teacher. This is to educate the ear.

"One or two minutes are spent in this exercise, which are followed by a representation of the sounds, thus:

which trains the eye together with the ear.

"Five minutes are spent in this way, each day, as a drill exercise, followed by practice upon the music charts. The result of this drill is remarkable. The ear becomes so well trained that children will go to the black-board and write the scale, or pitch-name, of any sounds given with the syllable la. This drill of single sounds is followed by Triad practice, after which the class is divided, an additional pointer used, and the pupil is trained in two-part harmony, thus:

"This is followed by the practice of two part songs upon the charts, together with the beating of the time; and, in addition to this, in the fifth and fourth classes, by the chromatic scale and a study of the keys which grow out of it, e. g.:

"And such has been the progress that children ten years of age will go to the black board and write the pitch of any progression of sounds which may be given in any of the sharp keys.

"I think it is safe to say that at the end of the school year the fourth class will have so practical a knowledge of all the nine different keys that they will sing correctly any choral, which may be written in any of those keys, at sight.

"The pupils become familiar with the position of each scale upon the staff, the same as in the key of C. To illustrate:

In the third or next higher class is introduced the study of the intervals, the chords and the triads.

At the end of this year the pupils can readily sing in plain three part harmonies, and should understand all the signs and characters used in musical composition, and be able to comprehend and read at sight any of the music found in our ordinary collections of psalmody. This, as I said at the outset, is as far as I think it expedient, for the present, to carry these illustrations, since it covers the most important part of the ground to be occupied in the general introduction of a system of musical teaching in the common schools of the land. Thus much, then, for musical instruction as it is given in the Boston public schools. The question now returns: Can such instruction be made available, at a moderate expense, in our public schools generally throughout the country? And if so, How? and at what cost?

An essential element in the plan of such teaching, as we have seen, is this: that it be given mainly by the regular school teachers, with the aid and general direction only of a professional teacher. We have seen that a single professional teacher can superintend the instruction of a large number of pupils,—just how many will depend upon circumstances. The number may be more or less, according to the density of the population, and to the general ability of the corps of regular teachers employed. In a city like this, where, we may perhaps say without boasting, that the standard of qualification is high, from 100 to 240 schools or classes, representing 8000 to 12,000 pupils, can thus be taught.

In the neighboring cities of Salem and Lowell, and some others in this State, a single intelligent head has been found sufficient. The salaries might vary from $1000 or $1200 to $8000 per annum. My belief is that in towns and cities not exceeding a population of 40,000 to 60,000 inhabitants, or in rural districts where a group of smaller towns and villages of perhaps half this population in the aggregate exists, and which could all be conveniently visited in a circuit of a week or ten days' extent, a single professional teacher only would be required. And in the latter instance a competent man, who should be a resident of the district, ought to be had for $1200 per annum.

I take it for granted that all the regular teachers could do their part in such instruction if they would. It requires in the system we have been considering no special musical ability or previous training. An aptness to teach only is necessary, and any person who is fitted in other respects to hold the responsible position as a teacher in a public school has the ability, I contend, to learn in a very short time (under the direction of a competent professional head, such as we have named) how to teach the elements of music as well as the other studies required in our common schools. Nor is it necessary that the teacher should be able to sing in order to be successful in this branch of study, though of course it is an aid. On this point says Mr. Holt in his report to the Music Committee in 1869, "In the short time within which music has been regularly and systematically taught in the classes under my charge, only seven out of the two hundred and fifty-one teachers who have come under my observation have proved themselves unable to do their work satisfactorily. Of these seven, three exchange work with other teachers at the time of the music lesson, one employs a teacher from outside to aid her in this part of her work, who is present at the time of my visit to receive my instructions, while in three rooms the work is imperfectly done. With regard to the progress made in different classes," continues Mr. Holt, "it varies in proportion to the faithfulness of the teacher. I find that teachers who are regarded as superior in other branches, obtain the best results in music. And many of my best teachers are among those who had no idea that they could do anything in music when we commenced. . . . I visit each of the two hundred and fifty-one teachers with their classes once in every four weeks; in this way I am able to help every teacher over any difficulty she may encounter, and to shape my instructions to the wants of each class."

Says Mr. Philbrick in his report, to which I have already alluded, "The improvement in the method of teaching music has very naturally helped the improvement of the methods of handling the other branches. As a general rule, teachers in an elementary school who teach one branch well, teach all branches well."

The cost of musical teaching to any city or town, or to a group of towns situated as I have said, having an aggregate population of say 20,000 inhabitants (one-fifth of whom may be reckoned to be of the school age), ought not to exceed the sum of $1250 per annum, and would be made up as follows:

The salary of the professional teacher, say, $1,200 00
A Set of Charts, with Standard complete, for each school (say for 80 schools, with an average of 50 pupils each, $11 25 x 80 = $800); which should last with careful treatment, six years ($800 ÷ 6) 150 00

Making, as above $1,350 00

The manual for the teacher, as also the pitch-pipe, is not included in the above expense, it being supposed that each teacher would desire to purchase and possess them. And with this manual in the hands of the teacher, the charts and the blackboard, I believe that up to the age I have indicated text books in music may be dispensed with altogether.

If to this be added the cost of a pitch pipe and a copy of the "Teacher's Manual" (explaining the use of the charts) for each school, the cost (on the supposition that these, like the charts, would last by careful usage six years) would be increased by $26.67—making a total of $1376.67, or a trifle over 84 cents for each scholar per annum.

With such simple addition to the mechanism of our common school system of education, and at so slight expense, an elementary knowledge of music could be diffused throughout the country. What variety and interest it would give to the dull routine of every day school work! What sunshine and gladness it would infuse into the homes and hearts of the people!

Obituary.

DANIEL FRANCOIS ESPRIT AUBER.

Auber, one of the most distinguished musical composers that France has produced, died in Paris yesterday, at the advanced age of 87 years. He was born at Caen, Jan. 29, 1784, and when a boy evinced a passionate taste for music. At the age of 20 he was sent to London to study business, but, finding it utterly distasteful, returned to Paris and devoted himself more than ever to his favorite art. He composed some pieces which were received with applause in private circles, but, feeling convinced of the importance of assiduous study, he placed himself under the tuition of Cherubini, and in 1813 appeared before the public in an opera entitled, Sejour Militaire, which was not a success. He was discouraged, and for some years did not contribute to the theatres, but, fortunately for the world and his own fame, the death of his father in embarrassed circumstances compelled him to devote himself to his art as a means of support, and in 1819 he produced at the Opera Comique Le Testament et les Billets-doux, an opera in one act. This was also unfavorably received, but undeterred by the ungenerous comments of critics, he wrote La Bergère Chétivaine, which was produced in the same theatre in the early part of the year 1820, and entirely reversed the public verdict regarding his merits. The history of the succeeding half century of his life presents a succession of triumphs. All his grace, spirit, and dramatic power appeared in the opera just named, which, with Emma, ou la Promesse imprudente, produced the following year, founded the brilliant reputation he enjoyed. From that time forward he produced a great number of works, some of which are the most successful operas now represented upon the stage. An imitator of Rossini at the outset, he gradually acquired greater independence of style, and in Masaniello, in which his genius reached its culminating point, he ventured to form a style of his own, to which he afterwards steadily adhered. In addition to the works mentioned, Le Cheval de Bronze, Fra Diavolo, Le Domino Noir, Les Diamants de la Couronne, L'Elisir d'Amour, Le Dieu et la Bayadère, Gustave, La Sirène, and Haydée, are among his most popular operas, and will immortalize his genius. Many of them have been translated into English and German, and almost all into Italian, and their melodies are known all over the civilized world. He continued until a few years ago a vigorous and successful writer for the stage.

The characteristics of Auber's music are sprightliness, grace, and great clearness and simplicity in their dramatic effects. His combinations are ingenious, if not profound, and his melodies simple, and often tender, although rarely pathetic. He succeeded best in buffo operas, for which Scribe furnished him with admirable librettos, and which are models of light and graceful composition. Among his last compositions, exclusive of those for the stage, was a March for the opening of the London Exposition of 1862. He received many marks of regal and imperial favor in France.—N. Y. Tribune, 15th.

SIGISMUND THALBERG.

[From the Weekly Review, New York.]

The announcement of the death of this great pianist, recalls in us a time which was a golden one for all virtuosos. Europe was lying prostrate at the feet of those who could amuse the people. The governments fostered this sentiment. In France the bourgeoisie reigned supreme, and every means was employed to delight this important and influential class of society. Theatres, concerts and balls were the centre of attraction. A singer, a player, a dancer of unusual merit, became a great historical moment. Germany echoed this sentiment. There society took its life from Paris. People danced to the life played in the French capital. A new opera, a new overture, a new prima donna, created the only possible sensation. Heroes were only those who could play the piano and the violin. It was the time when Ernst, with his "Elegy," was able to make people weep. Performers with long hair and pale faces were the accepted benefactors of society. It was at this time that Thalberg won his laurels. His pianism was the wonder of the day. When he came forward with his fantasia on "Moses," the public imagined there were two persons who played the pianoforte. Even pianists thought so, when he first played in a back room of a well known manufacturer in Paris; the critics talked of an innovation. Yet the thing was old, the germ of the system could be found in Beethoven's Sonatas. The clever pianist simply enlarged the principle laid down by the great master. He made the whole keyboard speak in his own methodical and scholarly manner. The effect at least at that time was unprecedented, especially when the author himself was the interpreter. And indeed nobody else could play like him.

He had the most beautiful touch together with the most marvellous technics. When he came to us in New York years ago, his powers were considerably worn. But at the time of his glory thirty years ago his playing was perfection. Alas, this very quality made it dry and monotonous. It was impossible to listen to him for any length of time. He lacked imagination and inspiration. His operas, his sonatas, prove this sufficiently. He was at the piano, what he was in life, a perfect gentleman. Emotional powers he had none. There was no change in his appearance from the time he sat down at the piano to the time he left it. He never became excited, even in the hottest days he could not even perspire. To him the well known words of the old Austrian Emperor, addressed to Dreyachock, could not be applied: "Sir, I have heard a good many of your profession, but I never saw anybody perspire like you." His influence is gone, and we think there are but very few pianists who perform his fantasias in public. Yet his "L'Art du chant" may even now be used by teachers with good advantage. In conclusion let us say with the lady in Paris, who, when asked about the merits of the two pianists, who occupied the attention of the musical world at that time, exclaimed: "Thalberg is the greatest pianist, but Liszt is the only one."

Miss Vienna Demorest's Concert.

[From the New York Sun, April 14.]

Miss Vienna Demorest gave her first public concert at Steinway Hall on Wednesday evening. There has never within our remembrance been a singer who commenced her career under such a weight of praise. The press has teemed with the most extravagant compliments of her voice and her singing, and recently, in a magazine printed in this city, her portrait was published on the opposite page and face to face with that of Nilsson. The suggestion was that these were sisters in art; and, in fact, several papers have not hesitated in plain words to award the young singer an equal place with that held by the distinguished Swede.

Amid this general course of laudation, Miss Demorest will not perhaps take it amiss if she hears one voice of quiet and truthful dissent, especially if that dissent is spoken only in a spirit of kindness. It may even serve as a foil and to give greater zest to the overwhelming flattery that has preceded her public appearance, just as the King of Macedon in the midst of his obsequious courtiers took a curious delight in the grim official whose sole duty it was to repeat from hour to hour the caution: "Philip, thou art but mortal!"

We freely say therefore that few vocalists that have ever appeared on the stage of Steinway Hall have had so many conspicuous faults and so little actual attainment in their art as Miss Demorest.

The young lady is entirely unprepared for a public appearance. The programme of the evening announced that she was about to go to Europe to study, and this is well; but it seems a little singular that the concert that should have come at the conclusion and as the culminating point of this study should have been allowed to precede it. To begin with a public concert and then to commence to learn to sing is rather reversing the natural order of events. It may however serve to mark the progress that Miss Demorest will undoubtedly make; and after the discipline that she will be subjected to by any first-rate teacher, she will herself be the first to acknowledge that she stood but at the very beginning of her art on the occasion of giving this concert, and perhaps to wonder at her own temerity.

As words of general criticism are but of little use, we shall briefly refer in detail to some of Miss Demorest's characteristics as a singer.

In the first place, her tone is exceedingly bad. It is neither pure nor sweet, but on the contrary thin, reedy, and unpleasant. And this arises apparently not from any organic defect, but from an absolute lack of knowledge of how to produce the tone, which is indeed the basis of the art of singing. The young lady is without training—the merest novice in an art, the elements of which she has yet to master.

Among the pieces that she sang was Donizetti's very charming, brilliant, and familiar aria, "O Luce di quest' Anima." It is a difficult aria, and served as well as any that could have been selected to exhibit all the defects of Miss Demorest's voice and execution. The tone, in the first place, owing to the wrong position of the vocal cords and muscles, was, as we have said, bad and thin. The vocalization was slipshod, the notes in rapid descending passages being slurred over and not distinctly given. The intonation was faulty—in other words, she failed to sing the notes in perfect tune; the pronunciation of the vowel tones in this, but more especially in her English songs, was conspicuously bad; and the general effect was that of an untaught beginner undertaking, with more ambition than judgment, what only an artist could perform.

If Miss Demorest goes to such a teacher as Wartet of Paris, or to any man of repute, he will at once tell her all this and a hundred other wholesome truths, and will dispel the illusions that injudicious flattery has thrown about her. Probably she will be kept steadily at singing simple scales, and more especially at singing single notes, for months, until she has learned to produce an even tone. Nor in all likelihood will she be permitted so much as to sing a ballad for a year or two. It takes five years of unremitting training to make a vocalist, and we sincerely hope that, at the end of that time, Miss Demorest may be able to make good the half of what her unwise and injudicious friends have said of her. If there is any one stumbling-block in the way of true success, it is the falsehood of undiscerning and insincere flattery. When Miss Demorest first discovers and recognizes the fact that she has no method—which is the touchstone of all vocalism—then she will be prepared to take the first earnest step forward in her art, and not till then. The A B C of music must first be acquired, and upon this alphabet she may afterward build.

We cannot refrain from referring to the unknown accompanist, whose name was wisely omitted from the programme, and who might have spoiled a better concert. He accompanied Mr. Thomas in his singing of Schubert's "Wanderer," and so discreditably a player we have never heard in public. Whole handfuls of chords were played falsely, the minor ones often being played major and the major ones converted into minor. He began with the wrong chord, and continued a series of blunders to the very end. So wildly discordant did he become at times, that it seemed as though he would inevitably lead Mr. Thomas off into some other key; and it was only the fact that that gentleman is a correct and excellent musician that saved him from completely breaking down.

To Be, or not to Be.

One of a thousand would-be "native composers" bespeaks our sympathy in the following touching appeal through the columns of the New Bedford Mercury:

Messrs. Editors:—It is, I believe, a privilege of the aggrieved of every class to confide their sorrows to the public, and through the medium of the press to seek sympathy and counsel. I am a musical man, in my way. Nature has favored me with a larynx which enables me to sing from O below the staff to the fifth ledger line; and an average of fifteen minutes a day devoted to the practice of the piano, from early childhood, has given me a command of the instrument, and has frequently won applause in the round dances, as well as in the more lively cotillon. But I am also a composer. At distant intervals I have given to the world, at one time a waltz, which tripping belles have called "sweet," and at another, a ballad which has drawn tears from the eyes of my auditors, perhaps for various reasons. Shakespeare makes Imbelia say:

"The poor beetle that we tread upon
In corporal sufferance finds a pang as great
As when a giant dies."

And if, comparing small with great, their woes be equal, may not their joys also have the same exaltation? I am sure Beethoven or Mozart never listened to their own divine conceptions with more thrilling pleasure than I have heard mine, rendered by some fair friend, lending the grace of her own accomplishments to the genius she inspired. But Mozart, Beethoven and I have had our mortifications, and this brings me to the point.

The other night I called upon the Miss Simpkinses, or the Misses Simpkins (which is right?) carrying, with the music selected for the evening's amusement, one or two of my own compositions, which I modestly hoped would receive the applause of these cultured amateurs, since I regarded them as among my best efforts. The first "opus" which I hesitatingly essayed was a descriptive ballad, in which a homeward bound vessel goes to pieces in the dark, and something white on the shore, which proves to be one of the drowned, is buried the next morning in a quiet church yard conveniently near. I never sang so impressively. But the younger Miss Simpkins remarked, as I concluded, that she always preferred to hear the other words, "The breaking waves dashed high," to that song. Well, I suppose it is true that musical, as well as other great thoughts often run in the same channels. And so, though somewhat discomfited, I sang my second effort, a sacred melody, which the elder Miss Simpkins warmly praised as an old hymn that always was a favorite. Messrs. Editors, would you advise me to continue composition under these circumstances, or shall I leave the field to others? Please reply through the columns of the New York Ledger. A.

Music Abroad.

London.

ORATORIO CONCERTS. The fifth concert of the season took place in St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening week, when Israel in Egypt was, if we are not mistaken, given for the first time under Mr. Barnby's direction. The wisdom of choosing a work which demands greater resources than were available is open to serious question. Handel's stupendous choruses want power in the first instance, and the public have been accustomed to hear them at Exeter Hall and the Crystal Palace Festivals under conditions adapted to satisfy this requirement. Hence it was anticipated that Mr. Barnby's modest "350" could produce little effect, and that the performance would pass off, as far as concerned its choral music, without making the customary sensation. Such, in point of fact, was the case, the famous "Hailstone" alone eliciting more than slight applause. The solos were taken by Mme. Sherrington, Miss Sinclair, Mme. Patey, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Raynham, Herr Stepan, and Mr. Beale. Mme. Patey won much favor for her admirable rendering of "Thou shalt bring them in;" and Mr. Reeves achieved one of his greatest triumphs in "The onery said," and the recitatives preceding the final chorus. He sang the former with astonishing vigor and power of voice, while his declamation of the latter was one of the finest artistic achievements in our remembrance. About the superlative excellence of each effort there could be no doubt at all, and the audience were not slack in showing their appreciation. Mr. Reeves very properly declined to repeat the air, and, but for their natural excitement, we should blame the audience for making so unreasonable a request. Herr Stepan and Mr. Beale—a veteran and a recruit—were associated in "The Lord is a man of war," but not happily, inasmuch as the veteran has spent a good deal of his strength, and the recruit was nervous. The orchestra did good service, and Mr. Docker made the most of an organ which goes for little at best.—Mus. World.

MODERN CHAMBER MUSIC.—The last of a series of concerts introducing new and little-known chamber compositions by living masters, took place at the Hanover Square Rooms on Friday week. The programmes of the three concerts comprised two quartets, Op. 25 and 26, and a quintet, Op. 34, for piano and strings, by Johannes Brahms; a pianoforte trio and string quartet by Robert Volkmann; a sonata for piano and viola, and a quartet, by Antoine Rubinstein; a trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in D, by Carl Reinecke. To the chamber compositions of Brahms we have repeatedly called attention, and are glad to note the favor they met with. Robert Volkmann shows distinct traces of Schumann's influence, but his work, less intellectual than that of Brahms, is more impregnated with the spirit of national songs and dances, particularly of Hungary. Brahms and Volkmann show themselves capable of keen self-criticism. This cannot be said of Rubinstein. We know of no important piece of his which would not gain by a use of the pruning knife. His principal thoughts, always vigorous, are not unfrequently marred by want of refinement in their development and diction. At the last concert Herr Reinecke took the pianoforte part of his trio in D, a brilliant and effectively-written composition, which was well received. A set of solo pianoforte variations on a passaged of Bach's, which Herr Reinecke played later in the evening, fell flat, though the very cleverly contrived piece deserves the praise of musicians, perhaps even more than the trio. The pianoforte was played, and extremely well played, at the first two concerts by Herr Willem Coenen, the violin by Mr. Wiener, viola by Mr. Zerbini, and violoncello by Herr Daubert—all excellent artists. The performances were carefully rehearsed. Concerts of a similar tendency ought to be less exceptional.—Ibid.

MENDELSSOHN SCHOLARSHIP FOUNDATION.—At a meeting of the committee on the 22nd of April, for the election of a scholar (Cipriani Potter, Esq., in the chair), William Shakespeare, (!) student of the Royal Academy of Music, was unanimously elected to the vacant scholarship. The examiners were the Chairman (Mr. Cipriani Potter), Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. John Goss, Mr. C. Hallé, Mr. Hullah, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and the Hon. Secretary (Mr. Otto Goldschmidt.)

BERLIN.—(Correspondence of the London Musical World.) Herr Bernhard Hopffer's opera, Frithjof, is in active rehearsal at the Operahouse, which, by the way, is epithetized as "Royal," despite the elevation of the King to the Imperial dignity. The following retrospective glance of what was done at this theatre from the 1st October to the 31st December, 1870, is taken from the Staats Anzeiger. Besides Richard Wagner's grand operas, Die Meistersinger, Lohengrin, Rienzi, and Tannhäuser, and Meyerbeer's Huguenots, the management gave the classical operas of Beethoven and Gluck, new life being imparted to the latter's Armide and Iphigenie in Aulis. Then came Mozart's Don Juan, Zauberflöte, and Figaro's Hochzeit, the last being selected for the benefit of Herr Krause, on his ceasing to be a member of the company. While grand French opera was represented by Auber's Muette, and Italian opera by Verdi's Traviata, the romantic school was not forgotten, both Margarethe and Romeo und Julie, by M. Gounod, having been performed. These operas, in the more elevated style, were varied by light operas with dialogue (Spielopern), such as Donizetti's Elisire d'Amore; Auber's Diamants de la Couronne, Maçon, and Fra Diavolo; Rossini's Barbiere; Lortzing's Czar und Zimmermann; a revival in this branch of opera was Die beiden Schützen, by the last-named composer, a piece which by its subject, and the complete distributed through it here and there, is very appropriate at this particular moment. Of Weber, there was only one work given, but that was his best, namely, Der Freyschütz; of Bellini we had Norma, and of Verdi La Traviata, each repeated once; lastly, there was one performance of Herr von Flotow's Martha. In addition to the ballet of Flick und Flock, embellished with new pictures adapted to the times; Fantasia; and smaller choreographic works, the management included in its programme some grand dramas, of which we may mention Strauss by Michael Beer; Faust, by Goethe; Schiller's Wilhelm Tell; and Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, with Mendelssohn's music.

Two patriotic concerts given on the 29th October and 16th November by the Royal Chapel, with the co-operation of large choruses, under the direction of Herren Eckert and Taubert, occupy an honorable place among the various musical performances got up for charitable purposes during the war. The first especially brought in a large sum, and, moreover, by the performance of the Ninth Symphony, and of Schiller's ode, "An die Freude," served to remind the audience of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birthday, which was universally kept on the 17th December. This event was duly observed on two successive days, both at the Theatre Royal, and at the Operahouse; at the former by Goethe's Egmont, with Beethoven's music, and at the latter by Fidelio, Beethoven's only creation in this branch of the art. Of the numerous performances—the sum total was seventy-four—there were four of a new opera by Herr Bernhard Scholz. It bears the title of Ziethen'sche Helden. After being given in Breslau, Hamburg, and Leipzig, it was first produced at the Royal Opera house on the 4th October, and within a short period repeated three times. The story, which has been put into its present shape by Herr Th. Reibbaum, belongs to the time of Friedrich II. It is founded on an anecdote replete with patriotic feeling, and, from its martial character, has much that fits it for the present time.

Herr Richard Wagner and his wife will take this capital on their way home from Leipzig at the end of the month. Herr Wagner has asked the Academy, of which he is a member, for permission to give a lecture "On the Purpose of Opera." Of course, the lecture will be published in the shape of a book. The publication of the "Kaisermarsch" was announced for the 14th inst. The pianoforte arrangement for two hands is by Herr Tausig; that for four hands, by Herr Ulrich; and that for eight hands by Herr Horn. The arrangement for military bands is by Herr Wiprecht. The march will be first publicly performed here under the Direction of Herr Biele.

VIENNA.—In the 365 days of the Subscription Year, from the 1st April, 1870, to the 31st March, 1871, there was only one performance at the old Opera house. This was on Easter Sunday, 17th April, 1870, for a charitable purpose. Robert le Diable was announced, but, in consequence of the indisposition of Herr Müller, it had to be withdrawn, and Guillaume Tell substituted. All the other performances took place in the new Operahouse. For 47 days in the months of July and August, 1870, the house was closed for the holidays; on five days there was no performance in consequence of rehearsals or preparations for novelties; on eleven days, there was no performance in consequence of those days being grand festivals of the Church; on three days the house was closed because the Court was in mourning; on two days there were performances for charitable purposes; on three days, the theatre was devoted to gala-performances; on four days, there were performances in aid of the Pension Fund, and, on another day, there was a concert for the same purpose; on 266 days, the performances were in the Subscription, 350 being guaranteed, and sixteen extra, which were given for nothing. The repertory consisted of thirty-one different operas and eight ballets. The following were produced with a fresh mise-en-scène, and for the first time at the new Operahouse: L'Africaine, Gustavus, Joseph, Mignon, Tannhäuser, Robert le Diable, Lohengrin, Le Nozze di Figaro, La Juive, Judith, Le Postillon de Longjumeau, Der Fliegende Holländer, Rigoletto, Le Domino Noir, Giselle, Monte Christo, Esmeralda, and Nana Sahib. The following were the number of times the various operas were played:—Faust, 17 times; L'Africaine, 16; Tannhäuser, 12; Der Freyschütz, 11; Romeo et Julie, 11; Don Giovanni, 10; La Juive, 10; Guillaume Tell, 10; and Die Zauberflöte, 10; Le Nozze di Figaro, Der Fliegende Holländer, Lrs Huguenots, and Mignon, 8 times each; Lohengrin, Norma and Le Prophète, 7 times each; Martha, Die Meistersinger and Robert le Diable, 6 times each; Fra Diavolo, Lucia di Lammermoor, and Gustavus, 5 times each; Le Domino Noir, Joseph, and La Muette, 4 times each; Fidelio and Judith, 3 times each; Armida, Le Postillon de Lonjumeau, and Rigoletto, twice each; and L'Africaine, once.

COLOGNE.—The forty-sixth Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine will be specially devoted to the celebration of peace. It will take place here from the 28th to the 30th May, under the supreme direction of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller. Among the artists already engaged are Herr and Mme. Joachim; Herr Stockhausen of Stuttgart; and Herr Schild, of Weimar. The programme will include on the 28th: "Fest-overture," Reinecke; Cantata, "Eine feste Burg," J. S. Bach; Overture to Iphigenia, Gluck; "Israel's Siegesang" (a hymn on words from the Bible), Ferdinand Hiller; and the Ninth Symphony, Beethoven. On the 29th, Handel's oratorio of Joshua will be performed; and, on the 30th, the works selected will be, in addition to the vocal solos, "Coronation Hymn," Handel; Violin Concerto, Joachim; and the overture to Der Freyschütz. A petition has been forwarded to the Emperor requesting him to attend the Festival.

NAPLES.—An unknown Missa Solemnis by the famous Neapolitan composer, Giovanni Battista Pergolesi, has just been discovered among the archives of San Ferdinando at Naples. The parts have been carefully copied from the score at the instigation of Signor Serrao, who intended to have the work performed in Passion-Week for the congregation of the before-named church. Pergolesi, who died at the age of twenty-two, just when he had finished his celebrated Stabat Mater, and who, though so young, had already formed a style, is one of the most interesting of the Italian composers belonging to the early period of the eighteenth century. Among his very few compositions for the theatre, the best known is La Serva Padrona; the only other one that has been published is Il Maestro di Musica.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MAY 8.—The last concert of the Church Music Association came off at Steinway Hall, on Wednesday evening. This was the programme:

Overture "La Muette di Portici".....Auber.
Mass in D.....Niedermeyer.
Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" (with choruses) Mendelssohn.

The concert was not as great an artistic success as either of the first two. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" did not go as smoothly as was expected. The orchestra played as well as usual, but the chorus showed a want of sufficient rehearsal. The Poem, or such parts of it as had relation to the music, was read by Mr. Matthison. The Mass in D, by Niedermeyer, is a magnificent work, and was finely sung. The solos were undertaken by Mme. Anna Bishop-Schulze (soprano), Miss Clara Perl (contralto), Mr. Wm. S. Leggat (tenor), and Mr. F. Remmert (basso).

During the intermission between the first and second parts, the conductor, Mr. James Pech, was presented by the subscribers with a handsome gold watch and chain.

The opera season at the Academy, under the management of Signor Albites, which commenced on Monday, was very successful, the Academy being crowded at each performance. "Poliuto" was given on Monday, "Traviata" on Wednesday and Saturday matinee, and "Un Ballo in Maschera" on Friday evening. "Rigoletto," "Sicilian Vespers" and "Faust" are announced for this week.

The sixth and last Philharmonic Concert of the season, on Saturday evening, may be considered as the end of the musical season, though there are two weeks more of opera. The following was the programme:

Symphony, No. 8, in A minor.....Mendelssohn.
Scene and Aria: "Freyshütz".....Weber.
Miss Mary Krebs.
Violin Concerto in D, op. 61.....Beethoven.
Dr. Leopold Damrosch.
Overture to "Idomeneo," (first time).....Mozart.
Song, from Goethe's "Faust".....Duchauer.
Miss Krebs.
Overture: "Le Carnival Romain".....Berlioz.

Mendelssohn's greatest orchestral work was well performed, with the exception that Mr. Bergmann took the time of the Scherzo a little too fast.

It is not often that Beethoven's Violin Concerto is heard entire. The first movement has been played many times, but the other two are very unfamiliar. Dr. Damrosch played his own cadenza. Mr. Vieuxtemps was engaged to play at this concert, and appeared at a private rehearsal, but was unable to appear at the concert.

Miss Krebs has a pleasant mezzo-soprano voice, but not of much power. She was recalled after each of her songs.

The following is a list of the works performed this season (the 29th):

Symphonies. Beethoven, Nos. 4, 7, and 8; Schubert, "Unfinished" in B minor; Rubinstein, "Ocean"; Mozart, No. 5, in D major; Schumann, No. 3, in E flat; Mendelssohn, No. 3, "Scotch."

Overtures. Wagner, "Tannhäuser"; Beethoven, "Egmont" (with all the music, songs, &c.); Cherubini, "Anacreon"; Mendelssohn, "Ruy Blas"; Goldmark, "Sakuntala"; Schumann, "Overture, scherzo, et finale," op. 52; Reinecke, "Aladdin"; Bargiel, "Medea"; Gade, "In the highlands"; Mozart, "Idomeneo"; Berlioz, "Le Carnival Romain."

Pianoforte Concertos. Beethoven, Nos. 3 (C minor) and 5 (E flat); Liszt, Nos. 1 (E flat) and 2 (A flat); Rubinstein, No. 4 (D minor).

Violin Concerto. Beethoven, in D.

Miscellaneous Pieces. Liszt, Symphonic poem: "Tasso"; Bergmann, Recitative and Romanza (bass clarinet); Lachner, Serenade for four violincellos; Mendelssohn, Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" (piano).

Songs, Arias, &c. Mozart, from "Titus"; Meyerbeer, "Ah mon fils" and "Dans ce chateau"; Beethoven, "Abentheuerlicher," from "Fidelio"; Rubinstein, "E'lanque ver"; Rossini, "Bel Raggio"; Mozart, "Letter Aria"; Weber, from "Der Freyschütz"; Duchauer, "Marguerite at the Spinning Wheel," from "Faust."

The following are the soloists, who appeared:

Singers. Mme. Rosa Czillag, Mme. Louise Lichtmay, Miss Clara Louise Kellogg, Miss Mary Krebs, and Miss Louisa Morrison Fiset.

Pianists. Mr. S. B. Mills, Mr. Richard Hoffmann, and Miss Mary Krebs.

Violinist. Dr. Leopold Damrosch.

Clarinet. Mr. E. Boehm.

Violoncellists. Messrs. Bergmann, Bergner, Hoch, and Liesegang.

Mr. Theo. Thomas and his fine orchestra, with Miss Mehlig, give a matinee next week. He opens the Central Park Garden on the 1st of this month.

J. M. W.

What They Say of the Passion Music.

[From the Daily Advertiser, May 15.]

The Music Hall was again filled on Saturday evening with a most earnest and attentive audience. The programme was devoted to selections from the "St. Matthew Passion Music" of John Sebastian Bach, and to "Sterndale Bennett's oratorio of 'The Woman of Samaria,' both of which were presented for the first time in America. Of the seventy-eight numbers of the former work sixteen were presented, the selections given including representatives of every form of composition employed in the "Passion Music." The success attending this performance will be found so great, we think, as to warrant the production of the entire work at a not very distant day. In many of its features the "Passion Music," even on a first hearing, is capable of affording the most pure and exalted pleasure to every sensitive and appreciative soul. The recitatives are felt at once to be incomparable, telling as they do the story of the death and passion of Christ with wonderful simplicity and directness, and yet with the graphic tenderness and intensity of a stricken believer and eye-witness. The great master of tones is perceived in this power to portray and impress through the agency of accompanied recitative, as the great artist in color is detected through the vivid life or the swift change which follows a few simple touches of his brush. The choral numbers of the "Passion Music," also, with scarcely an exception,—if we are warranted to speak from those performed on Saturday evening,—are replete with meaning and beauty, of which much is easily gathered up even by a novice. As specimens of the most marvellous power of harmonic combination, exercised with absolute ease and freedom, and as expressions of every phase of intense religious feeling, they seem incomparable. The full significance of the airs, on the other hand—and this, it occurs to us, is an inversion of the usual experience with unfamiliar music—does not come out so fully upon first acquaintance. The treatment of the melody is, if we may so say, unmelodic, the mere pleasing of the ear being apparently disregarded, or at least subordinated to an expression of the inner thought and feeling of the composer, which transcends the form of ordinary melody.

The numbers of the "Passion Music" which gave the greatest pleasure, we should designate as the alto recitation and aria, "Thou dear Redeemer, thou," and "Grief and Pain"; the solo and chorus beginning, "O Grief! here throbs the racked and bleeding heart"; the bass aria, "Gladly will I, all resigning"; the double chorus, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanished!" the alto aria, "Oh, pardon me, my God"; and the concluding chorus, "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping." The "Grief and Pain" aria was sung by Mrs. Barry at the Harvard Symphony concerts of this season, and its wonderful depth of pathos reveals itself more and more clearly as familiarity with it increases. The chorus, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," seems almost without a parallel as a combination of picturesque and emotional power; and the concluding chorus, with its refrain, "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping, and murmur low in tones suppressed—Rest thee softly, softly rest!" leaves an impression of beauty and power which is simply indescribable. The music speaks as with the voice of some loving disciple who, torn with grief at the remembrance of the great agony, can yet rejoice that his Master's sufferings are over, and find in the sleep of the Savior by whose tomb he watches, an earnest of that peace of the faithful soul which passeth all understanding. The solos were principally rendered by Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Sterling, Mr. Wm. J. Winch and Mr. Whitney. All of these artists acquitted themselves nobly though, with the single exception of Mme. Rudersdorff, they were all somewhat hampered by the immense difficulties of their music, and could not find opportunity for using the highest expressive power of which they are capable. Still, Miss Sterling's rendering of "Grief and Pain," and Mr. Whitney's of "Gladly will I, all resigning," were very earnest and effective. Mme. Rudersdorff's delivery of the very intricate and trying aria, written for a contralto voice, "Oh pardon me, my God," was characterized by complete intelligence and thorough technical skill, and might have been considered perfect but for her extremely bad enunciation of her words, which may perhaps be referred to an imperfect mastery of the English language. An oboe obligato performed by Mr. Eller, in connection with the tenor air: "I'll watch with my dear Jesus," and a violin obligato given by Mr. Bernhard Listemann, in conjunction with Mme. Rudersdorff's aria, were both very skillfully done. The chorus sang almost all their music with admirable accuracy, spirit and understanding. Very general regret was expressed that Mr. Whitney did not present the great air, "Give me back my dearest Master," the rendering of which made so profound an impression at the symphony concerts of last winter.

[From the Journal.]

One performance could not offer to an audience two selections of a religious character each so enjoyable of its kind as Bach's "Passion Music of St. Matthew," and Bennett's "Woman of Samaria." The one full of depth, thoroughly original, and only such as John Sebastian Bach could write; the other comparatively light, pleasing, and, as far as the subject would let it be, sensuous. The former, to be judged by many hearings, or even fairly understood in all its wealth; the latter showing most of its beauties at a single hearing. Bach's music deeply enjoyed by musicians; Bennett's by the public at large.

The Passion music (we must speak in passing of Mr. Dwight's very appreciative translation) was, as far as one can judge from a first hearing, remarkably well done. The chorus sang the difficult music with a precision and power that was hardly expected; the chorales, "I will stay here beside thee," and "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," a strong emphatic double chorale, were gloriously done, and the latter gained a deserved encore.

Throughout the chorus were steady and are to be congratulated on their success in a new and very difficult field, for seldom have they sung better than in the above mentioned and in the very trying concluding chorale, [chorus] "Around thy Tomb."

Miss Sterling sang, as usual, in sweet voice and pure style, and Mme. Rudersdorff with all the religious feeling the music requires, the two ladies rendering superbly the duet, accompanied by the chorus, which introduces the double chorale, [chorus] "Ye lightnings," &c. Mr. W. J. Winch we thought to be weak in the tenor music, while Mr. Whitney sang with the utmost precision and in true tone, but with less feeling than he commonly displays. Space forbids even a shadow of what is due to the selections from this grand composition, and it only remains to be said that few expected and every one rejoiced at the success of the first part of the programme for Saturday night.

[From the Gazette, May 14.]

If nothing else worthy of fame had been done during the Festival, the production of Bach's Passion Music, portions of which formed the first part of last evening's concert, would alone have made the occasion memorable. About a quarter of the work, as published, was sung, the selections made being sufficient to show its triune character of narrative, drama and passion. The story of the passion could not be more succinctly told than in the Scriptural record used for the narrative portions of the work, and so the selections, though made with care and discrimination, could not be otherwise than disjointed. The choruses, which seemed to give the most pleasure, were the one beginning: "Ye thunders, ye lightnings," and the finale, "Around thy Tomb," etc. The vividness of the former electrified the audience, who would not be quieted except by repetition. The seraphic calm breathed forth in the latter was not less impressive. The solos were sung by Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Sterling, Mr. Whitney (who assumed with becoming dignity and chaste expression the numbers assigned to Jesus,) and Mr. W. J. Winch, who sang the recitatives of the Evangelist and the tenor airs with the most refined taste. Some of the solos had been heard here before, and we were sorry to miss the fine bass air: "Give me back my dearest Master," which Mr. Whitney sang at a recent Harvard concert. A violin obligato, played by Mr. Listemann, and one for oboe, by Mr. Eller, were admirably played. The general satisfaction expressed may yet be taken as an index of a popular willingness to hear, and induce the society to bring out the work entire.

[From the Times.]

Indeed, we should not attempt any critical notice of so great a work as Bach's Passion Music after a single hearing, and can only say now that the selections given were of the most interesting and impressive nature, reaching a height of religious feeling and expression that we have heard nowhere else.

[From the Traveller.]

The music, which all predicted would be found heavy and uninteresting, is, in fact, full of beauties, and there is very much in it to interest the listener. It breathes the pure spirit of devotion, and it is a wonderful tone epic on the sufferings and passion of the Saviour. The rendering of the aria, "O pardon me, my God," transposed [?] from the contralto, by Mme. Rudersdorff; "Grief and Pain," by Miss Sterling; and the "Gladly will I resign" by Mr. Whitney was in the highest degree artistic, and the different styles of these numbers showed the scope of the composer's powers. The chorus, which was in capital condition, did its work well and thoroughly, and the two choruses, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanished," and "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping," were given with great effectiveness and in the best style of the society. An oboe obligato by Mr. Eller to the tenor air, "I will watch with my dear Jesus," and a violin obligato by Mr. B. Listemann, to the aria, "O pardon me my God," were delicately and feelingly given. On the whole, the music proved to be more than interesting, though there were some numbers that were quite wearisome.

[From the Transcript.]

Of Bach's Passion Music, first heard here on Saturday evening, we have simply to say that the Society had evidently taken to it with genial as well as laborious study, and meant to present it with conscientious skill and feeling. Still, with all advantages of rendering, we doubt if attention was strictly drawn to the music or that its inherent greatness was recognized and understood. There is certainly no appeal to popular emotion in it, and the style is generally too severe for the average modern taste. In consummate musical treatment it is, of course, of value for the educated; and beyond this there is the spiritual and religious force and a fine dramatic pathos to commend and exalt it. But its traits are sad, suggesting pain and struggle, and the power to typify them in music is summoned from such central and deep thought and profound purpose that the strain to understand the great scope of the work is not overcome by the way-side glimpses of simple melody or the moments of full impassioned harmony and bold instrumental color which happily arrest the ear.

The airs to which we were treated in these extracts of the work were certainly not lacking melody, but it was not of the salient kind and did not generally challenge attention, especially as the singing of them was attended with so much mechanical effort of voice by those who essayed them—Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Sterling, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Whitney. The great passages of the work accorded at this time were the great double chorus "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," which is graphic in the extreme, and received an encore for its masterly choral treatment; and a further double chorus "Around thy tomb," which is replete with tender beauties and interior fervor, as well as commanding breadth of expression.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 20, 1871.

Second Triennial Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society.

The great musical week has come and gone, leaving impressions which will long enrich the lives of all concerned in it whether as actors or as happy listeners. It was a grand experience. No one has partaken in it who does not feel the better for it. Art in this country, higher culture, love of the beautiful and true, faith in all high and holy things, has surely gained by it. Such a festival is a proud mark of musical and social progress. It shows how much has been accomplished in the education of the musical sense and faculty among the children of the ungenial, utilitarian and prosaic children of the Puritans. It sums up the results of all our culture through the noble Symphonies and Oratorios and Chamber Music we have heard, and through the rudimentary musical instruction that pervades our public schools, making the ear and soul sensitive to pure tones artistically woven into a subtle spiritual language, and every school a nursery of fresh, true singers and quick readers for the continual replenishment and renovation of our great choral unions. In such an effort we learn, to our own surprise, how much is possible with good use of the means we have, and are encouraged to still loftier endeavors. When, in addition to the triumphs of past years, to the "Messiah," the "Elijah," the "Hymn of Praise," the "Ninth Symphony," the old Society at length succeeds in a complete production of Handel's "Israel in Egypt," and in awakening a pretty general and heart-felt response, on the first hearing, to numerous selections (over an hour in length) from Bach's "St. Matthew Passion Music," its members may well feel that they need shrink from no really noble task, however difficult, hereafter. They have at least mastered "Israel," and they have practically settled it that the performance of the entire Passion Music here within another year or two, and followed up from time to time until it becomes known and loved and takes its place with the "Messiah," is a thing predestined. If the Festival had done nothing more than simply bring but so much of that music so home to the hearts of most who heard it for the first time that night, it would still mark a most important step of progress. (But of this in due order, later; for the present we only point for confirmation of our feeling of the temper in which Bach left that audience, to the generally more than respectful, the in some cases very warm and earnest, mention in the various newspapers from which we have made extracts elsewhere).

A six days' Festival, embracing nine such formidable programmes, was certainly a very ambitious, as well as a most laborious undertaking. But that ambition amply vindicated itself three years ago; and this time, setting its mark still higher, has reached it even more triumphantly. The second Triennial Festival has been more successful (musically) than the first. Of course, there have been imperfections—invariably in so much great work; but weak or faulty details are swallowed up in the impression of a glorious whole; the victory throughout was as complete and fine as any one could have a right to hope. Perhaps the scale was larger than is found necessary for the satisfaction of older and more cultured musical communities; a body of 700 singers cannot undertake all the serious and noble tasks that are within the reach of a select, compact choir of only three or four hundred, since the raw recruits necessitate so much rehearsal of the works familiar to the rest. But on the other hand, we live in a republic, and the people here come in for a share in whatsoever culture or good work of this kind there is going on; within reasonable bounds we need, we rightfully demand some multitudinous song festivals amid the many in which quality is thought of more than quantity; but here we had the latter with no material sacrifice of the former. Perhaps the length of the Festival, the number of concerts crowded into one week, was too great; in Germany they are content with two or three days; but here so short a period would hardly warrant the costly assemblage of such vast forces; once scattered, it is a long time before all the elements can be brought together again; and if it takes but two days for such soul refreshment for the more quiet, art-loving people of the old world, it may well require six days to make the due impression on a bustling, money-making, "fast" community like ours. We need sometimes a whole week's Sabbath (in an ideal, joyful sense, as of the Ninth Symphony).

THE OPENING. TUESDAY, MAY 9.

Here, too, we have forestalled the most that we wished to say, in our haste to copy (on the last page) the candid and appreciative record of a New York correspondent. We do not think he overrates the inspiration which possessed alike the singing and the listening masses. It was a noble opening, full of good omen for what was to follow. Yet, could we have selected freely, that miscellaneous First Part should have had a somewhat different programme. The programmes, generally, of the Afternoon (Symphony) concerts, we gratefully acknowledge, were far better than those of the Birmingham and other English Festivals, which are too often wearisome medleys of hacknied Italian opera airs and virtuoso exhibition pieces; at least they were made up almost altogether of good matter, if now and then there chanced to be too much of a good thing. But the opening of the Festival should have been all great. Nothing fitter, or grander, than the "Hymn of Praise," of course, could any one desire, which formed the Second Part. The Fest-Overture by Nicolai, however, had ushered in every Festival (three or four) which we had had before, and it has not the intrinsic charm to warrant so much repetition. The grandeur consists wholly in the Lutheran Chorale: "Ein feste Burg," which, simply sung alone, say once in unison, and once with Bach's four-part harmony, would have proved more edifying than it does followed by all that elaborate, uninspired fugue work for the orchestra, with the weaving in of a second and a trivial subject ("Rule Britannia," or something like it). Indeed, the work as a whole has been pretty generally voted dull and heavy. To be sure it answered one end, that of letting the full sound of the entire assembled force, the 700 singers, the 100 orchestra players, and the great organ, burst upon the ear at once with startling and stupendous power. But it thrilled and quickened for a moment, only, to follow up the promise with fatigue. Another time, we hope, a greater thing will be selected for this opening service; say Bach's Cantata on that very Chorale, or his Magnificat, or the easier Magnificat in D, by Durante; and, if these do not employ the whole force of the modern orchestra, what matter, so the music in itself be really sublime, if some of the monster effect batteries be kept in reserve a while?

The vocal solos were naturally dictated by the curiosity to hear the distinguished artists from abroad. Besides, such festivals are costly, and various attractions must be held out to the crowd; and then come in a thousand accidents to give the final shape to any programme with the best intentions. "Non più mesta" indeed seemed out of place, although Miss ANNIE CARY sang it capably.

Handel's "Sound an Alarm" introduced the young English tenor, Mr. Wm. H. CUMMINGS, who, though he has not the weightiest and most robust sort of tenor, has a very musical, pure, telling voice, most evenly developed, which he commands with ease and certainty, and sings with a refinement, an intelligence, an air of general culture, a fervor, and a real interest in the whole music, not in himself or his own part alone, which seems to have won all hearts at once. With the exception of Sims Reeves, who evidently furnished him the model, we never heard this battle song so powerfully given. A chaste nobility has characterized the style of all his singing. Some, for this very reason, found him cold at first, but were at length won over. Some fine ears were troubled by a shade of false intonation in a note or two; but what of that, when the impression of the whole is beautiful and true? Mr. Cummings is not a mere singer, vox et preterea nihil, like so many Italian opera tenors; he is a musician in his instincts and his culture. He has had an organist's education, which is an excellent foundation. A pupil of Mr. Hopkins, of the Temple Church, he was known also, unprofessionally, to sing well. Accident first brought him out in that capacity. Only about seven years ago, Sims Reeves called on him to take his place in Judas Maccabeus, and after much hesitation he consented; his success was marked; he was encored in "Sound an alarm," and from that time, after some period of study in Italy, he has been a public singer, mostly in the field of Oratorio.

Madame RUDERSDORFF (this is her maiden name) was born in December, 1822, at Ivanowsky in Russia; but at the age of three years she was taken to Hamburg, where her father was engaged as Concertmaster. Her beautiful voice was formed at an early age through Marianne Sessi; afterwards Banderelli and Bordogni became her teachers. After appearing in England and Germany as a concert singer, she made her debut in opera at Karlsruhe in 1841, and was then engaged at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, where she was married in 1844 to Dr. Küchenmeister, a professor of mathematics. She renounced the stage for a time, but accepted an engagement at Breslau in 1846; afterwards in Berlin from 1852 to 1854, when she removed to London, where she still resides, after a distinguished career, for some time in opera (Mozart's Donna Anna was her first rôle in London), but for some years past principally in oratorios and concerts. We heard her in the Birmingham Festival of 1861, where she shared the leading soprano honors with Tietjens, Lemmens Sherrington, &c., and her voice at that time seemed to us more worn than it does now. It must have been glorious once. Of course it is by no means in its prime, but something seems to have renewed its vigor, and there is a freshness and a fervor in her singing and her whole appearance quite remarkable for her age. Her strong side, next to her complete musicianship, is her dramatic fire and the intensity with which she throws herself into the spirit and expression of her song. There is a marvellous vitality about her, and her earnest, sympathetic presence seems to quicken chorus, orchestra and all around her; she is in it all, and seems to act it all out with the rest, and even prompt it. She is at home in all the great music and in every part of it; we verily believe, if need were, she could conduct any of the oratorios, impromptu, orchestra and all. In the piece chosen for her first appearance, she had full scope for all her dramatic energy and fire. The scena in the character of Medea, written for her appearance at a Leipzig Gewandhaus concert about two years ago by Randegger, now the foremost Italian teacher of singing in London, (but whose name and music suggest that there is German blood in him), is a long and impassioned outburst of jealous love, revenge and tenderness, on the same scale with Beethoven's "Ah perfido," only more extravagant and with a larger proportion of fierce declamatory recitative. It sounds the whole compass of that sort of passion, as well as of the singer's voice, which, while weak in the middle portion, and sometimes inaudible at some distance, often thrills you by its splendid high tones, as well as by its strong deep tones of passion. It was a revelation on her part of superb vocal and dramatic power. The orchestral instrumentation, too, is quite remarkable, and we read that the piece made a great impression in Leipzig, so much so that men like David, Reinecke and Ferdinand Hiller suggested to the author the writing of a Suite or a Symphony. And so the singer came and sang and conquered.

Mendelssohn's part-song: "Farewell to the Forest," as sung by the entire chorus, unaccompanied, was a beautiful, rich, cool, broad mass of euphonious harmony, each of the four parts being positively felt, and everything, in time and tune, in light and shade, in clear, precise enunciation, perfect as one could wish. In the third verse it went alone, without the conductor's wand, steady as clock-work, with no shade of drooping from the pitch. This caused great enthusiasm and it had to be repeated. But considered as a wonderful feat of choral ability, compared with their other efforts, it was an illusion, for it was the easiest thing they had to do. Besides, though it was a pleasant thing enough for an impromptu in an informal, free and easy meeting, it was hardly a fit selection for so great an occasion; the unpretending song was never written to be sung in that way; it was subjecting it to too strong a magnifying lens.—The "Hallelujah" from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" was sung with great spirit and effectively accompanied.

Of the "Hymn of Praise," Mendelssohn's happiest and most spontaneous great work, which has been given here so often and so well before, we need only say that never before has it been given or received quite so well as this time. The three Symphony movements came out like a warm and breathing picture from that noble orchestra, and all the choruses, even "The night is departing," so swift and intricate that we have doubted the possibility by any great choir of making it quite clear, were clearly and magnificently sung. But the memorable feature was the admirable rendering which Mr. Cummings gave of the Tenor Solo and the Recitative: "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" so full of dramatic earnestness and pathos, so beautifully graduated in force, with such intelligence in the pauses, the emphasis, and whole expression, and tones so pure and musically modulated; it proved the artist, the true singer, both by instinct and by culture. A very thoughtful, very fervent artist, though some call him cold.

Mme. Rudersdorff, too, in the answer to the Watchman, instead of ringing out the sentence in a clarion tone, sang softly, sweetly: "The night is departing," then repeated the word "departing," with a burst of splendor; and most, we think, were speedily converted to the new reading. The first soprano solo (with chorus): "Praise thou the Lord," was delivered with intense fervor and great brilliancy in the high range of tones. In the lovely Duet: "I waited for the Lord," her dramatic sforzando habit was rather in contrast with the even flow of Miss Cary's rich, smooth voice; otherwise it was all but perfect on the part of solos and of chorus.

So much for a glorious beginning!

SECOND DAY. WEDNESDAY, MAY 10.

AFTERNOON CONCERT, Orchestral and Vocal, with the following programme:

Overture: "Leonora," No. 3.....Beethoven.
Concerto for Piano-forte, in E flat, with orchestra. "
Miss Anna Mehlig.
Cavatina, Se m'abbandonni, "Nitocri,".....Mercadante.
Miss Cary.
Overture: "Genoveva,".....Schumann.

Symphony, in G major.....Haydn.
Adagio and Allegro, Adagio. Menuetto. Finale.
Grand Scene: "Andromeda,".....Mozart.
Mme. Rudersdorff.
Aria: "Una voce poco fa,".....Rossini.
Miss Phillippa.
Les Preludes.....Liszt.

The grand orchestra gave an impressive rendering of the two well chosen Overtures, though lacking something of the spirit, delicacy and precision with which they have been given, after special study, by our Harvard Orchestra alone; nor was the (here) familiar Symphony by Haydn—admirable relief between those Overtures and "Les Preludes"—quite so fine and full of sunshine as we have heard it when Mr. ZERRAHN has had more time to assimilate and school his usual forces. Miss MEHLIG played the greatest of Concertos, if possible, with more delicacy, more subtle power and ideality, more fervent as well as finished, easy mastery than ever before. Miss CARY's Cavatina sounded commonplace and out of place, but she sang it extremely well. Mozart's "Andromeda" Scena, ("Ah, lo previdi"), not from any opera, but one of his twelve grand concert arias, perhaps the greatest and most individual of them all, afforded another noble opportunity for Mme. RUDERSDORFF's impassioned lyric eloquence, and nobly she improved it. One can imagine how she would have sung Donna Anna's great scene: "Or tu sai." The florid "Una voce," made trebly florid by somebody's luxuriant embellishments,—all in good keeping with the spirit of the melody, however—formed Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS's Festival entrée. We commonly prefer our great Contralto in broad, sustained Cantabile, as more congenial to her large and noble nature; but we must admit that very rarely have we been delighted by so finely finished, even, free and spirited a piece of vocal execution, all the floriture being exquisitely perfect, and the whole song full of the right sparkle and espièglerie. Liszt's "Symphonic Poem," now grown hacknied and heavy to many of us, seemed superfluous in so rich a programme; its full and ingenious instrumentation, however, furnished argument for the great orchestra in all its faculties, and it was splendidly interpreted. Yet we would fain protest, here and throughout the Festival, against the boisterous valor of that bass trombone.

EVENING: MENDELSSOHN'S "ELIJAH." Now the Music Hall was crowded, for here, more than in any oratorio, the 700 singers were known to be at home and sure. And verily we doubt if ever before such perfect and electrifying chorus singing had been heard in America. Every chorus, great or small, sublime or tender, solemn and devout or graphic and dramatic, went to a charm. "Thanks be to God" nearly took the audience off their feet; and so too was the orchestra superb in that, and indeed throughout. The Double Quartet might have been sung better, but "Cast thy burden upon the Lord" (Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Phillippa, Mr. Cummings and Mr. Whitney) was almost perfect as a piece of Quartet singing; we understand that Mme. R. herself had drilled the voices. But by some strange fatality the Angel Trio, never before entrusted here to three more superior artists, never went so badly! Mr. WHITNEY, with all his weight and dignity of voice and person, is hardly in his best sphere in the music of the Prophet; it seeks too high a level for his best voice; nor did he seem to be so thoroughly alive and in good spirit for so arduous a task as he is sometimes. Yet much of his rendering was very noble and impressive; particularly "It is enough." Mr. CUMMINGS, in the tenor solo, showed the same beauty of voice, the same refined, chaste feeling, suggesting always something in reserve, the same purity of style and sovereign intelligence as before, and still grew in favor, though we do not think we had him at his best that night. Mme. RUDERSDORFF threw an intensity and vigor into the part of the Woman, which made that scene for once quite thrilling, and her rendering of "Hearye, Israel" and "Be not afraid" was electrifying. Nothing could be more sincerely musical and satisfying than Miss PHILLIPPS's singing of "O rest in the Lord." Mrs. Housston-Wheat, too, did her small parts of the soprano music, that of the Youth, &c., in sweet, clear voice, and with true feeling, excellently well.

And here, having reached one of the climaxes of this great "tidal wave" of song,—in fact, in point of good performance and of popular appreciation, we may say the highest of the week—we must pause. The greater half of our reporter's task remains, which is to dispose of such great themes as "Israel in Egypt," the "Ninth Symphony," and Bach's "Passion Music," not to speak of Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," and much good concert matter.

Opening of the Festival.

A NEW YORK IMPRESSION.

(Correspondence of the Sun).

BOSTON, MAY 9, 1871.—The Handel and Haydn Society are now quietly holding their Triennial Festival here in Boston. The event is one of the utmost interest in its relation to the art of music, which certainly of all the arts is the one to which we Americans most look as a constant source of happiness.

The Handel and Haydn Society, as most of your readers know, is the oldest institution of the kind in the country, and by far the best. It has nearly 750 zealous singers upon its roll, and every third year they surrender a week of their time in the busy spring to give the public the mature results of what they have most fully accomplished and conquered during the intervening years. This summary of labors nobly prosecuted is now being given in a spirit of such genuine devotion to art that it is deserving of every praise.

These musical festivals owe their origin to England, and date back there nearly ninety years. The cathedral choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford have assembled alternately at these different cathedral towns since the year 1734, holding, I believe, this year their one hundred and forty-seventh annual meeting. The first great Handel commemoration was held at Westminster Abbey in 1784. It lasted five days, numbered some five hundred performers, and was the greatest affair of the kind that had been known up to that date. Of late they have made a practice of holding in England, as well as here in Boston, a triennial Handel festival, but there on a far grander scale. At the festival of 1868, which was given at the Crystal Palace, the audience numbered on one day nearly twenty thousand persons. Christine Nilsson, Mme. Rudersdorff (now singing here), Miss Kellogg, and many other singers of eminence assisted. The chorus consisted of four thousand singers, and the orchestra of five hundred performers.

Of course the Handel and Haydn festival of the Bostonians is on a much smaller scale. In England every body of singers is gathered together that is willing to take part. Here, on the contrary, it is the work of a single society, not accepting any outside aid except in the matter of solos and orchestra. Even so the material is sufficient and more than sufficient for the purpose.

Out of the seven hundred and fifty voices, at least six hundred and fifty are in attendance, and the orchestra numbers upwards of a hundred instruments. In addition to this there is the support of the finest organ in this country, and one of the largest ever constructed. When all these forces are employed, it may readily be imagined that the Boston Music Hall can scarcely contain the sound.

We of New York have somewhat unpleasant associations connected with the words musical festival. Some were once given under that name at Steinway Hall, but they were hired enterprises and had no festival character whatever. Then the Boston Peace Jubilee assumed a half burlesque form in spite of some of its elements of grandeur, and was of more than doubtful benefit to art. Finally came that dreadful and melancholy affair at the Third Avenue Rink, wherein all concerned came to grief, and among them this very Handel and Haydn Society. No wonder that we fail to associate anything very agreeable with the words.

But here it is different. Society is more compact; the pride in the Handel and Haydn is universal; the persons engaged, instead of desiring to make anything out of the matter, are willing to sacrifice much valuable time in its behalf, and to provide against any deficiency, public-spirited merchants guaranty to make good all losses to the amount of $50,000. In this spirit the affair is inaugurated. Of course it is quiet and unostentatious. True devotion to art is apt to take that form, and not to proclaim itself boastfully.

At 8 o'clock this (Tuesday) afternoon, then, the festival began. Promptly to the minute the great chorus entered, and each singer assumed his allotted seat. The auditorium was already filled. In the centre and about Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the conductor, the orchestra was grouped, and the rows of singers radiated outward in ascending lines, till the last rows stood upon the topmost benches, with their heads so nearly reaching the third gallery that they looked like a fringe of supporting caryatides.

The programme consisted of miscellaneous concert pieces for the first part, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" for the second. The soloists were Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Annie Cary, and Mr. Cummings. The first and last named are singers whom the Society has engaged to come from England for the purpose of lending their services during the present week, and assuming the principal soprano and tenor parts. Both of them have high reputations abroad as oratorio singers, though not the highest. They have taken conspicuous parts at the great English festivals in London and elsewhere. Miss Cary is the lady whom we have so often heard in New York in connection with Miss Nilsson's concerts.

The following is the programme of the first part of the opening concert:

Nicolai's festival overture on Luther's choral: "Ein feste burg," for orchestra, chorus, and organ.

"Sound an Alarm"—Judas Maccabæus, Handel, Mr. Cummings.

Four-part song, "Farewell to the Forest," Mendelssohn.

By the entire chorus.

"Non Plu Mesta," alto aria. Rossini. Miss Cary.

Grand scena, "Medea," Randegger. Mme. Rudersdorff.

The Hallelujah Chorus from "Mount of Olives," Beethoven.

Nicolai's overture was a fitting work with which to open the six days' labor. It is deeply religious in character, devotional and severe. Its groundwork is Luther's mighty choral, introduced in the commencement and afterward at the close, the two parts being connected by a double fugue worked out with much elaborate learning. The better part of it is Luther's; what Nicolai has added awakened respect for his devotional spirit and for his learning, rather than interest for any value that it adds to the great reformer's hymn.

The second piece brought Mr. Cummings before the public. It is scarcely fair to judge of a singer from his first appearance before a new audience. But we can safely go so far in praise of this gentleman as to say that we do not know of his equal in this country as a tenor singer of oratorio. He is still a young man, and one of undoubted artistic intelligence and refinement. Whatever he sang showed a thorough understanding of his work. If he is in any way lacking, it is because art has failed to supply what nature denied; in other words, because his acquirements are even rarer than his natural gifts. The words with which the great aria opens, "Sound an Alarm!" were given out in long drawn tones which furnished an excellent opportunity to judge of the character of his voice. I did not think the quality of the tone itself remarkably beautiful. It is not in this direction that his superiority seemed to consist, so much as in his great musical intelligence, pure method, easy execution, earnestness, and enthusiasm.

Mendelssohn's four-part song, "Farewell to the Forest," showed how well the chorus had been trained, how nicely the voices were blended, and what delicacy and light and shade the great body of singers were capable of. The song itself is fragrant with the odors of the woods and fields. It is sweetly and charmingly graceful and simple. After leading the first two verses, Mr. Zerrahn left his chorus to go on by themselves without any directing hand. The seven hundred were equal to the emergency. The points were taken up with the same accuracy and precision, the expression marks as carefully regarded, and the pronunciation so clear that every word was distinctly intelligible.

Miss Cary then sang the Rossini "rice song," the "Non Plu Mesta." She appeared to much greater advantage than when contrasted with and overshadowed by Miss Nilsson, as she has so long been. By contrast then her voice seemed hard and cold, but before this audience of her native city it seemed to gain in warmth and color. Finally came Mme. Rudersdorff, upon whom so much of the interest of the present week will centre. This lady is a truly great and admirable artist. Her singing of Randegger's intense scene is to music what Mme. Seebach's garden scene in "Marie Stuart" is to the drama—in conception and splendid in execution. The voice may not be what it once was, but the fire of genius is there. Mme. Parpa could sing a bright, cold aria better, but she never approached Mme. Rudersdorff's favor. Both in this and in the "Hymn of Praise" which followed, this lady displayed the highest artistic gifts, and I sincerely hope that before she returns to Europe she may be heard in New York in oratorio.

The choruses of the "Hymn of Praise" were superbly rendered. They presented no difficulty which the Society did not fully overcome. The severer tests will come later in the week, when that greatest of choral works, "Israel in Egypt," and also certain portions of Bach's Passion music, are to be given. The concert of this afternoon, indeed, is but the inauguration of the festival; the interest will broaden and deepen as the work goes on, culminating in the performance of the "Messiah" on Sunday night. Besides the evening oratorios there is to be a concert every afternoon.

Among the well-known artists who are to take part during the festival, are Miss Adelaide Philippe, Miss Antoinette Sterling, Miss Anna Mehlig, and Miss Marie Krebs. It is curious to observe our Old Philharmonic players dotted in here and there among the orchestra, playing away as faithfully for Zerrahn as they do for Bergmann. But Zerrahn's hundred is by no means equal to Bergmann's. It has not had the drill, and it is impossible to gather together an orchestra from four or five cities and have the ensemble as perfect as in one accustomed to the same leader. Zerrahn, nevertheless, is a splendid conductor, and does with them all that man can do.

The strength of the festival, however, lies in the faith and in the great extent of its choral work. Besides the "Hymn of Praise" and the "Messiah," the Society is to sing the "Elijah," "Israel in Egypt," Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," and (parts of) Bach's Passion music during the week. This is a great mass of material for any society to have worked up ready for public performance at one time. When will our Harmonic or Mendelssohn Union be ready to do as much?

OPERAMMERGAU.—The performances of the Passion Plays, or Mysteries, interrupted last year by the war, will be resumed and continued on the [24th of June; the 2nd, 9th, 16th, 25th, and 30th July; the 6th, 14th, 20th, and 27th of August; and the 3rd, 9th, 17th, and 24th September.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Wood Nymph's Call. 3. G to f. Williams. 60

One of Parpa's songs, and an admirable one; easy, graceful, waits like in movement, requires but a moderate compass and fair execution, and does not fatigue in singing.

Souvenir de London. Campana.

A set of 8 pieces, arranged with Italian and English words by W. O. and J. E. Perkins. Of these

No. 4. The Troubadour. 3. F minor to f. 40

" 5. Come. (Vieni). 3. Eb to e. 50

" 6. The Sigh. (Il Sospiro) 3. G to e. 40

with others of the set are noticeable as very easy Italian songs, and well fitted for the first songs in that style for practice.

Oh, list to me. (E conte Mori). 3. F to f. Benoit. 30

With a neat, pretty French solah, and has a bright accompaniment.

I must leave thee, bonnie Katie. 3. F to f. F. Abt. 30

Fine farewell song.

The Heart that once was mine. 3. G to g. 30

M. W. Hackleton. 30

"Where hast thou given
The heart that once was mine?"

Jealous, but pretty.

Some other Day. 3. Ab to f. Offenbach. 30

"Cease, said I, cease I pray,
May, may, may.

Some other day perhaps I may."

Capital.

I thought his heart was all my own. 3. D to a. Clay. 30

Effective.

Little Sister's gone to sleep. Song and Chorus.

2. G to e. E. Christie. 40

"Angels bade our darling come,
Little sister's gone to sleep."

Fine Lithograph title. Like other songs of its kind, but a very good kind.

Willie and Old Brindle. 3. F to f. M. Keller. 30

Just the thing for "Willie May" or any other wide awake boy or girl to sing.

She's the fairest. Duet. 2. G to e. J. W. Turner. 30

Uncommonly good, and is easy.

The Merriest girl in the village. 2. C to c. Christie. 40

Fine lithographic title, and good song every way.

Even me. 2. Ab to f. Mrs. B. R. Boylston. 30

A hymn nicely set to music.

For sake me not. Duet for Treble and Tenor.

From Spohr's "Last Judgment." 5. G to g. 60

A magnificent duet.

Instrumental.

Morning Mail Galop. 4. Ab. A. Grebeis. 40

The title is not so good as the piece, which is very spirited and varied in character.

Vesuvius. 4. Eb. G. D. Wilson. 75

One of the best of the author's pieces, and an excellent piece for learners.

Old 96. Waltz. For one or two Guitars. 3. D.

Hayden. 30

Favorite waltz, well arranged.

Wanderstunden. (Leisure Hours.) 5. Db. Heller. 40

Played by Wahl at his concerts. Very striking and original.

The Little Gem Polka. 2. F. J. W. Turner. 30

A perfect "gem" for young players.

Juliet Waltzes. 3. C. Coote. 40

Easy, flowing melody. Among the "better half" of Coote's compositions.

La Sabotiere. Danse aux Sabots. 5. W. Mason. 75

Perfectly elegant. Although a "wooden shoe dance" it spiritualizes the clapping of the clogs, and is a very well wrought composition.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degree of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7.

The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c.

A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff,

an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 787.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 5.

Opera and the Art of Singing.

BY CARL GLOGGNER-CASTELLI.

[Concluded from page 35.]

IV.

If Rossini's contemporaries found fault with him for instrumenting his operas too strongly, and thereby smothering the singer, surely this objection may be brought with still more force against the composers of the last forty years. Only think of Marschner, for example, not to speak of many other German and Italian composers, with whom trombones and noisy instruments like the big drum must be taken into the account as almost constant accessories. Such massive instrumentation no longer admits of any true song, and so the saying of the Frenchman is confirmed: "They put the pedestal upon the stage and the statue in the orchestra." The orchestra, which in truth should be the accompanying element, through whose manifold capacity of shading the expression of the soul's emotions should be strengthened; through whose mediation that should in a certain manner be completed which the singer in his subjective utterance of feeling cannot render in detail,—has raised itself in our days to an independent element, whose loud manifestations often hardly allow a few single, scarcely audible notes of the singers to penetrate into the auditorium, so that his efficacy as an acting person is thrown entirely into the background. Only compare the moderate and finely considered instrumentation of Mozart's operas with that of many modern works.

That we have entered upon an epoch, in which the characterlessness of most of the Italian operas has finally been replaced through better efforts, must fill with satisfaction every one who means it honestly with Art. Nevertheless there is no denying that, with the Italian opera, we have lost a method of singing, which at least allowed a natural, an unforced formation of the tone. In the same degree that the orchestra has gained expansion, has the art of singing fallen into the background. Seldom do we hear singers now, who really satisfy us through beauty of tone, natural, and not outrée, declamation and perfectly developed technique. The old maxim, that the instrumentalists should learn from the singer, is to-day no longer applicable. Since the singers no longer give themselves to earnest studies, they can, as a rule, learn better from any violinist brought up in a good school, how to sustain a tone, and how to phrase musically, than they can from their colleagues.

Opera and style of singing (that is, method) go hand in hand. Nothing is more incorrect than the assertion, that the composers had dropped all use of technical difficulties because the singers no longer studied. On the contrary the singers have neglected technical study, since the later composers ceased to make the same demands upon them; that is to say, since flexibility of throat has become less an indispensable quality for every singer, but rather the speciality of a certain category, the so-called coloratur, or florid singers. But beauty of tone, and perfect control over it, can only be acquired through conquest of all technical difficulties. For this end one should study technique, and not to place facile execution as such in the foreground. This principle in our day has been quite too much forgotten, and so it has come to pass, that the majority of our singers neither know their instrument so well as they ought, nor have it in their power; in short they understand no longer how to sing.

The old strife of the Gluckists and Piccinists had received a new turn with Meyerbeer's appearance, in so far that virtuosity was driven from the field in opera. Much as there is genial, no doubt, in Meyerbeer's writing, still his tendency, in its inmost essence, is a realistic one, and so is the manner of singing which has proceeded from his works. Hence the degeneration of this latter, the employment of extreme means of effect, the crowding out of all artistic moderation, the overtasking of means for reaching a heightened dramatic expression, and all at the cost of beauty of tone.

There is no ignoring the fact, that, in spite of Meyerbeer's influence, the taste for good music during the last years in Germany, and partly even in France and England, has made important progress. The interest which the public takes in the performance of classical opera shows this. Even in Paris the German opera, during the last fifteen years, has had a success, from which we must infer a greater understanding. Yet the method of the art of singing has remained everywhere the same. What are the few good artists, who are still in a condition to sing a Mozart or Rossini opera finely, in comparison with the whole crowd of singers vitiated by the modern stylelessness and screaming manner? How can we expect a return to the better, so long as homage is still rendered to this system? So long as the theatre managers are still tempted to bring out the Huguenots, the Prophète, &c., on Sundays, as good speculations, there can be no use of talking about any decided reformation in the direction of the public taste. Only a new direction in the opera can beget a new style of singing, and the old idols will not fall until a new prophet comes to overthrow them! "Wann wird der Retter kommen diesem Lande?"

Judging by all indications, the opera is now in a transition period. Most of the operas, works of the greater German masters, are either comic, or belong to the class of opera mezza seria. Of great tragic operas by German composers there are so few, that no peculiarly German style in this kind has yet developed itself. Hence perhaps the absence of a great German school of singing, whereas the Italians and the French had long ago a genre of their own, and a style of singing corresponding to it. What is most peculiar to us (Germans), because most kindred, native to us, is the Lied; and so far as this form of song has found employment in the opera, it certainly has had an important influence on its style of singing.

An independent, and by its tendency peculiar style of serious opera has come to light with Richard Wagner. From the peculiarity of its style there might have arisen the necessity of a new school of singing, were it not that, in its necessary consequences, in the building up of the "Opera of the Future," the point of the pyramid is broken off.

It scarcely admits of a doubt that we are approaching a new era in the Opera, if we only continue to study the historical foundation, and thereby to separate the good from the false, without falling into eccentricities.—The old forms have become enlarged, and from the power of conviction bursts forth everywhere the impulse to create in new forms. The war between idealism and realism, to be sure, will never end, so long as Art progresses; the Gluckists and Piccinists will always stand confronted, though the party leaders change their names. But we may well indulge the hope now, that the scale will sink in favor of the former. In this principle alone can we find the right standpoint, which the Opera, the musical drama of our time, can assume; and it alone can show us the way to the development, according to the peculiar nature of dramatic song, of Tone, inspired and quickened through the basis of the Word, and standing in a constant mutual relation with it.

Apropos of "Lohengrin."

DEAR JOURNAL.—It was my—shall I say good fortune, to attend two of the Lohengrin performances at the New York Stadt Theater. Will you permit me to give expression here to a few of the observations that forced themselves upon me, concerning the "music of the future?"

It strikes me that one of the heaviest evils, not to say diseases, under which our times labor, is the immense preponderance of the purely intellectual faculties and powers over every other,—a tendency, I have no doubt, fostered, if not produced, by the great intellectual attainments of the age; in other words, everybody, in our day, imagines he can do everything. He has but to choose between becoming a Shakespeare, a Michael Angelo, or a Beethoven; for, if he will only apply his mind to either of the respective arts, he may accomplish what they did. There is no man who more fully illustrates this than Richard Wagner; he embodies in his own person all the most shining virtues, as well as the most glaring defects of the age. The proportions of his mind are as gigantic as those of his genius (spontaneous inspiration or creative power) are small. The very manner in which he became the musical dramatist or dramatic composer, in which character he stands before us to-day, more than confirms this opinion. We are told that it was one of Weber's operas, Der Freyschütz, I think, which first determined W. to devote himself to music, and that even when he had fully entered this career, he once halted in the midst of it, and hesitated whether not rather to take up the drama alone,—the spoken word, instead of that "musical declamation," which he would have us believe is the most perfect expression of feeling. What fortunate accident may have turned the scale in favor of Euterpe, is not on record. That he, whose soul is truly kindled by the "divine spark, without which nothing avails," the poet, painter, or composer, "by the grace of God," has absolutely no choice left him, that genius has the path it is to follow,—just such a one and no other, pointed out to it by an "innermost necessity," a fate, a destiny, by laws as fixed and immutable as those which govern the courses of the planets: this unimportant fact, this small obstacle in the way of his "determination" to become a composer, Wagner,—in all the arrogance of his vast mind, with all the assumption of a man who felt sure he could build a bridge to the moon, if he only gave some time and attention to that style of architecture,—seems to have completely ignored. Did any one ever hear that Mozart or Beethoven hesitated whether they had not better devote themselves to drawing and painting, or that Shakespeare contemplated musical composition? Does any of us imagine that, because we may resolve to study counterpoint or perspective, we shall be able to produce immortal works? If we do, we shall discover soon enough our woeful mistake, the melancholy failure in which such efforts must invariably end, and how the Muses may never be compelled to bestow their favor upon him whose brow they have not kissed of their own free will; we shall give to the world only works which, being the outgrowths of a fevered and overtaxed brain, not things "made of flesh and blood, and instinct with the breath of life,"—mere productions of the intellect,—will touch merely the intellect, and affect the senses, and that unpleasantly enough sometimes, but neither stir our hearts nor elevate our souls.

All this, then, I apply in its fullest possible meaning, in its utmost possible extent, to the apostles of the "music of the future," in general,—if that must still be called "music" which rejects what seems to me the very soul and essence of the divine art,—and to W. and his "musical dramas" in particular. To Lohengrin, too, though this work is probably the best and most pleasing of its kind that may be heard. It is perhaps not quite so fully an exponent of Wagner's peculiar musical philosophy as most of his other operas; for now and then there does appear a snatch of melody, which may possibly be beautiful. I say possibly, for we wander through such a dreary waste of harmonic, occasionally dis-harmonic, chords and combinations, to me wearisome in the extreme at a second hearing, though friends have been to hear Lohengrin no less than ten times, and as they assure me with ever increasing delight; through such a barren desert of tones in the high and middle registers, rambling and disconnected to all mortal senses,—how the unfortunate singers ever make it possible to memorize their parts is an unfathomable mystery,—that the thirsty, fainting ear drinks up every little rill of melody with an eagerness which makes it absolutely impossible to judge of its intrinsic worth, and we are much inclined to mistake a pool for an ocean, and a blade of grass for a tree. I repeat then, those melodies may possibly be beautiful, and W. should be given credit for them if they are original, not "reminiscences," if not conscious plagiarisms from the works of other more fortunate composers, as I strongly suspect. Of one passage, one of the best in the work, I know this to be the case; a prayer of King Henry's in the first act, which must instantly recall to any one the hymn of the Priests of Isis in the Zauberflöte.

I question if W. ever composed a melody, was ever blessed with a single musical inspiration in his life. From this barrenness, and the consciousness of it, no doubt, first sprang those peculiar views that seem to have since grown into a fixed creed,—noticed in your columns some time back,—among them this: "that harmony is more the real essence of music than melody." And yet this is absolutely like separating soul and body and casting the soul away as something that may be very well dispensed with.

Melody is unquestionably the imperishable part, the divinely inspired, the heavenly born, the portion not "made by man" in music; melody is to a composition, what the idea is to a poem. A composition without melody is what a poem would be without an idea, a mere play and jumble of meaningless words and phrases. And that W.'s philosophy is not the result of independent reasoning and conviction, but the outgrowth of his poverty of ideas, is made very evident by that with which he attempts to supply the deficiency. He substitutes declamation; the spoken word has taken the place that melody once held, and the harmony that accompanies it is but to give a more vivid coloring to the emotion thus expressed. Deprive him of the word, his staff and his support, or of at least a given definite subject, such as others of the same school, Liszt and Berlioz, for instance, have chosen for their "tone-paintings," and we should see how soon his muse would be reduced to absolute beggary, and die of woeful starvation.

Yet he thus not only does away with the immortal essence of music, but perverts, it seems to me, its very nature: which is to express just that which is inexpressible otherwise, to translate and embody all those exquisitely delicate shades of sentiment, those infinitely subtle emotions of which the word is at best but a coarse interpreter, and in many cases none at all. Music with him is no longer a queen, reigning supreme in her own right and in her own peculiar realm, but reduced to serve another art, degraded to a mere slave and handmaiden of the word.

How and why, in spite of all this, Wagner and the "music of the future" number many and very enthusiastic admirers, both among the uninitiated and professional musicians, particularly among the young rising "generation of genius," is upon second thought not very difficult to explain. Naturally such coarse, direct, and, if I may use the term, naked expression of sentiment as is this "tone-painting;"—a high, shrill note for the "height of anguish," a low, gloomy one for the "depth of despair," a loud thump of the kettle-drums for a burst of passion of any kind, to give only a few instances; a mode of expression utterly devoid of that delicate symbolism which is the very essence of poetry,—is much more comprehensible and intelligible to most people than the more subtle interpretations of the emotions of the soul which the great masters have given us, and which, I have no doubt, often appear to the "multitude at large" as a "book sealed with seven seals." As a matter of course, they take kindly to the man who talks "plain English" to them. And more than this, there is an undeniable charm and fascination, an interest that does not easily flag, about witnessing the display of great intellectual powers, no matter how they may be employed, such as undoubtedly appear in W.'s works, only this charm is as widely different from musical enjoyment as one of W.'s arias, or "musical declamations," is from one of Beethoven's immortal Symphonies.

But the reason why many young musicians swear by W. is still another, though certainly no better one. They delight in his works because they feel the possibility, the growing, if not the present, power of doing just as much as soon as they shall have sufficiently mastered the technical forms of the art. They perceive that these productions are but the direct, unclothed expression of certain passions and emotions which they too possess,—nay, which we all possess in common, and give utterance to in some shape or other, or could, if we received the proper training, and which they too will certainly be able to embody, at some time or other, in new and unheard of vocal and instrumental combinations and effects. If this man be a genius, having done this, I too am a genius, for I too can do this,—is the secret sentiment, whether acknowledged and confessed or unconsciously cherished, makes little difference; and of course the "Anch' io son pittore!" feeling is altogether too pleasant and delightful not to be grasped at, and clung fast too, at the very first opportunity. No wonder they hail as an apostle and a "Messiah" the man who inspires them with so great an idea of their own gifts, so firm a conviction of, and confidence in, their own creative power. Were his creed universally accepted, "the world," in the expressive words of a friend, "would soon be swarming with geniuses." Yet I scarcely fear that such will ever be the case. I believe that with W.'s death "the music of the future" will at once become a thing of the past, and ere long perish entirely, as many another system, containing no elements of life, no germs of immortal existence, passed away with its founder.

Thinking of Wagner and his works, I am reminded of one of H. C. Andersen's most charming stories: how little Kay, held captive in the barren palace of the Snow Queen, amused himself by arranging great, shining blocks of ice into all kinds of figures. "That was the cold play of the intellect," says Andersen. He succeeded in making all manner of shapes and constellations; there was but one figure he could never form; one word, the one word that would have broken the charm and given him freedom, the word Eternity.

This communication, dear Journal, has already swelled to more than three times the length originally intended for it, and I feel it high time to stop, though of course these few stray hints have far from exhausted this vexed question of the "music of the future." Heaven help our grandchildren! I cannot help exclaiming inwardly, when I think of the possibility that this "necessary evil" might be "handed down untarnished to coming generations!"

Brooklyn, N. Y., May 12th, 1871.

R. ST. L.

What They Say of the Passion Music.

[Continued from page 30.]

[From the Sunday Courier.]

The composer has displayed his greatest power in the choruses and orchestration. The hymnal, "I will stay here beside Thee," is impressively solemn in its rich harmony and devotional inspiration. Many of the selections are heavy, challenging critical study, but presenting but occasional glimpses of that melodic beauty that delights the ear, and there is a feeling not altogether peculiar to this particular composition, but applicable to the composer's works in general, of the want of soul, [!:]—of the living inspirational warmth that glows in the richest works of Handel, Haydn and Mendelssohn.

In contrast to the preceding portions, which are wanting in this living element, the superb chorus, "Ye lightning, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanished" stands out like a beacon light over a waste of waters. In subject and construction this chorus is in a degree suggestive of the halstone chorus in "Israel," although the composer in his original treatment of the parts dispels any analogy that might be instituted. The number is vigorous and inspiring, yet not altogether free from thinness, [!:] and not reflecting the intensity and grandeur of the powerfully dramatic passage which it describes.

The great effect produced by this number was largely due to its magnificent rendering by the chorus, which infused a spirit and abandon into its performance that would have rendered the veriest commonplace brilliant. The chorus was enthusiastically redemanded, forming the only demonstration of the kind elicited. Following the choral came another fine chorus, and the concluding double chorus, which was surpassingly grand in its wealth of splendid harmonies.

The principal solo work was the aria "Grief and Pain," for contralto, sung by Miss Sterling; "Oh, could my Love for Thee avail," for tenor, sung by Mr. Winch; "Gladly will I, all resigning," for bass, grandly given by Mr. Whitney, who was not, however, in his best voice; "O pardon me, my God," for soprano, sung with plaintive tenderness and eloquent power, by Mme. Rudersdorf; and an exquisite duet for soprano and alto, "Alas, my Jesus now is taken," executed with refined feeling and delicacy by Mme. Rudersdorf and Miss Sterling. The music was altogether gratifying beyond expectation, and for a first performance, was given with remarkable precision and fidelity, the beautiful accompaniment of the orchestra forming not the least of its attractions.

[From the Commonwealth.]

Saturday evening the cent of the Festival was realized—the presentation of Bach's "Passion Music of St. Matthew," and, for the first time in this country, Bennett's "Woman of Samaria;" the one full of depth, thoroughly original, and only such as Bach could write; the other comparatively light, pleasing, and, as far as the subject would let it be, sensuous; the former to be judged by many hearings, or even fairly understood in all its wealth; the latter showing most of its beauties at a single hearing. Bach's music is deeply enjoyed by musicians; Bennett's by the public at large. The Passion Music was written one hundred and fifty years ago, and was unnoticed and forgotten until Bach had been dead some eighty years, when it was resurrected by Mendelssohn, under whose direction it was performed at Leipzig. Sterndale Bennett produced it in London in 1853, since when it has been heard there a few times; but probably it has never been given with such richness of resources (!) and under such favorable circumstances as with us on Saturday night. Only a small portion of one of the "passions" (the one according to St. Matthew) was performed, and this has aroused a strong desire to hear the whole. The words sung were the translation of Mr. John S. Dwight, a pronounced admirer of Bach, who has waited long and labored earnestly to secure so much of a hearing for him as has been vouchsafed. The chorus sang the difficult music with a precision and power that was hardly expected; the chorale, "I will stay here beside thee," and "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," a strong, emphatic double chorus were gloriously done, and the latter gained a deserved encore. Throughout the chorus were steady, and seldom have they sung better than in the above, and in the very trying concluding chorale, "Around thy Tomb." The solo singers, Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Sterling, Messrs. Winch and Whitney, did finely also, and all listeners were deeply gratified.

[From the Worcester Palladium.]

The rehearsal of Bach's Passion Music, on Friday evening, afforded an opportunity for those who must leave town before its public performance, to listen to its beauty, and get an insight of the massive grandeur of the whole work. The numbers selected for performance were those most likely to interest at a first hearing, and that they awakened a lively interest was evident from the close attention given by the audience. The work is one where the interest never flags for a moment; its solos are all of great beauty, and its choruses grand beyond description. The colossal double chorus, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," was thrilling in its intensity. The concluding chorus, although so full of mourning, has a noble bearing of triumph, for though so stamped with weeping and sorrow, it is also full of hope and perfect faith. The work is a grand one, and must, in time, become a part of all hearts, as the "Messiah" now is. Dr. Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" interested, but its strains seemed tame after the grand Passion Music.

[From the New York Sun.]

As to Bach's music I have no words to express its beauty. Mr. Zerrahn had selected apparently such chorales, choruses, and solos as would be most readily apprehended by an audience unfamiliar with the quaint style of this master. The result was in every way gratifying. A spirit of the purest and truest devotion was manifest in every note of the music. It was written from the glowing heart of a great musician—a man who comprehended every resource of his art and had all its materials at his absolute command. Such fervent strains no other has produced, save perhaps Handel.

Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Sterling, Mr. Winch, and Mr. Whitney sang the solo parts, and these, as well as the choral portions, were admirably rendered.

Bennett's short oratorio, the "Woman of Samaria," succeeded the Passion music; but Bach, by contrast, took all the color and life out of Bennett's work and made it seem dull and barren, though really it is a very clever composition.

[From the New York Tribune.]

The evening was devoted to the most interesting programme of the week, for it contained two choral works entirely new in America, one of them being the greatest composition of one of the greatest of all the old masters, and the most difficult production as a whole that the Handel and Haydn Society has yet attempted. I mean, of course, the "Matthæus Passion" of Johann Sebastian Bach. More than a year ago the Society made preparations to bring out this gigantic work, but the plan was changed, and a few selections only were given [as] parts of a miscellaneous concert programme. Even now they have not ventured to sing the whole. They have picked out sixteen numbers—about a quarter of the entire work; but these have been selected with such excellent judgment that we get from them an idea not only of the majesty and richness of the music, but of the wonderful dramatic power with which Bach treated the awful story of the Passion. All but three are taken from the First Part. We have the narratives of the anointing of Jesus's feet, the Last Supper, and the Agony in the Garden. We have the tremendous double chorus, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders!" which follows the apprehension of Christ at Gethsemane. We have the beautiful contralto aria, Erbarme dich ("O pardon me, my God"), the choral, "O head all bruised and wounded," and the splendid final chorus, "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping." This gives an outline of the whole sacred poem, and at the same time preserves the continuity of the most dramatic passages. The performance reflected great credit upon the Society and their estimable conductor, yet I must confess that it was the least satisfactory effort of the week. There was very little fault to be found with the chorus. The noble chorals were delivered with dignity and precision; the famous "Ye lightnings, ye thunders" was encored, as it well deserved to be; and the immortal finale, "Around thy tomb" (Wir setzen uns)—in eight parts—was one of the best things heard to-day. But the solo singers were all unequal to the demand upon their powers. Mme. Rudersdorff took the contralto air, Erbarme dich, which is somewhat below the best register of her voice. She showed but an imperfect comprehension of the inner character of Bach's music, whose pathos is always elevated and ennobled in such an extraordinary manner by the union of religious fervor and majestic simplicity. Her delivery was sentimental where it ought to have been tender, and exaggerated where it ought to have been simple. An habitual tendency to excess in the sfz style she here indulged to a most unfortunate extent. Miss Sterling had a much more genuine appreciation of the work, but her "Grief and pain" solo was almost as remarkable for lack of color as Mme. Rudersdorff's was for its superabundance. Mr. Whitney struggled with a part beyond his strength, and Mr. Wm. J. Winch, who had the exquisite tenor music of the Evangelist, made havoc of what should have been the most beautiful portion of the oratorio. He showed a right conception of his part, but he had neither the physical gifts nor the artistic training to do it justice.

[From the Evening Post.]

The selections were admirably made; the most admirable numbers being "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," and the last chorus, "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping," two of the most magnificent contrapuntal efforts and superb dramatic effects ever put to paper. Of all men Bach, unlike the majority of composers, pursued the study of music with all the thought he could command. While others create according to chance, or at best as a happy instinct guides them, he was deeply susceptible of the changeable conditions of life, and was influenced by such. And here we have to thank Mendelssohn for the manner in which, during his lifetime, he attracted thousands to the study of Bach and Handel; how with his works he opened out, for the whole world, a new appreciation of these men whose immortal fame will always be ours, yet whom, until very recent years, we have seemed to have forgotten. Many who have cared to hear little else save Parisian and Italian music have had new pleasures opened to them in Mendelssohn. When Mendelssohn placed Handel, Bach and Beethoven as foundation posts of all further progress in modern music, he brought great changes, not only into production, but into the current traditional aspect of things. And hence the effort made last night to produce Bach, even in fragments, is the result on this continent of the seed sown by one of the greatest musicians and scholars of modern times in the old world. It was a glorious night in the history of the Handel and Haydn Society, and one that will be remembered with pride in the musical records of this great country. Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Antoinette Sterling, and the Messrs. Winch and Whitney rendered with much care and judgment the parts assigned to them.

[From the Philadelphia Bulletin.]

As to the selections presented to-night it must have agreeably surprised many, with myself, to find themselves not only comprehending this wonderful music, but thoroughly interested in and attracted by it. It is difficult music, indeed, and is not to be approached by any but artists. If it is not perfectly performed, it is impossible to get even the faintest perception of its deep meaning and spiritual beauty. The very highest praise, therefore, which I can give Mr. Zerrahn and this splendid Society is to say that I did not, as I had been told I would, find the music quaint, learned and incomprehensible. On the contrary, at its first hearing, I recognized a purity and a sublimity in these wonderful dramatic solos and choruses that I had least looked for in Bach, of all writers. That would not, however, have been my pleasant experience had not the difficult intervals and unaccustomed modulations which throng thickly in these noble choruses been thoroughly mastered by every member of this vast array of seven hundred singers. Get a copy of the score and give it a cursory inspection, and then comprehend the wonderful triumph of the Handel and Haydn to-night, in interesting an audience of three thousand people in this music. Their encouraging success must incite them to a production of the entire oratorio at some not distant day.

In the Passion Music, Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Sterling and Mr. Whitney sang the solos. None but a thoroughly accomplished singer dare attempt the exquisitely pathetic aria, "O pardon me, my God." Mme. Rudersdorff was great in this solo, the lovely and very difficult violin obligato to which was performed by Mr. Lietemann, the leading violin, with perfect expression and intelligent fidelity to the text. Miss Sterling's solo was the "Grief and pain wring the guilty heart in twain." She also was in full sympathy with the music, and infused into her interpretation all the soulful pathos and intelligent expression for which her talent and noble voice particularly qualify her. The tenor solo and double chorus, "I'll watch with my dear Jesus always," with its beautiful oboe obligato, performed by Mr. Eller, of the Thomas Orchestra, is one of the great numbers of the oratorio. The solo was creditably sung by Mr. Winch, and the chorus did their taxing part wonderfully well. Thoroughly dramatic and full of inspiration is the duet for soprano and alto, with double chorus, "Alas! my Jesus now is taken," with passionate utterances of the chorus coming in with sublime effect. "Leave Him, leave Him, bind Him not!" The tremendous climax of this massive chorus, "O! blast the betrayer, the murderous brood," is great in its overpowering intensity. With the rest of the choruses, it was grandly sung.

Music In New York.

THE LAST CONCERT OF THE EUTERPE SOCIETY. There is a certain enthusiasm in musical art in this city who, like most of his tribe, is more of an artist than a manager, and who undertook this year to get up a society that should devote itself to the bringing out of new pieces by American composers, and should fulfil various other noble, beautiful, and disinterested missions. The name of this gentle and talented, but misguided man, is John P. Morgan. His Society is named after the fairest and best of the Muses, Euterpe. But the Muse has miserably failed to take care of her worshippers, and the Society went from bad to worse, till it culminated on Thursday evening in a curious collapse. The programme was a superlatively excellent one. It may be remarked that it is one of the peculiarities of this unfortunate organization, that their programmes are better and their concerts worse than almost any we have ever known.

By way of elucidation, we give the list of compositions announced for performance on Thursday evening:

1. Motet.....Hauptmann.
2. Aria d'Eglise.....A. Stradella.
3. Song of the Wrens.....To be sung by Miss Brainerd.
4. Quintet, for piano and strings.....Schumann.
5. Aria from Bach's Passion Music. To be sung by Miss Sterling.
6. Motet, in eight parts.....Hauptmann.
7. Ballade of Chopin.....Wm. Mason.
8. Motet.....Bach.

What more could the most exacting of audiences ask than this? Every piece gave splendid promise. Hauptmann is one of the more severely excellent of modern composers, and the rest, Bach, Chopin, Stradella, and Schumann, are all geniuses. But, nevertheless, the Society came to grief. It was all well enough on paper, but when it came to the performance, there was a melancholy showing.

The first two numbers went of well enough. But when it came Miss Brainerd's turn there was no Brainerd. So poor Mr. Morgan laid down his baton and came out with a rueful face to say so. He had received a note from Miss Brainerd, and she wasn't well; but Miss Sterling could take her place.

It is to be noticed that whenever there is a particularly good natured thing to be done in a concert room, Miss Sterling is the one to do it. Faithful among the faithless, she often supplies the position of absentees, the bloom of kindness not having yet been rubbed off by time. So Miss Brainerd was not greatly missed, for Miss Sterling sang very charmingly two of Hauptmann's Marienlieder.

Then came the quintet, and forward came Mr. Morgan to say that arrangements were not yet complete, and Mr. Mason would play instead. And so he did.

Then the eight-part motet was struggled bravely through, and Miss Sterling sang again.

At this point the concert fairly broke down. For the third time the dejected Morgan came forward and made a speech, substantially as follows:

"LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: This is the most unpleasant duty I ever had to perform. We can't have the quintet. Through some intrigue, I fear, the viola player has not come, and I have sent everywhere to get one, but can't. My chorus is so depleted that we can't sing the Bach motet. It would be a farce for us to try to do so. I think, therefore, you will have to go home. But before you go, I want to say just one word. This Society is the victim of bad management. It has been the worst managed affair I ever knew of. And I am going to denounce the culprit and to expose his name. His name, ladies and gentlemen, is John P. Morgan. And I'm the man. If any of you have any business matters on hand, don't trust them to me. I intend to give concerts next season with this Society, but I give you notice beforehand that I shall have nothing to do with the business management. If artists fail, and musicians run away, and choristers keep out of sight, it won't be my fault. I wish you a very good evening."

Now, this is what we call honest. It is not every man that has the wisdom to see his weak points, and fewer still that have the pluck to stand up before an audience and tell them. So, as an offset to honest John Morgan's lack of business qualities, the audience could easily certify to his integrity, simplicity,

3. That scales do not interfere with five-finger practice, and, therefore may be learned very early with decided advantage.

4. That a systematic use of accents, as a means of increasing the strength and gaining control of the fingers, is of the highest utility.

4. That for culture and recreation, a variety of beautiful compositions should be played, and that such a training of the hands should precede, that each one, when attempted, may seem comparatively easy.

Every page of this remarkable book bears impress of thought and judgment. The first lesson is easier than we have seen it anywhere else. The first three pages are devoted to explaining the correct position of the hands, and five illustrations are given. In the first actual experiment in playing, the pupil has nothing of notes or letters to distract his attention. He is not even taught the names of the keys. He has merely nineteen exercises to play, such as these: Right, 4 2 + 3, 4 3 1 3, 4 3 2 +, 1, 2 3 2 +, 3 4 3 1, + 1 2 1, +.

Then come the names of the keys, and then some lessons in rhythm, based on quarters and halves in double time. For instance (yet no pitch notation, only the general direction to place the thumb of the right hand on C): No. 24.

And now, at length, we come to the staff and the treble clef, and exercises like this:

Then follow many exercises in five-finger positions, with a second part for the teacher. There is no doubt of the value of this kind of duet practice in the early stages of playing. All great teachers have been advocates of it. The lessons in this part of the book are taken mainly from Beyer, and we like particularly that credit is given. This is a point of honesty that some book-makers never reach. At about the sixth lesson a simple accent exercise is found. The bass staff comes at about the eighth lesson. The chromatic scale about the tenth,—and this for a small pupil of eight or ten years.

But not to extend these remarks, it remains to say this: This "System for Beginners" is what we have long looked for in vain—an elementary book, easy enough to be interesting, progressive in its arrangement, and sufficiently thoughtful to command the respect of the best teacher. Every step is practicable; yet every step is forward; and the ultimate goal is the modern method of piano playing, and not that of our grandfathers.

* System for Beginners in the Art of Playing the Piano-forte, William Mason and E. S. Hoadley. Boston: Ditson & Co. Chicago: Lyon and Healy. 1871.

Music Abroad.

BERLIN. At the Royal Opera house, on the 30th April, Herr Niemann took leave for this season of the public, the opera being Frithjof. Mdle. Mallinger and Herr Betz were shortly to follow his example, so that the winter season may be considered to have closed on the 1st of May. The following is a summary of what has been done between that date and the middle of August, 1870. The number of operatic performances was 162; the number of different works, 42. The novelties were Zieten-Husaren, on the 17th October, and Frithjof, on the 11th April. The following is a list of the other operas performed, and of the number of times each was represented:—Il Barbiere, Fidelio, nine times each; Il Trovatore, Les Huguenots, Jessonda, eight times each; Don Juan, seven times; Der Freischütz, Faust, Lohengrin, Le Philtre, six times each; Feldlager in Schlesien, Die Zauberflöte, Tannhäuser, five times each; Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, Fra Diavolo, Le Nozze, Mignon, Zieten-Husaren, Arvide, Frithjof, four times each; Norma, Nachtlager in Granada, Les Diamants de la Couronne, La Muette de Portici, Romeo e Julia (Gounod), L'Africaine, Robert le Diable, Martha, three times each; Czaar und Zimmermann, Iphigenia in Aulis, Die beiden Schützen, Oberon, La Juive, Guillaume Tell, Joseph et ses Frères, twice each; Le Prophète, Rienzi, Violette, Le Macon, Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, Lucia di Lammermoor, and Le Domino Noir, one each. In addition to the above, there was, on one occasion, a miscellaneous performance, consisting of the first act of Lohengrin, and the second act of Das Feldlager in Schlesien. Thus, Gluck was represented by two operas and six performances; Beethoven, by one opera and nine performances; Mozart, by three operas and sixteen performances; Weber, by two operas and eight performances; Meyerbeer, by five operas and twenty performances; Richard Wagner, by four operas and sixteen performances; Méhul, by one opera and two performances; Auber, by five operas and twelve performances; Gounod, by two operas and nine performances; Thomas, by one opera and four performances; Rossini, by two operas and eleven performances; Bellini, by one opera and three performances; Donizetti, by two operas and seven performances; Verdi, by two operas and nine performances; Spohr, by one opera and eight performances; Kreutzer and Nicolai, by one opera and one performance each; Flotow, by one opera and three performances; Lortzing, by two operas and four performances; Halévy, by one opera and two performances; Schulz, by one opera and four performances. During the above period, moreover, Mdme. Lucca appeared nineteen times; Mdme. Mallinger, fifty-four times; Herr Niemann, fifty-seven times; and Herr Betz, eighty-one times. —The Emperor has accepted the dedication of Herr Carl Reinecke's "Festival Peace Overture," and conferred the Crown Order, fourth class, upon the composer.

Another new book by the great Musician of the Future, alias the Lion of the Present, is On the Performance of the Stage-Festival Play, "Der Ring der Nibelungen," a Communication and Summons to the Friends of his Art. A concert was to be given, on the 5th inst., by Herr R. W., assisted by the Royal chapel and the chorus from the Royal Opera house. The programme was to comprise: "Kaisermarsch," R. Wagner; Symphony in C minor, Beethoven; Prelude from Lohengrin, R. Wagner; Final scene from Die Walküre, R. Wagner; and finale to the first act of Lohengrin, R. Wagner.

WAGNER IN BERLIN. Herr Wagner has been little more than a week prominently before the Berlin public, but during that short period he has been the cause of quite as much discussion as he generally contrives to excite. On the 28th of last month he delivered in the presence of the Berlin Academy of Arts—of which body he is a member—a lecture upon "Opera;" and on the following day a supper was given to him in the Hôtel de Rome. Nine o'clock was the hour fixed for the banquet: but it was ten before the entrance of Herr Wagner permitted the 150 visitors present to attack a bill of fare which, according to English ideas, was far better adapted to a dinner than a supper. A certain Herr Tappert afterwards welcomed the hero of the evening in an address which, being chiefly alliterative, would lose its sole characteristic in the process of translation. Herr Wagner's reply was by no means wanting in adroitness. He insisted upon the necessity—naturally referring to the late war—of Germans being independent in every act of foreign influence. He required for music nothing but truth of expression. Music had been degraded from a sublime to a merely pleasing art. "If music is really sublime, it has nothing to do with mere euphony (so hat sie mit blossen Wohlklang nichts zu thun.) The German spirit bears the same relation to music as to religion: it requires truth, not beautiful forms." Herr Wagner went on to indulge in a number of original paradoxes, and concluded by declaring that "dramatic music had suffered more than any other art by Italian influence, and that this same influence had produced the most serious errors in opera." "To impregnate the musical drama with German matter has been from the first my desire." He spoke in the simple, earnest manner of a man who was firmly convinced of the absolute truth of the observations he was making, and his startling assertions were, of course, received by his hearers with enthusiastic reverence. All Herr Wagner's ideas of music are, from the Wagner point of view, natural enough—he denies the power in which he himself is deficient. It seems to be his steady, unshaken belief in himself and his doctrines that impels him to his frequent flagrant sins against good taste and good manners. Of this peculiarity the morning following the supper afforded a singular instance.

On that morning the musicians gave him a musical welcome. So great was the desire to be present, that the large handsome hall of the Singakademie was crammed to excess, and the majority of the men present appeared in full evening dress at midday in honor of the occasion. When Herr Wagner entered the room, his wife, a daughter of Liszt, on his arm, he was received with a flourish of trumpets and shouts of applause. Frau Jachmann-Wagner, in full ball-room attire, then mounted the platform, spoke an address from the facile pen of Herr Dohm, editor of Kladderadatsch, and presented the composer with a laurel wreath and a kiss. Frau Jachmann-Wagner, now an actress, is better known in England under her operatic name, Johanna Wagner, and is a niece of the prophet of the future. The "Faust" overture was played with much more care than such hideousness deserved, and gratified the composer so much that he mounted the platform, thanked the executors, and by way of expressing his gratitude, asked them to repeat the overture—this time under his direction. In other words, in a concert given in his honor, the composer actually encored his own composition! It is not to be supposed that Herr Wagner intended any direct insult to the former conductor, to the executors, or to the audience. It should rather be believed that he was tempted to this flagrant act of bad taste by his perfectly unaffected but overweening self-confidence. The good-humored audience seemed to consider the proceeding natural enough, and listened with redoubled eagerness to a polyphonic picture of "chaos come again."—Orchestra, May 12.

COLOGNE. The Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine will be held here from the 28th to the 30th inst. According to the present arrangements, the programme will be as follows: First Day—"Sieges-Overture," Reinecke; "Worte der Weihe," a poem written and spoken by Herr Rittershaus; "Ein feste Burg," J. Seb. Bach; "Hymn," the words selected from Holy Writ, and the music composed by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller; Ninth Symphony, Beethoven. Second Day—"Joshua," Handel. Third Day, Symphony (as yet undecided): Violin Concerto (as yet undecided, but the executant will be Herr Joachim): Overture to Iphigenia, Gluck; Coronation Hymn, Handel. The second part of the concert will be made up of various solo performances, vocal and instrumental. The whole will conclude with the Overture to Der Freischütz. Among the artists already engaged, are Madame Bellingrath-Wagner, Madame and Herr Joachim, and Herr J. Stockhausen. Who the tenor will be is as yet unknown.

London.

THE MUSICAL UNION. Mr. Ella's twenty-seventh season has been commenced with the director's usual spirit, his quartet party being partly new to the subscribers, and consisting of M. Sivori, first violin: M. Otto Bernhardt, second: M. Van Waefelghen, tenor: and M. Lasarre, a finished and able artist, as violoncellist. At the first matinée, two well-known quartets, Mozart in D, No. 10, and Haydn in E, No. 61, were admirably played, and the other pièce de resistance was Beethoven's magnificent pianoforte trio in D, Op. 70, in which M. Baur, a Russian pianist of great intelligence, and a pupil of Liszt, was at the keyboard. He subsequently gave as a solo, Schubert's Impromptu in A flat, and M. Sivori delighted the audience with his performance of a cavatina by the young German composer Raff, which called forth more enthusiasm than any other number in the programme, and was deservedly encored. At the second matinée last week, Herr Reinecke was the pianist, the string quartet remaining as at the first concert. The quartets were Beethoven in B flat, Op. 18, No. 6, and Reinecke in E flat, Op. 34, in which the composer played. In Mendelssohn's quintet in B flat, Op. 87, Mr. Hann joined the strings. The chief feature of the concert was Herr Reinecke's playing, and his solos, including his own Nocturno in A flat, were warmly received. Mr. Ella promises Herr Jaell as the pianist at the next two matinées, and Herr Auer, who is always a welcome visitor, will take M. Sivori's post later in the season.

THE ORATORIO CONCERTS. Mr. Barnby, keeping his best things until the last, concluded his really fine series of concerts last Friday with a performance well calculated to test the strength of his forces—orchestral and choral—Beethoven's Mass in D, and the Choral Symphony. To listen to these two great works on the same evening, and to give them throughout an attentive and appreciative hearing requires some power of mental concentration on the part of the audience, but the difficulties to the performers were far greater, and they deserve the highest credit for the way in which they acquitted themselves. The choral portions of both Mass and Symphony were most admirably given, far above the average indeed, but the playing of the band showed that at times they were hardly en rapport with the conductor, owing probably to a want of sufficient rehearsal. The trying work allotted to the soloists was undertaken by Mdle. Cora de Wilhorst, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Herr Stepan, with fair success. The applause which greeted Mr. Barnby was honestly deserved, for few young conductors have done more to earn a title to public favor in so short a time—Choir, May 12.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 8, 1871.

Second Triennial Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society.

THIRD DAY. THURSDAY, MAY 11.

The second Orchestral and Vocal Concert, at 3 P. M., had not so large an attendance as such a programme, with such an orchestra of more than a hundred instruments, and such solo artists, seemed to warrant.

Overture: "Nachklänge aus Ossian".....Gade.
Aria: "Fecit ut portem," (Stabat Mater).....Rossini.
Concerto, for Piano-forte, with Orchestra.....Schumann.
Cavatina: "Robert; toi qui j'aime".....Meyerbeer.
Air, from Orchestral Suite to D.....Bach.
Symphony (C major).....Schubert.

The strength of this programme was in the orchestral pieces. The great feature, the ever glorious Schubert Symphony, a concert in itself, suffered somewhat by coming after so much other (not particularly well assorted) matter; in spite of the exceptionally grand orchestra, we have heard it more than once before when it has uplifted and transported us with more unflinching power. But there were some traits of rare beauty in the performance, such as Mr. Eller's oboe in the Andante theme, and the marvellous charm of that body of violoncello tone in other parts of the same movement: of course, too, the thundering emphasis of the double basses in the resistless on-sweep of the Finale was more than ever impressive. Gade's "Ossian" Overture made a refreshing, fascinating opening, gently quickening the imagination, while, like the seashore, it brought rest to the weary nerves. It has the Ossian poetry. It was evenly and smoothly played.

The Bach Aria, so quiet and serene, full of that wholesome, sweet repose in which the soul is not asleep, afforded also one of those moments of refreshment needed in so long and exciting a festival. But one naturally hoped to hear it followed by the quaint Garotte, far better worth the time than the trivial vocal bit by which it was preceded. And, of a truth, the vocal selections were not in keeping with the instrumental. Mme. RUDERSDORFF could hardly have chosen the hacknied "Robert" Cavatina for any other purpose than to show the intense dramatic power which is one of her strong points: and she seemed to know the kind of audience who wildly encored, in that she sang for them one of those silly, whooping Spanish songs which are rare fun for the gallery in a third class theatre. But it all showed the abundant vitality, and versatility and good nature of the woman. Nor had the Rossini Stabat Mater Aria, beautifully, though coldly, sung in the rich voice of Miss ANNIE CARY,—any particular raison d'être as coming between the Ossian Overture and Schumann's wonderful Concerto in A minor. This thoughtful, imaginative, and thoroughly artistic work was somewhat stiffly rendered, though from memory—more memory than reproductive feeling—but gave a new and brilliant instance of the faultless and triumphant technical virtuosity of the young pianist, MARIE KRENS.

EVENING. "ISRAEL IN EGYPT."

For the first time in this country this colossal Oratorio of Handel was essayed entire. For a Festival of the Handel & Haydn Society on its fiftieth anniversary, June, 1865, it was rehearsed, but proved too much for the choral means of that time, so that only an abridgement of it came to actual public performance; and that was unsatisfactory, mainly by reason of the absence of so many important choruses, and connecting links in the shape of quaint but necessary colts, thus aggravating its "monotony" of grandeur, as well as by imperfect mastery of those parts which were given. Still more fragmentary, crude and feeble, of course, were certain earlier attempts, by this and by the long defunct Musical Education Society, to do this work. But now at last we have had the whole herculean task at least earnestly and honestly achieved, and with a very flattering measure of success. With all its imperfections, we regard this rendering as a triumph. Faithfully and bravely followed up, it will become as easy and as sure a thing for this Society, as the "Elijah" is already; and we all remember when to chorus singers the style of Mendelssohn was stranger and more difficult to feel at home with than anything in Handel, or even Bach, can now be. And, by this token, "Israel" is bound to become popular with us, as it has long been in Germany and in England. More marked than the improvement in performance, is the progress, both with singers and with public, in the appreciation of the music: it would astonish were we to cite some of the newspaper criticisms of those former days side by side with the uniformly respectful, the deeply impressed, delighted tone of the comments upon this occasion.

The unflagging grandeur and sublimity, the vivid imagery, the stupendous scene-shifting—sometimes instantaneous, by a single chord, as when a lightning flash lights up the night, always in the stately preparation of one wonder by another, chorus upon chorus, miracle on miracle,—the great lights and shadows, the long repeated, now approaching, now receding, echo of the contrapuntal thunders, of that great mountain range of choruses, was palpable enough in mass and substance, clear enough in outline, precise and positive enough in all main strokes, in spite of confusion and timidity in details here and there, to awe and elevate the listening crowd, and keep expectation fresh unto the end.

There was a sense of wholesome feeling in the completeness of this effort. Every chorus, every recitative and curious Air, even those in the "Appendix," happily adapted from other works of Handel by Sir George Smart (only excepting the Bass air: "He layeth the beams," which is not an integral part of the work), was given,—much to the relief and lightening, we do believe, of any "heaviness" which may have attached to old abridged presentations of the work; it is a case where the whole is lighter (more elastic) than a part.

Of the Solos we will speak first, as the greatest novelty. The First Part, as left by Handel, contains nothing but two bits of Tenor recitative (one ushering in the great opening chorus expressing the sighs of the children of Israel in bondage, the other immediately after it: "Then sent He Moses," to introduce the series of "plagues of Egypt," both delivered with true simplicity and dignity of style, and with distinct enunciation, by Mr. CUMMINGS), and one Aria: "Their land brought forth frogs," &c., grotesquely graphic with its hopping violin figure, but a serious and melodious air enough, which Miss STERLING sang in her rich tones with large, simple, sustained style, not straining for too much expression. Moreover, of Sir George Smart's interpolations there were given two noble pieces of Soprano Recitative: "Thrice happy Israel in the light of God," and "But soon as Pharaoh," which gave room for some of the best tones and the thrilling declamation of Mme. RUDERSDORFF. Then a grand one for the Bass: "He measured the waters" (without the Air: "He layeth the beams"); and, a little further on, another: "God, looking down, confounded all their host," followed by the bold and graphic Air: "Wave from wave, congealed with wonder, stood, a crystal wall, asunder;"—all given in majestic tone and style by Mr. WHITNEY.

In the Second Part, after the great opening chorus (the Song of Moses), comes a Duet for Sopranos: "The Lord is my strength," a musing minor strain, begun by one voice after the other, canon-like, in successive fragments, truly beautiful and quaint, the voices joining in exulting, bird-like triplets near the end, and carefully and nicely sung by Mme. RUDERSDORFF and Mrs. WEST, though in quality their voices are not very sympathetic. A little further and we come to the great Duet of Basses: "The Lord is a man of war," which they say was begun badly, but which leaves on our mind as a whole the impression of very admirable singing on the part (equally) of Mr. J. F. WINCH and Mr. WHITNEY; we would fain have heard the former oftener, for there is a peculiar delicacy, an elasticity in his tones and his delivery; and his voice, if not as ponderous as Mr. Whitney's, is yet a great one; one would say, too, that he studied, with a right artistic spirit. This piece pleased so well that it required firmness to refuse a repetition. In the trying Air: "The enemy said, I will pursue," Mr. Cummings gave further proof of his intelligent, chaste, manly declamation, giving the latter part: "I will draw my sword" with fine energy. The Soprano Air, which follows it: "Thou didst blow," is quite peculiar (as it was to most entirely novel) in its half declamatory, half florid structure, and very difficult, giving opportunity however for great dramatic coloring, which Mme. Rudersdorff improved like a true artist, though it did not present her voice always to the best advantage. The Duet for Soprano and Tenor: "Thou in thy mercy," is a quiet, heart-felt strain, full of the sweet sensu of mercy and deliverance, and was sung with fit expression. There remains only the Air: "Thou shalt bring them in," a simple, tranquil, trustful melody, in low tones, where Miss Sterling's voice is very rich, and simply, beautifully sung.

Now of the great "mountain chain" of choruses (forming 28 out of the original 35 numbers of the work), it would require a description of them all to tell how well, or far from well, each one was sung; and as we have described them more than once before we will not undertake that task again. Most of them are double choruses, most of them very difficult, and some of them are long. The opening double chorus, which is a very grand one, as it were a great choral overture or prelude to the whole: "And the children of Israel sighed," was impressively rendered. The four-part fugue: "They loathed to drink," with its strangely characteristic theme, expressing the sense of "loathing" by the interval of the "extreme flat seventh," was perhaps not absolutely sure and true in intonation, yet the intricate movement of the parts was on the whole clear and effective. A difficulty, more in the single than in the double choruses, must have been experienced by the singers from the way in which they were placed, divided as they were into two choral bodies at opposite sides of the stage, so that many who were singing the same part were separated from each other by the whole width of the hall, and could hardly hear or feel each other. Moreover they had rehearsed it only once in that place and from those seats; could the stage arrangement be made permanent, rounding that end of the hall into a convenient, graceful amphitheatre, so that the rehearsals could take place there, the difficulty would be greatly remedied, for all would get to feel at home in the situation before it came to a public performance. —How aptly the "frog" air followed upon this chorus! The double chorus about "all manner of flies" was quite effective, and the fine divisions of the violins made the suggestion very vivid. The grand announcement: "He spake the word" would have been still grander, had Mendelssohn (whose arrangement of the score was used) known of the three trombone parts which Handel actually wrote for this and similar passages, and left on a separate sheet, which has since been embodied in the score in the complete Leipzig edition of Handel's works now in course of publication.—"He gave them hailstones" was the sensation of the evening; it was magnificently sung;

"fire mingled with the hail," i.e. it was sung with spirit; and all parts, orchestral and vocal, "ran along" with such a crisp and positive precision, that the scene was real. This was too good to pass off with one hearing, and the encore had to be granted. The strange, sombre modulations of "He sent a thick darkness" were palpable if not precise; and the "smiting" chorus, though here and there a little timid in attack, held attention breathless by its startling and relentless force. The pastoral simplicity and sweetness of "But as for his people, he led them forth like sheep," was smoothly, evenly and beautifully expressed.

That there should have been some signs of unsteadiness, some blurred and wavering outline here and there in such a long stretch of trying and fatiguing choral work, was to be expected, nor can it be otherwise until the same singers shall have performed it several times in public; new singing robes, especially such regal ones, must be worn, to feel at ease in them. These symptoms of constraint and insecurity were mostly noticeable in such intricate polyphonic mazes as "He led them through the deep, as through a wilderness." Here they were in the woods indeed. Eight voice parts (to say nothing of the instrumental parts), all with imitative, yet differing fragments of melodic runs and turns, heading so many ways, pausing and beginning each so fitfully and frequently, and yet all bound to strictest unity of plan, were surely involved in a task that might well be bewildering to themselves; and even should they thrice the labyrinth ever so steadily and coolly, to the average listener, with ear untrained to musical intricacies of this sort, it would still sound bewildering, as doubtless Handel meant it should, though with clear hint enough of a divine leading all the while. In this, and a few more such fugued double choruses ("Thy right hand, O Lord"; "Thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble," &c.) there may have been some blur or faltering; but not always really so much as there seemed to be, for the unfamiliarity of the general ear with movements of so intricate a structure must be taken into the account.

The same qualification must apply also to certain criticisms upon another score, that of seeming discords, or imperfect chords; for more than once, emboldened by the grandeur of these subjects, Handel used such freely; his sure instinct told him that nothing commonplace would do; and, once rightly apprehended, these exceptional effects are very grand; not all the discord must be charged to the singers.

Some of the great pictorial passages, however,—those phrases of two or three bars which engrave themselves indelibly upon the mind as complete, awe-inspiring pictures, ("The floods stood upright; "the depths were congealed," where a new chill strikes through the tones each time they are repeated in an altered key; "shall melt away;" "shall be as still as a stone;" &c., &c.), made their impression in a way that will not be forgotten. Then there are certain great broad choral sentences, or proclamations, in eight parts of course, brief and commanding, which introduce the more elaborate descriptions, such as: "He rebuked the Red Sea, and it was dried up;" "And Israel saw that great work;" the introduction to "The horse and his rider;" of these the effect was sublime, almost appalling. The more peculiarly ecclesiastical choruses, in Alla breve rhythm, ("And I will exalt him," &c.), evidently modelled upon the old church of England service music, and tracing its lineage to Palestrina, of course are not calculated to flatter the popular ear, and may seem dull to many who admire "Elijah," but they are solemn and impressive, and they bring repose at needful moments in the midst of the exciting splendors of that mighty choral and orchestral magic lantern, which in every image which it casts upon the wall (of darkness) awes you with the vivid likeness of a startling miracle. Verily Handel knew what he was about when he put in the pieces which we children fancy to be dull!

Our (possibly too trivial) simile reminds us of what we once witnessed in Berlin at Christmas time, when certain artists arranged an exhibition of transparencies,—admirable copies of great master-works of sacred painting,—and between the pictures, as we sat in the dark room, musing on what we had seen, there would resound a strain of solemn music from a choir invisible, the celebrated Dom-chor; is it not just what Handel has here done, to rest, not dissipate the mind, between his more stupendous pictures?

We should speak of the Song of Moses and the children of Israel, which begins and ends the Second Part sublimely, as one of the triumphs of this performance; just alluding by the way to the pregnant suggestion of those introductory chords in the orchestra, where the chord of each tone of the diatonic scale is sounded in succession, through its several inversions, as if preluding on a world harp, trying all its strings, preparatory to a universal song. In the intricacies of "the horse and his rider" the singers had an arduous task, but they "triumphed gloriously." Where it returns at the end, led in by Miriam's noble recitative and exhortation: "Sing ye to the Lord," to the height and grandeur of which Mme. Rudersdorff was equal, it justifies itself by the triumphant true ring of its enduring quality; and again the long tasked voices had vitality enough to bear them bravely through. Their leader's animating sign seemed present everywhere, from first to last of the whole work; and, like strong swimmers, very few gave out before they reached the shore. It was indeed a noble effort of the seven hundred, rewarded by the close attention and delight of nearly all that numerous audience; and it must have gladdened the heart of CARL ZERKAHN to feel that the severe and patient study through which he had so many nights conducted them and cheered them on, had wrought out anything so near to victory;—the beginning of sure victory it may be called, so surely as the effort in the same spirit shall be followed up. The orchestra, so far as our memory serves us, did its work well too; and the great organ (though only in part available, being still in the process of "tuning up" to "concert pitch,"—heu pricu fides!) did, under Mr. LANG's skillful and judicious treatment, solidly subsidize the deep foundation harmonies and swell the volume and extend the background of the whole Handelian tone architecture.

FOURTH DAY. FRIDAY, MAY 12.

The evening was given to rehearsal of the "Passion Music." The Afternoon Concert was as follows:

Overture to the Hindoo legend, "Sakuntala." Goldmark.
Songs. a. "Canzonetta." Mozart.
b. "Es war ein König in Thule." Liszt.
Grand Recitative and Aria—"Deeper and deeper still," and "Wait her, angels, to the skies," from "Jephtha." Handel.
Unfinished Symphony.....Schubert.
The Ninth (or "Choral") Symphony, in D minor. Op.
125. (Comp. 1822-3).....Beethoven.

This programme was too long, and also heavy. Another Symphony, even an "unfinished" one, immediately before the long Ninth Symphony, could not but seem superfluous, while the chances were that it would compromise the listening appetite with which one would approach the formidable work. Indeed neither the Schubert work, lovely as it is and finely played, nor the surfeiting and sombre "Sakuntala" Overture, which many of us have heard about enough here for one season, properly belonged in the same programme with the Choral Symphony. A new proof was it, therefore, of the vitality and greatness of the latter work, that after we had begun to feel satiated, and with the prospect of its great length before us, a few bars of the opening orchestral movement wrought such marvellous refreshment, and that its unfolding inspiration kept heart, soul and sense alive and full of rapture to the end. The day has passed for us to be describing the NINTH SYMPHONY. The name has come to mean something, and about the right thing, now, in this community. Our musicians like to play it; our chorus singers are never more happy than when they have a call to sing it, terrible as the task once seemed, and trying as the voice parts are, ranging at a height which nothing but a certain fiat of joint enthusiasm enables them to carry and to hold. Now they love to sing: "Joy, thou spark of heavenly brightness," and "Here's a kiss to all the world!"; and they are always certain of responsive audience.

[To be Continued.]

Handel and Haydn Society.

At the customary re-union of the Society at the close of its Triennial year, Dr. J. B. Upham, the President, having been called upon the platform, addressed them in congratulatory terms, briefly and in substance as follows:

Ladies and Gentlemen:—My valedictory has already been pronounced, and in coming upon this platform in answer to your call, I feel much as the college boy does who, having spoken his piece before his classmates in the quietude of the recitation-room, is called on to mount the rostrum and say it over again to a commencement audience. However, we are all friends here to-night, and not disposed to be captious or critical.

And seriously, I really want to take this opportunity of telling you, more emphatically and earnestly than I could properly do before, how highly I appreciate, how highly others estimate and appreciate,—the splendid performance of the past week. Never before, in this country, has it been surpassed, or equaled, or approximately reached. It is a week long to be remembered in the history of this old and honored Society,—in the art history of Boston.

In the days of ancient Greece and Rome such an achievement would have been commemorated by an inscription on the walls of the amphitheatre wherein it took place. So, today, it would not be inappropriate to write it upon yonder walls, that it might be known and read of all men:

—Now and here has the high and holy art we follow been upheld, the cause of humanity advanced, the good name of the city and the commonwealth dignified, the great union of the States made stronger.

Done in this Month of May, Anno Domini 1871.

Let us review, for a moment, the record of this eventful week. And what a programme it presents! I do not wonder that the London critics said of it—impossible—and were inclined to be profane on the subject!

Beginning, as in times past, with the adaptation by Nicolai of that sublime old choral of the 16th century, which if it cannot with absolute certainty be attributed to Martin Luther, reflects forth the grandeur of his heroic spirit, and is the very personification of the stormy times in which he lived;—then the mighty Hallelujah from the "Mount of Olives," followed by that magnificent cantata of Mendelssohn, "with preamble sweet of dreamy symphony," complicate, beautiful, marvellous in its construction,—with its wonderfully dramatic interrogative passage, which was interpreted in so touching and masterly a manner by the English tenor, "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" and that electrifying burst of choral harmony at its close. Verily I looked behind me to see if those images of angels and cherubs were not joining in the final shout, "Hallelujah, sing to the Lord."

And what shall I say of "Elijah," a work strong and almost weak, it may be, by turns, but which is not surpassed, in its passages of transcendent beauty, in its brilliancy, in force, in painfully dramatic intensity of interest, of which it is enough to say you gave the very best interpretation of it ever before achieved here. So I heard it said all around me, and so I believe. Of the "Israel in Egypt," the "colossus of oratorios," as it has been fitly called, "almost exclusively a mountain chain of choruses," as Mr. Dwight has happily expressed it,—simple in their massive grandeur,—in whose manifestly onward motion you seem to hear the tread of armies, as in my imagination, when long looking at the gigantic mountain ranges in Switzerland, I have sometimes seemed to see and hear them move. This too, taking into account its almost insurmountable difficulties, was creditably, most creditably, performed. In the great Choral Symphony of Beethoven I could only think of the fabled battle of the giants, so graphically depicted by Dr. Holmes, hurling to and fro the pudding stones of Roxbury as though they were pebbles,—so light you seemed to make of its labors. The "Passion music" too! who, after this, shall say it is impossible out of Germany? And another new work in the same evening, which, following close upon Bach, seemed breeziness and lightness itself? Nor should I fail to commend the performance of the much-sung but always glorious "Messiah" of Handel, which from its very familiarity is most likely to go wrong, but for which, as performed on Sunday evening last, from its opening chorus to the final "Amen," I have no words but of praise.

I say again, such a performance, such a series of performances of a similar kind, so uniformly well done, has not often, if ever before, found its parallel. You have a right to be proud of your success, I am sure I rejoice and glory in it on your behalf. But I am getting garrulous on the subject, and I will take up no more of your time. Once again I say to you adieu and farewell!

Music in the Public Schools.

(From the Saturday Evening Gazette, May 27.)

The annual musical exhibition of the public schools occurred on Wednesday last at the Music Hall. Those who are familiar with the progress of music in our schools cannot fail to notice the contrast between the slender beginning of twenty years ago and the full and assured success of to-day. Music is now as thoroughly studied and practiced as arithmetic. Under the wise and tender guidance of Mr. L. W. Mason the primary pupils (as Pope said of himself) learn to "lisp in numbers." Every child sings: at least, not above three in a hundred fail to sing in tune. By commencing early, and with simple exercises, it has been found that taste and capacity for music are not at all peculiar—that they form no sixth

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 788.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 6.

Auber—The Comedy Composer.

[From the London Orchestra.]

There must be something grateful, easy, light, and nourishing about the Parisian musical comedy, for its composers have proved a long-lived race. Founded by Duni and Dauvergne, it was modelled into shape by Monsigny, who lived to be eighty-eight; carried on by Gossec, who was a centenarian, short only of four years; continued by Cherubini, who died at eighty-two; and then by Auber, who has just left us at the age of eighty-nine. Grétry and Boieldieu must be classed as the herb born at early morn to be mown away at eventide, for the former died at the comparatively early age of seventy-seven, and Boieldieu's volume of life was unrolled at sixty. These two were the boys among the catalogue of the light-comedy patriarchs. This series of protracted lives renders the progress of the French musical comedy no difficult task to unravel. If Lulli founded it, Rameau, Philidor, and Monsigny made it a thoroughly native school; Gossec, taught by Sacchini, Grétry, taught by Casali, created the new school which broke down the organists' system, a method of isolated harmonics, with no centre and no root: a theory which stopped progress, affording no law for invariable rule, and no action for continual advance. Boieldieu, the outcast of the conservatory, but the friend of vocalists, for whom he made some hundred of charming and elegant chansons, imbued the school with a thoroughly Parisian tone; and his facile, pretty, and graceful tunes permitted him to laugh at Gossec, Cherubini, and the big-wigs, and to joke over his occasional harmonical peccadilloes. Herold, in 1819, commenced the new distinctive French style of the present day—an engrafting of the Rossini-spirit into the French rhythms; and to Auber must be assigned its advance, perfection, and probably its close.

Auber's life illustrates the adage of "Never too late to learn." When thirty years old he went to school, and finding in 1813 he had not learnt enough, stuck to the desk of the pupil until 1819; and in 1823, when forty-one years of age, produced "La Neige," and in 1824 "Le Maçon," operas which demonstrated the effect of good teaching and the promise of individuality of style. The great master never feared instruction or tried to shorten its due course. Piccini was eleven years in the academy, Guglielmi fifteen. In these days two years is quite long enough to represent a country and its music. When there is no necessity for order, progress is both miraculous and irresistible.

Auber had achieved absolute grasp over the mechanism of music; he had learnt the best way of doing the thing; and entertained no doubt whatever about it. It was a mere question of life and emotional power. Invention was in him, and he had for years been in the habit of writing the neatest of chansons for others less gifted than himself, and who sent them out to the public in their own name. Auber threw himself into the Opera Comique, which, if not altogether a shallow side of life, was not a serious one, and therefore not a school for the highest form of art. The titles of the Operas on which he was engaged testify to the expression of life and character he was called upon to portray; and to much that Auber has written the wise observation of Mozart on the music of Martini (the composer of La Cosa Rara) may be applied. "This music is all the vogue, but when the vogue changes, it will all fade." To be a fashionable composer of theatrical music all that is necessary, after acquiring the technique of the art, is to exercise much observation, to know the stage well and everybody about it, to gauge the public taste, just as one heathen judges or suspects another, and keep up great cheerfulness and equanimity. Too much sensibility will not do, for that treads on the toes of genius, and real genius, having reverent faith in the bright side of human nature, in strength and steadiness of character, declines to have anything to do with the bubbles, froth, and foaming that form the light and sparkle of the modern opera. The highest form of art is commonly based on some spirit of sacrifice. Doubtless Beethoven well knew his Opera of "Fidelio" was fifty years before its time, and with him his locking it up for a cycle of years was a foregone conclusion.

The long list of Auber's Operas proclaims the rare gifts and consummate art of their composer; but at the same time demonstrates the low platform on which he stood. He chose his destiny, and has fulfilled it. His ideas were fertile and abundant—prodigiously so; his melodies naïve, simple, elegant, and charming; his movements were relevant, graceful, well-balanced, brilliant, and vigorous; nothing infelicitous, nothing unnatural; much that was piquante, smart, and full of abandon. He had generally some great woman-singer, with whom he was en rapport; and, full of worldly wisdom, artistic insight, and possessing unbounded freedom, he wrote her song just as she desired. If, by chance, he went astray, she laughed and joked, and said "Mon cher, it cannot be done this way, take a glass of champagne, and listen to me;" and thus, the woman's tact and the singer's experience put all right, and the result gave great satisfaction to both parties. No man was more fully alive than Auber to the great want in his organization. When he first met Rossini, he says, "I shall never forget his lightning-like execution, his spirit and verve; his accompanying was marvellous; his hands seemed to gallop. I fancied I could see the keys smoking. I went home much inclined to throw my scores into the fire; it may perhaps warm them." All Auber's deficiencies were brought before him at this first meeting with Rossini. He worked hard to gain spirit and verve, and these he did acquire; but warmth—no—never. To create a feeling was out of his power, for he worked from the intellect, and rarely from the imagination; and the special gift he held, as a thoroughly taught artist, never had its fair and full exercise by reason of the very nature of the subjects he dealt with in music.

We have become so demoralized by the vulgarities of modern theatrical composers that it would be difficult to convey to our readers the effect which the first production in England of "Maaniello" created on the minds and feelings of well-taught musicians, and those accustomed to the Grand Opera at his Majesty's Theatre. Take the second motivo in the overture—that portion which breaks into the major of the prevailing tonic,—can anything be more commonplace, anything more inexpressibly vulgar? Consider again the themes of the galop, brilliant and sonorous as they are? As writing for the Grand Opera, these things were a lowering in tone and position which had never before been so represented. If the breadth of the structure exhilarated, the degeneracy of idea, and deadness of heart, at once checked the feeling. It was the great artist outside himself, pandering to the misguided taste of the public. But in satisfying others he satisfied himself, and in place of living to command, he simply labored to please. The result is told in few words: Auber spent forty years of his life in acquiring the power to write music, and he occupied another forty in ringing the changes over dramatic situations which, as a rule, describe neither delicate sensation, fineness of nature, nor heroic feeling, and therefore forbade the expression of deep and true passion.

Very many of his arias are charming to the vocalist, and delightful to the auditor; but they mean nothing, they say nothing, they are deficient in the pulse of life, and without heat—the white anvil heat—which alone gives longevity to artistic production. His melodies are rarely sung in concert rooms, still less so in the drawing room, and will eventually fade away from the stage. Certain of his overtures, from their clear outline and brilliant instrumentation, will for some time retain their position, and every commendation must be given to the worldly wisdom that guided the form of his ensembles and concerted movements. But his thoughts were of the earth, earthy, and he chose to place himself during the whole course of his extended life in sympathetic relation with fashion and arrangements that must die. He was the first composer who took the 2-4 dance time as the staple form of vocal movement. He commenced with the Parisian dance, and now it has passed into less clever, and more ignoble hands. He is, of course, the father of the last phase of dancing-opera—such as the music of Offenbach and the favorites of the present hour. There will be more spice, and more cayenne, that is to say, further degeneracy, and deeper depths; and the memory of Auber will be blotted out by the pens plucked from his own wing. He will be classed with Piccini, whom in many points he resembled, a bygone model, from whom there is much to be learned but nothing to imitate.

A History of Opera.

BY C. SCHULZE.

[Continued from page 26.]

Before proceeding to direct our attention to another genius, who, also, pursued his way on the mountain tops of art, let us cast a short glance upon some few of the wanderers in the valley below. The successes achieved by French comic opera and vaudeville, as well as by the opera buffa of the Italians, created a new counterweight, so to say, in the German Liederspiel, or operetta, in which the tone of national song, so captivating to German feeling, was adopted, and which, from that very fact, became a highly popular musical form. I will here mention Hiller of Leipzig, the real founder of operetta (died 1804), together with his librettist, Felix Weise. Hiller's songs have always a touch of something artistic about them, though they do not afford evidence of any very great imaginative powers. Then comes Reichardt (died 1814), for whom Goethe wrote Erwin und Elvira, Jery und Bättele, an aesthetically accomplished musician, and a great admirer of Gluck's operas, the influence of which is unmistakable in his own operas of Andromeda, Brennus, and Die Olympiade. Ferdinand Kauer (died 1831), whose Donauweibchen was universally popular. Wenzel Müller (died 1836), whose Alpenkönig; Verschwencker; Bauer als Millionär; Die Schwestern von Prag; and Das neue Sonntagkind, find admirers even at the present day. In Raumann (died 1801), the folk's tone is combined with empty Italian musical phrases; the opera of Cora is considered his most famous work. The same combination is found in Salleri's two pupils, Winter (died 1825) and Weigl (died 1843). The first was known for his opera of Das unterbrochene Opferfest, and the second was a musical Gessner, that is, a composer of idylls, and father of the Schweizerfamilie. We find the folk's tone combined with a humorous representation of the actual life of the people in the works of Dittersdorf (died 1799), and of Schenck (died 1836). The latter gained innumerable friends by the low comedy of his Dorfschäfer, which was performed 200 times in Vienna alone, and drew money everywhere. The former, an intimate friend of Gluck, proved himself a thoughtful and respectable composer, especially in Hieronymus Knicker; Doctor und Apotheker; and Hokus Pokus. It was he who prepared the way in Vienna for a greater genius than himself.

This genius was Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (born 1756, died 1791). Thoroughly conversant with the formalism of Italian opera, he had the courage to step out of Gluck's mythic heroic sphere into that of actual human life. The personages of his dramatic productions are not mere creations of the imagination, but human beings like ourselves; no bitter and obscure fatality guides them by a leading string; they themselves forge their own happiness and their own misfortune. Mozart paints, in tune, not only earnestness, dignity, and elevation, but also every affection that can be musically portrayed; even wit and humor are most amply represented in his operas. Opera as he wrote it must, therefore, be considered as the extension and perfection of opera as Gluck wrote it. In contradistinction to heroic opera, Mozart's style of opera is called romantic opera. With regard to its separate forms, it must be remarked of the overture that it excites in us exactly the kind of feeling which runs through the drama following it, and that it is instrumentally more important, and of a better articulated and more artistic form, than the overtures of any previous composer. The form occurs at a subsequent period independently still more perfect and truly classical in Beethoven, who, however, in his only opera, Fidelio, though it is instrumentally more important, has not surpassed the productions of Mozart. With Mozart, the recitative is not a mere accessory, or a mere poetical link; it serves him to portray and pave the way for psychological events. In the aria, where, it is true, he frequently made willingly, or was compelled to make, concessions to virtuosity, we find delicate characterization of the different personages. And how sensually sweet is his cantilena. The concerted pieces and the finales, sparsely represented in Gluck, skilfully combine all the various points of the action. On the whole, Mozart's operas, like all his compositions, are especially distinguished for originality, wit, fancy, and inexhaustible imaginative powers. Not one is like the other, and Mozart understood better than anybody else the art of uniting a contrapuntal style with expressive and pleasing melody. What a fine comic vein there is, too, in his operas! With what mastery does he employ the art of rhythm! He was, indeed, a reformer of comic opera. The Italian opera buffa dealt only with comic characters; Mozart's operas created comic situations, which could never have existed without sharply marked personages.

The influence exerted by Mozart and Gluck on the form and treatment of opera spread far, and thenceforth affected the national music of the Italians and French. We perceive it immediately, for instance, in Méhul (died 1818), whose Ariodant; Hélène; Les deux Aveugles; and Joseph are considered his best operas; the last is held in higher esteem at present in Germany than in France. In consequence of Méhul's endeavor to unite Gluck's style with the most commonplace operatic books, he could not possibly fail to be guilty of many a piece of bad taste and eccentricity. Mozart's influence is, however, even more directly apparent in Boieldieu (died 1834), the friend of Cherubini, and Rossini's rival in Paris. Every one praises very justly the freshness and animation of his melodies; the simplicity of his harmony, the splendor and fire of his instrumentation. His operas: Le Petit Chaperon Rouge; Ma Tante Aurèle; Le Calife de Bagdad; Jean de Paris; and La Dame Blanche, still enjoy a good repute in Germany. In France, however, they were quickly driven from the field by the "Swan of Pesaro."

We further find the influence of the hero Gluck exerted finally on Cherubini (died 1842) and Spontini (died 1851). Cherubini—in the cantilena, often an Italian; in grace and declamation, often a Frenchman—combines in his music earnestness and pithy brevity with fulness of harmony and delicate instrumentation, though he is not always free from heaviness, monotony and oddity. His best work is Les deux Journées, the finale of the first act being especially good. Of his other operas, Demophon (1788); Lodoiska (1791); Elisa (1794); Medea (1797); and Les Abencerrages, are worthy of mention. Spontini, a master of rhythm and recitative, weaker in harmonized counterpoint, but strong in the employment of orchestral resources, did nothing really conducive to the further development of opera. After having, during the first period of his productivity, written only genuinely Italian operas, a performance in Paris of Gluck's Iphigénie en Aulide suddenly illuminated his mind. He resolved to illustrate musically historical subjects, adapted to the feeling excited by the political and warlike events of the period, and to transform Gluck's classic opera into heroic opera. Thus arose La Vestale, his best opera (1807); Fernand Cortez, ordered of him by Napoleon, in 1809; and Olympia (1816). His subsequent operas were Nurmahat (1821); the magic opera, Alcador, (1825); and Agnes von Hohenstaufen (1827). Writing to Goethe, Zelter says of Alcador:—"Spontini seems to me like his own Gold-King, who flings gold at people's heads, in which he makes holes. What is intended to be melodious strikes one as an outline-drawing which is continually broken off, instead of being free and flowing, and which degenerates into caricature."

Shortly before the fall of Napoleon, French opera lost its charm and its reputation. Two new composers shared between them the latter: Paër (died 1839), who was appointed by Napoleon Spontini's successor in 1812, and Rossini (died 1868). Of Paër's numerous operas, I will mention merely Camilla (1799), which first established his reputation; Sargino (1803); Sophonisba; Numa Pompilio; and La Griselda. In all these works, we perceive a facile plastic talent, but little invention. All his melodies have well-known physiognomies, and frequently bear the stamp of Mozart. With him begins the Renaissance style, the melody being once more garnished with ornamentation as formerly. Greater than Paër, greater than any other Italian, stands Rossini; rich in melody; poor in harmonic invention; extremely simple in his instrumentation, nay, often too simple, since he seldom gives due prominence to the middle parts; but, on the other hand, frequently brilliant and clever. It is true that he generally fails in dramatic truth, and half his operas are genuine dance music. The Italians called him their romanticist, a name which he gained, probably, among them on account of his modulatory leaps, his crescendos, his triplet passages, cadences, flourishes, duets in thirds, and the big drum. In his twenty-first year, he wrote Tancredi, and before he was thirty he had composed thirty operas, of which L'Italiana in Algeri (1813); Otello (1816); Semiramide (1822); and Guillaume Tell (1827), are the best known. Il Barbiere di Siviglia (1816) is, however, the most important of all his works.

Bellini (died 1835), and Donizetti (died 1843), contemporaries and fellow countrymen of Rossini. While Rossini, thanks to his brilliant coloring and his cantilena, always produced works of art, we see, in the two former-named masters Italian opera become utterly shallow. Their melodies, though sensually pleasing, are by far less noble, and flow far less from the heart than those of Rossini. Donizetti places the centre of gravity not in the drama, properly so-called, but in the bravura air of the singer. Break-neck cadences, and physical exertion on the part of the vocal virtuosos, at the end of the different scenes and acts, have to conquer the hearts of the auditory, and they conquer them in, among other operas, Anna Bolena (1831); L'Elisir d'Amore, (1832); Lucrezia Borgia (1834); and La Fille du Régiment (1848); nay, more, they conquered—let the reader hear and wonder—in Anna Bolena, the professorship of counterpoint at the Conservatory of Naples for their composer.

Bellini, though entitled by his innate melody to a higher position, resembles Donizetti in his passion for dazzling and captivating his hearers through the performances of solo virtuosos, having written Il Pirata with a special eye to Rubini, and several parts with the same consideration for Mme. Pasta. Anything like the portrayal of individual character is out of the question, but his music is never false to the tone of sentimentality. Madness and the voluptuousness of pain are the subjects for his talent. Well, the masses like this sort of thing, and even at the present day there is a large public who admire I Montecchi e Capuletti (1829); La Sonnambula (1831); Norma (1832); and I Puritani (1834).

In Auber, the pupil of Cherubini and Boieldieu, we already perceive the influence of the neo-Italians on French opera; the same brilliant instrumentation; the same fiery rhythms; and the same decked out melody. But it must be confessed that Auber has frequently attached importance to genuine dramatic expression. It is this very fact which subsequently rendered him a dangerous rival of Italian opera. The most valuable, in form and purport, of his operatic works is La Muette de Portici, which achieved an unexampled success in Berlin and Brussels. In most of his other known operas: La Neige, Le Maçon, Fra Diavolo, La Fiancée, Le Philtre, and Le Lac des Fées, for the majority of which Scribe furnished librettos, piquant, original melodies, orchestral experience, and a knowledge of the stage, cannot make up for the want of dramatic unity and treatment, and of the genuine employment of music.

In the first rank I place the illustrious names of the Abbé Vogler's two great pupils: Carl Maria von Weber, 1786-1822, for whom song, and Meyer Beer, 1791-1864, for whom the orchestra, was more important than aught else.

Let people say what they will, Carl Maria von Weber is, after Gluck and Mozart, the most important of all operatic composers. In whom else do we find such natural truth, such characteristic fidelity with regard to time, plot, and personages; such fulness of thought; such an inward, graceful charm, and frequently so national a stamp of stately melodies and moving harmonies, such simplicity, side by side with fiery fancy; and such instrumentation, never overloaded, and always elegant! It is the fact of satisfying equally the physical and psychological requirements of his hearers which is the secret means whereby Weber gained the name of a conqueror, and still maintains it at the present day. His operas are universally known and popular. His Freyschütz especially has penetrated further and achieved a greater success than any other opera. That genuinely artistic work, Euryanthe; Oberon, with its ever-green overture; and Preciosa, rich in beautiful choruses, I must particularly mention. Der Freischütz, Oberon, and Euryanthe must be designated, in every respect, truly classical romantic operas; they represent admirably three principal subjects of romance: the saga, the legend, and chivalry.

Meyerbeer is to be looked upon as the master who barricaded the way to the German stage against ultramontane operatic music, and thus founded a new epoch. Before his Robert le Diable (1830), Les Huguenots (1836), Le Prophète (1849), L'Etoile du Nord (1854), and L'Africaine (1864), of the hundreds of operas written by Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti, only ten at the most have been able to stand their ground.

Commencing with compositions, displaying talent, in the German school, Meyerbeer, spurred on by Rossini's triumphs, soon became a zealous champion of the Italian school, and thence, in this instance again not crowned with laurels, turned to modern French grand opera. Thus, full of the impressions produced by the works of Beethoven and Weber, he entered upon the inheritance bequeathed by Auber; but he was more genial than Auber; possessed of contrapuntal skill, and having a finer perception of the manner of treating a subject. His operas, which always bear the noble stamp of a true artist, are characterized by charming sensuous harmony, though sometimes also by exuberance in the modulation; an oriental love of display and magnificence in the instrumentation, and a want of repose in the change of rhythm. Side by side with these distinguishing features, we often find disagreeable contrasts between serious and light, toying music. His two greatest operas are Robert le Diable and Les Huguenots. The scene of the oath and the consecration of the weapons in the latter opera is, and always will be, a real specimen of classical composition.

Halévy (born 1799) was an imitator of Meyerbeer. He achieved, it is true, a great success with his opera, La Juive (1835), but his good fortune did not increase with his subsequent productions. Adam (born 1803), a composer in the same style, surpassed him with his Postillon (1836), without afterwards outdoing Auber. I must not omit to mention Gounod, for when we are speaking of light we cannot help mentioning shadow as well. How much the public understand about music is evident from the fact that they lavish their applause upon operas in which the greatest harmonic commonplaces go naively hand in hand with the most threadbare worn-out melodies. (!)

In the path he selected, Weber was followed, also, by two German masters, Spöhr (1784-1859) and Marschner (1795-1861); the former wrote eight operas, of which it may be asserted that Jessonda alone displays any vitality. His style is full of mannerisms. He wants Weber's fresh, direct tonal-language, ingenuousness, and humor. Examples of exaggerated sentiment, which eternally find vent in chromatic melodic passages and enharmonic changes, and nearly always the same combination of instruments, cannot fail to end by making any one sea-sick. A more vigorous and more healthy spirit permeates Marschner's operas, of which I may cite Der Vampyr (1828); Des Falkner's Braut (1832); Hans Heiling (1834); and, more especially, Templer und Judin.

Marschner took his friend Carl Maria von Weber as his model. He possesses in common with the latter a beautiful, melodious style, dashing thought, warmth of expression and clearness of form. He strenuously endeavored once more to treat opera, deteriorated by the Italians, on Gluck's plan, namely, to develop it dramatically and paint real life. It is true that the partiality he, at the same time, entertained for the romanticist Weber caused an inequality in his treatment, while his fondness for copying reality exactly often proved injurious to artistic delineation.

I must not pass over in silence the composers of various single German operas which still retain possession of the stage; I refer to Kreutzer, Lindpaintner, Reissiger, and Lortzing. Conradin Kreutzer (1782-1849), one of Haydn's last pupils, produced a long series of operas, of which Das Nachtlager von Granada (1834) is, perhaps, the only one known at the present day. Lindpaintner (born 1791) also composed several operas in the style of Weber and Spöhr, but, though fashioned by a master hand, they did not, principally owing to the librettos, display any real vitality.

Reissiger (1798—1859), a pupil of Schicht and Winter, and the official successor of Carl Maria von Weber at Dresden, achieved by his operas, some twelve in number, as little permanent success as the composers just mentioned. His most successful one was Die Felsenmühle (1831), which is written in a light, flowing, and melodious style. A greater amount of appreciation fell to the share of Lortzing (1803—1851), a pupil of Rungenhagen's, for his operas, Der Pole und sein Kind (1823); Die beiden Schützen (1837); Csur und Zimmermann (1837); Undine (1844); and Der Waffenschmied (1846), most of which are still stock-pieces. Unfortunately, it was not until his eye was closed forever that a ray of fame fell upon him.

I will now offer a few observations upon Richard Wagner, who has stepped forward as a theoretical and practical reformer of opera. Wagner stands indeed alone among all operatic composers, pretending as he does to unite the philosopher, the poet, and the musician in one and the same person.

As an idealistic philosopher, he starts from the capital propositions:—1. Opera is the most perfect production of art; 2. Opera has hitherto been a mistake, for in it a means of expression (music) is made the end, and the end of what is expressed (the drama) is made a means. Many writers have undertaken to prove the utter falseness of the first, and the only half-truth of the second proposition; I forbear, therefore, from here criticizing either. In his latest pamphlet, that on Beethoven, Wagner even considers music in a metaphysical light, thus venturing upon ground where only very few of his most zealous adherents will manifest any particularly strong desire to follow him. As a poet he deserves respect for his plastic talent, and the choice of his subjects. But when it is asserted that his librettos are poetic works of art, and that the language employed by Schiller and Goethe is mere human patchwork compared with the divine outflowings of Wagner's poetic linguistic genius, such assertions are simply the exaggerations of enthusiastic admirers who see all he does in a rosy light, and can extort from us a smile at most. Another equally untenable assertion of these phrase-mongers is that Wagner's operas alone have a justification for their existence; that they are the greatest art-works of any period; and that, like the old Greek tragedies, they are calculated to advance the religious culture of our people. The only thing in them of any musical importance is, really and truly, the instrumentation. Instead of the independent employment of instruments, on the plan pursued in the works of previous composers, it is Wagner's aim to obtain a number of separate choral masses by reinforcing the different classes into which they are divided. It is by this means that he achieves such great, though, at the same time purely sensuous effects. It is his tone coloring which dazzles us.

Against form this composer has declared war; he despises form. In the recitatives he will have nothing but the accent of spoken language perceptible; the feelings are allowed to burst forth only in short melodies. He exhibits great partiality for musical painting, even in the case of single words. His idea of the orchestral melody, as he calls it, is original; this melody should suggest, in the orchestra, the progress of the story told on the stage, and characteristically define the various personages. He intentionally avoids the extravagant employment of figured music, and of the cantilena; endeavors to impress his audience by unusual modulations, and harmonic progressions, which, by the way, are introduced almost according to set formulae, and in consequence of this, as well as from his even treatment of the recitative, his frequent employment of chromatic interrupted runs, and the mediæval practice, as we may term it, of ranging chord after chord, side by side without prominent melody or rhythm, he becomes—for all who have formed their taste by, and take delight in, the works of Gluck, Mozart, Haydn, and especially Beethoven—monotonous! His adherents often point to the numerous performances and apparent success of his operas. But these are, now-a-days, no proof of the artistic value of an opera, for the great mass of the public applauds as heartily light Offenbachian, as it does Wagner's music itself, which can with difficulty be understood by those who hear it. The real magnet in Wagner's case is the poetic story. Beginning with a historical subject, he proceeded to the local, and finally to the national, saga. The last still reckons, and very properly, admirers even in the most cultivated circles. It is around the Nibelungen and Breton series of sagas that Wagner weaves his strange harmonies. In his new creation, Die Meistersinger, he appears to have wished for once to follow a doctrinary course; he treats at length in it a chapter of the national literature of Germany. According to one account, he will, in addition to Parci- val, already announced, write an opera, Buddha; according to another, he will produce no more musico-dramatic works for his thankless contemporaries.

Opera is, at the present day as we all feel, in a state of metamorphosis; it is not yet the great work of art men have long wished to possess, and striven to produce; it has not yet reached, and least of all in consequence of what Richard Wagner has done, the acme of perfection. Who will be the new knight to break the spell that holds it captive, and by what means will he break that spell? These are objective questions to which the future must shortly furnish answers. I will take the liberty of appending to them a subjective question. It is said of the aloe that it germinates one hundred years; grows a hundred years; and then is stationary another hundred years, after which it dies. The year 1580 is considered as the year when opera was born; in 1880 it will, therefore, celebrate its three-hundredth anniversary. Will it, possibly, be like the aloe?

Sigismund Thalberg.

Death has been busy of late with eminent musicians. Among recent losses in the musical world is that of one who was constantly among us for a series of years, and who, in his way, left an impress upon his time and upon his art. We refer to Sigismund Thalberg. What this gentleman achieved for the mechanism of the pianoforte is best known to pianists and amateurs of the instrument; what he was as a dexterous and accomplished performer all must remember who are old enough to look back some 30 years and more. Thalberg made his first appearance in London, at a Philharmonic concert, in the year 1837, and created a sensation something akin to that which had been created by a still more extraordinary man six or seven years earlier. As when Paganini was first heard in this country (1831) every violinist, in despair, declared he would go home and break his instrument, so when Thalberg was first heard the pianists were equally minded to abandon their vocation, as thenceforth useless and unprofitable. Nevertheless, the whole secret on either side comprised little more than what was then considered a newly invented mechanism, by the exercise of which things could be done previously never dreamt of, or, if dreamt of, regarded as impracticable. As time passed on, however, other violinists arose—Heinrich Ernst and Vieuxtemps, for example—who composed pieces surpassing in difficulty those of Paganini; while Joseph Joachim, whose Hungarian Concerto would have made even Paganini look wistful, diving into the past, brought up the violin solos of John Sebastian Bach, more elaborate and complex than any other compositions for the violin extant, ancient or modern.

Thus, too, it happened with the works of Thalberg, whose mannerism was so conspicuous, and whose chief technical devices were so transparent, that the market soon swarmed with pieces built upon the same pattern as his, many of them being more trying and intricate than any Thalberg himself had produced. An air played on the medium keys of the pianoforte, with arpeggios, scales, or other florid passages, sweeping the instrument up and down the key-board, became in the course of time the commonest thing possible. Liszt himself imitated Thalberg, and surpassed him in daring, though he failed to rival him in grace and purity. Döhler, Dreyschock, and Prudent, Leopold de Meyer, and others too numerous to name, supplied the world, ad nauseam, with fantasias in the Thalberg style; and of late years the device and the mannerism of this great inventor have been employed indiscriminately by composers of the smallest possible calibre—composers who might be named by the dozen, but who are really not worth naming. The fact is that, now-a-days, it is the easiest thing imaginable to invent a piece after that fashion which, more than 30 years ago, astounded the musical world in Thalberg. The idea of such a form of composition enduring, as "classical," is not for a moment to be entertained. The most gifted and brilliant exemplifier of it was Thalberg himself; no one, indeed, has equalled him in producing such perfect specimens.

Mendelssohn, in a letter from Leipzig addressed to his mother, after an interesting comparison between Liszt and Thalberg, declares his preference for Thalberg as a "virtuoso." Referring to the fantasia on themes from La Donna del Lago, that great musician says:—"It is an accumulation of the most exquisite and delicate effects, a continued succession of difficulties and embellishments, exciting our astonishment, all well devised, carried out with security and skill, and pervaded by the most refined taste." After this testimony from such a man, who can believe that Thalberg ever said what he is so often reported to have said,—"I hate music—I never did like it!"

Thalberg was born at Geneva in 1812 (January 7), of noble parents, whose name he did not bear. His first studies were at Vienna, under its signifier little what masters—some say Sechter, who knew not much about the art of pianoforte playing, and Hummel, who knew more than most men; others mention a certain bassoon-player, belonging to the Opera-house. What Thalberg did, however, aided by wonderful physical aptitude, the joint attainment of unremitting labor and a happy organization, was exclusively his own, and altogether independent of masters—whether, in counterpoint, of which he never acquired a command, or the manipulation of the pianoforte, in which, in his peculiar way, he surpassed all his contemporaries. From 1830 to 1839 he made the tour of Europe, winning everywhere unanimous admiration by his prodigious skill as an executant, but even more perhaps by his method of singing upon the instrument, to which he brought a fullness and richness of tone equal almost to that of the human voice when most adequately endowed, and a manner of phrasing which, though somewhat metronomically precise, was always natural and true. In 1837, as we have said, Thalberg came to England, and played with the effect we have described. From 1837 to 1851 he was frequently among us, invariably exciting the same interest by his admirable playing. In 1851, when Sophie Crivelli was Mr. Lamley's chief prima donna, he composed for that gifted lady an opera called Florinda, which, although the cast included (besides Sophie Crivelli) Calzolari, Lablache the elder, Coletti, Marie Crivelli, and Sims Reeves, and though, moreover, it was produced with great splendor and well executed under the direction of the late Mr. Balfe, obtained at the best a "success d'estime." Some time after this, Thalberg went to America and Brazil, where his singular ability as a pianist met with due recognition, both in an artistic and a pecuniary sense. His latest visits to England were in 1862 and 1863, when, besides giving "Recitals" in the Hanover-square Rooms, he made extensive tours which, if report at the time may be credited, brought him no less than £12,000. Since then, allowing for a series of concerts given in 1865, at Paris, where he produced his most recent composition, entitled "Les Soirées du Pausillipe," Thalberg virtually abandoned the musical profession. He possessed a handsome estate near Naples, to which he retired, and where he gave himself up almost wholly to the cultivation of the vine.

It is well known in England that Thalberg married the eldest daughter of the late celebrated dramatic singer, Lablache. One of his favorite pupils here was Arabella Goddard, to whom he imparted the secret of interpreting most of his principal fantasias, which she has so often shown she possesses in perfection. Socially Thalberg was one of the most amiable and consequently one of the most popular of artists. He had troops of friends, and, we may say, without fear of contradiction, not a single enemy. To enumerate his published works would take more space than we have at disposal. That many of them will live, as historical examples of a new phase in art, we are convinced.—London Times.

Fétis—Theorist and Historian.

The late François Joseph Fétis—the chief of the Royal Academy of Music in Brussels—stands forth as one of the most remarkable men of the present century. Born in 1784, he began his artistic life in Paris in 1800, and up to 1833 was one of the foremost musicians in that city of musicians, as teacher, critic, theorist, and historian. He held an organist's appointment; and early in life published some Masses and other music for the church, together with much pianoforte music—some hundred and fifty separate compositions—seven operas, vocal music, and methods of instruction of all kinds and on mostly all subjects. He was editor of the Revue Musicale, and for many years contributor to the Gazette Musicale. His communications to these journals occupy nearly three thousand quarto pages, and are distinguished for their great erudition and the zeal of the writer for the dissemination of the principles, philosophy, and practice of the art. For the last forty years he had been the head of the Conservatoire at Brussels, an institution which is wholly indebted to him for its high character and great usefulness. Besides memoirs of Paganini, the Straduarii, the musicians of the Netherlands, translation of Boethius, essays on oriental music, on Greek and Roman, on the old church or plain chant, he stands forth as the author of four most remarkable and thoroughly classical works, a Biography of Musicians, a Treatise on Harmony, a Treatise on Counterpoint, illustrated with copious examples from the great masters—a splendid book—and a General History of Music from the earliest times to the present day—a work projected on the largest plan and of which only two volumes have at present appeared. Of course a man of such inordinate reading and of such incessant production could not be permitted to run his course without opposition and the ordinary troubles and vexations of one desirous to teach and inform; nor could he avoid at times laying himself open to the criticisms of his contemporaries. His "Biography of Musicians" was sharply attacked by Tajan-Rogé, and no question many of the animadversions of his adversary were founded on facts and beyond contradiction. In such an extended work there must be omissions, occasional undue importance to insignificant artists, nor is it possible to verify every statement or to justify every judgment. With no less reason did Gollmick indite some sixteen or twenty pages testing the truth of the new theory of harmony and its results in the Academy at Brussels.

Fétis in his now scarce "Essay on the History of Harmony"—a work which contains a summary and analysis of all the great leading theories that ever appeared—demonstrates not only his enormous reading, but also his singular power in grasping the distinctive features of each treatise, and his thorough honesty in portraying them to the best advantage. He himself was not satisfied in after years with this work, and embodied such portions of it as he wished to keep before the public in his now well-known Treatise on Harmony. He considered himself as the apostle of harmony—born with a special mission—the revelation of the unknown principle on which music may be based to rest—and he may be considered to have specially devoted his life to this intent. When in his perplexities he appealed to Méhul, this successful operatic composer simply laughed at him. "All that I ever wanted I have found in Catel; that book has served my purpose, what more do you require?" Disappointed in Méhul, the anxious philosopher and theorist turned to the mathematician, the illustrious Lagrange. "Well," said the great geometer, "we mathematicians had imagined we had explained all that was necessary for you artists in music when we had laid before you the proportions of harmony and the rule of the temperament. But no doubt there is something more to know before the full truth shall stand revealed, and I have been much engaged in the investigation. I am not a musician, and the element necessary is wanting in me. The secret has been hidden for ages, all the more glory to him who may come forth as the discoverer." Hereupon Fétis gave up the study of mathematical music, and rested his theory upon the great art-judge of tones—the human ear. Mathematical intervals he declares are of no use in forming a scale of sounds—they are simply so many isolated facts with no necessary connection. The musical scale, he writes, is the product of a metaphysical law deriving its existence from the needs and circumstances of the human being. The Indian took what suited his passions; the Greek followed his example; and the Christian, rejecting both, became also eclectic and used only such sounds as were in accordance with his nature and his creed. Taking the old church gamuts as his stand-point, Fétis professes to trace the changes and enlargements of the gamut in all its modern enrichments of semitones and chromatics as the results of the feelings of mankind and the exertions of the musician to find out new modes of expression for the new emotions. Every sound has its own family of tones; and Fétis conceived that the discovery of this family of tones—all vibrating together in one grand harmonical relation—was the unfolding of the unknown secret. But in the application of this fact—or rather idea of a fact as the author lays it out—the practical method of our author reveals no new truth. We have the old system of natural sounds, and artificial sounds, modifications, substitutions, alterations, prolongations, retardations, suspensions, the pedale now at the bottom of the scale and now at the top—in truth a mélange of the theories of Sorge and Lévens, Momigny and Catel, Schröter, and G. Weber. Nevertheless this "Treatise on Harmony" is one that can be worked, and although it will not make a sound musician—as M. Gollmick endeavors to demonstrate—still it is to a great extent thoroughly practical. That it will not carry a student through safely is very plain from M. Fétis's own handiwork in his little book on choral singing; for in this the author tumbles upon progressions which no explanation of the harmonious tendencies of the one sound can possibly defend. The author in no page of his work ever alludes to the treatise of the Spaniard Virues, known in this country as translated by Vernevil; but it is very evident that Fétis had seen this work, and lies under great obligations to it. The English edition is a bulky, verbose, and ill-arranged method, but there is matter lying in it which, if condensed and wisely disposed in some forty or fifty pages, would prove of incalculable benefit to the inquiring student. The position that the fundamental seventh on the dominant—that discord—is the cause of all attraction in harmony, and furnishes the elements of all progress and all modulation, is not the invention of Fétis. This theorem belongs to the Spaniard, Virues, and it is but justice to his labors and memory to record thus much. The distinction made by Fétis between natural dissonances and those altered or artificial is simply absurd, for if they be harmonical they must be alike natural, and within the ken of the scientific eye; reducible to the law of division, and therefore within the circle of combination. If we cannot get on with the mathematician it is not altogether wisdom to cast him on one side. Although he may decline to guide, he is always a safe and agreeable companion.

How much of the great history of music but just commenced in print may be found in manuscript we know not, but should it be in any state proper for issue, the labors of this extraordinary musician can only be compared to those of the Abbé Migne, who has supplied the clergy of the old church with a history, an encyclopedia, and a theological library which render almost all other church books unnecessary. The good Abbé had been helped in his work, but Fétis appears single-handed. What he has published is really all his own doing, and it is a prodigious mass. Printed in our usual English way in fair readable type—an ordinary sized type—it must extend over a hundred volumes. He has rewritten Sala and Choron in his treatise on Counterpoint; he supplies Reicha and Catel, G. Weber, and Marx, in his treatise on harmony; he includes all the biographers in his eight volumes of biography; his edition of the old Gregorian music, which occupied him a quarter of a century, is still the best of all, and the present musical faith of the Roman church; and his methods, essays, reports, and periodical contributions contain a fund of information and supply much to the student not to be obtained elsewhere.

His death creates a void which no living scholar in music can fill up; and, wonderful to record, he labored hard to the very end. For full seventy years the pen was never out of his hand, nor had age weakened his love for the art. He had been to the Brussels Academy of immense benefit, and through his observation and keen watchfulness this institution has become possessed of a library unparalleled in its riches. No sale ever took place in which rare musical works were to be disposed of but Fétis was there represented; and many a most valuable work, not again to be seen for some half-century, has Fétis borne away in spite of the zeal and attention of the representative of our British Museum.

Fétis was first in England about forty-two years ago, and published his memoranda of the then state of musical art and its professors. Some extracts are to be read in the pages of "the Harmonicon" of that period by no means flattering to English taste or English science. He came here at our two International Exhibitions, and we believe expressed his high pleasure at all he saw and heard. He is the last of a race of giants. More fortunate than poor Auber—whose remains it appears the wretches in Paris have consigned to the common ditch—his body was committed to the tomb with every mark of honor and respect, and his name is likely to live long, among the constant and conscientious laborers for their art.—London Orchestra.

Handel and Haydn Society.—Annual Report.

At the Annual Meeting of the Society, May 27, the following Report was presented by the President, Dr. J. BAXTER UPHAM.

GENTLEMEN:

Members of the Handel and Haydn Society. In compliance with the requirements of the By-Laws of the Society I respectfully submit my

ANNUAL REPORT.

It gives me the sincerest pleasure to congratulate you upon a year of acknowledged artistic success,—not only in the ordinary operations of the Society, its routine of rehearsals and public performances, but in the crowning labors of its great Triennial Festival, the echoes of whose triumphs are now coming back to us from almost every town and city in the land. But I reserve for the present any detailed allusion to this interesting part of my subject.

The work of the Society in its necessary routine of duties has been greater in the past year than at any former season within my remembrance. Our meetings for practice commenced on the 2nd of October, and continued weekly, as usual, until the 26th of February; from which time they increased in frequency, in a constantly accelerating ratio, till the opening of the Festival. The number of these rehearsals (48 in all) is greater than in any previous year since I have been connected with the Society.

The average attendance also, as appears from the table furnished me by the Secretary, has been better than ever before. From this record it is shown that the fullest attendance was on the evening of the 18th of December, the thinnest on that of the 28th April, the number present on those occasions being 600 and 150 respectively. Once only were the rehearsals entirely suspended, viz., on the evening of the 12th February, at which time a severe snow storm was raging. The average attendance during the season was in round numbers 400,—to be exact, 392 27-48,—out of a total of a little more than 700 members. I have not included in this enumeration the rehearsals which took place during the Triennial week, nor those which preceded the New York Beethoven Centennial celebration (so-called) in June last, which if added to the above list would swell the total number of rehearsals proper to fifty six, and increase somewhat the percentage of attendance.

I have thus minutely dwelt upon this point because of the great importance I attach to it as being at the same time the test and the measure of your progress in choral excellence.

It appears from the Secretary's Records that the Government have been ten times called together for business purposes during the year, and the Society have been twice summoned for the admission of members and the transaction of other business connected with the interests of the corporation. Sixty-two gentlemen have been admitted to membership, four had been re-instated after their membership had for some reason ceased, six have been discharged and three have resigned. Six of the active members of the Society have died within the year, viz. Messrs. A. W. Brown, James D. Kent, C. Judson Merrill, A. Pendergrass, A. J. Tenny and James Rice, some of whom had rendered long and valuable service with us, whose presence, and whose aid and counsel will long be missed. The year, too, numbers among its dead the honored name of Col. Thomas E. Chickering, one of the past Presidents of the Society, in whose sudden and unlooked for departure the whole community will mourn with ourselves the loss of one who had identified himself as the friend and patron, not of art alone, but of every noble and generous enterprise. I desire thus to briefly place on record our own hearty appreciation of his manly and generous qualities of mind and of heart, and to express our personal sorrow at his early and sudden death.

The number of public performances during the year, aside from the recent Triennial Concerts and the New York demonstration, has been limited to five, in order as follows:

- Dec. 19th. Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony."
- " 24th. Handel's "Messiah."
- " 25th. " "
- April 1st. " "
- " 2nd. Haydn's "Creation."

the last two in connection with Mlle. Christine Nilsson. The Ninth, or Choral, Symphony was given, as you are aware, in conjunction with the Harvard Musical Association, in commemoration of the hundredth birthday of the great composer.

It may be proper to speak, in this connection, of the somewhat unusual action on the part of the Society in the month of June last, viz.: the acceptance of an invitation to join as a body in the celebration of a musical festival in a distant city. I allude of course to the so-called Beethoven Centennial commemoration in the city of New York. As was probably well known at the time, my individual judgment was opposed to such action, fearing, as I expressed to my friends in the Board of Government, lest the dignity and self respect of the Society might in some way be compromised when too late to be remedied. How far my fears in this regard were well founded, those who were present at that celebration are best qualified to judge. Of the Society's performances themselves, so far as they were allowed to be given, I can only speak in terms of unmeasured praise. My only object in speaking of this matter now is to suggest the propriety of much and careful consideration in the future before any similar invitation be accepted should occasion again occur.

I am happy to learn from the Report of our Librarian, to which you have just listened, that our already ample and valuable collection of musical works has received a substantial increase during the year, among which we hail with a grateful respect the scholarly production of Sir Wm. Sterndale Bennett, the first offering of real excellence by an Englishman to our repertoire of artistic treasures.

The Treasurer's exhibit still shows a small balance on the wrong side of his Leger, and the income of the Permanent Fund is thereby, for the second time since its creation, called upon to make good a part of the deficit. And yet the regular operations of the year, aside from the Festival, show a positive gain. Nor is it an easy or grateful task to attempt to account for these short-comings in our recent financial results. Certainly there has never been presented to the public a more attractive or comprehensive programme than that which has just been performed, none in which so many and so noble works, both choral and instrumental, have followed each other in so brilliant and rapid succession; none where the corps of assisting artists have been procured at so lavish expenditure, and whose merits have been so marked and so universally acknowledged. Must we seek for this financially ill-success in the actual surfeit of good things which our own community had already received prior to this final feast of Symphony and of Song? Or must we attribute it in part to the distractions of a week in which the representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic and the Army of the Potomac divided the public attention with the votaries of art? But amidst our regrets at the monetary aspect of the festival, it is pleasant to remember that the choral occasions were those which always attracted the largest and most appreciative audiences; from which it is fair to suppose that had your physical endurance been equal to the task, and we had added still others to the already herculean labors imposed upon you, the financial as well as the artistic success of that trying week might have been assured.

The preparation of the Annals of the Society is now near its completion. It was confidently expected that the volume would be published and ready for distribution at the close of the current year. Delays and difficulties of various kinds have disappointed us in this expectation. Another year, or a portion of it, will still be required before the work will be made ready for the press.

A word in this place as to the condition and future prospects of our Permanent Fund. As I have stated in my previous reports, I consider the establishment of this fund an important era in the history of this Society. I have said that its provisions have been so carefully made and so judiciously guarded, that no one who may be disposed to add to its increase, need fear that it can be diverted from its proper and legitimate uses. I hope and believe that no member of the Society, present or prospective, will cherish for a moment the suggestion that by any possibility the sacred character of this trust can be impaired or infringed. I wish it were possible to convince the many benefactors of art in a community now distinguished for its liberality to art, in its many and various forms, that this among others is not unworthy their careful and conscientious regard. Its growth at the present is, at best, slow and uncertain. Its increase from the profits of concerts and festivals we have seen to be occasional only and unreliable. It needs such substantial and material aid as the friends and patrons of art, in its other aspects, are now giving in so generous measure throughout this whole community. Be assured, gentlemen, that any effort which you may make in its behalf will be counted now and hereafter a real and solid service to the Society.

In a former report I alluded to the efforts which this Society, in connection with the Music-Hall Association, have been making to establish the pitch of the Music-Hall Organ (the Normal Diapason so-called) as the recognized orchestral pitch of Boston if not of the whole country. For seven years we have persistently continued these efforts and with, sometimes, a gratifying show of success. Twice we have purchased a set of instruments (in the wood department) for the use of the orchestra. The Music Committee of the Public Schools, co-operating with us in our views and efforts, changed the pitch of all the instruments in the schools. The Conservatories of Music both signified their willingness to move in the same direction. But the orchestral players, here and elsewhere, have never manifested a hearty willingness to comply with the proposed change. Doubtless there were real and grave difficulties in the way. And these difficulties have increased rather than diminished of late. Meanwhile, at every public performance of the Society, we have more and more felt the necessity of some plan of reconciliation or at least of compromise. At a recent conference of gentlemen,—musicians, connoisseurs, critics,—representing, as far as possible, all sides of the question at issue, it was, after several meetings and much and careful consideration of the subject in all its bearings, and not without reluctance and a real regret, decided that on the whole it was expedient and best, under the circumstances, to bring up the pitch of the organ to the present orchestral standard. In consideration of which determination the Government and Board of Directors of this Society voted to share with the Music-Hall Association the expense of so altering the pitch of the organ, with the understanding that the work was to be done under the direction of the Messrs Walcker, the builders, and be completed prior to the opening of the recent Festival. This latter part of the contract it was found impossible fully to perform, and it remains for the incoming Board to determine how far they are bound to the fulfillment of their part of the agreement.

It has been my custom in previous reports, to pass in review the faults as well as the points of excellence in the Society's record for the year. And I am happy to be able to say that upon a careful retrospect I find a marked and noticeable improvement upon what I have heretofore pointed out as the defects and deficiencies in the conduct of the Society. I have already alluded to the better attendance at the ordinary meetings for rehearsal. A glance at the statistics I have given you, however, will show that much, very much, can yet be done by way of improvement in that direction. The per cent. of attendance, as thus given, will be seen to be about 57-100 of the active members belonging. The attendance in some of our public schools is found to be as high as 97-100; too great, as the committee have sometimes had occasion to mention in their reports. I can only hope that my successor, in his future reports, may find occasion to warn you of a like excess of devotion to your duty.

The monitorial plan, having for its object the simultaneous rising and sitting of the chorus, is still in some respects faulty and unequal in its workings, and may and should be improved.

The careful and conscientious performance of their duty, on the part of the gentlemanly corps of Superintendents, has done much to bring about order and system in the marshalling of the various departments of the chorus to their places, both at rehearsals and public performances, and I have observed a more quiet demeanor and respectful attention on the part of the chorus on these occasions. An improvement, too, in their pose while sitting and standing must not be forgotten in this connection. If, in addition to this, more care than has hitherto existed be taken on the part of certain portions of the chorus (which I have before designated) to face the audience, so as to deliver their tones into the house direct, a manifest increase in the power and volume of sound would be gained. There is no doubt but that a strict attention to all such minute points would conduce greatly to the order and discipline of the Society, as well as, in its ensemble, to its effect upon an audience.

The present numerical force of the Society (the number of active and efficient voices, I mean), as appears from the catalogue appended to the Festival programme, is 739,—divided as follows: Sopranis, 234; Altis, 194; Tenoris, 137; Bassis, 174. From this it will be seen that there is still a deficiency of tenors, while the sopranos are somewhat in excess of their true proportion. I have previously expressed the opinion that if the forces of the chorus were so distributed as to furnish an equal number of voices to each part, a better balance of tone would ensue, and a more artistic and satisfactory effect be obtained. And in the belief, which I have also before expressed, that the highest standard of excellence would easier be attained and preserved if the number of really active and efficient participants in the chorus should be limited, for the present, to 600, it follows that this balance can best be ensured by some process of depletion of the parts already in excess. It may be that the By-Laws of the Society are not sufficiently stringent to warrant such depletion of superfluous material, if any exists. If so, I would respectfully recommend such revision of the Rules and Regulations as may provide for this contingency. And as a natural corollary of such action, it would follow that the standard of requirement for admission should be yet higher advanced. The care of the Government would then be directed to acquire and retain, within these limits, the best materials only.

We come now to a brief consideration of the Triennial exercises which have just closed. I only re-echo the opinions I have already expressed, and which are abundantly confirmed by the testimony of the vast audiences whose silence and whose applause, by turns, were alike emphatic in your praise, when I say that never before in the art-history of our city or the country has a greater,—has an equal success, I think I may say,—been attained. It was a whole week of triumph. The opening day foreshadowed it and seemed to set its seal upon what was to follow; and from that to the end of the programme it was a sort of triumphal march before which expected obstacles appeared to vanish and difficulties to be overcome,—to the surprise, I was about to say, of none more than of yourselves. I do not indulge in hyperbole when I thus speak. Faults, of course, there were,—short-comings and failures in particular points which the critical ear and understanding was quick to catch. These were the shadows in the landscape of otherwise rich and glorious light. Nor was it other than a legitimate triumph,—the logical result of the long weeks and months of faithful and zealous work, of toil, of patient study and preparation which no one outside the circle of this Society can know. And in all this achievement of splendid results I say again—the high and holy art we profess has been honored at your hands, the cause of humanity has been advanced, the good name of the city and of this commonwealth have been upheld, and the bonds of our union made stronger; for an art triumph, like this, cannot be confined within local limits; it belongs to the State and to the Nation.

It remains for me, at the close of this my long term of service, to express to my esteemed associates in the Board of Government,—to our honored Conductor, Mr. Zerrahn, and to my accomplished friend, Mr. Lang, who, together with our excellent Secretary, have been co-workers with me in always kind and friendly relations from the very first;—to you, gentlemen, one and all, my grateful acknowledgment of the uniform kindness and courtesy I have received at your hands through all these years of responsibility, of enjoyment and of care. In so many times as I may have been forgetful or negligent of my duty toward you, who have so often honored me with the highest office within your gift, I crave your kind indulgence and your pardon. If it has been my good fortune in any manner to aid or advance the noble cause to whose interests we stand pledged, it will be to me a source of unfeigned satisfaction. I have passed with you the best ten years of my life,—in many respects the happiest ten years of my life,—to which happiness you, my friends, have done your full share in contributing. Will you accept for yourselves, individually, my heartfelt thanks and my earnest wishes for your welfare and continued success. May the present prosperity of this old and honored Society be perpetual;—and may the blessing of Almighty God rest upon you and upon it.

Music Abroad.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA. A new star has risen in the place of Nilsson. A correspondent of the Saturday Gazette writes (May —):

Mr. Mapleson, the director of Her Majesty's Opera at Drury Lane, whose prospects looked very shady when it was announced that Nilsson would not return to Europe this season has been fortunate in finding a vocalist in the person of Mlle. Marie Marimon, who promises to worthily fill the place left vacant by the Swedish Diva. Mlle. Marie Marimon made her first appearance at Drury Lane Theatre last week in the opera of La Sonnambula with an unmitigated success. Upon her entry on the stage she was received coldly and almost silently, as though the audience seemed determined to judge the new artist entirely upon her merits, and to disregard any prejudice formed upon statements read or heard in her favor previously to her actual appearance. This kind of treatment would have been completely disheartening to any but an artist confident of possessing unusual gifts, and in the power of employing them properly with credit to herself and pleasure to her hearers. The utterance of the first few notes of the opening scena for Amina, Care campagne, at once declared Mlle. Marimon had the power of singing perfectly in tune, possessed also the most complete control over a voice of a pure and sympathetic quality, and of delivering her cadences not only in the most faultless style as regards mere mechanism, but of imparting an individuality and originality to the manner in which these cadences were executed, so great and novel, and with so sweet, flexible and tuneful a voice, that the silent but watchful audience became absolutely fascinated with delight, and only broke the witching spell under which they seemed to labor with a perfect torrent of applause. Mlle. Marimon is not a vocalist capable of surmounting the mechanical difficulties of execution alone, for she has also power of producing new effects out of well-used means; her voice is of a beautiful musical quality, with a true tremolo used judiciously, and her compass is great and of the same character throughout. She is a good actress, with a pleasing, expressive face, and by her acting and singing—her singing especially—charms her audience in such a manner as only an artist can charm.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS. Mozart's Idomeneo was presented on Wednesday evening at the Third Concert with so much success as not only to justify the experiment made in producing it, but also to serve as a stimulant for the production of other operas which, from the nature of their libretti, are unsuited to stage representations. Amongst these Così fan Tutte and La Clemenza di Tito would doubtless occupy prominent positions, although a diligent search amongst the Salzburg musician's works would bring to light many interesting selections suitable for the Concert Room, where dramatic effects are out of place, and abstract music can be thoroughly appreciated. Idomeneo ranks as the first of a series of grand operas, which comprise Die Entführung, Figaro, Don Giovanni, Così fan Tutte, Die Zauberflöte, and La Clemenza di Tito—works in which the genius of Mozart found full scope for display, and developed itself to its fullest extent. If Don Giovanni and Figaro may be quoted as operas contain nothing but gems, Idomeneo only needs compression to merit the same distinction, whilst to the musician in some respects it has surpassing interest. Written directly after a visit to Paris, when Mozart became convinced from hearing some of Gluck's operas, that the formalism of the old Italian school might with advantage be broken through, Idomeneo is the model upon which all his succeeding operas were composed. Circumstances, and the requirements of public taste, modified its form, and reduced its proportions, but it was never entirely departed from, and has served to preserve some of the most delightful ideas ever conceived by a musician's fancy. Two of the characters in the opera are well suited for musical illustration. The tenderness of Ilia and the violence of Elettra's passions afford contrasts which the composer has not failed to intensify with all his acknowledged power. In the remorse of Idomeneo and in the attachment of Idamante, but little interest can be taken; but these characters represent two or three arias which cannot be heard without causing emotion, for they are gems of real art. Some of the choruses are also superb. Nothing finer has been written than the ensemble, "O voto tremendo," in the third act, whilst, as descriptive music, the double chorus in the ship wreck scene is unsurpassed. The orchestration in some of the arias is both rich and elaborate. The horn passages in the "Se li padre" have never been exceeded in difficulty by any composer, and form a complete exercise for that instrument. The whole score is, in fact, a study worthy of close attention, and will repay any amount of research.

With regard to the execution of the work, too much praise cannot be bestowed on all concerned. Mlle. Tietjens (Ilia) sang magnificently. Her splendid voice was heard to every advantage in "Padre! Germani!" "Se li Padre," and "Zeffiretti." Mme. Fabbri (as Elettra) gave effect to "Ah s'estinto," and the charming aria, "Idol mio." Mr. Bentham (Idamante) sang the aria "Ma non colpa," and took part in the trio, "Non partir," with taste and expression. Signor Vizman (Idomeneo) had the most trying character to support after that of Ilia, but was successful in all his songs, and elicited considerable applause by his rendering of "Fuur del mar," and "Torno al pace." Signor Caravoglia took the part of the Priest with ability. The solo parts in the choruses were nicely sung by Mlle. Boettli (a debutante from Milan), Miss Louisa Beverly, and Miss Emrick, of the London Academy of Music. Several numbers were redemanded, but the March in C was alone repeated.

In the second part, the great attraction was the pianoforte playing of Herr Jaell. The concerto chosen by this pianist was Beethoven's in C minor, No. 8. Herr Jaell was applauded and recalled. Dr. Wyde conducted the whole performance, and was warmly received on entering the orchestra.

For the fourth concert the services of Mlle. Marimon have been secured as vocalist. The chief instrumental work will be Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in G major.—Times.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The fifth concert took place in St. James's Hall, on Monday, and had a programme as remarkable for its interest as its length. Only such interest could warrant such length; and, even under the actual circumstances, it may be doubted whether two symphonies—one of them Schubert's No. 9—a concerto, an overture, a fugue, and three vocal pieces, were not more than enough for the most ravenous classicist. Schubert's elaborate and final contribution to musical epic must always exercise a kind of fascination over those who know the work and are interested in the man, because of its beauty, and the revelation it makes of the author's genius and character.

The performance, under Mr. Curina's direction, was notable for vigor, and occasionally for that refinement and delicacy which are essential when such music is in hand. With the No. 9 of Schubert was associated Mendelssohn's No. 4—the bright and glowing record of its gifted author's Italian impressions. How this work was played and how received there is no need to tell.

The concerto—Beethoven's, for violin—introduced Mme. Norman Neruda to the audience, which, two years ago, promptly recognised her ability, and, as may be imagined, it proved a severe test. If we say that other performers have given the first and third movements with more power, no censure of Mme. Neruda is involved. They played as men—she plays as a woman; and, while her reading and execution are marked by feminine grace and delicacy, both are wanting in that masculine vigor contemplated by Beethoven. Yet we would endure the inevitable loss at any time to have the concerto rendered with such beauty of tone, charm of style, and neatness of manipulation, as were shown by Mme. Neruda. In these respects nothing was wanting; while the Larghetto, with its deep sentiment and touching expression, was as absolutely perfect as the boldest dare to hope. No wonder that the audience applauded with fervor, and summoned the artist back. Mozart's prelude and fugue in D, and the overture to Cherubini's Deux Journées, completed the orchestral selections. Mme. Sinico and Mr. Bentham were the vocalists—the lady being recalled after "Ernani involami," the gentleman after Mozart's "Un aura amoroso."

BERLIN.—We find in a German paper the following report of the first public rehearsal, in Leipzig, of R. Wagner's new

"Kaiser-Marsch," attended only by invited guests, and the "Master" himself:

"Having been received with a flourish of trumpets as he entered, W. expressed his gratitude in the following terms:—'I thank you, gentlemen, for your very kind reception. My friend Schmidt intends to give me the pleasure of performing my Kaiser-Marsch. I have not yet heard it played by the orchestra, have in fact of late become somewhat unused to the sounds of any orchestra. It gives me particular pleasure to hear my latest composition performed for the first time by so excellent an orchestra as yours. I thank you cordially.'

"After these words W. took his seat, S. climbed down to his musicians, raised his baton, and the first powerful chords of the march burst upon us. I shall not take it upon myself to express any opinion upon the composition, particularly as professional critics will certainly be heard from soon. It made, however, a considerable impression upon me, although the term 'march' seems somewhat inappropriately chosen. There are passages of great beauty, and the sounds of Luther's great, old song 'Ein feste Burg,' etc., that mingle with the triumphal chords, produce a powerful effect. The addition of the vocal element at the end, however, appears to me very superfluous. The choir too, is curiously placed,—this being intended, I believe, to lend a peculiar charm. The singers are stationed opposite the orchestra, in the 'dress-circle,' so that the audience, in between the two, should possess a Janus head to be able to look at both.

"But I was far more interested in the composer than in his work. During the first bars he remained quietly in his seat, contenting himself with marking the time by motions of his head and hands. But this did not last very long. Soon he could not endure to sit still any more; at the first fortissimo he sprang up, loudly sang out the trombone passages, gesticulated with his clenched hands, and stamped his foot convulsively. The more fierce and noisy the composition became the more exalted and convulsive grew his movements. All his gesticulations, and the ever-changing expressions of his face, were as a continued, uninterrupted commentary to the composition: sometimes comical, but always very suggestive.—I seem to see him yet, as he depleted, so to speak, a flourish of the trombone;—he stood leaning forward, clenching his right hand, like a boxer, fixing his eyes upon the instruments, and at the decisive moment throwing out his hand with marvellous energy, as though he meant to annihilate some invincible, deadly enemy, while he uttered a piercing "Tra!" that went through and through me. Most delightful too, was his representation of the rests. He extended both arms as far as possible, swiftly moving his hands up and down, as though to imitate the fluttering of a frightened bat, suddenly raising them, to mark the conclusion. While he gave himself up to these exercises, he sang, and screamed, and talked, obeying the impulses of the moment without any restraint, imitating the bassoons, the flutes, the kettle-drums, and even giving appropriate expression to the more delicate shadings, by graceful nodding of the head, and wavings of the hand. He appears however to inspire the performing artists with his own warmth and enthusiasm, for I had never heard our orchestra play with such fire, such passionate earnestness as it did to-day, under the demoniac influence of R. W."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 17, 1871.

Second Triennial Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society.

FOURTH DAY: AFTERNOON (Concluded).

We are happy to acknowledge that we differ from most of the criticisms we have seen on this performance, in that we do think that the "Choral Symphony" went quite as well, and even better as a whole, than it did three years ago. The chorus work was certainly more sure and easy, the natural result of practice and familiarity. The orchestral parts were admirable; and the Quartet of solo voices, although we had not Mme. Parepa-Rosa's all-sufficient and unflinching soprano as before, was really by far the best Quartet that we have ever had in it. Mrs. H. M. SMITH's musical, clear voice was sure, true, telling, well-sustained throughout the soprano; Miss STERLING's contralto by its weight was always felt; Mr. CUMMINGS, in the tenor, was invaluable, lending a new charm and completeness to the whole; and Mr. RUDOLPHER, being in excellent voice of late, delivered that most difficult opening Recitative, for the Bass, as well as his trying passages in the Quartet

(in that quadruple cadenza, for instance) in a manner too artistic to escape the recognition of exacting connoisseurs. And so with the last Symphony of Beethoven closed another high hour, another climax of the Festival.

Miss STERLING won sincere applause by her expressive rendering of Mozart's canzonetta (the well-known song "To Chloe"), and of Liszt's (to our mind) forced and not entirely musical setting of the "King of Thule" ballad. As to Mr. CUMMINGS in "Deeper and deeper still," and "Waft her, angels," he has left an impression, which we hope may never be obscured, of all that is most delicate and pure and spiritual, with nothing over-strained, over-refined or morbid, in the interpretation of that most exacting kind of song.

FIFTH DAY, SATURDAY, MAY 13.

The fourth and last Orchestral and Vocal Concert was given in the afternoon. It opened with a brilliant performance of the Overture to Tannhäuser by the great orchestra. Next came the noble Recitative and Aria: Non più di fiore, from Mozart's Clemenza di Tito, which no one could sing more nobly, hardly with more delicate expression, than Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. And a word is due here to the beautiful obligato accompaniment by our own excellent clarinetist, Mr. WEBER. The charming pastoral Adagio and Andante from Beethoven's Prometheus music followed, very delicately rendered, the cello solo being finely given by, we believe, a member of the Thomas orchestra. Then came the wonderful Chopin Concerto in F minor (only the middle and last movement, to the general regret), played with exquisite taste and feeling, as of course it would be, by Miss ANNA MEHLIG. It was, for a long time at least, her farewell to Boston, and so her playing (and of that piece, too, with which she first took our Symphony audience captive) was listened to with a peculiar interest. She has already returned to Germany, but there is hope that she will revisit America within another year or two. The glorious old C-minor Symphony of Beethoven worthily closed the series.

EVENING.—BACH'S "PASSION MUSIC."—BENNETT'S "WOMAN OF SAMARIA."

The presentation, and successfully, for the first time here, though only of selections from the greatest monumental work in the whole history of sacred music,—Sebastian Bach's setting of the Passion of our Lord according to the narrative of St. Matthew,—was the highest mark of progress reached in the whole Festival, or in the whole history of our Handel and Haydn Society and of choral efforts in this country. It was essentially the newest thing of the week; the freshest musical experience that Boston has enjoyed for many years; it led us farther into the inmost sanctuary of the divine life in tones than any revelation thereof that had been vouchsafed to us before. The saddest of all music (though never gloomily oppressive), yet how uplifting and inspiring! Accepting and embracing sorrow with all the fervor which tones only can express, it is only to find in it, what Beethoven in his way also found, beauty and joy forever! Could we, then, listen for an hour or more to a theme so serious, and so seriously treated, with all the intensifying and at the same time harmonizing and subduing power of Art, yet feeling a strange sweetness and serenity the while, a renewal of hope, a new sense of the worth and interest of life? Verily with most listeners it was so. We think we but describe the average (of course not unanimous) impression made on that great audience. Yet many went there to whose minds the very name of Bach was to that hour a bugbear; a goodly number of them came away enamored of him, longing to hear more. Some, doubtless, went to sneer; some of them perhaps persevered in that, doggedly clinging to their own conceit, but more went home to praise.

By far the greater number had been taught to fear a wearisome display of musical "learning"; quaint and frigid lengths of curled, conventional and by-gone melody, far from melodious to modern ears; and an intolerable heaviness of fugue and counterpoint, mere "intellectual arithmetic," without a quickening ray of soul or genius or a throb of real feeling,—a Passion passionless, in short. What was their surprise,—or would have been if they had known enough,—to find that there was not a single Fugue in all of it, with just the one short exception of the splendid chorus by which all were overwhelmed with wonder and delight: "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," and which had to be repeated! The testimonies which we have brought together (in our last three numbers) from writers in so many journals, fairly represent the average impression,—the "public opinion," so to speak,—regarding that experiment. Any good lawyer, putting this evidence together, sifting and weighing, making all due allowance for degrees of culture and of preparation, for prejudice and ignorance, for weak and vague enthusiasm, for blind echo of authority, "fashion," guess-work, and what not, will say that it contains abundant proof, that to the mass of that audience what they heard then of the Passion Music was a new revelation of sublimity and beauty, of rich humanity and tenderness, of most profound, sincere religious feeling; that not only were the choruses and chorales felt to be of surpassing fulness, depth and pathos, and of a kind that seemed original and fresh; but that the instrumentation, also, of the double orchestra possessed a singular and fascinating fitness, enhancing, vivifying every beauty, every apt expression, as if it too were all alive and human,—and all in a style they never heard before, tone combinations altogether novel, yet never betraying any motive but the intrinsic and religious motive of the whole work; also, that even the long arias with all their quaintness, and the wonderfully human Recitatives, charmed by their musical and sympathetic truth and beauty; while more than once were they surprised by things that sounded strangely modern in the best sense. Indeed the music made its mark, and has awakened a desire which nothing short of the whole work will satisfy. The Oratorio Society which for another season neglects Bach, will be behind the time,—at least in Boston.

Under the circumstances it was the part of prudence, no doubt, to begin now with selections; though several of the pieces necessarily lost something of their meaning and their beauty by being taken out of their connection with the whole. Fully to interpret each part in the light of what should go before and follow, would involve such an analysis of the whole work as would fill more than one week's paper. Impressive as the few separate choruses and arias were, no one could fully feel their power and beauty who had not studied the entire work as one. The selections, on the whole, were made with judgment, mainly from the most striking and most practicable numbers, including fair examples of each kind: the narrative Recitative, the Recitative in character, the formal Aria (preceded sometimes by accompanied cantabile Recitative), the harmonized Chorale, and the grand Chorus (often double); enough of it, indeed, in the First Part, to preserve something of the progress of the mournful story. The various elements which enter into the composition of the text, too, were in some sense represented: as, 1) the Gospel narrative, recited by the Tenor, called Evangelist, with the usual dry chord accompaniment. This Recitative is so beautiful and so expressive in its whole series, each phrase, each tone of music so close to each sentiment and image, nay to each phrase, word, syllable even, of the text, that but a faint idea of it could be formed from the very few fragmentary specimens. Yet even these failed not to interest by their purity of style, their obvious fitness and felicity. Mr. Wm. J. WINDY delivered them in clear, true tones, simply and chastely, and with a fair degree of expression. They were merely a few sentences connecting the words of the betrayer and betrayed in the scene of the Supper; a few more where the Master's "soul is sorrowful" at Gethsemane; and again, telling how he "fell down upon his face and prayed," as introductory to the one Bass Aria selected;—from Part Second none at all.

2. Of what we may call the character Recitative, or dialogue: the words of Jesus of course are of chief importance; and here the pious heart and genius of the musician, with utmost reverence and tenderness, has conceived and rendered every tone so worthily, that it would seem actually caught from the dear Master's lips. Possibly all did not notice, though they must have felt the fine, mysterious thrill: whenever Jesus begins speaking, soft tones from the quartet of strings flow in to weave a halo round his sacred head and make the very air divine. The only parts selected were: first, from the scene of the Last Supper, those which relate to Judas, the blessing of the bread, &c. There is a solemn, sovereign majesty and tenderness in every tone of this Recitative; at the words "Take and eat," and "Drink ye all" the phrase becomes melodic, and the instruments combine to make the voice and the whole scene more present; then, farther on, the words "My soul is sorrowful unto death"; and again where he prays that the cup may pass from him. This is for a Bass voice, and of course demands a noble one, and also more than voice or skill. Mr. WHITNEY delivered it with dignity of style and simple, true expression, if not always with all the sympathetic delicacy of which it is capable; indeed that would require a singer of at once a finer and a more commanding stamp than we have known.

3. The Chorales,—people's tunes,—like our psalm tunes, but so much more musical and from the heart of deep experience,—by which Bach intended the participation of the worshipping congregation in the Passion service. These Lutheran melodies he has harmonized for four parts, over and over again, each time with a new expression suited to the new occasion, with such truth of feeling and such perfect art as to elicit all their meaning, all that is implied in them, and make their beauty ever fresh and incorruptible. Of the dozen which he introduces in the Passion, three were sung. One, the first of all, after Jesus has told his crucifixion:

"Say, sweetest Jesus, what law Thou hast broken,
To bring on Thee the dreadful sentence spoken," &c.

was used to open the performance, rather abruptly to be sure, but nobly and impressively, at once arresting a profound attention. The richness of the sad and sombre harmony, supported, only, by the instruments, which play the same parts with the voices; the individual movement of the voice parts,—four interwoven strains of melody,—each helping the expression of the whole, made itself felt by all. The public yielded to the Chorale unconditionally,—and that was a good beginning. Still more captivated were they by the two which came later: "I will stay here beside Thee" (after the prediction of Peter's denial, but standing in the selections wholly by itself), and the same tune again with other harmony: "O Head, all bruised and wounded." For all three of them were sung with fine precision and expression by the seven hundred voices, so that it all sounded broad and full, at once majestic and sweet. We think, however, that so great a mass of voices pure and simple, would have sounded even better, without the somewhat heterogeneous timbre of the various instruments merely reinforcing their notes. Bach's own score has the instruments, but he arranged the Chorales for a church service with a much smaller choir, it is to be presumed.

4. Other specimens vouchsafed to us, naturally of the most interesting and important, belong to what we have termed the reflective element in the Passion Music. It is the more subjective portion of the text and music,—the comments, meditations, prayers, confessions, now of the ideal Church or congregation of believers, now of the individual pious heart filled with warm personal love and sympathy for Christ, who is almost every instance in this work is called by the human name Jesus. These are interspersed all along, prompted at various stages of the narrative, and take the forms of Chorus and of Aria, accompanied in polyphonic harmony with independent figures and suggestions by the orchestra. The Arias are very numerous, elaborate, commonly preceded by a verse of rhymed melodic Recitative, and are for each of the four kinds of voices. The Choruses (of this class) are few, but very great, serving for grand, solemn opening and closing of the two Parts. More numerous, and of the sweetest, deepest, tenderest of all the music, are the combinations of the two, Arias with Chorus, in which Bach shows some of his most characteristic and imaginative creative power.

[But we again lack room to complete what we must say about the Passion Music; also for what little we have in mind about Mr. Bennett's Oratorio and the wind-up performance of "The Messiah"; and for a few concluding general remarks. It will do no harm to keep the Festival topic uppermost for some time longer.]

☞ Notice of PROMENADE CONCERTS, already in type, crowded out.

We have still several interesting concerts in reserve for notice.

ORGAN MUSIC. Mr. EUGENE THAYER has just concluded his Spring series of seven "Free Organ Recitals" at the First Church (corner of Berkeley and Marlboro' Streets). He has now given, since that admirable Walcker Organ was erected—perhaps the most perfect instrument for its size with which any church is blessed in this wide land—no less than 29 of these sweet and quiet feasts of true and noble organ compositions, which have been freely open to all who love this kind of music. Sebastian Bach has always filled a good half of his programmes; Mendelssohn, Schumann, Handel, Hesse, Thiele, &c., being well represented in the other half. To a sincere music lover, who has any of the religion of music in his soul, and to whom music is a light and comfort amid the serious problems of life; to the artist or the student, especially, with whom music is an earnest matter,—we can imagine no more refreshing, soothing and delightful way of passing an hour or two in these lovely May and June afternoons, (unless when the heat is extreme), than to walk across the Common and the Public Garden, now in all their beauty, and entering that beautiful, still church, with its stained glass windows, to sit there in the dim, religious half light, listening to the sweetest and the grandest strains of those great masters,—their sincerest and most private prayers and meditations in their own native tone language,—interpreted through such an instrument by one so competent. Had we realized how rapidly such opportunities were passing, we would have made some sacrifice rather than miss a single one of them.

The "Recitals" (to be resumed after the summer vacation) have been given on Friday afternoons, at 3½ o'clock, and have been well attended, particularly by students and by amateurs of organ music, as well as by others who simply yield themselves up to the sentiment of the thing, as one does to Nature, and who have found in it refreshment to the spirit. Mr. Thayer has usually had the assistance of some one of his pupils, and these have acquitted themselves creditably. Without more ado, we here record the programmes of the seven afternoons:

23d Recital, April 28.

Prelude and Fugue in G major.....Bach.
Vorspiel: Schmücke Dich....."
Prelude in B minor....."

Mr. Robert Raymond.

Andante and Allegretto, from Fourth Sonata.....Mendelssohn.

Skizzen, Op. 58, No. 2.....Schumann.

Andante from Fifth Sonata, }.....Mendelssohn.

Finale from Sixth Sonata, }.....Mendelssohn.

Mr. Raymond.

Sixth Organ Concerto.....Handel.

24th Recital, May 5.

Prelude and Fugue in F minor.....Bach.

Six fugues on the name "B-A-C-H." Op. 60, Nos. 3 and 5.....Schumann.

Vorspiel: "Herzlich that mich verlangen." }.....Bach.

"Es ist das Heil uns kommen her." }.....Bach.

Mr. Samuel Studley.

Skizzen, Op. 58, No. 3.....Schumann.

Variations in A major, Op. 47.....Hesse.

Mr. Studley.

Chromatische Fuge.....Thiele.

25th Recital, May 11.

Toccata et Fuga in D minor.....Bach.

Vorspiel: "Wir glauben all"....."

[For two manuals and double pedals.]

Skizzen, Op. 58, Nos. 1 and 2.....Schumann.

Fifth Organ Concerto.....Handel.

Studley, Op. 58, Nos. 5 and 6.....Schumann.

Concertos in C minor.....Thiele.

26th Recital, May 19.

Toccata in G major.....Bach.
Vorspiel: "Christ, Under Herr"....."
Vorspiel: "Liebster Jesu"....."
Mr. Henry Barnard.
Stimmen, Op. 58, Nos. 4 and 5.....Schumann.
Prelude in G, No. 2.....Mendelssohn.
Mr. Barnard.
Chromatische Fantasie.....Thiele.

27th Recital, May 26.

Great Fugue in G minor.....Bach.
Staden, Op. 58, Nos. 3 and 5.....Schumann.
Fifth Organ Concerto.....Handel.
Mr. George Kie.
Choral Variations: "Hail dir".....Hesse.
Vorspiel: "Heut triumphiret".....Bach.
"Wir danken dir".....Bach.
Mr. Kie.
Prelude and Fugue in A minor.....Bach.

28th Recital, June 2.

Cantata in D minor.....Bach.
Vorspiel: "Nun freut euch"....."
"Valeit will ich dir geben"....."
Fantasia in G minor....."
Mr. Edward Fisher.
Staden, Op. 58, No. 4.....Schumann.
Stimmen, Op. 58, No. 4.....Schumann.
Maestoso and Andante, from Third Sonata.....Mendelssohn.
Mr. Fisher.
Variations in A flat, Op. 24.....Hesse.

29th Recital, June 9.

Fantasia in G major.....Bach.
Sonata in C minor, No. 2.....Mendelssohn.
Vorspiel: "An Wasserflüssen Babylon".....Bach.
Prelude and Fugue in B flat.....Bach.
Mr. Frank Stearns.
Choral Variations: "Hail Dir".....Hesse.
Stimmen, Op. 58, Nos. 1 and 2.....Schumann.
Adagio from First Sonata.....Mendelssohn.
Mr. Stearns.
Concertants in E flat minor.....Thiele.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT AT FRATERNITY HALL.

On Thursday evening last some of the younger members of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society laid before their friends a varied programme of vocal and instrumental music, under the leadership of Miss J. P. Titcomb, as a supplementary effort in connection with their recent May-day fair. One of the most interesting features was the production of Haydn's "Kinder Sinfonie," by a band of youths and maidens most of them hitherto wholly unused to orchestral manipulation. But with the valuable aid of Master Albert Van Rensselaer, of the Boston Conservatory (whose services as first violinist were politely granted by Mr. Eichberg), and the excellent pianoforte performance of Miss Alice F. Haynes, it passed off with brilliant effect. Master Van Rensselaer put the audience into raptures by a most skillful rendering of a difficult De Beriot "Fantasia," which, with a subsequent version of one of our national airs with variations, stamped him a child of extraordinary musical promise. A Concerto duet for pianoforte was played with excellent effect by the Misses Holand, and a novelty in the way of a "Piano Song" from the pen of Rev. J. V. Blake, with solo and chorus accompanied by piano, a brace of violins and drum, was especially pleasing. On the whole those who came with the dogged and dog-day determination to listen, in great heat and discomfort, were compelled to go away with many expressions of delight upon their lips.—Commonwealth, June 10.

THE SACRED CONCERT for the benefit of the Cathedral Choir Table, given at the Music Hall last evening under the direction of Mr. Gilmore, was decidedly superior in the quality of its performance as well as in the character of its programme to the large majority of miscellaneous concerts. The orchestra, though not large, was well balanced and effective. The chorus did most of their work neatly and earnestly. The principal solos were given by Mr. Powers, Mr. Arbuckle, Mr. Whitely and Miss Kellogg, all of whom appeared to excellent advantage. Miss Kellogg's selections were "Casta Diva" and the grand scena and prayer from "Der Freischütz," and both were rendered with great brilliancy of execution and refinement of sentiment. In answer to an encore of the air from "Norma," Miss Kellogg sang "The Last Rose of Summer," and in response to a recall after the "Freischütz" scena, gave one stanza of "Home, Sweet Home." The audience was very large and exceedingly enthusiastic.—Advertiser, June 12.

MORE IMPRESSIONS OF THE "PASSION MUSIC" AT THE FESTIVAL.—The Musical Independent (Chicago) says:

The effect of this music was far more agreeable on the audience than was anticipated. It differed widely from anything ever heard before. Yet, although the oldest work of the festival, it is, in many things, the newest. Bach's music has a smoother flow than Handel's. It goes on like an ever-flowing river. All the airs are long. All are exceedingly difficult, especially because the accompaniments are obligate. The most pleasing of the earlier selections is the eighth. This opens with a lovely oboe solo, accompanied by 'cello solo and violas. After a verse of the song, "I'll watch with my dear Jesus away," the chorus comes in softly, "So slumber shall our sins befall;" then the soprano resumes the opening strain, and the chorus again responds, but with changed music, and so they go on. There is nothing to say of this, save that it is tender, beautiful, and charming. The next hit was made by the duet and chorus "Alas, my Jesus now is taken." This opens with a prelude of flute and oboe accompanied by soft strings, and a charming thing it was too. Then the two singers, one after another, take up the sad refrain: "My Jesus now is taken," and presently the chorus bursts in: "Leave him! Bind him not!" This duet is totally unlike anything I ever heard, yet extremely beautiful. Then follows a double chorus that is as effective (considered merely from the dramatic stand-point,) as Meyerbeer ever wrote, yet full of the massiveness peculiar to Bach. It opens with a fugue: "Ye lightnings, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanished?" in which the basses have a rolling passage, very curious and very effective. This part of the chorus works to a climax on the dominant, and breaking short off leaves a silence followed by a passage, which for awful grandeur I have never heard surpassed, to the words: "Burst open ye fierce flaming caverns of hell." No verbal description can do justice to this remarkable passage. I can only repeat that it betokens Bach's very remarkable appreciation of dramatic effect. There is also a very artistic alto solo, "O pardon me," introduced by a violin solo, played beautifully by Mr. B. Lestmann. The closing chorus is also exceedingly beautiful, but is of a character to be explained only by the peculiarity of this work, having been composed for religious service. I am told by a friend who heard this several years in succession in Leipzig, that performed as it is in St. Thomas' church, the venerable barn-like structure in which Bach played the organ and trained the choir, the singers occupy the upper gallery. The church on Good Friday evening is dimly lighted, and the listener in the gloom below hears these beautiful and impressive strains, but sees no singer or player. When the music is half completed, a sermon on the Passion intervenes. It is on account of this intended use that the Passion Music of Bach lacks the brilliant ending customary with concert works.

And here is the comment of the Musical Bulletin (New York):

The most interesting event of the whole festival was the production of Bach's Passion Music and Dr. Bennett's Oratorio "The Woman of Samaria." It was a mistake to bring the two works into juxtaposition, for the music of the latter, fresh and spirited as it is, seemed little and almost trifling and insipid beneath the shadow of Bach's broad and massive work. The selections of Bach's music comprised three of the chorals, the magnificent double chorals, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," so suggestive of Handel's famous "Hallelujah" chorals, the concluding chorals, "Around thy tomb," songs for the soprano, alto, tenor and bass, and most of the connecting passages of recitative. The recitatives are among the most important parts of the work and demand something else than the mere flippant, sliding style of the Italian opera. The tenor solos, particularly, are very taxing, and they demand a great voice as well as the best cultivation. Mr. Winch sustained them creditably to himself, but they are capable of much greater effect than he is able to give them. The other soloists were Miss Ruderodorf, Miss Sterling and Mr. Whitney. The choruses are sturdy and impressive throughout the work. The two double choruses, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," and "Around thy tomb" are truly great specimens of choral writing. The choristers performed their parts very well, except that more light and shade—a more marked pianissimo to set off the more massive passages, would doubtless have enhanced the general effect.

"PERSONAL." The sensational Sun (New York), of June 3d, informs the world:

The steamer Scotia, which arrived at this port on the 26th of April last, brought from London the future husband of that charming songstress Miss Christine Nilsson. The modest young gentleman arrived on the day of the first performance of the late season of Italian opera, which he attended. On the next day he set out for the West in search of Miss Nilsson, and found her in Chicago. The gentleman's name is A. Roumand. He was recently engaged in commercial business in London. In future he will try his fortune in the commercial mart of the city.

Mr. Roumand is accompanied to this country by Col. Snow, an English gentleman, formerly, if not now, of the British army. Mr. Roumand is about twenty-eight years old, of middling size, chestnut hair, sandy whiskers worn in English style, of good presence, rather fine looking, and is an accomplished gentleman, and socially very pleasant. To make a long story short, this little affair between Miss Nilsson and Roumand is a genuine love match. This fact will explain the recent operations of Miss Nilsson in real estate, in Peoria, Ill., and Boston. When the happy couple are to be made one is not within our knowledge. Soon, it is presumed. They returned to this city on Tuesday, accompanied by Mrs. Richardson, a travelling companion of Miss Nilsson, Col. Snow, and Max Strakosch, and are temporarily residing at the Everett House.

On Wednesday evening Dr. and Mrs. Doramus entertained Miss Nilsson and Mr. Roumand at dinner at their residence in Fourth Avenue. Among the guests were Mrs. Richardson, Col. Snow, Mr. Jarrett, the London manager, and Mr. Waller, the musical and dramatic writer of the Evening Mail.

In a few days Miss Nilsson with her companion, Mrs. Richardson, accompanied by Roumand and Col. Snow, and Dr. and Mrs. Doramus, will go up to West Point to attend the annual examination of the Military Academy. They will then go to Niagara Falls and return to Saratoga by way of Lake George. After tarrying a while at the Springs, the party will visit Newport and perhaps the White Mountains or Long Branch.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Without thee. (Senza te.) (Ce que suis. 4.

F to g. Gounod. 40

Words in English, French and Italian. Is very pretty and piquant, and has made a decided success in the concert room.

She was my boyhood's dream. 3. F to d.

J. L. Hatton. 35

"I loved to see her waving curls,
Her bright eyes' sunny beam,
Oh, happy days, when boys and girls
Of merry meetings dream."

Of classic beauty.

The Song of a Clerk. 3. D to f. A. J. Goodrich. 30

Poetry by O. W. Holmes, and, of course is witty as it can be, and real wit, too.

On the Hill. (Auf dem Berge.) 4. F to f. Lindblad. 30

"On this height reclining,
Oft my tranquil moments flow."

Pretty melody, and fine workmanship displayed, both in harmony and rhythm.

Mine Host. Champagne Song. 3. Bb to f. 30

"Mine host, mine host, come hither
And drain a glass with me."

Instrumental.

Ave Maria d'Arcadeldt. 3. F. Liszt. 40

As this is quite easy, improve your opportunity to play "Liszt." A characteristic piece.

Kaufmann's Casino Waltz. 3. Gung'l. 75

Bright, fresh, and Gung'l-like.

Scene Bohemienne. (Chanson a boire.) 3. F. Kuhe. 50

A transcription of a strange gypsy air, with minor and major strains alternating.

Good Humor. Polka Mazurka. (Gemuthvoll und heiter.) 3. G. F. Budik. 30

Good name for it, as it is brighter than most mazurkas, while it retains the form.

Mandolina. Fantasie Brillante. 5. Eb. Leybach. 60

Vienne Galop. 4. F. Ketterer. 50

Two fine pieces, the first light and airy, the last surprisingly sweet and brilliant. One is tempted to call it one of Ketterer's best pieces.

Tête-a-tête Waltz. 3. C. L. H. Cooke. 50

Sparkling and pretty.

Carabinier's Swiss March. 4 hands. 3. Bb.

A. Croises. 60

A brilliant military movement. Effective for exhibitions.

Marche Turque. De Mozart. 4 hands. 3. A.

L. Streabogg. 60

A well-known march by Mozart, part minor and part major, probably originally founded on a real Turkish air, as it has Eastern peculiarities.

Walnut Polka. 2. G. R. B. Leonard. 30

Very neat and bright.

Galop. "Summer Garlands." 3. G. F. Zikoff. 40

Has very light, graceful, staccato octave passages. There is also a Mazurka and a Polka, in the "Summer Garland" set. Get them all. Handsome lithograph title.

Mazurka Caracterisque. 3. F. H. Kowalski. 35

Beautiful. Such pieces ought to outlast many more brilliant ones.

Books.

THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA. A Sacred Cantata

by W. S. Bennett. Paper, $1.12

Boards, 1.50

Cloth, 1.75

Leaders and Managers of Musical Societies would do well, during the summer, to procure and look through a copy of this book. It supplies material for practice to those who cannot quite manage an oratorio, and still is above the level of glee and anthems.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, E flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 789.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 7.

Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine.

[From the London Daily Telegraph.]

The present Niederrheinische Musikfest is the forty-eighth of a series celebrated in rotation at Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Düsseldorf, after the fashion which obtains with our own Festival of the Three Choirs. During near upon half a century of its existence, the institution has made for itself a history of no mean interest; thanks to the production of eminent works, and the co-operation of eminent workers. Upon that history, however, I must not venture to touch. Enough that the Niederrheinische Musikverein is distinguished even among the art associations of Germany for what has already been accomplished, and for the sustained energy which, year by year, marks its operations. The managing committee includes General von Frankenberg, the Governor of Cologne, and such representative men as the Oberbürgermeister, the Polizeipräsident, Capellmeister Hiller, and Franz Weber, the cathedral organist; while the executive force, numbering in all 763, is made up of contingents from some thirty towns, among them being Berlin, Dresden, Hanover, Amsterdam, and Brussels. The soloists are Frau Bellingrath-Wagner, Frau Amalie Joachim, Fräulein Schwarzkopf, Herr Gunz, Herr Stockhausen, and Herr Joachim; with Concertmeister Japha of Cologne as "leader," Herr Weber as the organist, and Dr. Hiller as supreme director and conductor. Known as most of these names are in England, and well understood as is the efficiency of a German orchestra and chorus, it must be evident that here are the materials of an ensemble such as only rare occasions present in England. Turning to the programme, we find that, unlike the schemes of our own festivals, which aim to give as much as possible in the time at command, only three concerts are arranged, to take place on consecutive evenings; the mornings being devoted to those careful rehearsals which are the secret of Teutonic efficiency. The contents of the programme will appear in due course; but I must at once express a natural surprise at the almost entire absence from it of the name of the German composer whom, next to Handel, the English people hold in highest honor. Bach, Handel, Gluck, Beethoven, Spohr, Weber, Hiller, Gade, and even Reinecke are more or less conspicuous; but Mendelssohn, the author of St. Paul and Eljah, is represented only by one of his smallest Lieder, at the far end of the last concert. This can probably be explained; but no explanation that has reached me is at all sufficient to account for what seems a deliberate slight.

Such gloomy forebodings as may have been excited by torrents of rain on Friday and Saturday were dispelled by the brilliant sun and cloudless sky of Sunday morning. The town, the river, and the adjacent country afforded a most bright and attractive spectacle. The population "descended" into the streets with one accord and with an aspect of grave enjoyment. Both fronts of the Gürzenich broke out into flags of many hues, and, generally, everything put itself into harmony with the occasion. Business began—so far, at least, as concerned many—with a reception by Capellmeister Hiller, at the unconscionable hour of half-past nine in the morning. It is needless to say that the rooms were crowded, or that the gathering was one of mark. Musically speaking, "everybody" put in an appearance, anxious to honor the distinguished host and the festival of which he is the head. There might be seen the honest, earnest face of Joseph Joachim, who had travelled all night from Berlin to be present; Leopold Auer, if I mistake not, was also among the crowd, as certainly were Carl Reinecke, M. Gevaert, from Brussels, Dr. Gunz, Herr Stockhausen, and others not unknown in English concert-rooms. Nor was England without representatives—though the reputation of our fair countrywomen, to whom Cologne is a musical Alma Mater, lies as yet in the future. The reunion began early; early it broke up; and at the before mentioned hour of six p.m. the first concert of the festival commenced.

Punctuality is not among the virtues of German concert-managers. They wait the convenience of the audience with a determination which would horrify Sir Michael Costa—to begin half an hour after the appointed time being looked upon as the most natural thing in the world. Happily, the public do not seem to take advantage of this accommodating spirit by demanding an extra grace. At all events, they did not so act last night; for within the half-hour the Gürzenich became comfortably full, and Dr. Hiller, seeing that all were ready, mounted to his lofty perch amid considerable applause, and started an overture composed for the Festival by Carl Reinecke. I do not think this pièce d'occasion will much enhance the Leipzig professor's reputation. It begins well, with some attractive passages for "wind" and "string" in alternation; while a second subject, which appears in due course, has also merit. But no sooner does Herr Reinecke introduce the first phrase of "See the conquering hero," than he degenerates into sheer and absolute weakness, which becomes almost ludicrous when "Ein feste Burg" is combined with Handel's theme. The scramble among the various subjects thus brought together is exceedingly droll; but I question whether Herr Reinecke intended his music as a source of amusement. Of course, the patriotic feeling suggested met with a hearty response, and the Leipzig Capellmeister was called to the platform in German fashion amid the roll of drums and blare of trumpets. After the overture a certain Herr Rittershaus took Dr. Hiller's place, and recited a poem of his own composition bearing upon recent events. Not being a professed critic of German poetry, I will not risk doing Herr Rittershaus an injustice, and only say that his effusion was very long. Whether the audience enjoyed it is doubtful. They listened in solemn silence to the end, and then applauded either with the applause of relief or of approval.

Sebastian Bach's cantata, "Ein feste Burg," soon dispelled the gloom engendered by Herr Rittershaus, and brought home to every one present what a king of musicians was the solid, God-fearing old Cantor. The first chorus, with its masterly contrapuntal elaboration, through which the theme of the well-known tune weaves its way, in the orchestra, like a thread of silver; the second chorus, in which the positions are reversed, and the chorale is thundered out in unison against an entirely different Orchesterstück; the beautiful duet for contralto and tenor, with obbligati for viol de gamba (clarinet) and violin; and the final chorale, which is simply "Ein feste Burg" in plain, full harmony—all these things made a profound impression, and marked the cantata as among the noblest sacred works of its illustrious author. The solo passages were sung by Frau Bellingrath, Frau Joachim, and Dr. Gunz.

Gluck's overture to Iphigenia in Aulis was then played; and after it, came "Israel's Siegesgesang," a hymn for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra, composed in honor of the German victories, and the peace they conquered, by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller. All the words are taken from the Bible. Dr. Hiller's hymn is in seven movements, of which three are choruses, the others a combination of solo and chorus. It is written throughout with deep feeling for the subject; and with a masterly ease, as well as breadth of style, to which the veteran composer does not invariably attain. Among the striking examples of merit almost reaching the dignity of genius, I may cite a beautiful solo and chorus, "Preise Jerusalem deinen Herrn;" an elaborate and largely developed chorus, "Die Heiden sind versunken in der Grube;" passages of great power in a solo, "Siehe, es stehet geschrieben;" and a charmingly melodious chorus of women, with solo, "Die mit Thränen säen." In these things Dr. Hiller appears as a master of his art; and, if there be passages, as in the final chorus, which make a less favorable impression, they are comparatively so few that they count for little. The verdict of the audience was unanimous, and Dr. Hiller was saluted at the close of his work, with the heartiest applause; the drums and trumpets of the orchestra joining in. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony closed the concert; but I shall reserve my remarks upon its performance until it may be possible to estimate, after larger experience, the capacity of this model German orchestra.

The second night's concert was devoted to Handel's Joshua, one of several oratorios by the great master which are unaccountably and undeservedly neglected among the people for which they were written. The choice of this work was dictated by an assumed applicability to the present circumstances of the German nation; and it might be unfair to charge those who made the application with presumption in comparing Kaiser Wilhelm to Joshua, his armies to the Heaven-favored hosts of Israel, and Paris to the Jericho of the heathen. Such things are done in all countries with surprising complacency, and are universally allowed to pass. Did not Handel write Judas Maccabæus in honor of "Butcher" Cumberland, and run the coronation of Solomon in parallel lines with the enthronement of his late Majesty, George II.? Does not M. Gounod, in his Gallia, compare Paris with Jerusalem; and does not Dr. Hiller, in the cantata just produced at Cologne, identify the German cause with that of the "chosen people?" It would plainly be absurd to distinguish between things that do not differ; while it is as well, perhaps, to have in the varying fortunes of ancient Israel a means of representing the ups and downs of modern powers, without risking offensive personalities.

We English are accustomed to congratulate ourselves upon the possession and preservation of Handelian traditions, and to suppose that the mighty master's works are best understood by those for whom they were written. In support of this belief there is, unquestionably, a good prima facie case. But, after last night's experience, I am disposed to believe that the genuine Handelian idea remains with the country which gave the composer birth. It would be easy to find plausible reasons for such a state of things; and to say, for example, that with us, Handel has been practically at the mercy, during many years, of a chef d'orchestre trained in a different school, and foreign to our native sympathy with the master's music. But no reasons can alter the fact that, assuming last night's performance to be representative of German methods, Handel is more reverently treated here than among ourselves. The execution of Joshua was from first to last marked by a carefulness worthy of the highest praise. Nowhere was the slightest hurry apparent; songs and choruses being alike taken in what would appear, to an English audience, slow time, but which, I believe, approximates to the composer's idea, as it certainly increases the musical impression of his work. Could Handel come to life again, he would repudiate the tendency to increased speed shown by English conductors. His choruses, admitting of broad and massive effect, require deliberate execution, while the prevalent English mode of scrambling through the recitatives, as compared with their emphatic declamation in Germany, only shows that Handel was less ill-advised than we generally believe when he filled so many pages with mere narrative. It was a pleasure, rather than a "bore," to hear the recitatives of the Joshua enunciated as they were last night, and accompanied, not by the offensive arpeggios of a violoncello, but by sustained chords from all the bass "strings." Thus rendered, no excuse was given for impatiently anticipating the next aria or chorus, according to the accepted English practice; or for treating the historical part of the work as a disagreeable necessity, which had to be endured rather than enjoyed.

Another special feature appeared in the extreme modesty, but withal adequate effect of the extra accompaniments written by Herr Julius Rietz. No doubt the example of Mozart, when filling up the "score" of the Messiah, works badly, because it encouraged others to do, without his genius, what only genius such as his makes allowable. Hence there are reconstructed Handelian scores which the master would fling into the fire as insulting to his music, and contemptuous of himself. Herr Rietz is not a Mozart, and has refrained from Mozartian liberties, being satisfied to supply that "padding" which gives solidity without attracting special observation. A similar remark applies to the organ part as arranged and played by Herr Weber, the Dom-organist; though, had the space available for the Gürzenich instrument allowed of a 32-foot diapason, that stop might have been used with manifest advantage.

In speaking of the performance, I can hardly refrain from observations with regard to the capacity of the orchestra and chorus; though my intention was to reserve them for a concluding letter. Since, however, the Choral Symphony and Joshua have supplied all necessary data, it may be as well to dismiss the topic at once. The chorus is thus made up—sopranos, 192; contraltos, 182; tenors, 111; basses, 139; and, regarding these numbers, attention should be called to the formidable array of contraltos, whose young fresh voices give a usually over-weighted part just the prominence necessary to a perfect balance. The quality of tone is generally good—best in the case of the sopranos, least excellent in that of the tenors, who sing with characteristic German "throatiness." Of the contraltos I have just spoken; and the basses, if a shade rough, are remarkable for volume and depth of tone. The choral music throughout Joshua was simply admirable in its precision and well-marked degrees of power, every point being taken up, not by a few leaders, but as with one consent by the entire mass. It was, however, in Beethoven's symphony that the chorus made the greatest and most abiding impression. No amateur needs to be told what are the difficulties of the "Ode to Joy," since even concert-goers, who never studied them in print, must know them by repeated disastrous failures in performance. But to listen to the Cologne chorus was to have belief in those difficulties shaken; and, what is more, to gain an idea of Beethoven's purpose, and the grandeur of his conception, such as nothing else could give. How great was the amount of skill and culture represented by this one effort, those who best know the work may best conceive. I cannot dismiss the choir without referring to the low average of age amongst its members. Nearly all—and this is especially the case with regard to the ladies, are in the full vigor of youth; and the result, one unhappily rare with us, is apparent in the bright ringing tone which only youth can secure.

Turning now to the orchestra, I find it composed of violins, 44; violas, 19; violoncellos, 21; double basses, 14; with 4 oboes, 4 flutes, 4 clarionets, 3 bassoons, 5 horns, 3 trumpets, and the usual complement of trombones and "percussion," making altogether 131 instruments. This unquestionably heavy force is not of equal merit throughout; for, though the "strings" are nearly all that the most exacting could desire, the "wind" is, by comparison, wanting in both quality of tone and executive skill. As might be supposed, this source of weakness told against what would otherwise have been a perfect rendering of Beethoven's colossal symphony, and, in fact, brought the average merit of its orchestral sections below that to which we are accustomed at the Crystal Palace. On the other hand, the entire band may be equally praised for an observance of light and shade which, eloquent always, gave a new meaning to more than a few portions of Beethoven's work. In this respect its accompaniments are simply perfection, as, indeed, they are in most others.

After these general remarks it is unnecessary, as it would be tedious, to enter upon details with regard to the performance of the concerted music in Joshua. Enough that a rendering more generally satisfactory, or more worthy of a great occasion, could hardly be desired. The soloists, however, were of unequal merit; and, with all deference, I submit that, as a body, they proved inadequate. Frau Bellingrath, artist as she undoubtedly is, has left the prime of her powers behind her; while Dr. Gunz is somewhat less than the Dr. Gunz whom London amateurs knew a few years ago. But then, on the other hand, Frau Joachim has displayed powers not only in Joshua, but throughout the festival, which would astonish even those who heard her recently in London. She sang Handel's music last night with a vocal skill, dramatic force, and clear perception of every requirement, which established her in the first rank of living artists. No greater success was possible than that easily obtained by her rendering of Othniel's air, "Gefahren umgibt mich" ("Place danger around me.") So masterly was Mme. Joachim's execution, that the somewhat phlegmatic audience roused itself, and demanded the first encore of the Festival. And no wonder; for few who heard will readily forget the sensation made.

Of Herr Stockhausen it cannot be necessary to speak. He was scarcely in good voice in consequence of indisposition; but whether in good voice or not, he invariably sings with such refinement and taste as to confer the highest gratification. Naturally, under the circumstances, "See the conquering hero" was the culminating point of the performance. It stirred the Teutonic blood like the news of victory; a thousand Teutonic throats demanded its repetition, the men rising to their feet and remaining erect; while at the close of the famous psalm the women waved their handkerchiefs as though the Red Prince himself had mounted the orchestra. Altogether it was a striking outburst of patriotic ardor, manifested naturally and on ample provocation.

At the third concert the attendance was larger than on any previous occasion, owing, no doubt, to a programme which artfully secured "the greatest happiness of the greatest number" by providing a little for every form of classical taste. Gade's symphony in C minor (No. 1) led off, and was played, as regards the "strings," with the perfection characteristic of

Dr. Hiller's orchestra. The "wind" again left somewhat to desire, but not enough to keep the performance generally out of the list of admirable things. About the work itself nothing need be said, since it has been heard at the Crystal Palace; where, by the way, Gade's music made no greater impression than it made on the audience of last night. An excellent feature in the arrangements enabled the Symphony, though it came first, to be heard in comfort—the doors were locked during the performance of each movement. Even the unpunctual concert-goers among ourselves must allow that this is an example which it would be well for English managers to follow.

After Gade's work came Dr. Gunz, with the original form of Florestan's air in Fidelio. His choice was an unhappy one, and his lugubrious singing damped the spirit of the audience—but only till such time as there appeared the well-known face and figure of Joseph Joachim. Is it necessary to tell how the great fiddler was received by those who ought to be, and who seemingly are, proud of him? or to say how he played the Ninth Concerto of Spohr? Assuredly it is superfluous to do either, though hard not to do both, especially after one of the most masterly displays of virtuosity ever witnessed. The "linked sweetness long drawn out" of the familiar adagio must remain, to all who heard it, a memory-haunting thing. No sooner was the last note reached, than the great crowd fairly boiled over with enthusiasm. A young lady stepped from the ranks of the chorus to present the artist with a bouquet, and others pelted him with flowers, while "Hoch!" was roared with all the strength of hundreds of good sound lungs. This was the beginning of ovations which now came fast and furious. Frau Bellingrath's delivery of the great scena from Oberon, though not at all remarkable for merit, elicited three calls, and a steady rain of flower leaves. More justly was Herr Stockhausen rewarded for his grand singing of Lysistrata's dramatic air in Euryanthe, and Herr Joachim for his perfect playing of Dr. Hiller's Grosses Adagio (op. 87).

But the climax of enthusiasm was reserved for Frau Joachim, whose popularity is boundless, and for the distinguished conductor of whom Cologne has a right to be proud. The lady sang, in her best style, three songs, by Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Schumann, respectively, and was forced to repeat the "Soldaten-bräut" of the last-named composer before she received almost burdensome tokens of public admiration. Loaded with bouquets, and made the target of innumerable flowers, she had to shake hands with the entire first row of sopranos, one of whom snatched a kiss, the report of which was followed by a roar of delight from the audience. Dr. Hiller endured not less honor. After a repetition—by desire—of the masterly chorus, "Die Heiden sind versunken in der Grube," from his new cantata, they placed a wreath upon his head amid a flourish of trumpets, and applauded as though applause in his case should know no end.

All this was pleasant to see, as it is pleasant to describe, making tame by contrast the remaining details of the concert. It must be said, nevertheless, that Handel's Coronation Anthem was less effectively given than we are accustomed to hear it; while, in the overture to Der Freyschütz, Dr. Hiller's orchestra gratified exacting taste by the wonderful brilliancy and dash of its violins. To my mind, however, the orchestral success of the evening, if not of the entire Festival, was made in the accompaniments to Spohr's concerto, which were played with a delicacy and unobtrusiveness worthy of the highest admiration. No solo ever had better "nursing."

The last concert was followed by a public supper, whereat a goodly number of ladies and gentlemen assembled, including most of the artists and others officially connected with the proceedings. This "wind-up" proved of the liveliest character, and afforded, in some respects, an odd contrast to our English habits on similar occasions. There was no solemn eating as though for eating's sake; neither "removal of the cloth," nor subsequent submission to a despotic chairman. Instead of this, each man inclined to speak—and many had the parole during the evening—did what was right in his own eyes as regards the time, matter, and manner of his speech. Thus the Oberbürgermeister rose from the discussion of fish to propose the health of the Emperor; and at various stages in a long repast his example was followed by gentlemen who had all sorts of things to say, carefully prepared impromptus to deliver, original poems to recite in honor of distinguished artists, or a string of epigrams to send sparkling among the crowd. Never, I should imagine, did the genial aspect of Teutonic nature assert itself more emphatically. The mildest quibs and cranks set the tables in a roar as unflinchingly as the jests of "poor Yorick;" and the last of the speakers, though he appealed to fatigued muscles and aching sides, received a tribute of laughter not less hearty than the first. The "mutual admiration" system was every whit as vigorously worked as with ourselves. Everybody proposed a "Hoch!" to everybody else; and it was a sight to see the rush of kindly folk when a Joachim or a Hiller was in question—all eager to catch his eye, and sustain with him the clink of glasses, which went on continuously, like well-nourished file-firing. So closed the Musikfest of the Lower Rhine; and I do not know how anything of the sort could close more happily.

Auber.—A Study. 1864.

BY B. JOUVIN.

Auber was always composing. You met him sauntering along the Boulevards: he was working.—At the theatre you took a stall next to the one in which he had settled himself, and in which he was soon asleep: he was working.—You pass along the Rue Saint-Georges after twelve at night; the street looked black to the right and left, with the exception of a window through which percolated the light of a modest lamp; that lamp was the lamp of the musician: he was working.—You knocked at his door at six in the morning; a portress as decrepid as the fairy Urgèle, directed you to the first floor. A housekeeper, as old as Baucis, referred you to a valet as aged as Philemon. This valet ushered you into an hospitable drawing room, where the sounds of the piano already reached you: the musician was at work. That did not matter, however; he came graciously to meet you; but you had to account to Posterity for a melody on the point of being born, and of which you deprived them.

The master—the youngest and most laborious of all—confessed to you with the greatest frankness, if you questioned him on the subject, that, when composing, he had never known any Muse but Ennui. "People consider my music gay," he said to me one day; "I do not know how that is, or can be; there is not a motive, among all those you are kind enough to think happy, which was not written between two yawns. I could point out to you many a passage where my pen has glided over the staff, and formed a long zigzag at the moment my eyes closed, or my head, weighed down by sleep, bent over the score. Yet it is these melancholy children of Ennui which people once called, and, perhaps, still call, Auber's contredanses."

Do not think this was sham modesty; the composer was sincere with others, and with himself. "I have never turned over one of my old scores," he said to me on another occasion, "with the delight we ought to feel at seeing once more faces we formerly knew and loved; when this occurred, I used to say to myself that there were a great many pieces I should begin again were my score to be re-written."

Very different from Auber, Spontini had in himself the faith of an apostle; nay more, the faith of an infallible pope. Even in his dressing-gown and slippers, he was mentally crowned with the laurels of him who composed La Vestale and Fernand Cortez.

Auber possessed several highly valuable albums: they were volumes of ruled paper, bound without any ornament, and in which he noted down his melodies (chants) as he was inspired with them. If he had an opera to write, he consulted his albums; he took stock; he counted his treasures, and his only care arose from an embarras de richesses, but that was no slight one. In the arts as in life, it is not enough to acquire wealth; the great thing is to know how to spend it. When Auber had, as I will call it, levied his conscription of ideas for an approaching campaign and an approaching victory, he crossed out the melodies to which he was about to set words and give a definite form. We are coming to the secret of his collaboration with his poets. In Scribe's time, this was something extremely curious, and in the ungrateful task—not of regulating the music by the words, but of making the verse run without halting to the music, Auber's partner achieved some perfect wonders. It sometimes happened that the musician gave the poet "a monster," on which the poet had to place rhymes of exactly the same length. Raimbaud's narrative in Le Comte Ory, Donna Lucrèce's air in Actéon, "Souvent un amant ment," are Scribe's masterpieces in this respect.

When Auber had found a melody—no great difficulty for him—do not fancy that he entered it without more ado in his "golden book," after trying it upon the piano, which formed part of the furniture in his study. It had first to undergo the ordal of the spinnet. Woe to the melody that could not stand the test; it was condemned to return to the nothingness whence the composer had drawn it.

The ordal of the spinnet was this:—Auber occupied only the first story of his house in the Rue Saint-Georges. In a room on the second floor (a regular artist's nest) he had had placed the old piano which was the companion of his poverty. When the hand appeals to its dilapidated notes, you fancy you are listening to the lamentations of the souls of several kettles soaring heavenwards; it is sufficient to make a coppersmith homesick. Well! the new-born melody, condemned to be subjected to these rheumatic, halting old keys, had to issue triumphant from the ordeal. If it pleased the ear of the composer, despite the kettlish tone disfiguring it, Auber asked no more. Dignus est intrare, and the album was open to it.

Did you ever stop before the bust of Auber exhibited at our principal music-publishers? What strikes you first of all on contemplating the eyes without a glance, and the white mask, the features of which are clearly and even rather too harshly rendered, is an expression of energetic will. The forehead is handsome and intelligent; the arch of the eyebrows, which is very prominent, juts out above the eye, which it encloses in a cone of shadow; the nose is straight; the mouth is firm; but, when it is not smiling, the very strongly marked arch of the lips, and the severe fold of the commissures impart to the physiognomy that profound, and somewhat bored seriousness, which is calculated to excite surprise in a man whose genius is all grace. The chin projects; the temples are raised, and the ear, which is rather broad, is rounded off like a shell. These last two peculiarities constitute, according to Gall, the signs of a vocation for music.

If from the bust we pass to the man, the too strongly marked features were softened down and harmonized. The eye had preserved all the fire of youth, and the harsh expression of the mouth, when in repose, melted into a most delicate and intellectual smile. When, with his mind absorbed by the crowd, Auber aired, with uncertain steps, his profile on the Boulevards; or, to kill the long hours in the evening, buried himself in an orchestra-stall at the Comédie-Française, or at the Variétés, the pedestrian, or the composer's neighbor in the stalls, felt at first inclined to take him for an Englishman devoured by spleen, and arranging, as he bit his nails till he made the blood come, the fifth act of his approaching suicide. But if you accosted—if you shook up by a word—the individual whose imagination was wandering a hundred leagues away—in the country of beautiful melodic dreams—if you dragged him out of his dreaminess, you were sure of finding a most amiable, most lively, and most original talker.

It was by the activity of an existence of which every hour was well employed, that Auber kept himself young. A regular system of work endowed him with a robust constitution. The valiant octogenarian could count the years of his green old age double, for he had always shortened his nights and added to his days. He never devoted more than three or four hours to sleep; this was a habit adopted in his twentieth year. At that period," he said to me, "it was the full dawn which, bursting into my bedroom, used to warn me that it was time to extinguish my lamp." When the breakfast hour struck, Auber had done his day's work, as mechanics say. Wait a moment, and you shall see how he refreshed himself after the fatigues of composition and his long watchings.

Only a few years ago, he used to ride regularly on horseback before breakfast. He afterwards substituted for this hippic exercise a drive in an open carriage through the Bois de Boulogne, but the hour was no longer a fixed one; it was sometimes in the morning, and sometimes in the afternoon, that you met him in the Grande Avenue des Champs Elysées, seated in a corner of the carriage, and plunged in thought, or with his eyelids half-closed. He breakfasted with the frugality of an anchorite: a cup of tea and four or five spoonfuls of cold milk (he afterwards abolished this meal). He generally stopped in till one o'clock; he then set out for the Rue Bergère, to manage the affairs of the Conservatory. It was during the period between his taking off his dressing-gown and putting on his frock or tail coat, that visitors, or bores, were received at the house in the Rue Saint-Georges; he greeted the one and the other with the same affability, and, if he dismissed the second somewhat more hastily than the first, he was so skilled in strewing with the flowers of politeness the floor of his drawing-room, that the visitor, thus charmingly shown the door, went away enchanted.

(To be Continued).

The "Easy Chair" recalling Thalberg and some others.

It was about fifteen years ago that Thalberg was in this country. Jenny Lind had been here two or three years before, and Alboni and Grisi a little later, and Vieuxtemps and Sivori and Ole Bull had arrived a dozen years before. Jullien, with his monster orchestra, had given monstrous concerts in the monstrous hall of Castle Garden, and many a musician of less fame had come to try his fortune. But we had had neither of the acknowledged masters of the piano, the founders of the modern school of playing—Liszt and Thalberg. Liszt, spoiled and capricious, played very seldom. Chopin, more a composer than a performer, we in America had never supposed would cross the sea: so sensitive, so delicate, so shadowy, his life seemed to exhale, a passionate sigh of music. In the stormy, blood-soaked, ruined Paris of to-day it is not easy to imagine those evenings at the Prince Czartoryski's, when Chopin played in the moonlight the mazurkas and polonaises and waltzes which moonlight or opium seem often to have inspired, but through which the proud movement of the old Polish dance and song so often also triumphantly rings.

In George Sand's "Letters of a Traveler" Chopin also appears, but sadly and hopelessly. The phrase of Xavier de Maistre, in speaking of the Fornarina and Raphael, is the undertone of all the passages of the book that speak of Chopin—"She loved her love more than her lover." Then came the burial at the Madeleine, with his own funeral march beating time to his grave. But of all composers for the piano Chopin seems to be the truest poet. The others play cunningly upon the ear, but he touches the soul. The mere pianist who had aroused the most enthusiasm in this country was Leopold de Meyer, who came more than twenty years ago. It was an exhilarating, champagne style. There was a grotesque little plaster cast of him in the shop windows at the time, which was a capital caricature. He was represented crouching over the instrument, with enormous hands spread upon the key-board, and his fat knees crowding in to cover all the rest of the space. It was slambang playing, but so skilful, and with such a tickling melody, that it was irresistibly popular. His "Marche Marocaine," a brilliant tour de force, was always sure to captivate the audience; and as De Meyer played with his whole body, and with evident zest, his success was indisputable.

His concerts were sometimes given in the old Tabernacle upon Broadway, near Leonard Street, the circular church which for many years was the chief public hall in the city. The platform was almost in the centre, and the aisles radiated from it. The galleries went quite around the building, and, except for the huge columns which supported a dome, it was convenient both for hearing and seeing. Here were some of the great antislavery meetings in the hottest days of the agitation. The anniversaries were held here, and it was the scene of all popular lectures and of concerts. A few blocks above, upon Broadway, near Canal Street, was the old Apollo Hall, where the first Philharmonic concerts took place. In those early days of the German music—days which followed the City Hotel epoch and the Garcia opera—people were so unaccustomed to the properties of the concert-room that the Easy Chair has even known some persons to whisper and giggle during the performance of the finest symphonies of Beethoven and Mozart, and so excessively rude as to rustle out of the hall before the last piece was ended.

Upon one such occasion it said to its neighbor, as they were coming out,

"It is a pity that such ill-mannered people should come among ladies and gentlemen."

"Ill-mannered!" quoth its neighbor; "I assure you they are carriage company from the neighborhood of Union Square."

In these days of universal respectful attention at the Philharmonic concerts to the performance of fine music it is but a curious reminiscence of long-passed boorishness, this of persons who whispered and giggled, and rustled out before the end, at concerts, to the disturbance of all mannerly people.

As the city grew the concerts came up town, and were for some time given at Niblo's concert-room. But, wherever they were, one person was for many years constantly familiar, sometimes as pianist to accompany singing, always modest, courteous, and efficient, a man widely and most kindly remembered—Henry C. Timm. Like most of our musical benefactors, he was a German, and gave lessons in piano-playing. He was not one of the great virtuosos, but his touch was delicate and nimble, and he had a sincere love of his art. Often and often, at a house always pleasant from that reminiscence, with the consent of parent and pupil, and to his own great delight, the hour designed for the scholar's scales and exercises was given to the master's playing. He was fond of Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," and he played it with force and precision and the utmost delicacy. Mr. Timm had a pale, smooth, sharp face, a rather prim manner, and a quick, modest gait. He was most simple-hearted, and loved a joke; and his fun was all the more effective from his very sober face and his lisp. It was his wife who was for so long the most efficient actress at Mitchell's old Olympic in the palmy days of burlesque.

It was at Niblo's that Thalberg played. Many of the virtuosos had been—like De Meyer—so extravagant in their action, and so evidently what we now call "sensational," that there was great curiosity to see the master whose name had been familiar since 1830, and famous since 1835, when he first played in Paris. The comparative estimate of the two men, Liszt and Thalberg, was that the former was a player of eccentric genius, the latter of consummate talent: a judgment which is very apt to spring from a superficial theory that eccentricity is the signet of genius. The long hair, the wild aspect of Paganini have done much to confirm this feeling.

At the concerts of Thalberg there were some preliminary performances, and then a gentleman of ordinary size, with side whiskers and no moustache, and unostentatiously dressed, entered upon the platform. His manner was grave and tranquil, and he bowed respectfully as he seated himself at the instrument. Immediately, without a flourish or grimace, steadily and calmly watching the audience, he touched the piano, and it began to sing. There was no pounding, no muscular contortion. Nothing but his hands seemed to be engaged, and apparently without effort they exhausted the whole force of the instrument. It was in every respect except its great effectiveness the reverse of De Meyer's playing. The effect, indeed, was astonishing. When he arose, as quietly and gravely as he had seated himself, there was a tumult of applause, to which he bowed and tranquilly withdrew.

The characteristic of his style is well known. It was a series of harmonious combinations of all the resources of the key-board, through which the melody was clearly articulated. It was by study and by long practice only that he carried this method to its perfection. Thus in one of his great fantasias, that from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," the sentiment of the whole opera is reproduced. You do not admire brilliant variations upon a theme selected from the opera but you are affected by the passionate movement of the entire work. It is a wonderful epitome. Yet the same respect which he showed for his audience and for himself, and which made him always a self-possessed gentleman, he also had for his instrument. De Meyer, for instance, seemed to suppose that the full range and power of the piano could not be developed except by grotesque methods. Other players treat it as if impatient of its limitations, and resolved to make an orchestra of a feeble key-board. But Thalberg instinctively apprehended the character of the instrument, and respected its limitations as well as its powers, and knew that its utmost resource was attainable by skilled motion rather than by brute force. Therefore it was that he played with his hands, and not with his knees and his body. But the force of his fingers was magical, and the volume of sound that followed was as great as any player evoked.

Indeed, Thalberg was a player only, and not, in the sense of Chopin, a composer. What are called his compositions are arrangements and adaptations of themes from operas treated in his manner, and for the purpose of developing them with all the richness of the instrument. The originality is in the method of instrumentation, and in this he was original, and is really the founder of the present piano school. As a player his characteristic was the cantabile—the singing quality; and this he had beyond all players. The flowing sweetness of his style is indescribable. There were many, indeed, who complained of a want of fire, and denied him that passion without which no work of art is perfect. But it was impossible to hear him play his fantasia from "Don Giovanni," for instance, without perceiving all the passion of the original. Mozart was not dimmed under his hands. And the impression of coldness was largely due, doubtless, to the tranquility and propriety of his appearance and manner.

The most generally popular of his successors at the piano in this country was undoubtedly Gottschalk, who was here quite as early as Thalberg, whose fame eclipsed all others. Upon his arrival Gottschalk played privately at a small party. He was a foreign-looking youth, with a peculiarly dull eye, and taciturn, but he was familiar with every kind of music. When he was asked he played Chopin, and with great skill. But his chief successes were his West Indian melodies, which were full of picturesque suggestion. His execution was most rapid, brilliant, and forcible, but a great deal of his playing was too evidently tour de force. It was always interesting to watch his audience, when, upon being recalled, he began one of the West Indian strains. There was a minor monotonous theme in them which fascinated the listeners. They heard the beat of the tambourine, and saw the movement of the dance, and with them all the characteristic scenery and association of the tropics filled their imaginations. The languid grace, the rich indolence, the gay profusion of the lands where the banana grows were all suggested by the sound.

But how many admirable players there have been, and among the best of the more recent, Alide Topp, Miss Mehlig, and Miss Krebs, who seem to have conquered every mechanical difficulty, and not to lack the power of men in playing. The old halls, indeed, are long since deserted, and Nilsson, the latest diva, new-lighted upon our shores, does not sing below Fourteenth Street. Meanwhile the conspicuous mention of one of the familiar names, as of Jenny Lind, or Alboni, or Thalberg, recalls a hundred delightful evenings; and when, as now, one passes through the bridge of Mirza out of sight, how many Easy Chairs pause for a moment to remember not only the great artist, but those who, by association, make the memory of him and the pleasure he gave perennial and delightful.—G. W. C., in Harper, for July.

The Musical Congress.

[From the Daily Advertiser, June 21.]

The first session of the third annual convention of the National Musical Congress was held yesterday morning in Music Hall. The attendance was very much fuller than at the meeting last year in New York. The session was appropriately opened by a voluntary on the organ, performed by Mr. J. K. Paine. The secretary, Dr. Eben Tourjée, read a letter from the president of the association, Mr. Wm. Mason of New York, regretting his inability to attend, owing to the illness of his father, the venerable Lowell Mason. Dr. L. H. Southard, of Baltimore, Md., one of the vice-presidents, was then called upon to preside.

A verse of the Doxology was then sung, and prayer offered by Rev. Dr. Kirk, after which the president introduced Governor Claffin to the audience. His excellency, on coming forward, was warmly received.

Governor Claffin, in behalf of the people of Massachusetts, cordially welcomed the congress to the capital of the Commonwealth. The citizens, he said, must ever feel a deep interest in a subject which afforded them so much pleasure, and which so raised and exalted them as did music. It was one of the happy results of the great Peace Jubilee that the whole standard of music was raised higher; that the whole people learned from it the necessity of a more thorough instruction in the art. The result was seen in the action of the last legislature of this State, which, though it failed to pass a law by which the larger cities and towns should make instruction in music compulsory, to be paid for by the cities and municipalities, yet developed so much feeling in favor of such action that for his part he could hardly expect another session to pass by without the law taking its place on the statute books. [Applause]. It took a little time for our legislators to understand the feelings of the public in regard to such matters; it required time for gentlemen who came from large cities as well as from the rural districts to understand how little labor and how small an expense was incurred in making known the beautiful, instructive and beneficial art of music to the whole public. In regard to the effect of music upon the young, his excellency said the various educational and reformatory institutions of the State understood it very well, for one of the first things introduced into such places for the benefit of the young was music, and if there were a lot of rough boys from some of the worst districts of great cities, they found it a great deal easier and pleasanter to rule them through the musician's baton than through the master's ferule. It was very easy to control them with the aid of music. In conclusion, the speaker congratulated those present upon the existence of the organization, and contended that it argued well for the people of this and adjoining States that so many members met together that day to cultivate the art and discuss the best means of disseminating instruction in it throughout the land. Already they could see the effects of high-toned musical associations, for people were beginning to appreciate the music that appealed to the heart and soul, instead of the light and frivolous music that was almost without meaning. He trusted that the success of the meeting would be equal to their highest hopes and aspirations, and that it would be followed by a larger one next year.

Mr. W. C. Green of Newton and J. H. Roberts of Chelsea were elected assistant secretaries. General Henry K. Oliver of Salem read the treasurer's report, from which it appeared that, from the 1st of September last, the receipts had amounted to $326, and the expenses to $185 57, leaving a balance in his hands at the present time of $140. The report was referred to a committee of three, consisting of Messrs. John Stephenson of New York, Leonard B. Ellis of New Bedford, and John B. Thayer of Randolph. The secretary's report was read by Mr. R. H. Husted. It stated that the labors of the congress had been productive of good results, both of its primary objects—the formation and development of choral societies and the promotion of the teaching of music in the public schools of the land—having been very successful. Many new choral societies had been established, and many others that were nearly exhausted had been resuscitated, so that the next jubilee would witness applications for places in the choruses from societies from Maine to the Pacific coast. The common school education was also much benefited by the labors of the congress, and the members had much reason to be thankful for the work that had been accomplished. The report closed with an allusion to the interest felt by the people in the prosperity of the association, which was more than local. The report was accepted.

The officers and delegates from the various societies at this point repaired to Burnstead Hall, Music Hall being needed for a rehearsal for the concert to take place in the afternoon. Among the societies represented were the Lowell Choral Society, with 270 members; the Choral Union of Indianapolis, Ind., 70 members; Francistown Choral Society, Francistown, N. H., 24; Leominster Choral Union, 60; Sherborn Musical Association, 20; Randolph and Stoughton Choral Union, 75; Union Musical Association, N. Y., 150; Fitchburg Choral Union, 80; South Abington Choral Society, 50; Plymouth Choral Union, 80; Lynn Choral Union, 360; North Bridgewater Musical Society, 96; and the Beethoven Society, Taunton, 115.

Mr. Theodore F. Seward of Orange, N. J., from the committee on the formation of musical institutes, made a brief verbal report to the effect that very little had been accomplished in the matter, but that the committee felt more than ever the importance of instruction in elementary music. The condition of things, he said, was sufficiently discouraging to be encouraging, which meant that the association had enough to do in the matter of musical instruction.

The following committees were then appointed:—

Resolutions—D. B. Hagar, P. S. Gilmore and B. B. Sherman of Massachusetts; H. C. Watson, J. P. Morgan, C. C. Converse and T. F. Seward of New York.

Finance—W. E. Sheldon and D. B. Hagar of Massachusetts; W. F. Sherwin and J. F. Seward of New Jersey; R. J. Johnson and John Stephenson of New York; Charles McLellan of Maine.

Nominations—Charles McLellan and E. F. Duren of Maine; H. C. Watson of New York; J. G. Barrett of Connecticut; P. A. Stackpole of New Hampshire; L. L. Holden and P. S. Gilmore of Massachusetts.

At the conclusion of the rehearsal in Music Hall, the members of the congress were again called together for the transaction of some business omitted from the morning session.

The discussion upon the subject of "The objects and aims of the National Musical Congress, and how they are best to be promoted," being called up, General Henry K. Oliver of Salem was called upon to speak. He referred to the refining influences of music upon the masses, and to the great good which might result from the well-directed efforts of such an association as the musical congress. He gave some interesting facts in his own experience where a choral society was formed among the operatives in a mill, over one hundred of whom it was found could sing. Very much, he was confident, could be done by this organization in affording encouragement, relief and advice to small musical communities. The small places expect such influences to come from the great centres of art. The speaker also alluded to the subject of the musical education of the young, and to the significant remarks of His Excellency Governor Claffin under this head. He wanted to see an influence go out which should bring attention to the importance of this matter throughout the entire country. In many places in our own State the study of music already formed one of the regular branches of instruction, and it should be so everywhere.

Colonel Tufts of Lynn followed, taking up the same line of argument pursued by the previous speaker upon the subject of the musical education of the masses, and particularly of the children in the public schools. In this connection he alluded to the beneficial effects of the practice of music in correctional institutions for the young, where its influence, it had been noticed, took deep root.

At this stage it was moved by Mr. John P. Morgan of New York that the further discussion of the subject be postponed until a convenient time in some of the other sessions, and the motion prevailed.

Mr. Stephenson of New York, from the committee to whom was referred the treasurer's report, reported that the same, with its vouchers, had been examined and found to be entirely correct. Mr. Barnes, the former treasurer, had been heard before the committee, and was ready to pay over the balance which remained in his hands—$214 90—to the treasurer who might be chosen at this meeting, his position having been that the election of his successor last year was not legal.

AFTERNOON CONCERT.

At two o'clock in the afternoon a concert was given in the presence of an audience of moderate size but of decided musical culture, at which the following programme was performed:—

And the Glory of the Lord, from "The Messiah" Handel.
He, watching over Israel, from "Elijah" Mendelssohn.
Overture, "Jubel" Weber.
The Heavens are Telling, from "The Creation" Haydn.
Solo—Qui la voce Bellini.

Mme. Lewis.
Thanks be to God, from "Elijah" Mendelssohn.
Overture, "William Tell" Rossini.
Hymn of Peace, written by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes to the music of the American Hymn Koller.
Solo—Per questo bella mano Mozart.

Mr. M. W. Whitney.
Gloria, from "Twelfth Mass" Mozart.
Solo, for Cornet, Aria from "Lucia" Donizetti.
Mr. M. Arbuckle.

Hallelujah, from "The Messiah" Handel.

The choral force numbers nearly one thousand voices selected from various New England organizations. It was especially strong in sopranos and altos, and especially weak in tenors. Most of its work, however, was done with a degree of precision and power much above the average of choral work. "The heavens are telling" received the best treatment of any choral number. The orchestra, which numbered between thirty and forty performers, was largely made up of our best artists, Mr. Schultze, leading the violins, and the other members of the Mendelssohn Quintette being conspicuous in their usual places. The "Qui la voce" of the programme was assigned to Mrs. Smith, but in her absence was acceptably rendered by Mme. Lewis, an English amateur with a pleasant voice, somewhat better adapted to the parlour than the concert-room. The "Per questo bella mano" of Mozart, with all its wonderful variety of noble melody, was finely and earnestly given by Mr. Whitney. The concert as a whole was very interesting in its programme and worthy in its performance; and it gave not a little pleasure to an attentive audience.

EVENING SESSION.

The evening session was held in Burnstead Hall. It was devoted to the reading of biographical addresses of members of the society who have deceased during the past year. On account of the inclemency of the weather the attendance was quite small, and some of the musical features of the programme were deferred.

SECOND DAY, JUNE 21.

The forenoon was occupied by the delegates in visiting some of the public schools of the city, in which exhibitions were given for their entertainment and instruction. A school of each grade was visited by some seventy or eighty ladies and gentlemen.

PRIMARY SCHOOL INSTITUTION.

The first school visited was the Girls' High and Normal School on West Newton street, where Mr. Luther W. Mason gave illustrations of the system he pursued in teaching music to the primary scholars. Mr. F. H. Underwood, one of the committee on music in the public schools of Boston, accompanied the party, and made a few remarks before the commencement of the exercises, in the course of which he urged that the art of music should be learned in early youth, whilst the organs of the throat were flexible and capable of the very highest cultivation. Mr. Mason, before proceeding with the examination of the pupils, informed the visitors that the class of small children, from five to six years of age, that were now brought forward, had not been specially prepared for exhibition, but that they would be put through their every-day course of tuition in music. The most proficient of the class had not been picked out, but the entire class would practice together. He then brought forward about thirty pupils and proceeded to explain the system he pursued. The first six months was principally given to the cultivation of the ear and voice; the succeeding half-year was given to the learning of the A B C of musical notation. The illustrations given by the class in rote singing and the first principles of notation, with the assistance of the blackboard and charts, was exceedingly satisfactory to the audience, who were unanimous in their approval of the system and highly pleased with the proficiency of the young beginners.

THE LOWER GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

At ten o'clock the Franklin school on Ringgold street was visited, where an exhibition of music as taught in the lower grammar schools was given by a class of pupils from eight to twelve years of age, from the Franklin and Dearborn schools, under the direction of Mr. J. E. Holt, the instructor. The illustrations here were of the most interesting character, and consisted of exercises in scales written in various keys on the blackboards. The pupils displayed an actual knowledge of the scales that was surprising to the visitors. The surprise was considerably enhanced when two little girls, of ten and twelve years, respectively, came forward and went through the whole lesson in the capacity of teacher and pupil, and one of them, with Mr. Seward of New Jersey, went through an impromptu exercise and put down on the blackboard the notes emitted by that gentleman, one mistake only being made when the key was altered. A piece that had been prepared for the late school festival was then sung, and the proceedings terminated with the explanation by Mr. Holt that whatever degree of proficiency was exhibited was due to the regular teacher, he only being present with the class about half an hour each day.

THE HIGHER GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

An hour later and the members of the congress were at the Everett school, West Northampton street, where illustrations of music teaching as conducted in the higher grammar schools were given by a choir of children from the Everett, Winthrop, Franklin, Dwight and Rice schools, under the direction of Mr. J. Sharland, the instructor. Before the exercises began Mr. Underwood made a few remarks as to the importance of music, ranking it as next to the mission of the Christian minister only, and advertising to the importance of the art as being useful to every scholar; whereas the other branches of learning—chemistry, geology, &c.—would be of benefit to only a few. Mr. Seward added a few words as to the importance of placing the profession in the first rank and was followed by an explanation by Mr. Sharland, to the effect that he had had but very little opportunity to practise with his class. Some exercises in rhythm followed, with chords and discords and sol-feggio movements. Mr. Seward was then invited to write an extemporaneous composition on the blackboard, which he did, and which the class got through with with very little difficulty. They were very heartily applauded for their efforts.

THE GIRLS' HIGH AND NORMAL SCHOOL.

was the next and last place visited, and here a class of nearly two hundred pupils of the higher classes were waiting, with Mr. Julius Eichberg as conductor, to show their proficiency in the higher parts of music. Mr. Underwood briefly introduced Mr. Eichberg as the instructor in all of the high schools in the city of Boston, and that gentleman briefly explained that the teaching of music in the schools was divided into three parts—the first, singing by sight, then exercises in vocalization and exercises in part singing. He then, with the aid of the blackboard, put the pupils through a course of exercises in singing at sight in one part, then in two parts, and next in three parts, with chords. Mendelssohn's "Ye Sons of Israel," was excellently well performed. The singing of the anthem, "Lift thine eyes," from Elijah, by the senior class, brought the proceedings to a close shortly after one o'clock, Mr. Eichberg receiving from the visitors as they departed many congratulations upon the proficiency his pupils had attained in the higher branches of music.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

In the afternoon a meeting was held in Music Hall for the consideration of musical topics. There was not a large audience present. Mr. Southard presided. The first thing on the programme was a discussion on "What course shall be pursued for the creation and development of choral societies in America?"

THE DISCUSSION.

Dr. Tourjée began the discussion. He said he had been in 200 communities during the past year to speak upon this subject, and in at least fifty of them a desire had been manifested to form choral societies. He thought the church should take the lead in the organization of such societies. The leading musical people should join with the clergymen, and the entire community should be made to feel an interest in the subject.

Mr. Emerson said it was very important that the churches in various communities should unite and put aside all jealousy. Musical organizations were not, as a general thing, self-sustaining. There was great lack of thorough elementary instruction, and the churches should see to it that this lack was supplied.

Dr. Tourjée further explained how the jealousies and petty rivalries of different religious societies could be overcome. In not thus coming together they were operating against themselves, and were doing nothing to get rid of the charlatanism and light sacred music that exists. He had records in his office of conventions held as long ago as 1834, when every State in the Union was represented. Since that time they had been going backward.

F. F. Seward of New Jersey next undertook to give some illustrations of elementary teaching in music. It seemed to him like carrying coals to Newcastle, yet he must enter his protest against one matter in which he found the current very much against him. This was the use of the musical syllables. He found that wherever they had been used to determine the absolute pitch, musical culture among the masses had declined. This was seen in Italy and France, where the masses sang like birds, but without acquired skill. This truth was illustrated by the great success of the "tonic sol-fa" system. He thought that it was particularly important that the system which he opposed should be discouraged in Boston, as educators in all parts of the country were looking to our schools for examples of musical teaching. Mr. Seward offered the following resolution:—

Whereas, there is to be observed an increasing tendency in this country to depart from the original and proper use of the syllables in elementary instruction, and whereas it is believed that such departure is sure to result in a decline of popular interest, and to prove a great hindrance to popular progress:

Resolved, That this congress declares itself unreservedly in favor of the use of the syllables according to the Guldonian or tonic system, and that all teachers and educators are recommended to use their utmost influence against the opposite method, or that in which the syllables are used in a fixed position to represent absolute pitch.

General Oliver supported the resolution. He was astonished that anybody should think of introducing the Italian system. He objected that it destroyed all association in memory. Mr. W. O. Perkins also advocated the resolution, deeming it almost impossible for a scholar to gain proficiency in reading by the new method, because before it was accomplished it would be necessary for the learner to have a complete knowledge of every possible interval which could occur in music. The Rev. E. A. Wentworth also supported the resolution.

ESSAY ON ORATORIO MUSIC.

The Rev. Elias Nason then read a paper on "The Four Great Oratorios." Music, he said, was an extra benediction, an express benison of God. He has filled this world brimful of it. To man he also accords the skill to bring in instruments, and from them to invoke and bring in harmonies. This again, is purely supplemental. The outer world is a grand harmonia, invisible fingers touching, Oh, how masterly! This is the well spring of the art; and all the various forms of human music are God-given. There is, in one sense, no secular music. The loftiest form of heavenly art is the oratorio. The word is derived from the Latin word, meaning a prayerful song. In the middle ages it was customary to perform profane dramas of the Creation, and other scenes, in which supernal and infernal characters were introduced. From these profane dramas the oratorio arose about the middle of the sixteenth century. After speaking of the origin of the oratorio, he defined it as a logically connected and continuous musical composition, founded on some sacred narrative or event, consisting of an overture, with introduction for instruments alone, and solos, duets, arias, quartets, quintets, recitatives, choruses, etc., in various time, key and movement,—all conspiring to develop the plan or plot of the story, and to give in unity and power the general idea of the composer, so as to raise the imagination of the listener. It is, in other words, an epic-toned poem, an Iliad in song. The language is drawn from the Bible. The first oratorio in point of time and talent is the Messiah of Handel. Mr. Nason gave a sketch of Handel's life. Pushed to the wall in England by feminine intrigue, a thought struck him, and at fifty-six years of age he began to compose the original, soul-entrancing oratorio of the Messiah, which he finished in twenty-three days, which has done more to educate musical taste, unclasp the bands of charity and to unfold the mind of God to men than any other composition save the Bible itself. It was first performed in Dublin in 1742. In England its greatness was soon acknowledged, and at a particular passage the King and his suite always rose, a custom which is kept up to this day.

At the close of the sketch of Handel's life, a solo from Handel's opera of Admetus was sung by Mrs. H. E. Sawyer.

Handel is the Homer, Haydn the Virgil of music. The Messiah is the Iliad; the Creation is the Æneid, full of sweetness, grace and serenity. It was composed at Vienna,—begun in 1715, when he was 63 years old and first performed in public in 1739 at the imperial palace. It was received with unbounded applause, and the world hears it still with ecstasy. His spirit was imbued profoundly with devotion.

Mr. Nason next turned to Beethoven, who came, a wild, erratic, wonder-loving boy, to take lessons of Haydn seven years before the latter had enraptured the Viennese with his great "Creation." He was music's darling child, and with the untrammeled power of Heaven-kissing genius he went forward to a brighter sphere and composed "Christ on the Mount of Olives."

[Continued on page 56].

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 1, 1871.

Second Triennial Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society.

FIFTH DAY (CONCLUDED).

We were cut short in the middle of our remarks upon the Passion Music, which we now resume.—

Another class of choruses, short, and very frequent in this work,—but wholly unrepresented in the Festival selections—belongs to the narrative portion, and should have been mentioned under our first head.

Wherever, in the course of the Gospel narrative, bodies of people are represented as speaking, the words are embodied in a chorus. In the rude and slender Passion music of the Middle Ages such choruses were introduced and were called turbæ (voices of the crowd). They sometimes give voice to the disciples, in such brief sentences as: "Where wilt Thou that we prepare the passover?"; oftener, and more elaborately, and with immense dramatic fire and vividness, to the angry and relentless outcries of the Jews: "O tell us, thou Christ"; "He guilty is of death"; the terrible shout "Bárabbas!" (accent on first syllable,—diminished seventh chord spread over eight voice parts and orchestra); "Let him be crucified," &c.

But we were speaking of the Choruses and Arias which constitute what we have termed the reflective portion of the work. Perhaps the greatest Chorus of this kind is that which Bach has used for the Overture, as it were, or gate of entrance (grandier than Dante's to the Inferno) to the solemn and heart-rending spectacle. It is a Double Chorus, with full orchestral introduction and accompaniment: "Come, ye daughters, weep for anguish" (at the sight which you shall see), in which instruments and voices seem pressing, crowding forward, like a vast multitude with anxious hearts, yet irresistibly attracted, all moving on in long-drawn figurative phrases; the second chorus asking: "Who?" "Where?" "How?" the first replying; until soon a third choir in unison (commonly boys) joins in in the long tones of a Chorale, line by line, intermittently: "O Lamb of God"; and finally both choruses and all the instruments are brought together to swell the mighty current of the leading theme. Nothing in music can be more sublime;—nothing, perhaps, more difficult to execute; and therefore were we, to our sorrow, deprived of this most fitting introduction, the selections opening, as we have said before, abruptly with a Chorale. Mr. LANG, however, showed a proper sense of the situation by making his opening voluntary on the Organ out of a portion of that orchestral prelude; of course it was but a faint sketch or hint of the grand thing in full.

First in order, among the reflective pieces given, was the Contralto Recit. and Aria (Nos. 9 and 10) prompted by the incident of the Woman with the box of ointment:

"Grief and pain
Wring the guilty heart in twain.
Fall, ye drops, fall faster, faster,
Freely from mine eyes, like rain,
Grateful balm to my dear Master!"

Of this touching melody and of its slight, but tenderly suggestive exquisite accompaniment—simply two flutes, in thirds and sixths, with string quartet (the latter made out from the figured bass by Franz),—we have spoken on a former occasion. Suffice it to say, it was well suited to the rich tones of Miss STERLING, who sang it simply, largely, well; some, doubtless, would have liked a little more dramatic pathos.

Next we have to name one of the very happiest selections, one of the most original instances of Bach's exhaustless genius and consummate art, the Tenor Solo with Chorus, Nos. 25 and 26 (Recit. "O grief!", and Aria: "I'll watch with my dear Jesu alway," with the soft, rich, soothing choral response: "So slumber shall our sins befall.") To each intensely pathetic exclamation of the Recitative, with its underground of not less eloquent accompaniment, the Chorus of Believers respond in four-part harmony, subdued and serious, self-accusing, which is a revelation of new depths of feeling and of beauty in the same Chorale with which the selections opened now to the words: "Why must Thou suffer?" &c. Nothing could be more beautiful, unless it be the Aria which sets in after it, in a more buoyant, yet moderate tempo, full of sweet confidence. The pregnant melody first sings itself through upon the oboe, and is then taken up in fragments by the Tenor voice: "I'll watch with my dear Jesu alway"; and at intervals the chorus, soft and sweet and evenly diffused like summer rain, repeats: "So slumber shall our sins befall!", then stops and listens fondly to the other (kindred) melody of solo voice and oboe; the latter, like a silver thread, runs through the whole. (We quoted one critic who accused Bach's music of a "want of soul"! A very leaden slumber must have befallen his soul during the performance of that piece!—In the tenor solo Mr. WINCH, though far from realizing all the beauty and interior meaning of the music, did much better than we could have expected of one just entering so new an element. It was a very trying task, and it is no small praise to say he did not fail in it. The intervals were sure, the tones true and musical, the style manly and honest. Now and then a note was reached with too apparent effort, and generally the rendering was a little cold and crude; but the tones, the form, the melody were there, and told effectually in the harmonious whole. The running oboe obligato was exquisitely played, but should have become more subdued whenever the voice began. The only fault, too, with the choral responses was that they were too uniformly loud; the 700 voices blended richly, and the individual outline of no one of the four parts was lost.

The next selection followed in unbroken sequence: the Recit. and Aria for Bass voice, which is a meditation on (or application of) the prayer of Jesus that the cup might pass from him. The Air: "Gladly will I, all resigning, Cross nor bitter cup declining, Drink in my Redeemer's name," &c., is full of beauty and resigned expression; but it is a melody of so elastic, delicate a fibre, that it could not be just the best selection for Mr. WHITNEY's solid, ponderous, majestic manner. It is Gothic, so to speak while he is Doric. We would rather hear him (if he must be limited to one Aria) in the one he sang in the Symphony Concerts: "Give me back my dearest Master." Yet this was sung conscientiously and grandly, only with hardly vitality enough to make the song pass for all that it is worth.

And now came (No. 33) the great sensation of the evening, and the most startling revelation of Bach's wonderful dramatic power. Jesus has been siezed and led away. A flute and oboe, in mournful, plaint, melodious duet, stand out from the deep, sombre background of the orchestra, preluding to, and then accompanying the mingled lamentation of a Soprano and an Alto solo: "Alas! my Jesu now is taken." As they sing on each in its own heart-broken, long drawn, sobbing strain, lengthening out the melodic figures in grief's unhurried and involuntary way, the sultry atmosphere is ever and anon relieved by loud bursts from the indignant chorus: "Leave him! bind him not." "Moon and stars have in sorrow night forsaken:" the duet continues. "Leave him!" thunders again the chorus. "He's led away! Ah! they have bound him;—all pity banish'd," still they sing, or almost wail, in yet more long-drawn, melting cadence, when suddenly the smothered indignation of the general breast finds full vent in the swift, tremendous double Chorus: "Ye lightnings, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanished?" The short, stern motive is first given out by all the basses; the tenors answer fugue-like, while the deep basses of the orchestra begin to roll and rumble; the theme goes round the circle of parts; the rolling movement takes possession of the vocal basses also; voices echo voices instantly and sharply, like clap on clap of thunder, or in vivid flashes, and the foundations of the great deep seem upheaved in foaming billows, when suddenly there is a pause,—a moment of the silence that expresses more than sound;—and then, upon the major of the key (heretofore minor), with a new motive, gathering up all the forces of the orchestra, with an appalling energy and splendor, the storm waxes to a mighty whirlwind, as quickly over as it suddenly came on, leaving the awed, excited hearer listening still with bated breath:

"But open, O fierce flaming caverns of Hell, then!
Engulf them, devour them,
Destroy them, o'erwhelm them,
In wrathfullest mood.
O! blast the betrayer,
The murderous brood!"

The effect was overwhelming. Such a rush and storm of harmony, such vivid, terrible tone-painting, such startling climax, and withal such wonderful sonority and wealth of tone (for to Bach's own vocal and instrumental polyphony Robert Franz had added the brass instruments, which doubtless Bach himself would have used in our day), was a new sensation, a new sense of sublimity, to that audience, even so shortly after Handel's "Hail Storm" chorus. But even if the two choruses may come into comparison, think how unique is Bach's conception in making such a chorus the necessary sequel and development of such a Duet!—for the two pieces must be taken together as one scene, one dramatic moment. Doubtless many a person has puzzled over the notes of that Duet, and come to the conclusion that it looked long-winded, dull and thankless; but when we came to hear it, framed in all the subtle beauty of the instrumentation, and with a live singer, well at home in Bach, like Mme. RUDERSDORFF, to put life into it, and seconded so well in the Contralto by Miss STERLING, all were charmed by it. (The little choral interruptions, too, Bach's instinct knew, were as essential to the musical charm as to the vividness of the dramatic scene). Mme. Rudersdorff sang it in her way, very dramatically, with such intensity of accent, and so much sforzando, as to contrast perhaps too strongly with the quiet, even flow of the Contralto; and yet, but for such emphasis (really impassioned), it is doubtful whether the piece would have made its mark; as it is, the singular Duet is from that hour believed in and desired.

Here ended the selections from the First Part, passing over the great chorus with which Bach concludes it, or rather the elaborately varied Chorus, with rich figurative accompaniment: "O Man, bewail thy sin so great."

From the Second Part, which is the longest of the two, only two numbers, in addition to the Chorus: "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden," were vouchsafed; but these were precious "grants," as one of our critical friends would say. One was the not wholly unfamiliar Alto Aria (but equally well suited for the mezzo soprano voice): "Erbarne dich, mein Gott" ("O pardon me, my God"), with the beautiful violin solo (remarkably well played by Mr. LISTEMANN). The string quartet had been enriched by Franz with a quartet of reeds (clarinets and bassoons), delicately eking out and coloring the intrinsic motives of the piece to render Bach's intention the more palpable. This very broad, sustained, and difficult melody, the loveliest, the noblest, most pathetic in the whole work, was sung by Mme. Rudersdorff with great feeling and expression, bringing it home to most hearts more powerfully than when it has been sung before, though in a less scrupulously chaste and even style than that to which we had been accustomed, so that the strong dramatic accent and the frequent breath-taking seemed at first a little strange; but she breathed a new life into it, and even the violin and whole accompaniment seemed to become possessed with her magnetic spirit.

Finally, the unspeakably beautiful and sacred Schluss-Chor, or concluding (Double) Chorus. It is the parting hymn of the disciples weeping at the Master's tomb:

"Around thy tomb here sit we weeping,
And murmur low, in tones suppress:
Rest Thee softly, softly rest!
Long, ye weary limbs, lie sleeping,
Rest ye softly, rest in peace!
This cold stone above Thy head,

Shall to many a care-worn conscience
Be a sweet, refreshing pillow;
Here the soul find peaceful bed.
Closed in bliss divine, slumber now the weary eyes.
Around thy tomb here sit we weeping,
And murmur low, in tones suppress:
Rest Thee softly, softly rest!"

What other Art, what Poetry has ever yet expressed so much of grief, of tender, spiritual love, of faith and peace, of the heart's heaven smiling through tears, as this tone elegy,—at once an inspiration of profoundest pious feeling, and the ripest masterpiece of complete Art! So should the Passion music close, and not with fugue of praise and triumph like an Oratorio. How easily and evenly the music flows, a broad, rich, deep, pellucid stream, swollen as by countless rills from every loving, bleeding and believing heart in a redeemed Humanity! How full of a sweet secret comfort, even triumph, is this heavenly farewell! It is the "peace which passeth understanding." "Rest Thee, softly!" is the burden of the song; one chorus sings it and the other echoes: "Softly rest!" then both together swell the strain. Many times as this recurs, not only in the voices, but in the introduction and numerous interludes of the exceedingly full orchestra, which sounds as human, sympathetic and spontaneous as if it too had breath and conscious feeling, you still crave more of it, for it is as if your soul were bathed in new life inexhaustible. The middle portion, too, before the return of the main subject, and which is more discursive, (the lines: "Long, ye weary limbs," &c., to "Closed in bliss divine," &c.), is wonderfully beautiful, and shows in how high and free a range of pure imagination Bach could soar in his intensity of feeling: ("Want of soul," forsooth!)—This chorus was indeed admirably sung, as if every singer's heart were in it; and, with eight vocal parts so fully manned, and blended to such purpose by the master soul of polyphony, with such accompaniment of double orchestra and organ, it conveyed a sense of wealth and fullness such as no combination of instruments and voices had ever given us before.

It would be impossible to over-estimate the wholesome and profound impression which that chorus made; and many of that audience would say Amen! were we to include nearly all the pieces heard then for the first time in the same remark. The performance, for a first attempt, was altogether creditable. It was the highest mark in pure artistic effort which the old Society have reached thus far. More familiar things they can sing better, but this has been their worthiest and highest task; nor should it cease to be their task, their problem paramount, until they have made themselves and the best Boston public as much at home with the whole Passion Music (of which this was but a small part) as they have long been with the "Messiah" and "Elijah." The study and the mastery of one such work is worth a dozen "Jubilees."

We have not much to say about Sir Sterndale Bennett's short Oratorio, or rather Sacred Cantata, "The Woman of Samaria," which occupied the rest of the evening. Supposing it to be ever so good, it had not a fair chance after Bach. That impression remaining, this was hardly more than gaslight in the midst of sunshine. It must be owned it sounded for the most part quite tame in comparison. Yet it is a musician like, artistic, elegant and earnest work; without much positive originality; often suggesting Mendelssohn, as if suggested by him. Not a great work, but elevated in tone, pleasing, pure in style, and always musical. Its best power is shown in the choral and orchestral writing; its weakest in the Recitative, which for the most part lacks character and interest,—inevitably it seems so after Bach; only the few greatest masters seem to have proved their mastery in this rare art of recitative. For instance, where Jesus says to the Woman: "If thou knowest who it is that saith unto thee: Give me to drink," the repetition of this last phrase, inexpressive in itself, is singularly weak and empty. And once or twice there is an attempt to be dramatic, imitating tones of actual life, that sounds (unwittingly) too much like Verdi; as, where the Woman goes into the city and says: "Come, see a man, &c.," with the curious staccato pianissimo accompaniment.

The Arias,—one for each of the four principals,—are good, but not remarkable. That for the Woman: "Art thou greater than our father Jacob," has the strong accent and wide intervals of great excitement, and so was well adapted to the best power of Mme. Rudersdorff, who made it one of the salient points in the impression of the work. Quite a noble Air, however, is that for the Bass: "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again," and was feelingly and beautifully sung by Mr. J. F. WINCH; indeed, among the single performances of the whole week, this will be remembered as one of the best. The Air for the Contralto (which also takes the place of "Evangelist" in the brief connecting narrative sentences): "O Lord, thou hast searched me out," is simple, fading from the memory at once, nor did it seem to inspire our admirable singer (Miss PHILLIPS) with much life. Mr. CUMMINGS sang the pleasing Aria which, we believe, was written for him: "His salvation is nigh to them that fear Him," with all the refinement, the chaste fervor, the pure and finely modulated quality of tone, which one is sure to find in him.—Altogether the most beautiful impression made in the whole work, was the unaccompanied Quartet: "God is a Spirit," very simple in itself, but executed to perfection by these four singers.

The instrumentation abounds in delicate felicities. The introduction, particularly, leading into a Chorus, sung in unison by Sopranis: "Ye Christian people, now rejoice," is worthy of the romantic, genial composer of the "Naiades" and "Wood Nymph" Overtures, and hints of living springs to the imagination. The following Chorus: "Blessed be the God of Israel," the spirited and striking one, but rather operatic: "Therefore with joy shall ye draw water"; the Chorus: "Come, O Israel"; the hymn: "Abide with me; fast falls the eventide"; the grave: "Now we believe," &c., all show the practised hand in contrapuntal choral writing. But to our mind the most satisfactory of all was the figured finale: "Blessed be the Lord."—The Cantata is of moderate difficulty compared with the great tasks of the Festival, and did not suffer in the rendering, as it did from such great neighborhood as "Israel" and the "Passion Music." Perhaps when it invites us by itself we may be able to do it better justice.

LAST DAY; NINTH PERFORMANCE. On Sunday evening the Festival was brought to a close, of course with the most widely known and loved of Oratorios, "The Messiah"; and the hall was crammed to overflowing. Singers and audience both came to it naturally a good deal fatigued. As far as we judge in that condition, it was in the main a very good performance, but not up to the most proud traditions of the old Society. Some of the choruses, however, went superbly. Mme. RUDERSDORFF had to claim indulgence on account of a severe sore throat; but in "I know that my Redeemer," she made up by her inspiring earnestness and fervor, and her thorough understanding, for what she lacked in voice. "Rejoice greatly" was less suited to her. Mr. CUMMINGS was nearly all that we could wish in the tenor solos; Mr. WHITNEY was nobly at home in the Bass, for (here, at least) the "Messiah" Arias belong to him; and Mrs. WEST shared the Soprano part to great acceptance.

And so ended the most important, the most nobly planned and worthily, successfully executed festival of music of which this country can yet boast. In the magnitude and richness of the programme it even surpassed most festivals abroad. So many of the greatest works, choral and orchestral, in one week, are very seldom heard. The main element in this success, throughout, has been, by general consent, the chorus singing. Never before has the foremost Oratorio Society of America been in such excellent condition. The number of voices is full large enough for any work,—perhaps too large for some of the choicer tasks. The proportion of young and live material in the regiment (of 700 or 750) has been very much increased within three years. There is a good average of fine, fresh, musical and telling voices. And most of them are persons who read music readily, and who love good music, and are willing to spend time and effort in learning to sing a great work as it should be sung; this they have shown by the fidelity and zeal with which they have followed up the long and frequent series of rehearsals necessary to such a Festival. Of course, there is still room for improvement; the "weeding out" process, the elimination of "dead wood," in so large an army, and so old and proud, must go on always, and fresh, young life must take its place. There must be some mode of honorable retirement (from active service) provided for those whose zeal and love and pride in their old society has outlived their voices. And the lesson has yet to be learned in this country, regarding all such enterprises, that, beyond the point of sufficiency, much virtue lies in limitation of numbers. Enough is as good as a feast. In our fast age, there is too much ambition to do things on the biggest scale. Could we only select the soundest, choicest portion out of the crowds of singers whom the teaching of music in the public schools is beginning to raise up for us, is it not obvious that a chorus of 500, or even 400 voices might be trained to execute the oratorios even more satisfactorily than 700 or 1000 voices can do now? And then, for certain of the finest tasks,—getting to be the most important now, since the old repertoire has grown so familiar—such tasks as the Cantatas, Passions, &c., of Bach—is not the sound heart-wood, the nucleus choir, always more prepared and more available than the "great bodies which move slowly," waiting for raw recruits and stragglers to catch up? Of course, for certain things, for certain effects, a more general massing of forces is desirable; and that might be by combination of several less bulky organizations.

There is no denying, however, the great and solid progress which the Handel and Haydn Society have made. And it is due, not only to the increased respect for music in our whole social life and education, but more immediately and signally to inspiring devotion, wise counsel and suggestion, practical ability and unstinted labor on the part of the officers of the Society and their long tried and trusted musical director, Mr. CARL ZERRAHN. The latter gentleman has shown himself fully equal to the great undertaking. He has been instant, in season and out of season, in the laying out of the work, and in the preparation of himself and of the forces under him, which he wields with such inspiring certainty, for the achievement of so formidable a programme. All are grateful to him, and seriously wonder whether without him such a week would have been possible. Nor can we overrate the general obligation to the energetic and devoted Secretary, Mr. LORING B. BARNES, who in all that concerns the business affairs of the Society has been, through a large part of his 17 years of service, its mainspring and factotum, as it were, and who has since been gratefully promoted to the place of President. Of the retiring President, Dr. J. BAXTER UPHAM, who has so enviably identified himself with the cause of musical education in our community, and who for eleven years has so well upheld the dignity and courtesy and harmony of the old Society, and done much to raise its ideal and enlarge its scope, the following extract from the record of the late annual meeting but expresses the general appreciation:

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The following resolutions, offered by the Secretary, Loring B. Barnes, were, with much enthusiasm, unanimously adopted by a rising vote, and the retiring officer briefly replied to the same:

We, the members of the Handel and Haydn Society, desirous of expressing our high appreciation of the valuable services rendered the Society by the retiring President, J. Baxter Upham, who has filled the chair of presiding officer for the past ten years, do unanimously

Resolved, That in the severing of the ties which have bound us to our efficient and in all respects worthy head, we lose the services of one who has at all times commanded the respect and esteem of not only each and every member of the Society and of the Board of Directors, but also of the community in which we live, and one who by his influence has contributed in no small degree to the advancement of the Society, to the high position it now occupies both at home and abroad.

Resolved, That we part with him with great reluctance, but in the belief that his future course will be in full sympathy with all our movements toward a still higher and better artistic position than that which we now occupy; and this Society will ever cherish the name of J. Baxter Upham among its most valued friends and supporters.

Resolved, That these resolutions be entered upon the records of the Society, and that a copy of the same be presented to the retiring officer.

Several of the newly elected officers were called upon to make speeches. Mr. Barnes addressed the Society at some length in regard to its future.

THE MUSICAL SEASON OF 1871-'72 promises to be of great brilliancy. To the usual entertainment furnished at the symphony concerts of the Harvard Musical Association and the oratorios of the Handel and Haydn Society will be added the extraordinary attractions of at least two fine opera companies. Mme. Parepa-Rosa will open in English opera at the New York Academy of Music on the 2d of October and will play an engagement of three weeks. The date of her first operatic appearance in Boston is as yet unannounced, but it is announced that she will give concerts in the Music Hall during the holiday week. Strakosch's Italian opera company, with Mlle. Nilsson and M. Jamet as its principal artists, will open in New York on the 23d of October, and in Boston, probably, on the 1st of January. The "Dolby English Ballad Troupe," consisting of Miss Edith Wynne, Mr. and Mrs. Patey, Mr. Cummings the tenor, and Mr. Lindsay Sloper, pianist, will give ballad concerts in the Music Hall during the third and fourth weeks of October, and will sing, it is said, with the Handel and Haydn Society in oratorio.

Besides all these things, Mr. Peck has an extremely interesting project on foot, the details of which will be given more minutely hereafter. He proposes to give a course of ten popular concerts of which two are to be orchestral, at which the best music will be furnished at a moderate price. To insure the success of the enterprise a large subscription list must be first filled out, and books are now open for that purpose at the Music Hall, the price of tickets for the whole series being set at four dollars. At these concerts Miss Kellogg, Miss Phillippe, Miss Cary, Mrs. West, Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Barry, Mr. Whitney, Mr. Packard, Mr. Fessenden, Mr. Barnabee, the Temple Quartette, Mr. Perabo, Mr. Thayer and Mr. Dow will take part.

To the above (which we find in the Daily Advertiser) we may add, that we have positive assurance that Mme. Rudersdorff has determined to return to Boston in season for the Christmas Oratorios, and pass the winter in this country.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.—An excellent beginning has been made by the Germania Band and Orchestra,—in business partnership with Mr. PECK, the superintendent of the Music Hall, who knows so well how such things should be managed,—to supply in part a great desideratum of our summer months. That is to say, some frequent opportunities of hearing good orchestral music, with a liberal admixture of the best quality of music light and popular, and at cheap prices. The first experiment, on Friday evening of last week, took the form of a "Promenade Concert." The seats of the floor of the Music Hall had been removed, so that those who chose could walk about (or dance upon occasion), and the quiet ones could sit in the balconies and listen and enjoy the cheerful picture Mr. EICHLEN's nice little orchestra of 25 upon the stage, performed such pleasantly mingled and choice strains as: "Inauguration" March by Strauss; Allegretto from Beethoven's 8th Symphony; Overtures to La Gazza Ladra and Die Felsenmühle; a cleverly contrived potpourri from "Midsummer Night's Dream"; Strauss's "Blue Danube" Waltz, a Polka Masourka and Galop, &c. The band, for the number, was excellent, and all went gracefully and with spirit. There were also skilful Solos, on the Cornet by Mr. KALTENBORN, and on the flute by Mr. GORRING, which were highly relished. The invitations of the Waltz and Polka were readily enough accepted, and pretty children, youths and maidens, even some almost venerable seniors, whirled around in couples, covering the floor, for a few minutes, very picturesquely. The aspect of it all was cheerful, orderly, respectable, and indeed refined. The company was large, and everybody votes it a success. The second came off last evening.

There will be more. We trust they will become much more frequent through the summer, and that their character will be varied by a certain proportion of sit-down concerts, where those who thirst for higher music and find none in Summer, may have a chance to hear some. We trust, too, that the support given to these concerts will be so liberal as to warrant a fuller complement of violins, &c., in the orchestra.

[The above was in type for our last issue, but crowded out. We can only add that these concerts have gone on since, once a week, proving themselves more and more attractive and entirely unexceptionable.]

[Continued from page 58.]

Olives," distinguished and unrivalled as the grand classic oratorio of the world. The speaker spoke briefly of Beethoven's life and genius, naming him the Dante of music. He spoke last of Mendelssohn and his oratorio of St. Paul, which, he said, becomes more beautiful as men hear and see more. It may not be so grand as his later oratorio of "Elijah," but the magic word beauty is written on nearly every page of the score. Mendelssohn is the charming, the beloved Tasso of music. Beautiful in his person, in the tone and feeling of his heart, in his affection for his sister, in his culture, in his amenities toward his fellows, in his transcendent works, in his home life and art life, he was the perfect artist. His name shall live while music holds her sway. Mr. Nason discussed the question of musical composition in America, and at the close of his essay, on motion of General H. K. Oliver, a vote of thanks was passed to him.

Miss Hattie E. Safford then sang a selection of Mendelssohn's music, with piano accompaniment.

The meeting was continued for about an hour after the reading of the essay. The discussion, which was of a somewhat informal character, turned upon the subject of choral societies. Mr. Carl Zerrahn made an able speech upon the subject, and General Oliver gave the history of the Salem society. The history of the Lynn society was also given, and several interesting addresses were made.

EVENING CONCERT.

A concert was given in the evening before a large and very appreciative audience. The chorus was somewhat larger than on Tuesday afternoon, and much better balanced. It was made up from the Boston Chorus, the Boston Choral Union, the Chelsea Choral Society and the Newton Musical Association. The choral music, of which there were five selections, was sung in a style which could hardly have been improved if the chorus had been of an integral and not of a composite character. There was no orchestra, and the choral selections were sung simply with piano accompaniment. The music given so varied from the printed programme that the latter was of but little service in the hands of the listener. The concert opened with the chorus, "Sleepers, wake," from "St. Paul," Mendelssohn, which was number four on the programme. This was followed by Enkhansen's Postludium in F, for organ, trumpet, trombones and tympani, which was performed by Messrs. Torrington, Arbuckle, Brückner, Regenstein, Saul and Stoehr. The song, "Lo, here the gentle lark," against which the name of Mrs. H. M. Smith was placed, was sung in her absence by Miss Lizzie M. Gates. The quintet in B flat, op. 87, Mendelssohn, was given by the Quintette Club, over which the audience was enthusiastic and disposed to encore. The choral, "To God on high," from "St. Paul," and was also encored.

Nothing during the evening pleased the audience more than the flute solo by Mr. Heindl of the Quintette Club, which was introduced in place of a pianoforte solo on the programme, and the player was enthusiastically applauded. The other pieces given were the duet "Cheerfulness," by Miss Gates and Miss Safford; chorus "And the glory of the Lord" from the "Messiah"; chorus "He, watching over Israel" from "Elijah"; "Slumber Song," by Miss Safford, and final chorus, "Achieved is the glorious work" from the "Creation."

THIRD AND LAST DAY.

[From the Transcript].

The third day's proceedings were opened in a business meeting in Bumstead Hall at ten o'clock this forenoon, Mr. L. H. Southard, the President in the chair.

On motion, the following named gentlemen were elected life members: L. F. Snow and R. W. Husted of Boston, W. E. Sheldon of Waltham.

The next in order was the reading of an Essay on Mendelssohn, by Rev. W. L. Gage, and it was decided to adjourn to Music Hall in order to give a large audience the benefit of the reading.

Mr. Gage began by saying that his acquaintance with the character and talents of Mendelssohn was rather with the man than the musician. The publication of the two volumes of Mendelssohn's letters within the last two years had made his name seem nearer and dearer to every noble and high-minded man and woman, and more than anything else given an insight, as it were, into the inner life of the man.

The speaker had recently travelled in Germany, and everywhere he had found evidence of the profound respect and love in which the memory of the great musician is held, not alone for his genius but for his virtues as a man. He had in him a large element of solid common sense. His life was almost without spot or blemish. His faults were that he was morbidly sensitive of neglect,—what the Americans call "thin-skinned," and being brought up almost from youth in an atmosphere of adulation, this at times made him appear morose and resentful when he thought he was not properly appreciated. Berlin, during the latter part of his life, was distasteful to him, because at some period he had suffered some real or supposed lack of appreciation there.

He was of an excitable, restless temperament, which kept him continually at work, and but for this continual strain on his system by his almost constant employment, he might, perhaps, have lived to a good old age instead of dying at the age of thirty-nine. He left a great name, but his fame is secondary to that of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. His oratorios and symphonies will always rank high in the musical world.

That he led a pure and blameless life does not establish his musical genius, but it establishes his character as a man, and his power as a musician will never be disputed.

He enjoyed the advantage of possessing an independence, so he had only his own tastes to consult in his musical compositions, and instead of pandering to the fashions of the times in which he lived, he produced music of so pure and ennobling a character that it will never go out of fashion.

Probably no public man was ever more fully endowed with that subtle essence called magnetism. He inspired every one with whom he was brought in contact with some of his own enthusiasm. He was pleasant and genial in his relations with the artists who were under his baton. Criticism from his lips lost its sting; and praise was doubled by his graceful and kindly expression of it.

In other things as well as music, Mendelssohn excelled. In the Greek language he was very proficient; he was an artist of no mean order, and was at home in all the sciences.

If sculpture, and painting, and poetry can train the mind up to a sense of beauty, a character so statuesque and grand in purity must make man higher and nobler.

The speaker once suggested that the two volumes of Mendelssohn's letters be published by the American Tract Society, and distributed, as embodying the highest ideals of pure and noble manhood, but the project was regarded as visionary.

In his music Mendelssohn had no tolerance for that species of legerdemain in fingering, and the rush and the frenzy of the Thalberg school, and happily our leading musicians are now gradually becoming of the same opinion.

He was a believer in the Christian religion, living in it and dying in it. If there is one man for whom we can feel assured of a happy immortality, it is Felix Mendelssohn—happy in his life, happy in his immortality.

Mr. Gage was listened to with great attention and was frequently applauded. At the close of the essay the members of the Business Committee again met in Bumstead Hall.

Mr. W. E. Sheldon of the Committee on Finance was called upon to report. He said that some means must be adopted to raise funds for the necessary expenses of this and future Congresses. He recommended that an effort be made to secure as many life members as possible at this session. He thought there should be at least one thousand life members secured. Those who did not wish the life membership could become annual members on the payment of one dollar.

It was moved and carried that Mr. Sheldon be appointed a committee to represent this matter to the members of the Congress this afternoon at the close of the concert.

Mr. Sheldon declined on the ground that he was unused to appearing in public on the stage.

The President thought he would never have a better opportunity, and refused to excuse him.

Mr. J. E. Barrett of Hartford opened the discussion on "Church Music." He thought the subject worthy of profound deliberation. He would, if possible, have an organ in every church and an effective choir, not to take the place of, but to lead the congregational singing. There were in our hymn-books many pieces which could be fitly rendered; therefore there should be a good understanding between the pastor and his choir-leader. His experience had taught him that those pastors were most successful who had treated the leaders of their choirs as co-workers with them and extended to them the right hand of Christian fellowship.

Rev. E. Wentworth said that in the consideration of church music it is of the first importance that we should understand its scope. We do not want anything grand and majestic for church music, but simply lyrical music, such as may be learned and appreciated by all. As the popular taste becomes elevated to a higher standard let it be gradually improved.

Mr. L. O. Emerson considered music as one of the noblest gifts of God to man. He believed the time would come when not only music would be taught universally in the common schools throughout the country, but when music of the highest order would be understood and appreciated by the common people.

Rev. J. H. Wiggins, of Medford, had had congregational singing in his church for twelve years, under the leadership of an efficient musician. He characterized a large portion of the music which appeared in our music books for church use as wooden, and some of the hymns were no more capable of being sung than would be a financial statement from a newspaper, or one of Andrew Johnson's speeches.

Rev. Mr. Patrick of West Newton took the same view of the case as the preceding speaker. He said when any one wished to make money on a new music book he would sit down and grind out about twelve enough to fill it, and if there was a good one got in amongst them it was by mistake.

Rev. Mr. Spaulding was in favor of congregational singing. He began life at "the other end of the ship," as an alto singer when he was a boy, and knew some of the perplexities of both pastor and choir leader. He believed the day was coming when we might be styled a musical people, but it would be when the present generation of children come on to the stage.

[Conclusion next time.]

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Souvenir de London. Campana.
No. 7. She deceived me. (M'inganno). 3. A to e. 40
" 8. The Tomb. (La Tomba). 4. Ch to f. 40
Of the same excellent set before mentioned, translated by the Messrs. Perkins. The key of the last need not frighten any singer, as to the singer it appears the same as the key of C natural, and is therefore easy. The song reminds one, a little, of Beethoven's "Adelaide."
Chiming Bells of Long ago. Song and Chorus.
3. D to f. C. F. Shattuck. 40
Fine lithographic title, and equally fine chorus. Has a pretty chiming accompaniment, and is attractive every way.
I'm little, but I'm good. 2. D to e. R. H. Haig. 30
Comic, with a "dance in it."
The Man O'Airlee. 2. C to f. 30
Record this among the "first class" Scotch songs.
"And up and down, and round and round
And o'er the whole world fairly
You might have searched, but never found,
Another Man O'Airlee."
Nell, the Village Pride. Song and Cho. 3. A to f. G. F. Morris. 35
Pleasing, and in popular style.

Instrumental.

- Hurrah Germania. Potpourri. 4. H. Cramer. 75
True Germania doesn't hurrah, but cries "Lebe hoch!" or "Juché!" and plays on the "Brass Band." But here is a splendid array of a dozen or more stirring melodies, with which one may "hurrah" on the piano or organ to good purpose.
Oberon. Fant. Brillante. 4 hds. 4. Db. Leybach. 1.00
Leybach's popular pieces, of which there are many, are perhaps a trifle above the capacity of common players. The 4 hand arrangement makes this fine piece much easier.
Happy Thoughts. 3 Easy Pieces for little hands.
No. 1. Cantilene. 2. F. L. Streabog. 25
Very sweet and graceful.
Summer Noon. Lithograph titles. C. Faust. 40
No. 3. Galop. 3. G.
"Faust" like and brilliant.
Ninth Regiment Quickstep. 3. C. D. L. Downing. 1.00
Fine view of Col. Fisk on the title, with mountains, Bristol Line steamer and Erie R. R. train in the background. Bright, wide awake quickstep.
Sleepy Hollow Mazurka. 3. G. J. M. Deems. 35
A delicate and sweet composition.
Dundurn. Galop Brillante. 3. C. G. F. de Viné. 35
Pretty and good for learners.
A Song of the Morning. (Morgenlied). 4. D. J. W. Harmston. 40
A "Song without words," interpreting with success the emotions of a poet or musician who awaits the coming of the morning.
Lord Lorne Galop. 3. G. Dan Godfrey. 30
Brilliant and varied.
Deep Rock Spring Galop. 3. D. Pabet. 40
A great deal of "spring" to the galop, which the visitors at Deep Rock will no doubt dance merrily to in the coming summer evenings.
Golden Stars. Six Easy Dances. L. Streabog.
Delightful little airs for beginners, and that is saying a great deal, as it is very difficult to compose interesting simple music. Of the 1st and 2nd degrees of difficulty.
1. Valse. 2. C. 25
2. Polka. 1. C. 25
3. Schottisch. 2. F. 25

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, E flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 790.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 8.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Home Music.

How many of all those, who spend time and means in the cultivation of music, have any object in view beyond the entertainment of company? My young friend, do you feel yourself sufficiently rewarded for the time you are spending every day in practice, dry and disagreeable as the mere mechanical part is, by the exaggerated applause of the shallow people of whom fashionable society is mostly composed? If you have a true soul for music, you have found that in company a style of music pleases, altogether different from what you would play at home for your own enjoyment or that of your family. In company you are expected to appeal to the eyes as well as the ears of your listeners. Your fingers must perform feats equal to those of the most accomplished gymnast. Some people delight in watching the fingers to such a degree, that they think of nothing else. Finding this to be the case, you are anxious to make the best of what technical ability you have acquired by the diligent practise of scales, chords, &c., and astonish yourself even, in the execution of the music of a Gottschalk, Wehli, or some other rattle-trap. Or perhaps your teacher 'composes,' and his music is particularly striking in its way. He has inspired you with respect by his finished performance, and, when he presents you with a copy of his last composition with the request that you would learn it, you feel at once so flattered, that you are ready to devote any amount of time to studying the peculiar effects through which he astonishes his hearers. He may play octaves particularly well; the public are informed of the fact by the unmeaning frequency of octave passages. Or he has a wondrous power in the left hand, and therefore uses this member to the exclusion of the right. Or he excels in rapid, brilliant runs, calculated to exhibit the equality of touch, of which he is master. Although you are versed in none of these artifices that constitute the popular musician, and although as yet developed in no particular direction, you diligently spend an unaccountably long time to produce the effects intended by the composer. In the mean time, what becomes of the pieces you learned before? They are forgotten of course. Not one of them can you remember. The last piece is the only one; to be laid aside in its turn and forgotten, while working to master another of even greater difficulty. And so on until the young days are spent. This music has never been any real enjoyment to you, for it is barren; it is not the language of the heart; for a brief moment it sparkles, glares, makes noise, and is burnt out like a rocket. And, as the desire to inspire admiration ceases, when you are settled in life and have the care of a family, the piano is never opened, except when an occasional visitor tries her skill. On the music-stand are the bound books, full of emptiness, with your maiden name on the cover; and you can hardly believe that you ever played them, so little remains in your remembrance of the pieces they contain. To those who are following this course, let me say a few words about home music.

How different your selections would be, were they made with a view of choosing such pieces as would, by their divine influence, make the bond of family union closer, and send you into the duties of the day with cheerful hearts; pieces that at night would harmonize the jars of the busy day's work into sweet contentment. Our hearts tell us what is appropriate; and we feel well repaid for the sacrifice it may cost us; so make a religious duty of beginning the day with sweet music, when Papa with beaming eyes tells us that he awoke, thinking the angels had come down from heaven; when each member of the family, as they meet at the breakfast table, seems to have felt the holy influence. You were conscious of no effort on your part, and only felt that the sleeping ones must not be harshly awakened with noisy, trifling music. Nor is it so difficult to find pleasing, elevating, and at the same time easy music. Do not think Papa is old-fashioned, and it is not worth your while to sing, at his request, some melody which brings back to him the days of his youth. Is it not to him you owe the advantages of musical instruction? Can any one's praise be sweeter?

If you have a voice cultivate it, not that you may gain the applause of the unthinking by singing some difficult operatic air, and by taxing your powers to the utmost in the execution of trills and passages entirely beyond your ability, imagining all the while that you are a Nilsson. Be sure that you are giving more pain than pleasure to every true heart. No matter how limited your powers of execution may be, as long as you forget self and put your heart in it, seeking only for the truthful and simple expression of feeling as contained in the songs of Schubert, Robert Franz, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Beethoven, and others, leaving the execution of vocal extravagances to the unusually gifted, you cannot fail to give pleasure to all those who hear you. Are there not accessible to you hundreds of good people's songs of all nations, all of them easy of execution, whether you sing or play them? Songs that spring up among the simple people, as fresh and fragrant as the wild flowers in the woods?

Of piano music the "Children's Album" (Album für die Jugend) by Robert Schumann, containing some of the best thoughts of this charming composer, is full of appropriate little pieces; quite easy, only requiring heart to give the desired effect. In Beethoven's immortal Sonatas there are many divine Adagios just fitted to elevate your home-audience into a sphere of kindness and good will to all men, which shall accompany them through the busy day like an echo from better regions. And yet they are easy of execution, if only you feel their beauty. The same is true of many of Mozart's Adagios, indeed of whole Sonatas of this master and of Father Haydn. If your ability permit, you might find in almost all of the Sonatas of those masters appropriate home music to begin the day with, even in the sprightlier, more energetic movements. And what an evening feast we have in the wonderful Nocturnos of Field and Chopin, Bach's Preludes, Slumber songs of Stephen Heller, &c. Of four-hand pieces of medium difficulty Franz Schubert composed a delightful variety. If there are two of the family capable of uniting their powers, you will be able to render with double effect the various Symphonies, Overtures, and other compositions of the great masters.

Of such music no one grows tired. Such music is never forgotten. Yours is an important mission, that you perhaps have never thought of: that, of educating the family taste by leading them to the knowledge of what is good and true in music; that of creating in them the same appreciation of the best you have yourself—by your playing. Without your knowing it music has become such a part of your family life, that it is as necessary to the mind and heart as food is to the body. When oppressed with care it helps you, and when overworked it gives you rest. It keeps alive the sense for the Beautiful and True. Like the sister-arts, it elevates you from the commonplaces of life into the realms of the ideal.

S. M. C.

More Letters by Mendelssohn.*

The following translations of some letters which have only very recently been published in Germany for the benefit of a charitable institution will be received with interest by the English admirers of Mendelssohn. How it came to pass that they were not included in the two volumes published by the Family it is difficult to understand, unless their slightness formed the reason of their rejection. The letters, however, though slight, are by no means without value. They are full of the grace and charm, and the love of life, which pervades everything he wrote, and of the humor which is hardly less his characteristic, and which here displays itself in the allusions to the squabbles that interfered so seriously with his comfort at Düsseldorf, and finally drove him away from that city, and in many an amusing and clever touch on other subjects. But apart from these qualities, the reference to his symphony in C minor—confirming the date of that composition to about 1824—to the Hebrides overture, and others of his own compositions, to his method of performing Handel, to the works of Beethoven and Bach—are all of value.

One point there is which distinguishes these letters from every one of those previously published—the mention they contain of the name of Mendelssohn's illustrious friend and compeer, Robert Schumann. It has often been remarked as more than strange that, notwithstanding the close friendship so well known to have existed between these great masters, the two published volumes of Mendelssohn's letters should contain only one allusion, and that of the slightest kind, to Schumann. "Schumann and his wife . . . are to be the teachers at first," is his only reference to two people who are known to have been amongst his most intimate friends. It is therefore very gratifying to find in these letters a few more appropriate references, especially the graceful and characteristic one which forms the point of the last. Some day perhaps some more letters will come to light, which will speak, in fitting terms, of Jenny Lind, Joachim, Bennett, and many another dear friend of Mendelssohn's whom he loved not less than Schumann, and who have suffered a like temporary eclipse.

The letters are addressed to Mrs. Voigt, a well-known amateur at Leipzig.

DUSSELDORF, 19th Nov., 1834.

Forgive my delay in answering your kind note: musical business, chiefly of a tedious and disagreeable nature, has hindered me day after day. I now hasten to write and say how much I thank you for your kind recollection of me. My address is simply "Düsseldorf," as I am well known at the Post Office through many a letter. I am sorry your note was so short, merely asking for my address, and then ending by saying that you are silent about Leipzig music because you do not wish to give me a moment's uneasiness. But I can't understand your being unable to find anything worth telling, for you must know how full of interest all your descriptions are to me.

I could give you such an account of this "Rhine-Athens," as the Rhine-Athenians themselves call it (Düsseldorf, to wit), this pattern of a provincial town, where, when the orchestra is not drunk or fighting, its performance is below mediocrity. I am everlastingly exhorting the players to be sober and peaceable, to keep time and play piano; but, like other preachers, I am unheeded, and they go on pitching into each other and the notes most unmercifully.

But writing from Leipzig, which gives the very key-note to music, and is so full of all that is good and new in the art—with its Thomas School, its Concerts, and its Opera—you must have much that is interesting to tell me.

So I hope you will soon favor me with a few lines, and not deprive me long of so great a pleasure. You cannot be wanting in matter (as I have already said) to reintroduce a young recluse into the world of art.

I have written to Hofrath Rochlitz, and only beg my kind regards to him and to your husband, and remain yours truly.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

DUSSELDORF, 10th Jan., 1835.

My best thanks for your kind note; the day before I received it I had seen the death of your friend in the newspaper, and I felt how great his loss would be to you. One hardly knows whether to grieve or rejoice at having renewed acquaintance with one so near his departure; but I shall be very glad to look over some of his compositions, which you kindly propose to send me, especially as you say that he wished me to see them. I have always heard of him as one of the cleverest musicians at Leipzig, and in the present sad dearth of music it is a twofold sorrow to every musician when the best are taken from us.

Many thanks for your interesting account of the music at Leipzig; you seem to be very full of life and spirit, but it surprises me much to hear of my Overture in B minor being taken faster at the end than at the beginning. I suppose you mean after the animato? If so, I shall certainly adopt Sebastian Bach's practice, who hardly ever marked even a piano or forte on his music. I thought a piu stretto would hardly do well, as I referred rather to an increase of spirit, which I did not know how to indicate except by animato.

But have you seen the two hand arrangement of this Overture? I heard it yesterday to my great consternation: had it been played to me in this shape without its being my own, I should have scolded at the composer like any reed sparrow; the bass on the last page is as lame and tedious as the veriest "Marki."

By-the-by, can you tell me of anything pretty and new for the piano, with or without accompaniment? You are at the fountain-head at Leipzig. I have lately seen a new book of Lieder ("Der Bergmann") by Loewe, a Fantasia on "Robert le Diable" by Chopin, and some Lieder by Hiller, but I cared for none of them. I look forward to receiving Schunke's pieces, and am longing for something new and good to learn.—Of Beethoven's violin Sonatas, the one in C minor is my favorite, and seems to me to stand far above all the others. There is a go about the end of the first movement, greater than anything of his I know, except perhaps the end of the first movement of the ninth symphony, which certainly has more go than anything else in the world. I also delight not a little in the theme of the last movement, especially where it comes in at the end just before the presto.

Do you never play the Sonatas for Piano and Violin by Bach, your ancient "Cantor?" the one in A major* for instance, and another in E major and F minor, which any one might be proud of. I wish you could have heard my friend Ritzl play the opening of the one in E; that was indeed fine music; but he too is gone long ago; and it will be a long time before we hear such tones as his again.

And now farewell; write when you can, and gratify yours truly.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

DUSSELDORF, 15th March, '35.

I beg your pardon a hundred times for not having sooner thanked you for what you sent me. "Tortments of all kinds"—in other words, business of all kinds—take up my whole time. Pardon me, and accept these very tardy thanks. What you sent me has given me the great pleasure of a new musical acquaintance, though, alas! too late. I like the Sonata best, it is the most in earnest, and most natural, especially the first movement and the andante, more so than the scherzo and the last movement, in which I recognize the pianoforte player who wrote the variations in A flat, and which for other reasons I do not care for. But in the four-hand pieces there is much to like, and I can imagine how interesting it must have been to hear them all fresh from the hand of the composer, and can understand how much fine promise has been cut off by his death.

Will you please thank Mr. Schumann most heartily for his kind present, and the kind words he has added to it? I wish I could spend a couple of days in Leipzig, just to tell him how much there is in it which finds me and pleases me, though not all; and I am pretty sure if I could only explain what I mean, that he would come round to my opinion. One of my favorites is No. 2 in F minor. Once more please to thank him, and tell him how much pleasure he has given me.

What else have you heard this winter that is good and new? I live here like La Fontaine's rat when he retired into the big cheese. I see people when I dine; and at other times I ride, walk, and write my oratorio,* which, please God, will be finished in a few weeks; but of the world outside I hear nothing. I shall conduct the Cologne Musical Festival at Whitsuntide, and then travel about for a couple of months, though I hardly know where. I have some fancy for England, still more for Switzerland, and unfortunately yesterday a friend wrote and asked me to go to Spain with him, and the very name sets me longing. But it's a long way off, and I dare say the music in Spain is just as little worth hearing as in Düsseldorf. Next week Bernhard Romberg is coming to give a concert; and then Mlle. Thénar, a Brussels pianist; and last week a Mr. Lewy was here with his chromatic horn, playing F sharp major, C-sharp major, and B minor, in such a style, with such scales and sostenuto notes, as made everybody breathless—even the performer himself. Then we had a blind flute-player; and the day before yesterday the whole of the Messiah was sung by amateurs, amidst fearful discussions and agreements (but no blows).

On reading your letter over again I see that Mr. Schumann asks for an account of the music in this place† Immermann would be the last man to give it, as he hates music, and never hears or wishes to hear any. And I am the last but one, for I should take a fortnight to write my letter, and then (if I thought it were going to be printed), when I came to the end should scratch out the beginning. But there is a musical man at Cologne, Dr. Becher, who could do it well and readably, and if Mr. Schumann wishes I will undertake to speak to him on the subject. Please let me know.

* An old favorite. He refers to it in his letter of December 20, 1831, as having heard it, when a boy, played by Ballot and Mme. Bigot.

† Eduard Ritzl, one of his earliest and dearest friends. He died in January, 1832; the news reached Mendelssohn in Paris, and distressed him exceedingly. "It is the hardest blow that has yet fallen on me, and I shall never forget it." (Letter, Feb. 4, 1832.)

‡ "Martens aller Arten."

§ Ludwig Schunke.

|| This doubtless refers to "Estrella," in Schumann's "Carnaval."

• St. Paul was first performed at the Festival at Düsseldorf, on May 22, 1836.

† No doubt for his new musical paper, the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, which was then in the first year of its existence.

But now the blank page of your album lies before me, seeming to stare me in the face. I played a little piece on the piano last night in F sharp minor; ‡ I will write it down, and you must forgive me if I have to scratch out, or if it should turn out good for nothing. I always like my own pieces, and I want to send you a new thing, never written down before. So be merciful, and keep well and happy and let me have the pleasure of an answer soon.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

Though much pressed by work and business, I despatch these few lines in answer to your kind letter. I would willingly have sent a song as requested, and am sorry to forego the pleasure of helping such a man as you describe Mr. Ulrich to be; but I have nothing ready which would do for a concert. I am really quite sorry to hear that my symphony in C minor is to be given at his concert; for it is more than ten years old, and does not at all rank with my present things. You will do me a kindness if you can prevent its being done; or if not, pray manage to let your friends know that the symphony is op. 2, that is, that it was written by a boy scarcely fifteen—that it has been for six years at the publisher's, and was performed at the Leipzig concerts more than seven years ago. I should be glad if you could contrive to let the public know this before the performance, because the work seems to me quite childish.

It would be very nice and amiable of you to come to the Festival; I believe it will be an extraordinarily good one; but I am sorry that I shall have to give up the pleasure of going with you afterwards to Switzerland, as my engagements will keep me here at least till July, and perhaps longer—indeed I grieve to think that possibly I may not be able to travel at all. You would never regret making a trip to Cologne for the festival. Handel|| in his original shape, with organ all through, three trumpets and drums, as well as the new Cherubini—these are surely inducements enough for a journey.

I can't agree with you that there are many parts in Bach's Sonatas which might have been composed in the present day. Pray by whom?

And now farewell; excuse my hurry, and this letter scarcely to be called a letter.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

Düsseldorf, 10th April, 1835.

(To be Continued.)

‡ This was the "Gondellied," which appears, with some alterations, as No. 6 in the second book of "Songs without words."

§ He might have added that it was played at the Philharmonic, in London, under his own direction, on the 25th May, 1829—during his first visit to London. The above is not a bad specimen of the stern judgment which he passed upon his own compositions; but the verdict will be endorsed by no one who knows the symphony, which is not only a truly remarkable work for a lad of fifteen, but one of which many older composers might be proud.

|| "Solomon" was the oratorio performed at this Festival. Mendelssohn wrote a complete organ part for it "in the manner in which he thought it ought to be played" (Letter, April 3, 1835). The "new Cherubini" was an unpublished Hymn, the title of which is not to be found.

Auber.—A Study. 1864.

BY B. JOUVIN.

(Concluded from page 51.)

Auber did not like travelling, or the country. Pointing with his finger, one day, to some colored engravings on the walls of his ante-room, and, as far as my eyes enabled me to perceive, representing a river, some meadows, and a wood: "There," he said, "is about all I have ever seen in the way of verdure and nature. However," he added, with a smile, "Scribe has taken me in his operas over so many different countries, that it is very natural I should now be glad to find myself once more in Paris."

Not that he felt any antipathy for a blue sky and green trees; but the dust charged horizon, and the rickety and sparsely-planted trees of the Boulevard sufficed, when the fine weather came, to satisfy his rural longings.

Auber was one of the most regular visitors at the Opera on ballet nights. If he thought it delicious to take a nap in Dr. Veron's box, even during the most hoisterous beauties of a noisy masterpiece, he was, on the contrary, all ears, when the dancing began. This explains why the composer of Le Dieu et la Bayadère wrote such pretty ballet airs. In a study devoted to this musician, I cannot, even at the risk of repeating an oft-told tale, pass over in silence one singular fact: Auber was never able to witness the performance of any of his works from the front of the house; he knew them only by having heard them at rehearsal. The reason of this nervous phenomenon, over which his will and courage in vain attempted to triumph (who

* From "Macmillan's Magazine" for June.

† "Acht Briefe und ein Facsimile von Felix Mendelssohn-Bartoldy. Zum besten der Deutschen Invalidenstiftung." Leipzig: Grunow, 1871.

‡ He entered on his duties as musical director at Düsseldorf in 1833, and remained in that post till the summer of 1836. On the 4th of October of that year he conducted his first concert in the Gewandhaus at Leipzig.

§ Ludwig Schunke, a pianist and composer of much promise. He was associated with Schumann in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and died on December, 7, 1834, at the age of 24.

|| This is the well-known overture called the "Hebrides," or "Fingal's Cave," written at Rome in 1830, and first played at the Philharmonic Concert of May 14, 1832.

would believe such a thing of an artist consecrated by so many successes, and satiated by so much glory?) was—well, was incurable timidity. A chord of his own music, when sounded before fifteen hundred spectators, affected him like the Biblical trumpet which overthrew walls. He could not escape this emotion, which amounted to almost intolerable suffering, even by throwing himself to the back of a box, after Meyerbeer's fashion, and being present invisibly at the execution of his operas; it was absolutely necessary that the fiery semicircle of the float should separate him from the public.

One evening it came to pass that he took his seat in the stalls at the Opera with the sweet calm of a man who is collecting his thoughts and enjoying beforehand a masterpiece. The bills of the morning had announced Guillaume Tell. Habeneck gave the signal to his musicians. But oh, treachery! instead of the violoncello solo, a tutti burst out in the orchestra. The brazen and unexpected explosion wounded the musician to the heart; a film covered his eyes; there was a singing in his ears; he would have given a thousand francs for the trap that swallows up Bertram. He rose from his seat; he wanted to reach the corridor leading out of the house, and it was to the middle of the stalls that he directed his course. He had to retrace his steps; his neighbors began to murmur aloud, and send to the devil the boor, the Goth, the savage, who smothered under the ill-mannered shuffling of his feet the andante of the overture. When he had completed his painful journey between knees and feet most evilly disposed towards him, and hidden from all eyes his confusion by taking refuge in a corridor, it seemed to him as though he had carried away in his glance all the gas-jets in the chandelier and the float. The performance had been changed, and it was La Muette which put him to flight.

Auber was nearly forty when he achieved his first theatrical success. This début, when he was at his artistic maturity, was what enabled him to reveal himself from the very beginning with brilliancy, and in all the virility of inspiration. He placed at the service of talent, full grown and set, a young imagination; he came to the stage with the experience and the resources acquired by knowledge slowly amassed, having obtained, moreover, this knowledge and this experience without blunting an artist's finest and rarest faculty—the gift of creation.

Another piece of good fortune for the musician at the outset of his career, was to meet Rossini, and to enter, without the slightest hesitation, into the musical revolutionary impulse given to art by a man of genius. Suppose, on the contrary, that, instead of writing La Bergère châteline in 1820, Auber had given it in 1813 [the date of Le Séjour militaire], and that his vein of great success had commenced at that epoch; the revolution accomplished in France by the author of the Barbière, far from inspiring him with enthusiasm, would have surprised and saddened him. This unexpected transformation of the art, this change in public taste, would have taken him unawares, and after he had achieved his position and reputation as a French composer. Before sharing the infatuation of the crowd, he would have had to begin by burning what he had adored; and, as a general rule, a man, whether musician or author, does not set fire to his Past to run more nimbly and without regret towards the Future, except when that past is merely so much dry straw. If his granary bent beneath the weight of rich harvests, he would think twice before lighting the torch. Thus the Rossinian revolution, so warmly greeted and embraced by Auber, necessarily cast a gloom over the old age of Cherubini, and made that excellent man, Berton, the most unjust and most passionate of pamphleteers. One more remark with regard to this gift of transformation in art: Auber, who possessed a style and modes of working which strike even the ignorant crowd by their originality, followed without an effort the current of modern ideas; with strongly-marked musical individuality, he belongs to his time. Not that he troubled himself with the great tentatives of the German school posterior to the Rossinian revolution; the art which blows from this quarter interested him but little, and, to tell the truth, he did not feel much sympathy for it; he had, however, remained young, and a contemporary of the young, thanks to the sap, which, victorious over years, fecundated, and, at the same time, renewed in him his talent as an artist and his cleverness as a man, and also, we are bound to add, because he placed youth above all the other blessings of this world.

A young man during the epoch of the Consulate, and well received in the aristocratic salons, discreetly opened to re-collect the waifs and strays of a society whose members were glad to meet one another again, Auber was enabled to see, grouped round two or three pretty women who were the fashion, the rallied veterans of French elegance, the surviving inheritors of the intellect of the eighteenth century. At that time people in France still knew how to causer, and in the school of these old masters of a lost art the young musician was the very person to learn quickly and retain a great deal. Auber very soon refuted most brilliantly the proverb which says: "Bête comme un musicien." He possessed more than any one what was formerly called du trait, and what is now known as des mots. His reputation was so well established in this respect that he inherited from Talleyrand the honor, or the misfortune, of getting credit for others' witty repartees, and for being supposed to supply the mot coined for every circumstance in which Parisian malignity allowed itself full scope.

It would be a difficult task to keep a register of all Auber's witty sayings; his reputation for wit did not need the help of an ana. But as there are some happy mots which convey, with merely a slight touch, the physiognomy of the man and of the artist, a faithful biographer cannot neglect them all. The embarrassment he is under, however, consists in the difficulty of making a choice; to pick up a sally in memory of contemporaries is seeking in the flint notched by the steel the place where the spark leapt out; it is picking up a rocket-case the day after a pyrotechnic display.

In Sainte-Beuve's Causeries du Lundy I find the following anecdote, in which I change nothing, for it emanates from one who knew what he was about.

"I will slip in, by the way," says this accomplished critic, "a little observation which looks like nothing, though it contains a fair amount of philosophy. The conversation turned, in the presence of that amiable composer, Auber, on the nuisance of growing old. 'Yes,' said he, 'it is annoying, and still it is the only means yet discovered for living long.'"

Old age—for which he found so original and even so consoling a definition—was, alas! for this great artist, the small black cloud in the clear sky, the bitter drop in the sweet beverage in which he drank success by goblets full. If Destiny, assuming a voice and a face, had come and said to the illustrious chief of the French school—"I propose a swap. Deliver up to me your scores, which, I warn you, I shall throw into the fire; have an instant divorce from the half century of glory which has carried your name to the extremities of Europe; renounce the great fortune so laboriously and so nobly earned; fling out of the window to yonder man who is crying 'Old clo', old clo'! your dress coats, decorated by every chancelierie; consent, in a word, always to remain an obscure but happy man—and I will let you be once more only five and twenty!"—"Destiny, let me be at once only five and twenty!"—the musician would have exclaimed, without stopping to reflect. Not that Auber flung himself back with affright into the life that is escaping from the man of years, and wanted it without any conditions. Not that he was tempted to say, with the malheureux in the fable:

" * * * qu'on me rende impotent,
Cul-de-jatte, goutteux, manchot, pourvu qu'en somme
Je vive, c'est assez: je suis plus que content."

But, for Auber, the only thing in life, beautiful and good when we possess it, and forever to be regretted when we have lost it, is youth!

The Triennial Handel Festival.

GRAND PUBLIC REHEARSAL.

[From the London Daily News, June 17.]

Yesterday's performance, although characterized as a rehearsal, may be considered as really the inauguration of the great Festival which has now long been looked for as an event to mark, with its regular recurrence, every succeeding period of three years in the history of the Crystal Palace. This is the sixth celebration, and the fourth triennial meeting of the kind that has been held here.

The centenary of Handel's birth was celebrated in Westminster Abbey on May 26; in the Pantheon on May 27, again in the Abbey on May 29, with repetitions there in the following months of the year 1784; being the commemoration specially recorded by Dr. Burney, the celebrated musical historian. It may be interesting to compare the forces then employed—at that time considered gigantic—with the numbers engaged on recent similar occasions. The orchestra at the Abbey consisted of 251 performers, the wind instruments, of course, many times doubled; the chorus numbered 274—while the total forces employed in the smaller arena of the Pantheon was 200. The renowned Mme. Mara was the principal soprano at this celebration. Similar Festival performances—not always, however, with special reference to the great composer of English oratorio—were held in Westminster Abbey in 1785, 1786, 1787, and 1791, with gradually augmented forces; after which nothing of that kind occurred until 1834: this, however, was not a Handel commemoration, and even then the number of performers was only some six hundred. The gradual development of massive choral effects thus commenced was afterward much further extended by the Sacred Harmonic Society (founded in 1832). The frequent performance of Handel's oratorios by this institution no doubt lent additional interest to the approaching hundredth anniversary of his death, and led to the desire to commemorate his illustrious memory by some gigantic performances commensurate with the grandeur of his genius and the greatness of his fame. The co-operation of the Sacred Harmonic Society with the authorities of the Crystal Palace, and the exceptional facilities offered by this building for the assembling of large numbers resulted in the experimental Festival and the subsequent periodical celebrations already referred to.

As a reminiscence of the past Crystal Palace Festivals, it may be interesting to give here the following table of the results of each:

1857.
Rehearsal: (No. of persons present).....	5,844
First day.....	8,628
Second day.....	8,148
Third day.....	14,722
Total.....	88,414
1859.
Rehearsal.....	19,680
First day.....	17,108
Second day.....	17,708
Third day.....	26,837
Total.....	81,319
1862.
Rehearsal.....	19,163
First day.....	16,694
Second day.....	14,143
Third day.....	18,567
Total.....	67,567
1865.
Rehearsal.....	15,420
First day.....	18,677
Second day.....	14,915
Third day.....	16,442
Total.....	59,434
1868.
Rehearsal.....	18,607
First day.....	19,217
Second day.....	21,850
Third day.....	23,101
Total.....	82,465

The progress in the musical efficiency of the Crystal Palace Handel Festivals is illustrated by the comparative number of orchestral and choral performers engaged on the different occasions. In 1857 the chorus consisted of 2,000 voices, and the orchestra of 386 instrumentalists. The solo singers then were Mmes. Clara Novello and Rudersdorff, Miss Dolby (now Mme. Sainton-Dolby), Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. M. Smith, Mr. Weiss, and Herr Formes. In 1859 the band was increased to 460, and the chorus to more than 2,700. At this Festival the principal singers were Mmes. Clara Novello, Rudersdorff, and Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, and Signor Belletti. In 1862—the first of the Triennial Festivals, when the band and chorus were again augmented—the solo vocalists were Mlle. Titians, Mmes. Rudersdorff, Lemmens-Sherrington, and Sainton-Dolby, Miss Parepa, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, and Signor Belletti. The second Triennial Festival, in 1865, assembled a still more imposing array of executants—a band of 495, and a chorus of 2,866 performers—the principal vocalists having been Mme. (then Mlle.) Adolina Patti, Mmes. Rudersdorff, Lemmens-Sherrington, Parepa, and Sainton-Dolby; Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Weiss, Herr Schmid, and Mr. Santley. On the last occasion upwards of 3,000 voices were supported by an orchestra of nearly 500 performers. The principal singers then were Mmes. Titians, Christine Nilsson, Kellogg, and Carola; Mmes. Rudersdorff, Lemmens-Sherrington, and Sainton-Dolby; Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Santley, and Signor Foli.

The selection of pieces performed has been similar on each occasion; the two greatest of Handel's oratorios, the Messiah and Israel in Egypt, having appropriately formed the chief features at every Festival. In 1857, the intermediate day's performance (that of Wednesday) was appropriated to Judas Macabæus, but subsequently the programme on this day has been judiciously formed of selections from several of the composer's works, secular as well as sacred; framed so as to exemplify his wondrous variety of power.

With some fluctuations, it will be seen that the last Festival was the most successful of all, and there is no reason to doubt that the present occasion will realize as great or even greater results. That in a musical sense it will surpass the previous occasions, was confidently anticipated, and has now been established by the preliminary proceedings of yesterday.

The dispersion of sound observable in former instances led to improvements in the construction of the Handel orchestra for the Festival of 1862, and subsequently to the application of screens partially enclosing the sides of the vast area appropriated to the audience. The enhanced effect thus gained was strikingly observable in the performances of 1868. Much greater results have now been obtained by the introduction of a gigantic velarium stretched across the interior of the glass roof of the central transept. This, combined with the previous improvements, has caused a concentration of sound, and conferred a distinctness of effect, that have never before been attained here. The results were advantageously evidenced in every portion of yesterday's performances; and most strikingly so in the vocal solos.

Among the most important features in the arrangement of all these Festivals has been the presiding direction of the world-renowned conductor, Sir Michael Costa; whose knighthood occurred shortly after the date of the last celebration (1868). The musical skill and business talents of this excellent chef d'orchestre are too generally known to require fresh eulogy now. His long career as director at Her Majesty's Theatre, and afterwards at the Royal Italian Opera, the impulse which was given to the progress of the Sacred Harmonic Society by his appointment as conductor in 1848, and the marvellous energy and power of control with which he has availed the mighty forces engaged at the Triennial Handel Festivals, have long since become registered facts in the musical history of our time. Although comment thereon is now superfluous, recognition thereof is inevitable.

It has already been said that the arrangements for the present Festival transcend those of its precursors. The number of performers now engaged is stated to be upwards of 4,000. The orchestra consists of 415 instrumentalists, comprising 93 first violins, headed by M. Sainton; 72 second violins, with Mr. J. T. Willy as principal; 56 violas, led by Mr. C. W. Doyle; 58 violoncellos, with Mr. E. Howell as principal; 57 double basses, principal Mr. J. Howell; and a wind band of proportionate force, including eight flutes (principal, Mr. Radcliff), the same number of oboes, clarinets, and bassoons, headed respectively by M. Barret, Mr. Lazarus, and Mr. Hutchings, supplemented by a monster double-bassoon, played by an amateur performer, Dr. W. H. Stoner; several other distinguished amateurs being in the orchestra. The brass band comprises six cornets, six trumpets, twelve horns, nine trombones, and three euphoniums, the respective principals being Messrs. Reynolds, T. Harper, C. Harper, Hawken, and Hughes. Two serpents, and double drums, bass drum, and side-drums—all used by experienced players, and the organ in the competent hands of Mr. J. Coward—make up the complement. Of the enormous chorus assembled it will be sufficient to say that the names of the singers occupy nearly 17 pages of the programme. This vast body consists of the choristers of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the Handel Festival choir, members of provincial choirs, and professors and amateurs from various quarters. The preliminary choral rehearsals that have taken place in London and elsewhere had thoroughly prepared all for efficient co-operation in the assembled efforts of the day.

By the time appointed—12 o'clock—all were placed, with an orderly regularity resulting from those admirable arrangements which prevail at the Crystal Palace; and Sir Michael Costa lifted his baton for the commencement of the "Hallelujah" chorus from the Messiah, which at once proved the good effects resulting from the newly applied Velarium. A rehearsal, however, is not a fit occasion for critical remarks, which will be more properly reserved for the next week's performances. The "Hallelujah" was succeeded by the "Amen" chorus from the same oratorio. The "Dettingen" Te Deum followed; the incidental solos by Mr. Santley; and then came various detached pieces, also forming portions of Wednesday's programme. The first of the organ concertos with orchestral accompaniments (in G) was very finely played by Mr. W. T. Best, the eminent organist of St. George's hall, Liverpool, and recently appointed to a similar office at the Royal Albert hall. The concerto—with an interpolated cadenza of Mr. Best's—was one of the most effective pieces of the day. The aria from Orlando, "Sorge infausta," sung by Signor Agnesi; "Farewell ye limpid streams" (Jephthah), by Mlle. Titians; the chorus, "Ye sons of Israel" (Joshua); the air (from Alcina) "Vordi prati," sung by Mme. Trebelli-Bettini; "Nascere al bosco," from Erice—better known as "He layeth the beams"—by Mr. Santley; the airs "Oft on a plat" and "Let me wander," by Mlle. Titians and Mr. Cummings; and the chorus "And young and old," from L'Allegro ed il Penseroso; "O, had I Juhah's lyre!" (Joshua), by Mme. Sinico; and the chorus "The mighty power," from Athaliah—with Incidental solo by Mme. Trebelli-Bettini—closed the first portion of the rehearsal programme, from which the recitative "Deeper and deeper still," and air "Waft her angels" (Jephthah), were omitted, in consequence of the absence of Mr. Sims Reeves on account of hoarseness.

On re-assembling, after a brief interval, selections from Solomon and Israel in Egypt, consisting chiefly of some of the sublime double choruses of those works, were rehearsed. Of the grand effect of these, especially of "From the censer" (Solomon) and the "Hailstone" chorus and "The Horse and his rider" (Israel), we shall have a more legitimate opportunity of speaking next week. The selection from Solomon included the airs "With thee th' unshelter'd moor," and "Golden columns," given respectively by Mme. Sinico and Mr. Cummings; and the incidental contralto solos in the choruses, "Music, spread thy voice," and "Now a different measure try," sung by Mme. Patey—and among the extracts from Israel in Egypt was the duet, "The Lord is a man of war, assigned to Mr. Santley and Signor Foli.

The rehearsal terminated soon after 5 o'clock. Of the efficiency and preparation of all concerned some notion may be formed from the fact that there were only three instances—in the choruses—in which it was requisite to stop and recommence.

There appears to be every prospect of an unusually favorable result for the Festival of 1871. The weather—contrary to recent experience—was bright, and the temperature agreeable, and the arrangements for the accommodation of visitors in the Palace, and their transit to and fro by railroad were excellent. There was a large attendance.

FIRST DAY. MONDAY, JUNE 19.

(From the Telegraph.)

Yesterday, the "Messiah" was performed at the Crystal Palace to an audience numbering about 22,000 persons. In presence of an event conceived and wrought out on so vast a scale, the descriptive pen is at a loss where to begin. Here are three features—listeners, more than the population of many a famous city; exponents, unique in merit as in number; and a work which is the greatest offering ever laid by art on the altar of religion. Each topic has its attraction and its claims; but we will decide the question of precedence in favor of that magnificent audience which covered the arena of the central transept from the base of the orchestra to the stage; which extended right and left far down the nave, and rose to the level of the highest gallery. The people who came to see were themselves a sight, neither the least suggestive nor the least attractive in a coup d'œil of unequalled grandeur. All the morning trains were depositing crowds of visitors at the Palace gates in quick succession, and every road leading to the building was early alive with vehicles bound on a similar errand. But again the railway stations were the chief centres of interest. One string of carriages is very like another, and one group of their occupants may be taken as representative of the rest; while in London both may any day be seen without a journey Sydenhamwards for the purpose. But along the iron ways which have placed the Crystal Palace next door to half the provinces, came the vast country contingent always attracted by Handel's sacred masterpiece. Readers of that essentially modern and most voluminous literature—advertisements—know how well arranged are the "feeders" of the Handel Festival, and how there is scarcely a county in England upon which they do not lay hold. It was impossible to be long at the Palace yesterday without finding out that these "feeders" do their work to some purpose. Probably half the audience had come up by "excursions," and certainly more than half the dialects of England might have been heard by any one who proffered going about with his ears open in quest of them to taking in the glorious Handelian strains. Not philologists alone could feel an interest in these dialects, because they told that other than the refined and educated had spent hardly-earned money upon a noble object. Indeed, the "people" were visible enough, being present almost "in their thousands." Genuine music lovers these, who, away down in Blankshire, fill the village choirs or the benches of the local orchestras, and, after their homely fashion, work as zealously for art as the most enthusiastic London amateur. Of course the "Messiah" day was chosen for their trip. The "Messiah" they know, from the overture to the last "Amen," as well as they know the Bible or the "Pilgrim's Progress," and an opportunity of hearing its familiar strains given out by the "four thousand" could not be lost. So the provincials overran the Crystal Palace, as we have said, and were the real "distinguished visitors" of the day. Not that visitors otherwise distinguished were wanting. One of the boxes which are still called "Royal," though Royalty has ceased to attend these Festivals, was ablaze with the gems and gold of the Nawab Nizam of Bengal and his suite, while keen eyes might have discovered among the crowd in the area the familiar form and face of the Prime Minister of England. But enough about the audience—as representative a gathering as ever music brought together.

What came all these thousands out for to hear? In the first place, an orchestra about which something has already been said in these columns, but with which we have far from finished. Our previous remarks, by the way, were unintentionally adapted to make a wrong impression as to the strength of the provincial contingent in the ranks of the band and chorus. An examination of the roll-call shows that not more than 95 sopranos, 114 altos, 196 tenors, and 188 basses—in all 593—are drawn from the host of country amateurs; while of the band all but forty are resident in the metropolitan district. This is a smaller proportion than ever before; and it is to be hoped, for more than one reason, that the lessening process will now cease. Of course we know that London could supply twice four thousand competent vocalists; but a large country force gives to the Festival something of a national character, while there can hardly be a question that it improves the musical effect. The men and women who bring their Handelian zeal from provincial towns and villages, bring also good sound lungs and vigorous throats, such as those "in populous London pent" cannot boast. Here a curious fact suggests itself. That section of the chorus wherein the country voices are fewest—the sopranos—is also the least resonant; while the tenors and basses, on the other hand, are remarkable for volume of tone. We do not attach much importance to this, because the difference is out of proportion to the result; nevertheless, it is remarkable enough for statement, and its tendency is to encourage a belief that the depletion of provincial singers ought now to end. The localities from which the "592" are drawn may easily be surmised by those who know the Handelian fame of Bradford and Leeds, and are cognizant of the fact that in certain towns, Birmingham, Norwich, Worcester, &c.—local festivals keep a supply of vocalists ready to order. But many an outlying place has representatives on the great orchestra. Penzance has sent its quota, so has St. Ives, Torquay, Stratford-on-Avon, Barch, Wrexham, and Frome. But, in the name of "justice to Ireland," where are the delegates from the sister isle? We look down the list of places, and fail to see the appellation of a single Hibernian township. Is this the result of a separatist policy? or did the Festival managers announce that "no Irish need apply?" Whatever the cause, there is the fact.

Like time and tide, Sir Michael Costa waits for no man, and precisely at two o'clock the able conductor, who was received with applause, raised his baton to "inaugurate" the Festival with the customary performance of "God save the Queen." As on previous occasions, his own arrangement was used, and brought out the full power of the orchestra with magnificent effect. This performance has always been a marked feature in the first and last day's scheme, for reasons every one must appreciate. At its close the "Messiah" overture was immediately commenced, its execution justifying all the hopes of those who expected most from the imposing orchestra. Nothing could be better than the delivery of the fugue—every point being taken up with accuracy, and every part standing out sharp and clear. The solos in the first section of the oratorio were taken by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley—the ladies subsequently giving way to Mlle. Titians and Mme. Patey. Mr. Sims Reeves was to have sung the "Passion" music and "Thou shalt dash them;" but hoarseness unhappily prevented his appearance, and the work was done by Mr. Rigby, the subordinate tenor part falling to Mr. Kerr Gedge. Adequate as were these arrangements, it was not to the efforts of the solo vocalists that interest mainly attached, but rather to the stupendous chorus. The artists we have named can often be heard under better conditions, but only once in three years is it possible to listen to four thousand voices and instruments engaged upon the noblest example of sacred music. Properly, therefore, the choruses took the first place in general regard, doing so the more easily because, with very few exceptions, they were rendered in splendid style. The altos—a fine body of voices—struck the key-note of success by their "lead," in "And the glory of the Lord," this being followed by a rendering of "And he shall purify" which set all doubts at rest as to steadiness in bravura passages. But the first great sensation was made in "For unto us a child is born." Sir Michael Costa took this admirable example of the master's genius in excellent time—not too fast, that is—and, moreover, he abandoned the absurd whispering which at Exeter Hall well-nigh turns grandeur into ridicule. To these excellent measures must be added singing almost faultless in its precision, accent, and phrasing, the whole making up a performance such as few present hope to hear excelled. The thunder-shout on the words "Wonderful! Counselor!" &c., was something to remember. In "Glory to God" an impressive effect was made on the words, "and peace on earth"—the pianissimo of so large an orchestra being hardly less grand than its full power; while the entire series of choruses, beginning with "Surely He hath borne our griefs," and ending with "He trusted in God," was magnificently rendered, allowing for the somewhat too great speed here and there noticeable. Few will ever forget the coda of "All we like sheep," in which the utmost power of music strove adequately to set forth that "the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." As overwhelming in its way was the effect of "Lift up your heads," and of the short but most masterly chorus, "Let all the Angels," which follows. To go through the rest of the work in this manner would simply be to repeat a string of laudatory terms; and we shall, therefore, only call particular attention to the "Hallelujah" and "Worthy is the Lamb," with its colossal "Amen." During the singing of the former everybody stood, in compliance with George the Third's happy fashion of homage; but a greater and better homage was paid to Handel's glorious inspiration by the tears which women did not seek to conceal, and which strong men vainly tried to hide. The climax, however, came with the "Amen"—an exposition of science and profound impressiveness never excelled. In this manner did the Handel Orchestra of 1871 prove itself at least the equal of the best among its precursors. The solos, confided to such artists as those already named, were in safe hands. Mme. Sherrington's bright, pure voice was heard to advantage in the "Nativity" recitatives, and it would be hard to say whether she more excelled in the bravura "Rejoice greatly," or in the cantabile "Come unto Him." Need we urge that the former received entire justice from her brilliant execution, or that the latter was given with an obvious desire to exhibit all the intensity of its expression? Once more it must be said of Mlle. Tietjens that she sang "How beautiful are the feet," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," in true Handelian style. For perfect vocal skill, and for all those subtle qualities which go to make up an artistic effort, her delivery of the great devotional air was excelled by nothing in the day's performance. Mme. Trebelli, successful in "He shall feed His flock," made no impression with "But who may abide," for obvious reasons. The air is not suited to a contralto voice, and should have been given, as Handel intended, by the singer of the preceding recitative. Mme. Patey won general applause for her rendering of "He was despised," her fine voice and singularly appropriate delivery causing a great impression. Both in his own airs, and in those he undertook for Mr. Reeves, Mr. Vernon Rigby exerted himself strenuously, and with success. He elicited an emphatic compliment for a delivery of "Thou shalt dash them," which lacked nothing in the shape of vigor, and might have been equally fortunate in the "Passion" music, had not a passing thunder-shower drowned his voice. All the bass airs were given by Mr. Santley with that blending of perfect execution and entire propriety of style which so much distinguished him. Whether it was the stately "For behold, darkness;" the emphatic, "Why do the nations?" or the solemn, "Behold, I tell you a mystery," Mr. Santley fell nothing short of the perfection to which his best efforts have accustomed us. Adding that Mr. Kerr Gedge rendered efficient service in the subordinate tenor music, that Mr. James Coward used the large organ with effect, and that Sir Michael Costa conducted as Sir Michael Costa always does, we may bring our remarks to an end.

SECOND DAY. WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21.

[From the Orchestra.]

The performance on Wednesday commenced with the Dettingen Te Deum, composed in 1743, to celebrate the victory obtained over the French in June of that year at Dettingen. From the time of its production until 1843 (with the exception of one or two years, when it was laid aside in favor of the Te Deum composed by Henry Purcell for St. Cecilia's Day, 1697,) the Dettingen Te Deum was annually performed at the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy in St. Paul's Cathedral. After 1843 its performance, as well as that of other music requiring the aid of an orchestra, was discontinued at those festivals, in consequence of the services of the instrumental band being dispensed with; and since that period it has only occasionally been heard in London. It continued, however, to be annually performed at the Festivals of the Three Choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, at which it was first introduced (at Gloucester) in 1748, until 1859, since which year the celebrations of Divine service with which those festivals open and at which the festival sermon is preached have been conducted without the aid of an orchestral band. The last performance of the Dettingen Te Deum at the Festivals of the Three Choirs was (as the first) at Gloucester.

We were among those who regretted the discontinuance of the Dettingen Te Deum, at St. Paul's, for its effect in the Cathedral was something quite sui generis; and although, generally, the band was ill-proportioned, both to the voices, and in the relative numbers of the different instruments—all services being gratuitous, and any one playing who liked to be present,—there was a "go" about the performance which was very enjoyable. The élite of the profession were content to take subordinate parts in the orchestra; and the general effect—the voices of the boy trebles, the reverberation of the full parts, and the manner in which the trumpet passages seemed to dance about the roof of the cathedral,—were not soon forgotten by the congregation who contributed half crowns for the privilege of scrambling into the cathedral; or ensured easy access and seats by the payment of gold. But a sense of propriety began to dawn on the cathedral dignitaries (it is still only dawning)—and the "Dettingen" in St. Paul's has long been a thing of the past.

It would be difficult to imagine a greater contrast to such a "function" than the performance at the Palace on Wednesday. The choruses generally went well, but a large number of the singers were not so much at home in the music as in that of the "Messiah," and there was occasionally a little indecision and unsteadiness. The chorus "To Thee Cherubim" went exceedingly well: the "Day by day," but indifferently: the fugue particularly seemed to lag, and to want spirit. Mr. Santley sang "Thou art the King of Glory" well; and the "Vouchsafe, O Lord" better. But somehow the audience did not seem to warm to it, and the last chorus hardly elicited any applause. Perhaps the audience were thinking of the music to the same hymn in their churches.

The Organ Concerto followed, and afforded a great enjoyment to the dilettanti, though the audience seemed hardly to understand it—possibly again from thinking of their Sunday organist at church. Mr. Best's execution of the concerto was technically excellent: his mechanism perfect; but we think he might have done more to popularize it with a miscellaneous audience. But an organ concerto with such an orchestra requires much thought to produce the best effect; and possibly no two organists would agree as to their modus operandi. No one certainly is more competent to form an opinion than Mr. Best.

Mr. Sims Reeves's appearance was the signal for a universal burst of delighted applause. The audience were in doubt as to his appearance, and now they had really got him their enthusiasm knew no bounds. The first piece on the programme was the "Sorge infausta," capably given by Signor Agnesi. Mr. Reeves sang the "Deeper and deeper still," and the following air, as he only can sing it. The applause was tremendous. He had a similar ovation for "How vain is man," from Judas Maccabeus, and richly deserved it: we never heard him sing better. Mlle. Tietjens was hardly successful in "Farewell, ye limpid springs:" her rendering of the concluding part in the major was the best part of it. The choruses from "Joshua," "Ye sons of Israel," went very well. The "Verdi prati" was beautifully given by Mme. Trebelli-Bettini, but strange to say, produced no effect on the audience—a great reproach to their taste. Mr. Vernon Rigby almost rivalled Mr. Reeves in the applause he got for "Call forth thy powers;" and in "Nasce al bosco," Mr. Santley sang delightfully, and won some recognition, though the people did not seem to like Handel in Italian.

In the little Curfew song Mlle. Tietjens was very successful; and Mr. Cummings gave the charming air "Let me wander" with great feeling, and good contrast. "O had I Jubal's lyre," was merrily rendered by Mme. Sinico; and Mme. Trebelli gave the solo in the grand chorus from "Athaliah" with charming expression. An interval of rest followed before the selection from "Solomon."

This consisted of the overture and the following pieces:—Double Chorus, "Your harps and cymbals sound;" Air, "What though I trace;" Air, "With thee th' unshelter'd moor;" Chorus, "May no rash intruder;" Double Chorus, "From the censer;" Recitative, "Sweep, sweep the string;" Solo and Chorus, "Music, spread thy voice around;" Solo and Double Chorus, "Now a different measure try;" Recitative, "Then at once from rage remove;" Chorus, "Draw the tear from hopeless love;" Recitative, "Next the tortured soul release;" Air and Chorus, "Thus rolling surges rise;" Recitative, "Thrice happy king;" Air, "Golden columns;" Double Chorus, "Praise the Lord."

The solos were given by Mme. Sinico, Mme. Patey, and Mr. Cummings; these left nothing to be desired; and the same observation will apply to the band. The chorus were occasionally rather unsteady; but it is perhaps hypercritical to mention it. The only fault of the programme was in its length; and if some of the audience were weary, still more must this have been the case with the performers.

New York.—The Saengerfest.

[From the Weekly Review, July 1.]

The twelfth musical festival of the North-Eastern Saengerbund has been celebrated this week in New York in the usual manner. As we expected, it has been a failure, financially and artistically. All these festivals can only flourish in small cities, where people have but little excitement, and look upon the display of ribbons, emblems, transparencies, processions as the most momentous question of the day. It is not so here. The few thousand ribboned persons, the fuss and pretensions of those who are put in brief authority, pass unnoticed in the bustle of daily New York life. We could not help smiling, when one of the singers gave vent to his indignation, that anybody should have asked him "what was it all about?"—There is a serious side to this matter. These festivals are very expensive, chiefly on account of what may be called the social accessories. The question arises, whether the result is adequate to the outlay; whether it is really worth while to spend thousands of dollars, in order to gratify the appetite for social pleasure on a large scale. For after all, this is the essence of all these gatherings, the music is only the pretext.

We will not deny that some of the singers have the ambition to improve their musical abilities; but we ask any impartial observer of what was going on during this festival, whether such an ambition can be satisfied? The very social element in these gatherings, which seemed to be considered so necessary, must and does hinder the development of the musical resources of the societies. The festival of this week gave a perfect illustration. The singers were so soon worn out, that already the second day they were unfit to do their work, and that on the third day they broke completely down.—Under such circumstances art can derive little benefit from these festivals, which might just as well be dispensed with, especially as in their present form and arrangement they are only a pale reflex of the customs of the Middle Ages.

There were four concerts this week, the first taking place last Sunday night at the Academy of Music. Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" was the principal work of the evening. Owing to the fact that the sound was not thrown into the audience, but escaped through the side wings of the stage and up into the lofty regions of the carpenters and painters, and also that the singers sat quite in the background, about a hundred feet from the conductor, very little of the music could be heard. It seemed that everybody on the stage felt uncomfortable also, with the exception of fifty empty benches, which were placed behind the conductor. These benches had it all to themselves, and seemed to enjoy it hugely. Mr. A. Paar conducted, but he too seemed to be depressed, for he gave us but a very tame performance. The orchestra played without precision and fire. There was very little light and a good deal of shade, there was no climax. The very long instrumental introduction, beautiful as it is in many parts, became tedious; and when the last note of the whole work had died away there was a great relief in the audience.

The solo parts were sung by Mme. Lichtmay, Mme. Becker, and Mr. Wm. Candidus. Mme. Lichtmay forced her voice, and sang considerably out of tune, and Mme. Becker could scarcely be heard. Mr. Candidus sang in tune, pronounced distinctly, and gave on the whole satisfaction. He might, however, have improved his singing by a little more ease and fire.

Next to the "Lobgesang" came the rendering by Mr. L. Damrosch of the first part of Beethoven's violin concerto, which elicited genuine applause on the part of the very excited audience.—The best part of the programme, at least in reference to effective rendering was that of the "Triumphal Hymn" from Wagner's Rienzi, under the direction of Mr. Bergmann, the solo being sung in excellent style by Mr. Candidus. The performance was very spirited, and gave rise to an enthusiastic call for an encore. The concert was concluded by a very indifferent performance of Lindpaintner's "Fest overture."

On Monday afternoon at Steinway Hall the so-called prize singing took place. The competitors were from Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Buffalo, and Poughkeepsie. Three songs were sung by the various societies, so that listeners had the felicity of hearing each song at least six times. The compositions treated of the charms of the forest, of love and spring—a very nice subject, if dwelt upon in a poetical manner. To hear "I love thee" may be, under certain circumstances, very pretty, but to hear it eighteen times with very little variation, by a host of very robust men, becomes in the end exceedingly tedious. The songs have very little artistic merit. That by Herbeck (for the best rendering of which a Steck Grand was awarded) is very pretentious without cause. It has a few difficult modulations which will tax the singer, but not to such an extent as to upset him if he has any experience, yet most of the societies could not overcome them. The song "Waldeszauber" (second prize—Cycloid piano from Lindemann & Sons) has more depth of expression. It was well rendered by the Choral Society of Washington and the Quartett Club of Philadelphia. The song of the third prize (book and music stand): "Das macht das dunkelgrüne Laub" is in idea and expression very common, one of the thousands of quartets for male voices, with which the market abounds.

The decision of the judges was as follows: The first prize was given to the Baltimore Germania Maennerchor; the second to the Choral Society of Washington; and the third to the Buffalo Liedertafel. We congratulate the American Society upon its success. It was well deserved, although some opposition has been raised on account of the pronunciation of the singers, which, with conception, rhythm, and intonation, was made a point that actuated the decision of the judges. But candidly, on the whole, the Americans pronounced as well as the Germans did.

Three instrumental pieces for full orchestra varied in a most welcome manner the monotony of the proceedings. The conductor was Mr. Carl Bergmann, who did full justice to the task, especially in Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa."

In the evening the first so-called Monster Concert took place at the Rink. The place is only fit to be used for fairs, skating and trotting. The consequence was, that Beethoven's fifth symphony was lost in the vast dimensions, and begged in vain to be comforted. Not much better fared the Frithjof's Sage by Max Bruch. All the finer touches of the composition became lost, and the meaning of the production was hidden behind the banners and emblems, with which the building was decorated. Of the soloists—Mme. Lichtmay and Mr. Vierling gave satisfaction. The best impression was produced by the spirited rendering of the "Morgenlied" by Rietz, a very effective composition, which seemed to delight the audience.

The last concert, also at the Rink, was in reference to the singing a complete failure. The spirit of the festival told its tale, and it was a lamentable one. Little else were the performances of the orchestra, composed of the most heterogeneous elements, and little able to play such compositions as "Lea Preludes." Mr. Damrosch, the conductor, did all that he could under the circumstances, and achieved as much success as could be reasonably expected from him. In conclusion, let us say, that this Saengerfest was very suggestive. We wonder whether it will teach anything to those who take particular interest in these festivals.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 15, 1871.

The Festival Season.

Musical Festivals, at home and abroad, chiefly occupy our columns just now. And indeed there is a certain correspondence between the gala season of the earth, Midsummer, with long days and balmy nights, and the high noon of Music. Not that Music does her best work, proves her most sincere and deep devotion to her pure ideal, or confers her chiefest blessing, in these her great exceptional, sensational parades and pomps. In her quiet, daily, modest rounds of study and of practice, and of concert seasons, self-supported, in her several local centres—each steadfast to its true task, and not seduced by advertising arts of speculators into mere Jubilee excitement and vain show,—in this way mainly Music gains a holy empire over the hearts and tastes and manners of a people. At the same time it is natural that in the summer days there should be large gatherings or festivals, bringing together the fruits of the home study, showing what progress has been made, and quickening each member of each small society or chorus with the ringing palpable response of hundreds and of thousands in full sympathy. Only let it be borne in mind, that in our musical affairs we must not live entirely with a view to celebrating our musical Fourth of July. There is some danger of that in this country; our people are too easily tempted by "big things," forgetting that essential greatness takes no thought of outward magnitude. Our musical societies will work, and strain their voices night after night in arduous rehearsals to prepare for a festival, an exhibition, when they will not work for music as the great aim in itself.

The evil that results is two-fold: first, the use of so much artificial stimulus impairs the quality of the devotion, begetting shallow ambition rather than sincere love of art and joy in its unpretending, quiet service. Secondly, it monopolizes the hours, distracts and dissipates the spirit, and unsettles all the conditions for entering upon and following up persistently many a fine task for which there may be no room in a Festival, but which in itself, fairly accomplished, even if never exhibited, were worth a hundred festivals. For instance, our own Handel and Haydn Society have just achieved a great musical success, on a great scale, in their Triennial Festival. Is there no danger, in all the surfeit of praise and compliment with which such occasions are accompanied and followed, that the rank and file of chorus members, nay, even some of the leaders (it would not be strange), may flatter themselves: "Well, now our work is done, and gloriously, for a good while at least, and nothing serious remains for us until the drawing nigh of the next Festival, three years hence; meanwhile, resting on our laurels, leaving the "Passion Music" half learnt, careless of this and other such conspicuous gaps and blanks in our repertory, we will have an easy winter and a thrifty; we will enter into the service of speculating managers from abroad, who are to bring bright importations of star singers; we will do Messiah, and Creation, and Elijah, and such familiar things as both we and the said stars know by heart already; and so learn nothing new, but earn perhaps a little money to repair our losses by the Festival, and have a good time generally." And if this tempting plan brings praise and profit one year, will it not come round again more temptingly a second year? And if it be true, as has been whispered, that one of these foreign importer impresarios has actually boasted: "We are coming to take possession of the Oratorio business in America, seeing that there is such a broad field for it," will he have reckoned entirely without his host?

Welcome the foreign artists will be to us all, of course; and welcome the return of the triennial Festival, and of all festivals which spring from really artistic impulses. We only throw out these hints in the way of caution, and in serious forecast of the conditions of our future, we trust wholesome, progress in the practice and the love of music as a people. We feel that in each several locality, each city, town and village, this culture ought to take root independently and deeply first; that here in Boston, for instance, it is important that we form the habit of doing all, as much as possible, out of our own resources, in our own way; welcoming whatever of true art and its expositors Europe may send, but in our organic efforts, our Societies, employing them to carry out our programmes, instead of being employed by them, or rather by their "agents," always in hot haste to convert this musical development of a young nation into a field for their own private speculation. Have we not had warning in the way that Opera has been introduced and managed in this country, exhausting the soil by forced, untimely visitations, and running itself into the ground at last until no opera succeeds? Would we have Oratorio and Symphony music fall under the same sort of exploitation, till Art in all forms shall live merely upon sufferance of Business, giving us more than we want at one time, withholding all that we want through long, barren periods, demoralizing the general taste, upsetting all high standard, and trading on sensational, factitious, momentary excitement, in the utter torpor of a true love and interest for Art? Business versus Art might be the title of a very serious essay.—But we had no thought of writing that now; and we return to the design, from which we have unconsciously digressed, which simply was to notice some of the distinctive features of some of the musical festivals of the present season.

Our own Handel and Haydn Festival, which came the earliest, was distinguished by its great length (six days), by the remarkable weight and richness of its programme, and by the size of its chorus compared with any abroad if we except the Crystal Palace occasions. Artistically, as we have said, it was a great success; a great encouragement, if only the high ground won be jealously maintained, the victory improved. If we have dwelt upon possible dangers, such as lurk in every triumph, none the less do we concur entirely with the flattering estimate of it as a whole which we find so well expressed in the appreciative, temperate, yet glowing "Review" by Mr. F. C. Bowman, of New York, published in pamphlet form by the Society. If there was failure, to some extent, pecuniarily, it was due mainly to the accident of an exhausted period both in the interest and the means of very many music-lovers, coming, as it chanced, after an unusual plethora of music, and the French Fair particularly. But it was perhaps also due in part to the ambitious magnitude of the undertaking, to the costliness of an unnecessarily large orchestra, and to the fatiguing fulness of the week. Nine concerts of such solid matter in six days! It was in the afternoon orchestral and vocal concerts that the paying audience fell short; most of the Oratorios were crowded; it was simply that one great Oratorio in a day is music enough for an ordinary mortal to take in and digest. Yet, to be sure it would seem a poor economy to bring together such forces, and from such distances, at such expense, for only two or three days. The $6,000 spent in bringing from England Mme. Rudersdorff and Mr. Cummings we regard as one of the best investments; since the benefit to our own singers of the example and the influence of two such artists—such musicians, and not singers merely—was more than worth the outlay. When our own local musical centres shall have become unflinching springs of musical power in themselves, then it will be easy to concentrate upon a festival all the required elements, for shorter periods, and less crowded work, at a more moderate expense.

A model of an artistic, sensible, true Festival, was that of the Lower Rhine, held this year in Cologne in the same month of May, under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller, of which we copied a report in our last number. That lasted only three days, with only one concert in a day; i. e. in the evening, leaving the whole long morning open for rehearsal—the want of time and freshness for which in our Festival caused some of the performances of the extra large orchestra to show to disadvantage. The "public supper" with which the last evening was wound up was, doubtless, better suited to thoroughly musical, æsthetic, genial Germans, than it would be to our people. Then the programme: what could be more appropriate? For the first concert: a Festival Overture for the occasion by Reinecke; a poem (which we could spare); Bach's Cantata built upon "Ein feste Burg"; Gluck's Iphigenia Overture; a hymn for solos, chorus and orchestra, composed by Hiller himself in honor of the German victories; and finally the Ninth Symphony. Second Concert: Handel's Oratorio of Joshua—something for our Handel and Haydn to think of some day! Third Concert: Gade's first Symphony; air from Fidelio; Violin Concerto of Spohr, played by Joachim; Airs from Oberon and Euryanthe; Songs by Schubert, Schumann, &c.; Handel's Coronation Anthem, &c., &c. It is rarely that a festival in England contains so much that is appetizing, yet all choice.—The main characteristic to be observed here is, the absence of that uneasy ambition for doing things upon a very big scale, with an immense chorus (there were about 600 voices), and for crowding too much into a single week. It should be a lesson to our musical busy bodies. In the most musical country there is no taste for monster "Jubilees"; they have the real love of music which is content with gratifications less exceptional, more simply, easily procured, and far more wholesome. That is not a musical people which craves a chorus of 10,000. Simple, frequent, moderate (in quantity) supplies of what is excellent in quality: that is what the cultivated taste requires.

To-day we copy in extenso from London papers reports of the first two days of the great Triennial Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace. This festival has a specific character and object; it is to celebrate the worth of the music of Handel, and bring it home to the hearts of men by all the means of instruments and voices. Handel's Oratorios, if anything, would seem to justify a chorus of extraordinary numbers. Four thousand English voices, in the Crystal Palace, singing the Messiah before 22,000 people is certainly a sublime conception. Possibly the 4,000 were too many for the best effect even in such Crystal Coliseum; doubtless they were far more effective than the ten thousand of the "sacred shed" of summer before last. But this one was a real Festival, conceived and carried out in the true sense of Art; it developed itself naturally out of a sincere sentiment for noble music, and was not intended mainly to astonish by stunning and sensational effects. It was not mainly brought about by outside manoeuvres and appliances, by advertising agencies, and all the cunning ways by which a clever charlatan can manage to commit a public to a monster undertaking when there is no call for it. The object was a noble one, to illustrate the power and excellency of Handel's music. The programme was noble:—three great performances of Handel's noblest compositions, namely the two greatest Oratorios, Messiah and Israel in Egypt, and for the middle day selections from his various works. It was an Art festival in that true sense in which the great Peace Jubilee was not, in that it was free from clap trap, and that it used its mighty chorus in the service of an adequate interpretation of entire great works, instead of borrowing single pieces from an Oratorio for the vain glorious display of such an enormous vocal army as the ambitious thaumaturgic manager might raise. This Handel Festival had also rare convenience of space (the Crystal Palace), and of time, by the sensible arrangement of a day's interval between the concerts, good for rehearsal, good for recreation both of singers and of listeners. One thing worth noting in it is, the real popularity in England of so severe and uniformly grand a work as Israel in Egypt. Let us too not despair of that; another year will bring it, if our old Society will only follow up its (almost) victory.

There is no Birmingham festival this year; but in the next regular English festival upon the usual scale (chorus of 400 or so), the Festival of the Three Choirs, which takes its turn at Gloucester next September, it will be seen that Bach's Passion Music figures in the programme, as well as Handel's Messiah and Dettingen Te Deum, and two new Oratorios by English composers.

Looking back now nearer home we find one of the great German Sängerevents, which came off lately in New York, and of which we copy a thoughtful notice, which, we are sorry to be obliged to feel, seems to be only too just. We did hope more at one time from these genial, hearty, musical and social gatherings of our German fellow citizens; but it appears that the social and parade side of the matter—particularly the beer drinking side—has taken precedence of late over the musical, artistic side. At all events we know, that many music loving, serious, yet none the less genial and social Germans look upon it in that light, and that our Boston Orpheus Society have systematically of late declined participation in the heat and dust and glory of this kind of Vanity Fair.

HANDEL FESTIVAL. (LATER). The Orchestra, June 30, has just come to hand, bringing the following brief account of the third and last day:

The last day of the Festival was its crowning triumph. The "Israel in Egypt" was performed magnificently; the principal singers, the band, and the chorus exerting themselves to the utmost to produce a worthy rendering, and their efforts being well rewarded by the successful result. "Education" and "instruction" have of late years combined to popularize this most gigantic of all Handel's oratorios; but the wonderful effects produced by the forces under Sir Michael Costa, could not but impress the most indifferent listener, or the one most ignorant of the technical details with which the composer worked. Among the score of thousands present, there must have been many who had little appreciation of the contrapuntal skill, or of the powers of orchestral coloring which had been lavished on the work they were listening to; but they were none the less impressed by the grandeur and magnificence of the work; they were conscious of the thrill and cared not to analyze its mode of production, even if they could have done so.

The choruses which seemed to produce the greatest effect on the audience, of course after the "Hallelujah" and "Horse and his rider"—both gloriously rendered—were "But as for his people," "But the waters overwhelmed them," and, most of all, "The people shall hear." The execution of these—and indeed of all the choruses—admits only of the highest eulogy.

The principal singers acquitted themselves well. Mr. Kerr Gedge gave the tenor recitatives with distinctness and feeling, and Mme. Patey sang her two songs, "Their land brought forth frogs," and "Thou shalt bring them in," in excellent style. The lady was in good voice, and was greatly applauded.

Mme. Rudersdorff displayed her usual fire in "Thou didst blow," and sang the exciting duet "The Lord is my strength" with Mme. Sherrington: both ladies acquitted themselves well. It was accompanied by Mr. Coward with great taste and steadiness. In the trying solos of "The Lord shall reign" Mme. Sherrington's bright and clear voice rang out well, and seemed quite to fill the immense space. We have only to mention "The Lord is a man of war" by Messrs. Santley and Foli, and Mr. Sims Reeves's marvellous delivery of "The enemy said," which he has never sung better. This, more than anything else in the whole oratorio, evoked the enthusiasm of the audience—a fact, some would say, more creditable to the singer than to them.

At the end of the oratorio the "National Anthem" was played, and the Festival—the most successful in an artistic point of view that has ever taken place—was over.

Miscellaneous.

THE THREE CHOIR FESTIVALS.—The next festival of the three choirs of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester, takes place in the week commencing September 4th, at Gloucester. The principals have been engaged and the oratorios selected. The novelties are two in number—an oratorio by Macfarren, St. John the Baptist, and Gideon, by Mr. Cusins. The other oratorios are the Messiah (Handel), the Elijah (Mendelssohn), The Passion (Bach), Calvary (Spohr), and Handel's Te Deum, written in commemoration of the victory of Dettingen. The principals engaged are Mlle. Titiens, Mme. Cora de Wilhorst, Mme. Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Signor Foli. Dr. S. S. Wesley, organist of Gloucester Cathedral, conducts, and Mr. G. H. Brown occupies his old post of secretary to the stewards.

Music bore rather an anomalous part in the peace festivities at the Opera in Berlin. For instance:

After the Court had reappeared, the audience took their seats, and the curtain rose on "Barbarossa"—another pièce de circonstance, of which the less said the better. You know the Legend of Kaiser Redbeard, and how he is supposed to be not yet dead, but only sleeping, "till the bad world reach its worst, when he will reappear." Thus Carlyle. Well the tra-dion has been spoiled by the author, Herr Hein, who represents him in the cave at Salzburg, doomed to lie there until released by a new German Emperor. Meanwhile, he dreams dreams of Germany's history, which are depicted with extraordinary skill by way of tableaux vivants. The piece is literally on very long accompanied recitative monologue, broken only by occasional stanzas for chorus. The music is by Hoffer, composer of a wearisome opera called Frithjof—one of the young German musicians whom Wagner's pernicious example has taught to seek beauty in perpetual discord, symmetry in helpless disorder. Herr Niemann, who has worried his naturally superb tenor into utter intolerance of all control, looked princely enough in the Imperial garments of Barbarossa, and sang loudly enough to make his hearers hoarse; while pleasant voiced Fräulein Florina disguised herself as the dwarf who keeps the Redbeard au courant of outside events. The tableaux represent striking episodes of German story, from the Crusades of Barbarossa's time, through Frederick the Great, to the Slavic and Austrian campaigns, and the reunion of the Empire—symbolized by Germania held aloft on a shield, supported by a soldier of each State. Artistic taste was shown in depicting the distant events with all the realism of color and costume, and the recent deeds by symbolic statuesque groups. The tableaux caused some of the younger officers to break out into the applause which, of course, is not de rigueur on State occasions; but the example was not followed. When, however, an ineffective "Kaiser-Wilhelm Marsch" by Ingeborg von Bon-art had given place to the soul-stirring "Wacht am Rhein," and the curtain rose on an equestrian effigy of the Emperor, a shield marked "Paris" lying under his horse's hoof, enthusiasm could be restrained no longer. Every man turned round with one impulse, and "Hoch" was cried out three times with startling effect, the repetition being each time accented by helmets waved aloft. The Emperor bowed in reply; the Empress also gravely but graciously saluted the audience; and the brilliant household of many-colored warriors and statesmen leisurely strolled out into the crowded streets of their homely Berlin.

LONDON.—The seventh concert of the Philharmonic Society on Monday evening, although it came at the close of the first day of the Handel Festival, attracted a large audience to St. James's Hall; and even the members of the orchestra, who had done an afternoon's hard work, seemed scarcely to have been affected by their previous labors. The symphonies by Haydn and Beethoven were played in admirable style under Mr. Chasins' direction and the latter, especially the well known No. 4 in B flat, played first in the second part of the programme, was most enjoyable. The chief attraction of the evening, however, was the piano forte concerto of Sir W. S. Bennett in F minor, No. 4, played by Mme. Arabella Goddard, which in point of finish and genuine artistic intelligence could scarcely have been surpassed. It was eminently a performance of which Englishmen might feel proud, and the national composer and the national artist were alike honored by the loud applause at its conclusion. Herr Strauss played Viotti's somewhat mediocre concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor, with his usual skill and taste, but it failed to find much favour with the cognoscenti among the audience. The vocalists were Mlle. Titiens, Mlle. de Murka, and M. Capoul, Mlle. Marimon's appearance being postponed until the last concert of the season.—Choir.

FARMINGTON, CONN. The usual classical concerts of chamber music, at the close of the summer session of Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School, occurred June 29th and 30th, under the direction of the faithful Karl Klauer. The executants were Dr. Damrosch (the lately imported Conductor of the Arion in New York), Violin; S. B. Mills, Piano; F. Bergner, Violoncello. The programmes were, as always, choice:

53d Concert, Thursday, June 29, 1871.

Sonata, Piano and Violin, op. 47.....Beethoven.
Sonata, Piano, op. 22, G minor.....Schumann.
Prelude and Fugue, G minor, Violin Solo.....Bach.
Sonata, Piano and Cello.....Bouffé and Schuber.

54th Concert.

Sonata, No. 16, E flat, Piano and Violin.....Mozart.
Solos, Piano, a. Des Abends, op. 12.....Schumann.
b. Transewirren.
c. Ende vom Lied.
Romans, Violin.....Damrosch.
Sonata, Piano and Cello, op. 69.....Beethoven.
Solos, Piano, a. Rinde, No. 5, op. 25.....Chopin.
b. Waltz, No. 3, op. 64.....
c. Marche Militaire.....Tausig.
Solo, Violoncello.....Stradella.
Trio, op. 97.....Beethoven.

The Musical Congress.

[From the Daily Advertiser.]

[Concluded from page 55.]

Dr. Barnett then presented the following list of names for officers for the ensuing year, which was adopted:

President—John Stephenson, President of the United Choral Societies of New York.

Corresponding and Recording Secretary—Dr. Eben Tourjée of Boston.

Treasurer—W. E. Sheldon of Newton, Mass.

Vice-Presidents.—Wm. Mason, George W. Morgan, Chas. W. Harris, E. Wentworth, D. D., Otto Singer, J. H. Cornell, S. B. Mills, A. H. Meester, William Steinway, William A. Pond, H. C. Timor, John Zundel, S. P. Warren, L. B. Wyman, J. P. Browner, Theodore Hagen, Chester G. Allen, George W. Pettit, Dr. Charles W. Beams, William Hall, John C. Cook of New York; Oliver Ditson, George D. Russell, George H. Davis, Eugene Thayer, John D. C. Parker, Carlyle Petrusilla, Ernest Perabo, S. H. Southard, George E. Whiting, J. H. Wilcox, George J. Webb, Julius Mehberg, Hon. William Claflin, B. D. Allen, J. O'Neill, Amos Whiting, B. W. Husted, W. O. Perkins, L. O. Emerson, H. E. Holt, F. H. Underwood, J. B. Shariand, F. H. Torrington, J. F. West, L. Soule, Benjamin Walker, S. W. Stevens, John B. Thayer, L. B. Ellis, A. W. Whitcomb, Gardner Tufts, L. W. Mason, of Massachusetts; J. Pearce, M. H. Cross, of Pennsylvania; George P. Cole, of Maryland; W. S. B. Mathews, A. Baumbach, Dudley Buck, George F. Root, George A. Saunders, George B. Upton, of Illinois; C. H. McClellan, F. S. Davenport, E. F. Duren, H. Kotchmar, S. Thurston, William Rice, of Maine; E. T. Baldwin, John W. Moore, T. J. W. Pray, George W. Boody, John Jackman, John W. Odlin, of New Hampshire; S. T. Brooks, S. D. Winslow, of Vermont; G. J. Stoeckel, Marshall Jewell, Pily Jewell, Rev. Wm. L. Gage, J. G. Griswold, Henry Wilson, of Connecticut; Hon. Eliza Dyer, L. T. Downes, of Rhode Island; O. S. Gregory, Jr., William F. Sherwin, Lowell Mason, of New Jersey; John Church, Jr., of Ohio; Dr. Caulfield, District of Columbia.

Directors—John P. Morgan, Carl Bergmann, Geo. P. Bristow, Henry C. Watson, James Peal, Robert J. Johnson, of New York; Carl Zerrahn, John E. Paine, P. S. Gilmore, S. A. Emery, Luther L. Holden, of Boston; C. C. Converse, of Brooklyn; H. K. Oliver, of Salem; Henry Trask, Springfield; Charles Jarvis, Philadelphia; Hans Balatka, Chicago; J. G. Barnett, Hartford; Theodore T. Seward, Orange, N.Y.; P. A. Stackpole, Dover, N.H.; Francis A. Fisher, Rutland, Vt.

The following named gentlemen were appointed a committee on the formation of musical institutes:

T. F. Seward, W. O. Perkins, W. S. B. Mathews, L. H. Southard, L. O. Emerson, E. F. Dunn, E. F. Davenport, C. G. Allen, George B. Loomis.

The meeting then adjourned.

FINAL BUSINESS SESSION.

At the conclusion of the afternoon congress a final business session was held. It was devoted chiefly to the passage of resolutions.

Mr. Southard, who has presided in the absence of the president, made a short address. Mr. T. F. Seward of New Jersey, on behalf of the general committee on resolutions, reported the following:—

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That we, the members of the national musical congress, are highly gratified with the results of this, its third annual convention, and feel that decided progress has been made in advancing the results which it aims to accomplish. These results are as follows: 1st, the formation of musical societies throughout the country and the encouragement of those already established; 2d, the presentation of the best and purest music, by which the standard of taste in those societies and among the people may be continually elevated; 3d, the introduction of music in all the public schools of the land; and 4th, the renewal of a popular interest in elementary instruction in those sections of the country where it is neglected, and, as far as practicable, the supplying of teachers for carrying on the work.

Resolved, That the thanks of the congress be presented to the gentlemen who have prepared papers on various subjects, the reading of which has contributed so much to the pleasure and profit of this convention. The committee also recommended that those papers should, if possible, be published, and thus placed among the permanent records of the society.

Resolved, That the thanks of the congress be presented to the artists who have so kindly lent their aid, and who have added so much to the interest of the various sessions. Among these it is desired to include the organists and conductors.

Resolved, That the thanks of the congress be presented to the various choral societies that have taken part in the concerts, with congratulations upon the success of their performance.

* Mr. Perabo and Mr. Eichberg have since publicly protested against this unauthorized use of their names.

ances, which cannot be regarded as otherwise than remarkable when it is considered that the singers were brought together from different communities and were not familiar with each other nor in many cases with the conductors. Their admirable singing cannot but have the effect of stimulating other similar organizations to renewed exertions, and also, it may be, lead to the formation of like societies in cities and towns where none now exist.

Resolved, That the kindness of the board of education and the teachers of music, in affording an opportunity for members of the congress to witness the methods of teaching in the public schools, is well appreciated. It will be our aim to show that appreciation by endeavoring to establish musical instruction, if no such system already exists, in our schools at home.

Resolved, That the congress heartily indorses and will endeavor to carry out the spirit of the remarks made by Mr. Underwood at the Everett school, concerning the dignity of the music teacher's vocation. It will be one of the aims of the congress to correct public opinion upon this point, and to lead the world to see, what is undoubtedly true, that the work of the teacher of music, having to do as it has with the immortal part of man's nature and developing powers which will be employed throughout eternity in rendering praise to the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace, is only second in dignity and importance to that of the minister of the gospel.

Resolved, That the thanks of the congress are due to the acting president of this convention, Dr. L. H. Southard, for the able and courteous manner in which he has performed his duties, and to the secretary, Dr. E. Tourjée, for the energy and tact which he has displayed in the preparations for this convention.

These resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Dr. J. G. Barnett, of Hartford, offered a series of resolutions, that the congress invite writers of music who are now unknown to the public to send in their compositions to the directors for publication, such compositions when published to become the property of the congress. The resolutions provided for the appointment of a committee of six persons to supervise the vocal music and a committee of three on instrumental music. They were adopted.

Mr. P. S. Gilmore, being in the hall, was called upon for a speech, and somewhat reluctantly consented to make what was the best speech of the afternoon. He referred to his proposed international peace jubilee, and announced that he should lay the plan before the public in about two weeks.

The following resolutions were offered by Mr. Seward and adopted:

Resolved, That this organization learns with high gratification, that Mr. P. S. Gilmore has in contemplation an international peace jubilee to take place in 1873; and recognizing the great benefit which the inauguration and successful carrying out of the peace jubilee of 1869 has conferred upon musical art, and believing that his plan as now propounded will tend greatly to broaden the area of musical culture, touching a chord which will vibrate not only throughout our own communities, but will serve to bind in closer fraternal relations the nations of the world, we heartily commend it to the acceptance of the American people, and to the sympathy and co-operation of the friends of music everywhere.

A committee of six were appointed to arrange for the next annual convention, as follows: W. E. Sheldon, of Newton, Dr. Eben Tourjée, Geo. B. Ellis of New Bedford, T. F. Seward of Orange, N. J., R. J. Johnson of New York, L. L. Holden of the Boston Journal, and Chas. H. McClellan of Bath, Me.

The convention then adjourned sine die.

THE FINAL CONCERTS.

In the afternoon a miscellaneous concert of a very interesting character was given, in which a number of fine orchestral selections were presented, and solos were performed by Mr. Radolphsen, Mr. C. N. Allen, Mr. Perabo and others. Mrs. West and Mrs. Sawyer were announced upon the programme in the "Quis est homo" from Rossini's "Stabat Mater," but Mrs. West was unable to be present, and in place of the duet Miss Fisher sang Bassini's "Ave Maria." The programme as a whole was enjoyable, and the performances were of a high order of merit.

In the evening, "The Creation" was given in the hearing of an immense audience, whose numbers quite exceeded the seating capacity of the hall. The solos were sustained by Mrs. West, Mr. Whitney and Mr. Wm. J. Winch, all of whom acquitted themselves in a manner worthy of their high reputations. Mrs. West was in particularly good voice and sang to the great acceptance of the listeners. The chorus appeared with very full ranks and did its work on the whole well,—surprisingly well, perhaps, in view of its heterogeneous character and slender preliminary preparation. The audience throughout the evening were most earnest, attentive and enthusiastic.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal with Piano Accompaniment.

- The Violet. "Select Trios for Female Voices." 3.
A to g. Curshman. 40
The set mentioned contains more than 20 select trios, and should be adopted in "every seminary."
The Violet has a simple fugue-like, or round-like progression, and is varied without being difficult.
Come let us all be merry. Song and Chorus. 2.
F to f. F. J. Lippitt. 30
A "Jolly boy's" song.
Mollie Adair. (Lithograph title). Song and Chorus. 3. G to g. W. F. Wallman. 40
"I dream of my darling, wherever I go,
She's fair as the lily, and pure as the snow."
One of Emma Ludlow's songs, and must be a success.
Te Deum in F. 4. F to g. J. R. Thomas. 1.00
Very musical throughout. A worthy Te Deum.
Why is my heart so sad. Song and Chorus. 3.
D to g. H. Percy. 30
Sung with success by a minstrel troupe.
Yes or No! 3. Eb to f. M. W. Hackleton. 30
"Violet, violet, blossoming low
Deep in the greenest of meadows that grow;
Whisper it softly, and whisper it low,
Say is he coming? Yes, or No?"
A bewitching little song, delicate and melodious.
I'd be a laughing Child. 3. Ab to a. J. S. Knight. 30
A bright reminiscence of childhood.
Jubilate in F. 4. F to f. J. R. Thomas. 50
Choirs will be pleased with the new piece, which includes a pretty duet, and is neither long nor difficult.
When will Papa come? Song and Chorus. 3.
C to e. H. Percy. 30
Simple, and will please the little ones.
Jesus, Saviour of my Soul. Quartette. 4. Ab to f. R. Berry. 30
The old, sweet hymn set to beautiful new music.
Smooth and flowing in style.

Instrumental.

- Utah Galop. 2. F. T. H. Daly. 30
Spirited dance, commended to Mormon households, and to all others who like the "galop."
Golden Echoes. E. Mack. 30
A Set of 25 pieces, containing among others
Dublin Bay. Barcarolle. 2. G.
When the corn is waving, Annie dear. 2. A.
Both pretty, and the last a very pleasing transcription.
Three Sonatas by Pleyel. For 4 hands. Pleyel.
No. 1. 4. Bb. 90
" 2. 4. D. 75
These beautiful Sonatas are as good as ever, and that is very good. Without the deep expression of modern pieces, they are smooth, sweet, elegant, and excellent for learners.
Five Petits Morceaux. Very easy. J. Rummel.
No. 2. March. 2. C.
Good for one of the "first pieces."
No. 3. Romance. 2. G.
Good, graceful practice.
No. 4. Valse. 2. F. 25
Does not appear so easy as it is, but is pretty, and fits easily to the fingers.
Norma. Fantasia Brillante. 5. Sidney Smith. 80
Norma, to be sure, but Sidney Smith's brilliant arrangement of it, and does not sound in the least old or worn. Brilliant.
Dexter Galop. 3. G. Hermann Eberling. 40
Quite full and powerful for a galop, but retains enough tripping elegance to render the name appropriate.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 791.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 9.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Telegrams.

While the proud sun, with slowly-dialled hours,
Leads on the weary day, followed by weary night,
Triumphant lightnings flash across Time's course,
And all the nations in one day unite.

In vain roars ocean with tumultuous waves :
Beneath its tempests speeds a silent voice,
With words to hush a million hearts in grief,
Or bid the millions in one hope rejoice.

While conquering armies sweep across the plain
Pursuing in hot haste the scattering foe,
O wounded men, dying with no friend near,
Know that some far-off stranger mourns your woe.

To thee, sad dweller in a foreign clime,
Striving with memories to cheer thy heart,
Swift as thy longings a fond message comes
Straight from thy home, to say how loved thou art.

E'en while he speaks the statesman's words are borne
To distant lands ; far from the listening throng
Great sympathies are roused and bright eyes glow,
As he with eloquence condemns the wrong.

While answering pulses circle round the earth,
How lonely do we wander day by day !
Is there no fire of thought, subtler than words,
That can from soul to soul its currents play ?

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Hans Guido von Bülow.

HIS LIFE AND WORKS.

It is a fact worthy of notice that the fame of pianists who are not also composers, seldom extends beyond their own country. Photography reproduces imperfectly for us the works of architects, sculptors and painters. Printing reproduces perfectly the works of authors and composers ; but the real presence of a pianist, as of a tragedian, is a necessity for his full or even partial appreciation. The inability to travel to all parts of the world is therefore the first great cause of the limited fame of pianists ; and the second cause is that they are after all only translators of other men's compositions, or readers aloud, and must inevitably enjoy only the fame of being good interpreters, and not that of invention or original production. But when the performer becomes also composer, he avails himself of the already mentioned advantages of the composer, and becomes famous more readily. Thus it happens that there are but two pianists living who have a world-wide reputation as musicians, Liszt and Thalberg.* Rubinstein has a European reputation which bids fair to become world-wide. Yet all Englishmen are proud of Halle. The North Germans boast of Taubert. Parisians praise Planté. Italians recognize a great artist in Petrelli, and the South Germans are justly proud of Bülow, who is equal perhaps to any of the above-mentioned as a pianist, and superior as director of an orchestra. The principal facts in his life are as follows : He was born in Dresden, Saxony, January 8th, 1830, and did not display any peculiar talent for music until his ninth year, when he was dangerously ill with brain-fever, and immediately after his recovery he showed a wonderful power of reading music at sight. He studied under Wieck and Litolf, and later under Eberwein and Hauptmann. In 1846 he went to the Lyceum at Stuttgart ; in 1848 to the Leipzig University ; and in 1850 to Berlin, with the intention of studying law. Later in 1850 Bülow went to Weimar and witnessed the first representation of Wagner's "Lohengrin" given under Liszt's direction. For the next few years Bülow was the protégé of Liszt and Wagner, the latter giving him very often pecuniary support, which his parents were unwilling to do on account of their dislike to his newly chosen profession, to which they became reconciled after a few years. He made several musical tours in Europe, and was enthusiastically received. He became in 1854 head professor of the Piano department in the Berlin Conservatorium. In 1857 he was naturalized as a Prussian citizen, and in the same year he married Liszt's youngest daughter, Cosima, the child of the Countess d'Agout. In the following year he was appointed court-pianist at Berlin. In 1864 he created a great sensation in Russia both as an orchestra director and as pianist. In the same year Bülow went to Munich, and was appointed pianist to the King of Bavaria. In 1866 Bülow followed Wagner to Lucerne, but returned in 1867 to take the position of Court chapel-master, director of the opera, in which position he gained fresh laurels in bringing out Wagner's "Meistersinger," and many other operas. In 1869 Mme. von Bülow concluded that she would like to change husbands ; so she left Munich and went to live with Richard Wagner at Lucerne. Soon after a divorce was pronounced by the Bavarian Courts, and Von Bülow came to Florence, where he has been ever since and now is. Besides the honors already mentioned he has been decorated Knight of the Order of St. Michael (Bavarian), Member of the Prussian Order of the Crown, Member of the Order of the House of Hohenzollern, Receiver of the Mecklenburg Gold Medal, Doctor of the Faculty of the Jena University, Corresponding Member of the Dutch Musical Society, etc., etc., etc.

* This was written a few months before Thalberg's death.

As a man of society Von Bülow is genial and pleasant, often striving to be witty, and succeeding occasionally. He has much affected modesty, and is seldom capricious about performing in private. His personal appearance is not peculiarly prepossessing. He is below the average height and of rather a slight figure. His head is proportionately large, and his face an egg-shaped oval, being immensely broad behind the eyes, and sloping inward toward the forehead and chin. His features are regular and his eyes, which are rather small, but prominent, have a most laughing expression. He is slightly bald and wears a moustache and goatee. His movements are all quick and nervous.

As a critic and teacher Von Bülow has been very successful. In 1849 he wrote frequently for the Berlin "Abendpost," and later for the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," and his musical criticisms are considered in Germany as thoroughly sound and reliable. He gives lessons at high prices to students who have already made considerable progress, and who exhibit a real talent for music. He is very severe and brings his scholars forward rapidly and thoroughly. He scolds his young lady pupils usually to the crying point, by telling them that they play miserably, and don't learn and don't practise ; but they do learn wonderfully under his tuition, notwithstanding the loss of tears and the exhaustion which such a drain produces.

As a composer Von Bülow has not published very many works. They number only between twenty and thirty. The most celebrated of them are the "Overture and Music to Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar," "The Singer's Curse" for orchestra ; "Nirwana ;" numerous piano pieces ; songs for single voices and for chorus ; besides two concert duos for piano and violin. He is however better known for his arrangements and transcriptions, among which we should mention the piano arrangement of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde," Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and many other productions of Wagner, Liszt, Handel, Bach and Berlioz.

As Director of an orchestra Bülow is without a superior. He has a knack of inspiring his musicians with ambition, and a wonderful talent in discovering just where the weak parts are, besides a deep and thorough knowledge of the music even to the most insignificant note of the least important instrument. Sometimes when leading he seems possessed with some musical sprite or genius, and utterly to forget the audience. The superb rendering of Wagner's operas at Munich, during the past few years, is alone sufficient proof of his ability as director, and many others are not wanting.

As a Pianist, however, Von Bülow is best known, and shares the honors of Europe with Rubinstein and Taubert. He is very fond of devoting an entire evening to the works of a single composer only, thus making a study of his style. In this way we have often heard him play for two hours only the works of the profound Beethoven ; another evening only the music of the less thoughtful, more melodious and pastoral Schubert ; again that of the eccentric Schumann, of the poetic Mendelssohn, of the melancholy Chopin, of the labyrinthine Bach ; another time, the finger gymnastics of Liszt. We have heard him, in short, play every style of composition except the trivial, and except his own ; and in passing we may say that this habit of not playing his own productions is as pleasant as it is rare in an artist. We have had therefore full opportunity of appreciating Bülow. And first of all it must be said that he is not a very uniform player. His nervous nature is often excited to put forth every effort and to perform with his whole soul, and sometimes he relaxes almost into mediocrity. He is not universally but usually brilliant. His memory is really wonderful. In the numerous times that we have heard him he has never used notes, and not only does he play for hours at a time the most difficult compositions of Bach and Beethoven without notes, but sustains his piano part in trios and quartets, and sometimes even directs an orchestra with no music to aid his memory. Several times however we have heard him vary from the written music, either intentionally or otherwise, in which cases he repeated a phrase until he remembered the exact harmonies, or improvised a few chords, and continued farther on. Of course this was done so cleverly and smoothly that no one would notice the variation unless he were very familiar with the music. Von Bülow's executive ability is beyond praise. It is often said that he is not equal to Tausig in very difficult octave passages. It is also said that in comparison with Rubinstein he lacks delicacy in piano passages; that Bülow can render a piano passage entirely piano, but that Rubinstein can put crescendo and decrescendo into the same passage; that Bülow renders smoothly piano, but without light and shade. We think this is hypercriticism or partiality. Bülow is thoroughly dignified and grand in the maestoso style of music, but also tender and romantic when sentiment is to be expressed. His most individual peculiarity is an apparently absolute identification of himself with the composer. The man seems to be lost in the composer. The music seems spontaneous. There is never a moment of doubt or hesitation. There is never a passage that seems unintelligible to the pianist himself. The whole production seems to be a poetical musical effusion straight from the man's own soul.

Von Bülow is versatile, and still the rendering of Beethoven is his forte. He can play Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words" admirably. He can play Beethoven's Sinfonies and Sonatas superbly. His superiority as a performer of Beethoven's works comes especially from his unusually deep insight into the argumentative or reasoning part of the music. We of course acknowledge that Beethoven's music comprehends more different styles than that of any other composer. He is poetic, pastoral, gay, and sad, but always deeply thoughtful. Even so Von Bülow is versatile, but always works out and expresses the idea first and foremost.

Even the jealous Italians, who are ever ready to disparage the talent and ability of foreign artists, all acknowledge Von Bülow as a "chief amongst ten thousand," and, in the absence of aught else, fall back upon his affectation so as to find something to blame. In this respect he has certainly reached a height quite equal to his musical reputation. It is amusing to watch the careless manner with which he looks at the programme to see what pieces he is to play; the production of two handkerchiefs to dry his hands; his habit of looking patronizingly around at the audience while playing some very difficult passage; and another habit of putting his face close down to the key-board at all very piano passages, as if to smell out the melody. We were also much amused one evening at the end of a duo. Von Bülow and the first violinist had just performed the Rondo, op. 70, of Schubert, in which the piano has an equal share of the work. The audience applauded loudly, whereupon the humble pianist bowed toward the violinist and commenced clapping also. This looked very much like affectation, but we do not dare to call it such lest we should incur the severe displeasure of a small circle of ladies who have apparently set aside the first commandment, or at least inserted the initials G. H. von B. in the middle of it.

Florence, Jan. 27, 1870.

More Letters by Mendelssohn.

(Concluded from page 58.)

Düsseldorf, 17th July, 1835.

I should have thanked you long ago for your kind note, and feel honored and pleased with the poem which you sent me; but I have been hindered from writing by much unexpected sorrow. You know that my parents accompanied me here from Cologne, and we were living together so happily, making excursions in the neighborhood. Everything seemed to promise an enjoyable summer; when my mother was taken dangerously ill, partly from the upsetting of the carriage in one of our country drives, and partly from exertions to which she is not accustomed. At first we feared the worst, but now, thank God, she is better, and indeed so far recovered, that we begin to look forward to leaving this place. Of course we shall take the most direct road to Berlin, and travel by easy stages; and I shall go with them, so as to make sure of their safe arrival, and look after them carefully on the journey. You may imagine what an anxious time I have had, and I am sure you will excuse me for not having been able to thank you for your note and the poem until this very day. I shall hope soon to repeat all this by word of mouth, for Herr Dörrien tells me that I must be in Leipzig at least four weeks before the first concert; so you will see me about the end of next month.

Of course I have written no music lately, beyond doing a little here and there to my Oratorio, and these lines will show you that letter writing suits me no better: still less as I look forward to seeing you soon, and saying everything so much better than I can write it. Till then, therefore, farewell. Best regards and many thanks to you both for all your kindness at the Festival. Should you have anything to communicate to me before I get to Leipzig, please to direct to Herr A. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Berlin. Hoping to see you again in a fortnight,

Yours truly,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

How kind and thoughtful of you to surprise us* again this morning, with your beautiful basket of apples; their fragrance fills the whole room. A thousand thanks to you and your husband for so kindly thinking of us and remembering how fond we are of such delicious fruit. I envy Mr. Voigt when I look at them; when can Donizetti or Pacini send their friends such dainty things? Nothing but songs—often tasteless enough, and with maggots inside—instead of nice fragrant apples. Again a thousand thanks from myself and my wife; to-day or to-morrow I shall hope to repeat them verbally.

Yours ever truly,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

Leipzig, 8th November, 1838.

Horchheim, near Coblenz, 6th Aug. 1839.

I heard this morning from a friend in Leipzig that you were so unwell as to be obliged to go to a watering-place, so I hardly know where this letter will find you; but I cannot forbear writing to say how much the unexpected news of your illness has pained me, and how heartily I hope that you will soon be well again. A few days ago I was at Ems, and when I saw the visitors pacing up and down, I thought how tedious it must be to anybody with an active mind to have to stay there. Yet people are satisfied if they can thus purchase health, and I feel sure that, disagreeable as your present residence must be, if it brings you health and strength you will not regret its tedium. Are you able to play the piano at all? If not, I know what a deprivation that must be. Yet, during a "cure," it may be wiser to forego the pleasure for a time, as it might be injurious to get too much engrossed about anything. I suppose this is why there are so many parties and conversazioni at watering-places, because such talking requires so little thought and feeling; the weather plays the great part.

Apologies to which, do you ever remember a more uninterruptedly beautiful summer? I hope you can enjoy these lovely days and evenings in the open air. We made excursions for two months, walking and driving in the lovely country round Frankfort, and now again here on the Rhine. The woods near Frankfort and the hills here could tell many a tale about us. It is time now to think of leaving, and we intend to make only a short stay at Bingen and Frankfort, and be back in Leipzig in about a fortnight. I have undertaken to conduct a Festival at Brunswick in the beginning of September; but with all the pleasure and honor of the thing I am sorry for it, as it obliges me to shorten my visit here. To leave the Rhine in the beautiful summer months and go northwards is never to my taste (in every sense of the word, because the fruit and grapes are so good). I believe that Providence has created the musicians of this country as an antidote to its attractions—they certainly do not enhance them. I feel quite at home and happy when I meet some of our North German musicians, and am no longer worried with jealousies and bickerings, and backbitings and antediluvian gossip.

* He had been married in the interval between this letter and the one before it in April, 1837.

† The apples were the gift of a friend from Italy.

A thoroughly honest musician—like Klengel for instance—is not to be found in any orchestra here, and when autumn comes I begin to long terribly for Leipzig music. I hope David will stay there. I have heard a good deal lately about his settling in England, and some of my English friends wrote to me, expecting me to share their wishes about keeping him there; but I am far from being so unselfish, and shall, on the contrary, do all I can to make him stay with us.

I have lately been writing all sorts of new things, which I hope soon to play to you—a trio for piano, violin, and cello—a book of four part songs for the open air—a Psalm—some Fugues, et cetera animata. I meant to do much more during the summer, but the walks, and the baths, and the dolce far niente, do not forward one's work!

Now, I have chatted long enough, perhaps too long for you; but these few lines may amuse you when you are tired, so let them go. May they find you convalescent and happy. With kind regards to your dear husband and little Ottilie, I am ever,

Yours truly,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

The last letter of this set cannot be given here entire. It is dated "Leipzig, 19th October, 1846," and consists—evidently in allusion to a similar gift to that which called forth No. 6—of a pen and ink sketch of a basket of apples and grapes, followed by a quotation (easy to recognize, though it is not quite literal) from one of the pieces in Schumann's "Album für die Jugend." The words are Mendelssohn's own:

O Dank! Ihr habt uns sties er - quickt!
(Florestan.)

Such is the constant cry of the whole family of

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

[Macmillan's Contributor is mistaken about the above quotation. The notes are not by Schumann, and the words are not by Mendelssohn; the passage occurs, word for word and note for note, in the prison Aria of Florestan in Fidelio.—Ed.]

† The D minor Trio, No. 1.

‡ Psalm cxlv, "When Israel out of Egypt came."

The Salem Oratorio Society.

[From the Salem Register, July 13.]

The annual meeting of this Society was held at Lyceum Hall on Monday evening last, the attendance being large. D. B. Hagar, Esq. was chairman, and Capt. Geo. M. Whipple Secretary. The Treasurer, Mr. Bigelow, presented his report, showing a favorable balance on the right side of the sheet, and that the last season has been eminently a success, financially. The Chairman read the report of the Executive Committee, an ably written document, giving a recapitulation of the progress of the society since its formation, notices of its public performances, percentage of attendance of members at rehearsals, &c., &c., with some valuable hints as to the future of the Society, as follows:—

MR. HAGAR'S REPORT TO THE ORATORIO SOCIETY.

The Salem Oratorio Society was organized under the lead and through the strenuous efforts of Mr. Francis H. Lee. At his request a goodly number of gentlemen, interested in musical culture, met in the Chapel of Barton Square Church, on Tuesday evening, Nov. 17, 1868, to consider the expediency of forming a society for the study of the higher styles of music. The meeting was called to order by Mr. Geo. M. Whipple and was organized by the choice of Mr. D. B. Hagar as Chairman and Mr. S. P. Driver as Secretary. After an interesting discussion relating to the character of the proposed society it was resolved to place its business affairs in the hands of an Executive Committee, and to give to Mr. Carl Zerrahn entire control of its musical affairs. An Executive Committee were unanimously elected, consisting of Messrs. F. H. Lee, Geo. M. Whipple, Benj. Whitmore, Geo. A. Fuller, and E. H. Randall.

The fee of membership for gentlemen was fixed at $5. Ladies were to be admitted free.

The first rehearsal of the Society—then called simply a "Class"—was held in Barton Square Chapel, on Wednesday evening, Dec. 2; and so great was the interest in this new musical enterprise that more than two hundred persons appeared as members.

The Study of Haydn's Oratorio of the Creation was then commenced with promising success.

The number of persons desiring to join the Society became immediately too large to be accommodated in the Chapel; the rehearsals were therefore transferred to Crombie St. Church. In order to reduce the number of members, and to secure a better balance of parts, the ladies were required to have their voices tried individually, and only those who were found well qualified were admitted to membership. The number of members having thus been considerably reduced, the rehearsals were restored to the Chapel, where they were continued for a considerable period, and until the gradual increase of membership led to the use of Lyceum Hall.

The first public performance of the Society was given at Mechanic Hall, on Thursday evening, Feb. 11, 1869. Some two hundred voices rendered Haydn's Creation with the most encouraging success. The soloists of the occasion were Miss J. E. Houston, Soprano; Mr. James Whitney, Tenor; and Mr. F. J. Rudolphsen, Bass.

By general request the Oratorio was repeated on Wednesday evening, March 17.

The third Concert of the Society was given on Friday evening, April 23, and included Rossini's "Stabat Mater;" selection from Mendelssohn's St. Paul, Hymn of Praise, and Elijah; and the Hallelujah Chorus, from Handel's Messiah.

The fourth and last performance for the season, given June 7, was a public rehearsal of the music assigned to be sung at the great "Peace Jubilee" which commenced in Boston, June 15. The members of the Salem Oratorio Society who participated in that world renowned festival can never forget the intense and delighted emotions with which they mingled their voices with ten thousand others in producing some of the grandest music the world has ever heard.

The Annual meeting of the Society for the transaction of business was held July 1, 1869. The fee for new members (gentlemen) was fixed at $5; the yearly assessment for gentlemen already members was placed at $2. An Executive Committee was chosen consisting of Messrs. D. B. Hagar, F. H. Lee, G. M. Whipple, E. H. Randall, Benjamin Whitmore, and G. A. Fuller.

The rehearsals of the second season commenced at Lyceum Hall, on Thursday evening, Oct. 7, 1869, when the Oratorio of the Messiah was taken up for study. The Oratorio was publicly performed by the Society on Wednesday evening, Jan. 12, 1870. The Soloists were Mrs. J. W. Weston, of Salem, Soprano; Mrs. Chas. A. Barry, of Boston, Contralto; Dr. S. W. Langmaid, of Boston, Tenor; and Mr. Wm. H. Beckett, of New York, Bass.

On Wednesday evening, Feb. 16, Haydn's "Creation" was reproduced by the Society, assisted by Miss Houston, Soprano; Mr. W. J. Winch, Tenor; and Mr. M. W. Whitney, Bass.

On Wednesday evening, May 18, the Society sang Mendelssohn's "Elijah" with a success which drew the highest praise from the most competent musical critics. The solos were given by Miss J. E. Houston, Mrs. D. C. Hall, Dr. S. W. Langmaid, and Mr. M. W. Whitney. The instrumental music was performed by thirty members of the Germania orchestra.

With the performance of "Elijah" the Society's work for the season was brought to a close.

At the annual meeting held July 26, 1870, the Executive Committee of the past year were re-elected. It was voted to make the annual assessment $4 for gentlemen and $2 for ladies.

The Society resumed its work on Thursday evening, Sept. 29, with a large increase in its numbers. On Monday evening, Dec. 26, 1870, the Society, numbering nearly 400 voices, performed the "Messiah," with the assistance of Mrs. J. Houston West, Mrs. Charles A. Barry, Mr. F. C. Packard and Mr. M. W. Whitney.

On Thursday evening, March 2, 1871, Mendelssohn's Oratorio of "St. Paul" was rendered by the Society, aided by Mrs. J. Houston West, Mrs. Charles A. Barry, Mr. W. J. Winch, and Mr. J. R. Winch. The public interest in this Oratorio was so great as to bring together one of the largest audiences ever assembled in Salem at a public concert.

The next and last performance of the Society took place on Thursday evening, May 4, when the Oratorio of Elijah was rendered with excellent success. The Soloists employed were Mrs. H. M. Smith, of Boston, Soprano; Mrs. H. E. Sawyer, of Boston, Contralto; Dr. S. W. Langmaid, Tenor; and Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, Bass.

It appears from this brief statement of the doings of our Society, that it has given ten public evening performances, besides ten public afternoon rehearsals. It has sung the "Creation" three times; the "Messiah" twice; "Elijah" twice; "St. Paul" once; "Stabat Mater" once; and miscellaneous selections, some once, some twice. That this is a large amount of work for a Society to accomplish in the first three years of its existence, will, we think, be generally conceded. Of the quality of the work done, critics from abroad have spoken in terms more laudatory than we should feel at liberty to use.

At the beginning of the musical year just closed, it was feared by some that the increase of the annual assessment for gentlemen members from $2 to $4, and the levying of an assessment of $2 upon the lady members, who had hitherto been free from pecuniary charge, would seriously diminish the number of members. The result showed, on the contrary, an increase in the number of sopranos from 131 to 168; of altos, from 77 to 92; of tenors, from 51 to 61; and of basses, from 64 to 81; making in all an increase from 323 to 402, the number whose names are recorded in the book of members for the year just ended. A few new members neglected to record their names.

It may be interesting to know how large a part of the 402 members reside in Salem, and how many in neighboring towns. The following table gives exactly the statistics on this point:

Residence.	No. Mem.	Sop's.	Alt's.	Ten's.	Bas's.
Salem,	287	128	65	40	54
Beverly,	43	18	10	8	7
Peabody,	21	6	4	7	4
Danvers,	20	6	1	3	10
Marblehead,	18	6	6	2	4
Boston,	3	1	1		1
Ipswich,	3		2		1
Manchester,	2	1	1	1
Malden,	2		1
Worcester,	1	1
Milton,	1	1
Gloucester,	1		1
	402	168	92	61	81

It hence appears that about 74 1-2 per cent. of the members reside in Salem, 10 1-2 per cent. in Beverly and about 5 per cent. each in Peabody, Danvers, and Marblehead.

There were present every rehearsal during the year 2 sopranos, 2 altos, 2 basses, and 3 tenors; at every rehearsal but one, 6 sopranos, 11 altos, 4 tenors and 8 basses. The largest number present at any rehearsal was 308; the smallest 163. The average attendance of all the members was 64 per cent. of the whole number; of the sopranos, 62 percent. of their number; of the basses, 65 1-2 per cent.; of the tenors, 66 per cent.; and of the altos, 68 1-2 per cent.

The pecuniary prosperity of the Society for the past year has been all that could be desired. The receipts from members' assessments have been sufficient to defray the heavy current expenses; to pay for the construction of new seats in Mechanic Hall, and their subsequent increase; to add $35.18 to the piano fund; to procure beautiful English editions of music books at less than half the usual retail cost, and still to leave in the treasury, from the ordinary receipts, a surplus of $175.16. The treasurer's report will give all needed pecuniary details. The most grateful acknowledgment is hereby made to those ladies who organized and successfully conducted the Oratorio and Institute Fair, which was held in October and November last, and which resulted in placing in the possession of this Society the large sum of $1,664.82. The energy and efficiency of those ladies are worthy of all praise. The sum just named, added to the ordinary receipts of the Society, makes the balance of cash on hand, $1,839.98.

In closing this report, we heartily congratulate the Salem Oratorio Society upon the distinguished success which has thus far crowned its labors; upon the enviable reputation it has quickly gained at home and abroad; upon the great pleasure its members have drawn from the delightful study of the greatest masters of one of the noblest of arts; upon the pleasure which it has contributed to the cultivated taste of this community; upon the powerful impulse which it has given to the culture, among our people, of sacred music of the highest style, and upon the general good effects, social, moral, and religious, which always flow from the faithful pursuit of any refining art.

The success of our Society in the past ought to be a guaranty of even greater success in the future. To attain that success, it is only needful that at all times and under all circumstances we should maintain perfect harmony among ourselves, judging one another with kindness and forbearance, giving to those whom we select to conduct our affairs our cordial sympathy and co-operation; and laboring unitedly with aims free from all mere selfishness, for the advancement of music, which, as a wise poet says, —"exalts each joy, allays each grief;

Expels diseases, softens every pain."

Gen. Oliver moved the acceptance of the report, and addressed the meeting congratulating the members on the high rank the society had taken before the musical public, and hoped that the same Esprit de corps would be shown in the future, which had made the past so successful. Gen. O. remarked that a musical gentleman, in a neighboring city, asked Mr. Zerrahn why the Salem society had gained such proficiency in Oratorio singing in so short a time, and Mr. Z. answered, "Brains and Study."

The matter of assessments for the coming season was discussed, but the old rates were finally adopted.

Messrs. Hagar, Whipple, Whitmore and Randall severally addressed the society, stating, in substance, that, having been members of the Executive Committee for three years, and thanking the society for the tokens of confidence, they now wished to retire from Committee work; therefore they declined a re-election.

Several gentlemen, in well chosen remarks, regretted that the members of the Committee declined a re-nomination, and made complimentary allusions to the faithful and valuable services of the Executive Committee during the past three years.

The Chairman announced the next business to be, choice of Executive Committee for the ensuing year. After discussion as to the best method of election, Mr. E. Valentine moved that the chair appoint a committee of five to report to the meeting a list of six gentlemen for an Executive Committee. The chair appointed Messrs. E. Valentine, James Upton, H. F. Waters, E. R. Bigelow and J. H. Millett, who soon reported the following names: Messrs. F. H. Lee, S. Lincoln, Jr., Jas. T. Hewes, E. Valentine, B. H. Farnes, and Wm. Agge—and their report was accepted and adopted.

The Bavarian Passion Play.

The Passion Play of the Life and Death of Jesus Christ, performed at Ober-Ammergau last year, has once more come on for representation. The series of performances, which is to last during the summer, commenced on the 24th June, and is described in a daily contemporary from which we make a few extracts. The scenario of the drama has already been detailed in these columns, and we need not go over it again; but the method of the actors and the influence of the spectacle on the beholders are worthy of further comment.

The peasant amateurs who act the play are described by the correspondent from whom we quote as having seized the oriental aspect of the life around Christ with great skill, but they have rigidly adhered to their traditional outline of the play. No effects founded on recent discoveries, no scientific grouping, according to the rules of the stage, will do for them. Such as their acting is, it is to be quite their own. They enter into the spirit of the characters they represent, and rather live the characters—as far as they can realize them—for the moment than act them. Peter and Caiaphas, John and Judas, are as intensely themselves as the noble impersonation round which they appear. How strong the impression of it all is! The deep, affectionate interest which centres in the Christus, and grows stronger as his death approaches, has been roused to almost fever point by that awfully vivid scene when the living actor is fixed on the cross in presence of the whole assembly, and is raised aloft where all can see him. He must be some fifteen or twenty minutes thus raised, and must be very resolute and well prepared to go through his part so well. Of course he is not nailed, but he looks as though he were; and the blood which flows from his side, a little later on, is terribly well contrived.

The modern Greek revival, under the very shadow of the Acropolis, will give us a good starting point for the outward appearance of the Ammergau Theatre—simple and wooden as it is. We must take the Grecian arrangement of the stage; we must fancy the bright sky over head and the proscenium, or theatre within a theatre, occupying part of the space before us, and we shall be on the right road to understand the preparations of Ammergau peasants for their Passion Play. They are so thoroughly and honestly rustic and so far removed from professional mannerisms of any kind, their chorus is so well drilled and their minor parts are so well sustained, that it is a pleasure to see them perform. Here is their simple wooden theatre, fashioned, as has been said, on the Greek model. Here are the rows of benches open to the sky, and the side scenes, whence the chorus can conveniently issue forth, and the central portion (the proscenium), where so much important work is carried on. Though the sky be far less bright than in Attica, and though wooden benches supply the place of the old stone steps of the Grecian theatre, we have gained a step by dwelling on this memory of a modern Greek revival. The background of mountains, too, might serve as an additional point of resemblance between Athens and Ammergau. But between the Greek play and this Passion Play, in the Bavarian Highlands, there is as wide a difference as between the cold, clear light on yonder summit and the soft purple tinge of the Greek landscape. The Passion Play has been left to Ammergau as a great favor. The village was protected in the matter by the monks of Ettal, a monastery about two miles off, and was allowed, on account of its solemn vow in the days of the plague, to go on with the accustomed performances every tenth year. Passion plays were strictly forbidden elsewhere in Bavaria in the latter part of the last century, and but for this favor shown to Ammergau there would be no such thing as this spectacle. There is danger that the increased means of traffic afforded by the railways, and the tendency in Europe to rush after any untried experience, will gradually swamp Ammergau with larger and larger crowds of visitors. We hear that excursion trains will run from Vienna for several of the forthcoming performances; and that the gathering may be expected to be something enormous before the end of August. Already there are several houses in Ammergau specially retained by rich foreigners for part of the season; and already its very success threatens the Passion Play with extinction. The opening day was not, however, a specimen of this overcrowding. The number of foreigners present was large, but there were not so many of the neighboring villagers as there often are, and the theatre was far from being unpleasantly full.

There is need to see these Passion Plays more than once to understand them clearly. Many seem to think that as they have come to be interested and startled by what they see, it is better not to criticize the performance. They take it as a whole, and they wonder how the villagers can act so well. The story seems to be brought back again out of the dim ages of the past, and to be going on in our very presence. At some points of great interest, above all the Crucifixion, there are sobs to be heard among the audience, and the bright eyes of the ladies who have come so far to see the play are filled with tears. The country-folk have mingled mirth and sorrow in what they behold. They are hushed into awe-stricken silence by the more solemn scenes, which must be familiar enough to most of them, and they laugh heartily at the supposed comicality, or laughable wickedness, of the bad characters of the play. Yet there is not the faintest trace of comic acting in the whole piece from beginning to end, any more than if it were a religious service. But there are points about Judas and Pilate which strike the neighbouring villagers as so intensely human that they laugh and chuckle over them.

There are acted scenes and tableaux vivants following one another in quick succession. We have a pause between the first and second parts of the piece to allow of refreshment, and we have regular tickets issued for the places in the theatre—tickets for the boxes and for pit, to translate the names into our own phraseology. All this looks very practical. Yet the play remains as strange and touching as ever. The fear is it will be "done" to death by foreigners; that is its greatest danger. Already their presence is so far felt that the longer interval between the first and second acts in the first day's performance was attributed to them. Instead of an hour there was a pause of an hour and a half.

In a pamphlet entitled "Impressions of the Ammergau Passion Play, by an Oxonian," published by Hayes, and referring to last year's performance, there is some appreciative criticism on the ethical aspect of the play. We transcribe some of the writer's impressions on this head.

All through the Play, (he remarks) I kept repeating it to myself, "This is a primitive, mediæval, half-civilized peasantry, still sunk in the trammels of priestcraft; it has never known what it is to have an open Bible, and a free press; it is deprived of the blessings of the Electric Telegraph, and is about 300 years behind the present age." But it would not do. I could not but confess that I was witnessing, not only a beautiful, but a most subtle and delicate and thoughtful rendering of the Gospel History; a rendering in which the Truth was gathered up into a whole with a power and grasp that put to shame the loose and casual apprehension of this or that interesting trait or striking light, which is sufficient fodder for the weak stamina of the modern "Religious view."

As to general intelligence, refinement, and dignity, who could not give all he had to see a spark of it in the average English rustic or London rough? The charm of the people is indeed worth going miles to see and feel; it lights up the lovely valleys of the Bavarian and Tyrolean Alps with the magic spell of a courtesy that is never servile, and a simplicity that is never coarse. The traveller is welcomed with a heartiness that is almost friendship, and refreshed with the delightful familiarity of innocent interest. Their religion is untainted by the gloomy savageness of the Vallais; their roads are not ever and always darkened by the gory horrors that make you shudder and quake as you pass down the valleys of the Rhone; but often, as you peep with a lurking dread into the little oratories, you are cheered by the soft eyes of a Madonna which the gentle Cranach at Innsbruck has inspired, or by a quiet image of the Good Shepherd. Their services are marked by an impressive earnestness, giving them that congregational tone which to a Protestant seems so lacking to the ordinary Mass. I saw hardly any drunkenness, and but little misery, and begging is unknown. The cottages are brilliant with pictured walls, and gay with flowers; all is clean and fresh, and bright and happy. Such a life does much to explain the style of the Play, but very little towards illustrating the meaning of progress. Progress, of course, there is in civilization, but it requires, I felt, something deeper than the Daily Telegraph, more profound even than the Times to explain in what it consists. It was impossible to talk grandly and vaguely about liberty of thought in the presence of such a character of life as I saw around me, and as the Passion Play revealed. As for the "happiness of the greatest number," the words withered on my tongue. It takes a greater and a grander principle than can be thrown off in a newspaper article, or than can be touched on at the tag end of this paper, to show how the quickened life of the few in this troubled century, can be worth the awful price paid for it in the degradation of the many.

To return to the Play itself. So far as it can be looked upon as a picture, it surely has all the virtues of religious art. It unites them with the excitement and beauty of motion, and intensifies them with all the additional delights of the ear. And if the great abuse of religious art comes from its tendency to localize spiritual truth in the fleshly imagination, this danger is avoided by such a drama as that of Ammergau. The sight we get of Holy Persons is not wrapt by the wonders of an unknown skill; the forms do not beam upon us out of the mystic heaven of an art in whose golden realms we have never trod, as in the case of painting. Here we know too much about it all to be carried off our legs by the flood of its fascinations: its machinery is well within our sphere, there is no ignotum that we can be tricked into taking pro magnifico. Mair and Flunger, Hett and Lechner, Stadler and Zwick, we know them all; their sisters and brothers are with us; honor them as we will, they are still in their own country and in their own home. The material difference between it and a picture is that in the one there is nothing but what you see, nothing but the blue and the vermilion; while in the other there is behind a human being, with inharmonious passions concealed by an artificial state of feeling. Now, the danger of this lies in its effect on the actors; for as to the spectators, it is hopeless to speculate on what is not seen or heard. If we are morally responsible for more than a certain amount of what goes on "behind scenes," it is impossible to listen to an anthem or an oratorio, much less an opera. And as to the effect on the actors of entering into solemn and awful subjects with such dangerous intimacy, I must observe that it is remarkable that this sensitive hesitation appears only in times of doubt and difficulty, and never enters the heads of those whose reverence is the most unshaken and unwavering. Is it not the old story—the prayers of the monks sounding like blasphemy and impiety to the scepticism of the historian?

Still, if a sacred drama presupposes, and can be justified only by such a height of faith as this, we must suppose that Ammergau can only have preserved such a purity by exceptional, if not unique circumstances. I have spoken of the peculiar beauty of these peasants' lives; other facts conspire to heighten the Play's character. Besides the halo of its origin, its religious importance is raised by its being practically alone—for the extempore performance of sacred themes which are common, I believe, in the neighboring village fairs, are too slight to trench on its dignity, while they soften its strangeness. The people whose highest thought and feeling it represents has kept its belief pure and undefiled. Its picturesque Catholicism has never been allowed to run riot with the morbid imagination of more southern minds, or with the grossness of northern ones. Its simplicity has been heightened by contact with the new world of Protestant severity and plainness in a way and to a degree that must be considered extraordinary. Its native refinement has preserved it free from the incongruities which so naturally and readily cluster round such performances; and above all, in contrast to the excitement of dramatic action, which tended more and more, in mediæval times, to the introduction of the supernatural, so that their plays have become known to us as "Miracle-Plays," the Ammergau versionist has, with exquisite taste and delicacy, and with perfect recognition of the true capabilities of the stage, clung to the human side of our Lord's ministry, and enforced it with all the grand plainness of S. Matthew, with the mystic flavor of S. John, yet without a single stain of that overgrown miraculousness which the fondling of the after ages heaped upon the tale they loved. So far is this abstinence carried, indeed, that the events after the Resurrection are slurred over in too hurried a manner, perhaps, to allow for their dogmatic and didactic effect, the feeling being that wherever you touch on the supernatural, human machinery becomes inadequate. However, the people see, as in a perfect mirror, the human life which the Bible records. The morality which that life personifies is carried out in a high subjective tone which qualifies the necessarily objective character of the representation; for instance, the chorus sings, on Judas's punishment, without a tinge of materiality—

"So fled Cain—Ah! whither?
From yourself you cannot fly;
In your own heart you carry
Your own Hell's agony!"

Thus it is that the self-sufficient and independent son of the 19th century may leave Ammergau, not so much with the satisfaction of having relieved the curiosity with which he entered it, as with the consciousness of rebuke and reproach in the sight of a faith, purer, livelier, and not less intellectual than he has yet attained.—London Orchestra, July 7.

The Charity Children.

Mr. J. Hullah passes judgment in the Academy on the recent festival at St. Paul's as follows:—

I had not attended one of these meetings for many years past. They are interesting musically as indices of the progress of the national ear; and as such they are, on the whole, satisfactory. On the occasion of my first and only other attendance at one of them (as far back as during the reign of the late Thomas Attwood—the Attwood who 'had seen' Mozart), that great musician and judicious organist was, I well remember, under the necessity of holding on the last note of the melody of every line of the Old Hundredth Psalm, during several seconds, in order that the juvenile choristers might recover the pitch from which they had generally departed—downwards, of course—to the extent of a semitone, more or less. Little or nothing of the kind was observable on Thursday. The intonation was, if not throughout faultless, as little faulty as we often find it with choristers of greater experience and more pretension; and this in passages the extent of which upwards is considerable, e.g., in the 'Hallelujah Chorus' and the 'Coronation Anthem' of Handel.

The timbre, too, or quality of the vocal mass, was agreeable, in spite of the large element of cockney pronunciation—surely the meanest and most odious in the three kingdoms. But in all other respects, regarded as a musical performance—for the moment my sole consideration—the meeting was anything but satisfactory. If the tune was good, the time was quite the reverse. It would no doubt be difficult to keep together a body of musical performers even of far greater skill than those who constitute the choir at this anniversary, scattered as they are over so large an area. But the singing of these children is of a kind indicative, not of difficulty arising from the locality or any circumstance connected with it, but of their having had no training whatever in the elements of music. For this there is no necessity whatever; and the difficulty arising from it is altogether gratuitous. There are children enough in London, fairly acquainted with musical notation, and with the relations, melodic and rhythmic, of musical sounds, to fill every corner of St. Paul's with Westminster Abbey and a dozen other of our largest public buildings to boot. Not only so. In the majority of schools of the class from which these children are taken there is at least one teacher with musical skill and science enough to prepare a contingent who would come ready to take part in music incomparably more difficult than any performed on Thursday—even without a general rehearsal. Music no doubt is not as extensively or as thoroughly taught in schools of whatever class as it might be; but, under circumstances always of difficulty, generally even of discouragement, it is taught more extensively and more thoroughly than is generally believed. The anniversary meeting of the Charity Children might be made an evidence of this, instead of remaining, as it does, an evidence to the contrary—with those who judge only from what they hear on that occasion.

Extracts from Mr. Bowman's "Review" of the Handel and Haydn Festival.

THE PRINCIPAL SOLO SINGERS.

Foremost among these undoubtedly stands the lady to whom we have just referred, Mme. Rudersdorff. This vocalist, though by birth a Russian, is a cosmopolite in her art. Her face and voice are as familiar at the great festivals of the lower Rhine and other parts of Germany as at those held at Sydenham Palace, Birmingham, Norwich and Gloucester.

Mr. Cummings also has been identified with most of the English festivals for many years. It would, perhaps, be an exaggeration to say that either of these artists stands first in the public esteem in England, but Mme. Rudersdorff has shared the soprano part, and divided the honors with that great singer, Mlle. Titiens, and Mr. Cummings has not been so far eclipsed by Mr. Sims Reeves but that his great worth has been recognized at its true value.

From the first it was evident that Mme. Rudersdorff had been thoroughly trained in her vocation, and was mistress of her art in every detail. Nothing came amiss to her, and her great abilities were equally conspicuous whether she declaimed with impassioned energy the imprecations of the furious Medea, or melted with supplication in entreaty for the life of the widow's son in "Elijah." Her talent was broad, earnest, dramatic, and intense,—that of a woman of mobile and ardent temperament, alive to everything about her, demonstrative in action, and quick in expression. Such persons enter fervently into the spirit of what they sing, and reflect it vividly to the public mind; and this Mme. Rudersdorff always did. The difficulty in her case was often not so much how to express, as how to refrain from over-expression. Much of Mendelssohn's music is gentle and sad, expressive of the passive and not the active qualities of self-renunciation, and of resignation rather than of self-assertion; and in these directions Mme. Rudersdorff failed to interpret him. A single instance will sufficiently illustrate what we refer to. In the "Hymn of Praise" occurs that beautiful expression of resigned faith, humility, and trust, "I waited for the Lord." The energy with which Mme. Rudersdorff waited was of the most active kind, and found musical expression in the use of strongly marked sforzandos, and other dramatic forms, not at all akin to the reposeful character of the composition.

Mme. Rudersdorff's voice is not in its first freshness, but still it is a noble one, large, resonant, and, in passages of sentiment or pathos, singularly tender and beautiful. In such great songs as "Hear ye! Israel," it lacked that clear, sparkling beauty that was so conspicuous in Mme. Parepa, who sang this aria with a breadth and brightness of voice as though she called all Judea to listen to the message to be delivered. But, on the other hand, to all passages of description or of emotion Mme. Rudersdorff gave a graphic intensity that colder singers fail to approach. This was conspicuous in the great scene from "Medea," and also throughout the "Elijah." The episode of the death of the son of the widow of Zarephath, the suspicion of the mother that the prophet had slain the boy, her grief and supplication for aid in her sore affliction, her doubt as to the power of Elijah to bring the dead to life, and her final crowning joy at the restoration of the child, were all so beautifully and truly pictured, as to win the utmost admiration from the audience.

Throughout the festival Mme. Rudersdorff was a tower of strength, a singer to be relied on. No one after the first day felt the least doubt that she would sustain her part to the end, and well. She did not tire easily, but found sufficient spare voice to sing in many of the choruses, and energy enough to be interested in everything that was taking place in chorus, orchestra, or audience. Such a vital woman always carries with her a valuable and inspiring sympathetic power and moral support.

Mr. Cummings' abilities were of quite another order. There was no passionate earnestness in his singing, but an even excellence. Whatever he did was characterized by discretion, good judgment, and a broad intelligence. He was a singer of such refinement and delicate sensibility that at the close of whatever he sang one could not but commend the tact with which the salient points had been brought out, the admirable wisdom with which every musical phrase had been balanced, and the exact measure of expression according to it. Mr. Cummings' voice was by no means a marvel of beauty, whether as regards quality or quantity. Many men have finer voices, and even more have larger ones, but in the well trained skill, the discipline of years, the discretion and the wisdom that guided Mr. Cummings in the use of his powers to their best advantage, and enabled him to convey to his hearers the exact meaning of the composer, he has no equal among us.

THE PASSION MUSIC.

The performance of Bach's passion music we regard as one of the pivotal points of the week. It called for no ordinary degree of musical courage and reverent love of art, to face this severe and exacting work. No other society in this country has been so brave or so lofty in its aims as to attempt it. Whatever was done in this direction it was clear was to be done through faith and for pure art's sake, and not with much hope of captivating at once the popular ear. It was a true and noble work for the society to undertake, and in their long record of the achievements of half a century, there will be no brighter page than that on which stands recorded the fact that on the evening of the 13th of May, 1871, the Handel and Haydn Society, for the first time, interpreted to an American audience a portion of Sebastian Bach's passion music from St. Matthew's Gospel.

Whatever may be the inclinations of individual taste, or however this person may find the music antiquated, or that other may find it dull, the fact remains, and is beyond all question or dispute, that the music itself is beautiful, not only spiritually but materially. Those who fail to find it so may rest assured that the fault is in them, and not in it; and that they need to bring themselves up to the right level of appreciation; for Bach is as truly and unequivocally great in his direction as was Homer, or Dante, or Milton. He and Handel are the two great composers of Protestantism, and their works are the corner-stones upon which all oratorio writers have built. The superstructure may change its form with the mutations of taste, but theirs is the quarry from which all have hewn. Every composer of eminence, from Bach's own day to this, has acknowledged his greatness,—none more freely than Beethoven. As for Mendelssohn, his works show how deeply he had drunk from that pure and living fountain, and it is well known with what zeal he applied himself in the flower of his youth to the production of this very work.

Finally, Schumann himself, perhaps the profoundest and most original composer of his generation, has said in his Musical Life Maxims: "Make Bach's Well-tempered Clavichord your daily bread, so shall you surely be a thorough musician."

The passion music called out all the best elements of the great composer's genius. His talent never shone more brightly than when turned to the purposes of devotion; and this recital of the sufferings and death of the Saviour it may well be believed aroused his deepest feelings and moved him to the fullest exercise of his transcendent powers. The result is a work full of the purest and highest expression of musical feeling, solemn, devout, and fervent, replete with grace and beauty, and of such sterling merit that as surely as it comes to be known it will commend itself more and more to the admiration of him who gives himself faithfully to its study, till whatever quaintness of form it may at first have seemed to possess will be but an added element of beauty. It would be a labor of love to recall, one by one, the solemn beauty of the chorals, arias, recitatives, and choruses that compose the sixteen numbers of this work that were selected for performance. All of them were composed in a spirit of simplicity, of conviction, and of earnest devotion, and in the golden amber of Bach's godliness they have been preserved to us for this century and a quarter, and still the essential spirit of Christianity shines out from them. Bach was a man who was engrossed in his calling, who diademed artifice, who was direct, simple-minded, and earnest; and all this his music declares. It was made for the religious use and comprehension of the common people, and not fashioned to please the dilettanti. The chorale is the great occurring theme, the central pillar of his musical building. To this he always returns with ever-varying skill, and certainly nothing in all the range of musical composition finds its way more directly to the heart than do some of his chorales. For instance, that beautiful one:—

"O Head, all bruised and wounded!
Hang up to brutal scorn!"

What could be more touchingly beautiful! Doubtless, however, the selection that gave most universal pleasure was the chorus, "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," in which the faithful believers call upon the elements to avenge and overwhelm the betrayers of the Saviour. There was a fierce vehemence about this chorus that quite startled the audience, and it was followed by a storm of applause and demand for repetition. It showed how easily Bach could handle the dramatic element when he was so minded.

What words can tell the tender beauty of the concluding chorus, describing the afflicted disciples about the sepulchre of their departed Lord?—

"Around thy tomb here sit we weeping,
And murmur low in tones suppress."

The musical phrase upon which the chorus is based is of great beauty, and it is one also that Mendelssohn has, perhaps unconsciously, borrowed more than once. The translation used was Mr. Dwight's, and was framed in reverent sympathy with the composer's meaning, and with a fine appreciation and mastery of that most difficult of tasks, the adaptation of words to music.

Musical Correspondence.

The Handel Festival.

LONDON, JUNE 27.—The present Handel Festival has proved the most successful musical entertainment ever known in the history of the world. In point of numbers, both of performers and listeners, it has far exceeded the previous festivals given in honor of the great oratorio composer.

The Festival of 1871 lasted three days, and took place as usual, in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. The first day was devoted to the Messiah. The work has been given so often by monster hands of singers, that its performance, however enjoyable, had scarcely the charm of novelty. The soloists were all familiar to the audience. The vast body of chorus singers sang the well-known music almost by heart, and with the swing and ease which come from familiarity. Sir Michael Costa, who conducted, took the time more slowly than at the Exeter Hall performances, recognizing the impossibility of doing with a colossal chorus what could be done with one of a medium size.

On the second day a miscellaneous programme was offered. It was too long to be endured even by a patient English audience; but it contained many features of unusual interest. It began with the Dettingen Te Deum, a work which Handel originally wrote on the occasion of the return of one of the Georges from a rather absurd campaign. It was first produced at the little Chapel Royal of St. James's Palace, and has since been heard in every city where the memory of Handel is revered. Mr. Santley took the bass solos, and the trumpet playing of Mr. Harper was a prominent orchestral feature. Mr. Best then played on the organ, with orchestral accompaniment, the first of Handel's six Concertos for organ and orchestra. Sims Reeves sang "Deeper and deeper still," sublimely. London connoisseurs, who have listened to him for many years, declare that nothing in his whole artistic career has equalled his singing on this eventful occasion. Of course the audience were wild with delight, and the vast transept of the Crystal Palace resounded with cheers of welcome and applause. Reeves also sang "How vain is man," from Judas. Vernon Rigby selected "Call forth thy powers;" and Mr. Santley gave the aria "Natce al bosco," which is published in the appendix to the modern editions of Israel in Egypt, and was often introduced in the oratorio. Mme. Trebelli, now the prominent contralto of London, sang "Verdi prati," and "He bids the circling seasons shine." Mme. Sinico, Titiens, Patey, Cummings and Agnesi all lent their invaluable aid to complete the attractions of this memorable entertainment, in which also the vast chorus took part, creating a great impression in the choral extracts from Solomon.

But the culmination of this superb festival was the performance on Friday, the 23d, of Israel in Egypt. There can be no doubt that this was the most stupendous musical performance the world has ever seen. Mr. Kerr Gedge, a promising young tenor, had the honor of opening this work with the brief recitative, "Now there arose a new king in Egypt." The next phrase, "And the children of Israel sighed," was sung by the contralto, Mrs. Patey. Then came the marvellous series of choruses which form the first part of the oratorio. The "Hailstone Chorus" of course made a very great impression. The sublime movement, "He sent a thick darkness," was magnificently sung, and indeed the same remark may be made of all the choruses. In the pastorate, "As for his people," the pianissimo effects produced by the large chorus were noticeable. The fugal movement, "He led them through the deep," was another success; while the peculiar iteration of words in "There was not one of them left" came out with tremendous effect.—In the second part of the oratorio, the numerous double choruses were simply beyond criticism in their manner of performance. The solo parts by Mmes. Sherrington, Rudersdorff and Patey, were well sung, but from the immense size of the auditorium were not really enjoyable. An exception must, however, be made in the case of Sims Reeves; the moment his curly head appeared as he came up the platform steps there was a general burst of applause. The petted favorite took graciously the welcome of the admiring public; he bowed, and even deigned to sweetly smile. After the applause had subsided he sang his air "The enemy said," the only tenor solo in the oratorio. Mr. Reeves was in excellent voice, and rendered the morceau in glorious style. Cheer after cheer rewarded him, but he steadfastly refused an encore, and after bowing took his seat till the storm of plaudits should abate. Sims Reeves never was more popular in England than he is to day. His voice is also as good as ever, while that of Mario is in the last stages of decay. Reeves, as usual with him, will not sing when he does not want to; that is, unless he feels he is in thoroughly good voice. In this way Reeves is never heard to sing badly, and he preserves his reputation as a vocalist intact.

Among the lady singers at the Festival, Titiana was certainly the greatest; but fine as she is, she does not equal the oratorio singers of years gone by, such as Jenny Lind and Clara Novello. Next to Sims Reeves, the tenor Cummings—who leaves in a few weeks again for America—has given the most satisfaction. Mme. Patey, who also is about to visit the New World professionally, has shown her ability as an accomplished contralto singer.

A Handel Festival is no longer a novelty in England, and of course does not attract the general attention which that of 1857 did. The festival of 1871 was given by the Crystal Palace company, who assumed all the risks, and engaged the singers. The chorus of course gave their services gratuitously, but in most instances their railroad fare was paid. Many came from distant provincial towns, the Cathedral choirs being largely represented. It was at first feared that the enterprise would not be a pecuniary success, for it was evident that the public at large was by no means excited over the matter; but the result has proved most satisfactory, ensuring the continuance of these great Triennial Festivals.

The following is the number of visitors who have attended the Festival on each day:

Rehearsal, 18,676; 1st day, 21,946; 2nd day, 21,330; 3d day, 23,016; total, 84,968.

The oratorio season is nearly over in London; but three performances of Messiah, the Creation, and Elijah are announced to take place at the splendid new Albert Hall. Otto Goldschmidt also announces two performances of his Ruth, with Jenny Lind Goldschmidt as the principal vocalist. TROVATOR.

BERNHARD LISTEMANN. The New York Sun pays the following just compliment to an artist whom Boston will reclaim in due time:

Mr. Listemann, who has been a leading violinist in Boston, for the last few years, has transferred his residence to this city, and is now playing first violin at the Central Park Garden concerts, occasionally also appearing as a soloist. Next winter he will discontinue his orchestral playing and will be the solo violinist of Thomas's concerts.

What is Boston's loss is our gain, for Mr. Listemann has at once been recognized as an artist of the best type, having a broad and fine musical intelligence, and being in sympathy with the highest and best forms of musical composition. His tone is pure and true and beautiful, and his playing such as every connoisseur can listen to with unalloyed pleasure.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 29, 1871.

What for the next Season?

The musical prospect is bewildering, and even threatening. A plenty of good music we shall have, no doubt,—good, bad and indifferent; the only trouble is, that we are threatened with too much. To judge from all the newspaper on-dits, and hints, and feelers, it would seem as if this country had come to be regarded as the musical El-dorado among all the musical fortune seekers of the Old World. There is scarcely a famous artist in Europe, scarcely a company of artists, of whom we do not read that he, or she, or they are in negotiation with some enterprising manager, Yankee, Englishman or Jew, preparatory to a musical tour of the States. They hear what harvests have been reaped by Nilsson and Parepa, even by young lady pianists, like Mehlig, and they all burn with the fever to go and do likewise. They hear how Oratorio has taken root in Boston, and is sending out shoots into other cities, and they say: Let us make haste to enter in and reap. They hear how the smart opera impresarios, by skilful trumpeting and "managing of the press," have found out that they can make money with the cheap thing just as easily as with the good thing,—i. e. by moving rapidly from place to place, and flooding it after a long drought, to be succeeded by another,—or, to change the figure, exhausting the soil by feverish short "seasons," furnishing no wholesome permanent supply:—and they all covet a share, which each one hopes to make the lion's share, in the "little game." Of course, too, they have all learned how to talk of themselves as apostles, missionaries of taste and culture to a half savage continent, at the same time bestowing their most flattering encouragements and compliments on such "appreciative" and hopeful publics as they find in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, &c.

We dare not undertake to enumerate the more or less famous singers, instrumental virtuosos, opera and concert troupes, whose advent on our shores has been announced already, or foreshadowed. But if the half of them should really come, we fear they would stand terribly in one another's light, and more than half of them would go home sadly disappointed; while the effect upon our musical development here would be so to distract the public mind as seriously to put back the quiet organized endeavors in each town and city to build up something permanent and wholesome of its own, some never failing fountains from the well of music "pure and undefiled." The whole air will be thick with "stunning" advertisements; and the real love of music needs a more tranquil atmosphere to thrive well in. We shall be a truly cultivated and art-loving people, when we have reached the point that we can be comparatively indifferent to such appeals, because we love truth in Art too well to be continually startled off our balance by pretentious novelty.

In the long list that unfolds itself—we mean that part of it which is the most certain—there is much that we shall be glad to welcome. Miss NILSSON will certainly appear in Opera, if not occasionally in Oratorio and Concerts; and there are even intimations that she will make her lyric debut here in Boston early in the Fall. Her company includes Miss Annie Cary, the French tenor Capoul, the bass Jamet, and the well-known Brignoli. Mme. PAREPA-ROSA, in fresh health again, is probably already on her way back to this country, and will open in English Opera at the New York Academy in the first week of October. Of course we shall have our turn in Boston. Her troupe includes,—besides Mrs. Seguin, Castle, Campbell, and most of her old artists,—Miss Clara Doria, daughter of the English composer, John Barnett, and a young English tenor, of whom report speaks highly, named Tom Karl. We may rely upon Carl Rosa and his lady for a good repertoire and careful renderings at least.

The Ballad Troupe, organized by Mr. Dolby, formerly the agent of Dickens here, including Mme. Patey, contralto, Miss Edith Wynne, the charming English ballad singer, Mr. SAMLLEY, the great English baritone, and Mr. W. H. CUMMINGS, whose return will be most welcome, have taken the Boston Music Hall, we understand, for eight concerts in October. They will also cooperate with the Handel and Haydn Society in some half dozen Oratorio performances in November and December. And while on the subject of Oratorio, it gives us pleasure to assure our readers that the good work so well begun by that Society on Bach and other noble music will not be suspended in consequence of these engagements; on the contrary, they will pursue the study of the Passion Music until they can sing it all; nor will "Israel in Egypt" be put away to sleep. If NILSSON too should sing in Oratorio, and Mme. RUDERSDORFF adhere to her design of coming over in the winter, we shall be strong in Oratorio. Among the sterling singers, however, we shall miss our manly Basso, Mr. M. W. WHITNEY, who is already on his way abroad, and of whom we shall hear next winter in the oratorios and concerts in England.

However popular the Dolby Ballad Concerts may be, we doubt not that the entertainments which our friend Mr. Peck is organizing,—ten in number, two of them orchestral—will prove neither less attractive nor less worthy. With such a list of artists as he has secured, and with his long and careful study of the tastes and likings of the Boston public, there is little danger either of poor performance or of very trashy programmes.

Of Symphony and other noble Orchestral music the promise is at least as rich as the review of last year. This time the Harvard Musical Association will be the first in the field, with its seventh season of Ten Symphony Concerts, beginning as usual on Thursday afternoon, the 9th of November, and running nearly to the end of March. Mr. ZERRAHN will still conduct; the orchestra, in spite of the loss of Listemann and a few others, will as a whole be even better than before, and the programmes equally attractive. THEODORE THOMAS and his orchestra this time will come later; probably about New Year, instead of in October as in the past two years. To replace the great attraction of Miss MEHLIG, who remains abroad, at least through the coming winter, he has engaged another "bright particular star," newly risen in Germany, Miss SOPHIA MENTER. (Wonderful young lady pianists are getting so plenty, that there seems to be hardly any chance for a piano-playing man!). Her name is wholly new to us. She is a pupil of Liszt, will probably keep the Liszt school largely in the foreground, and is said to possess great personal beauty. We find in the Signale of Leipzig, June 20, an account of her performance at a concert in Baden-Baden, from which we are tempted to translate, as giving some idea of her, although it reads almost as if it were written expressly to operate on the American market.

"Any one who knew with what enthusiasm Fri. Menter had been received during these last years, wherever she had appeared, especially in Prague, Vienna, Pesth, &c., was prepared beforehand to expect something extraordinary. But even we, who have followed her career from the beginning with the greatest interest, and have been witnesses in part to her steadily increasing success,—even we were surprised when we heard the young and lovely artist again for the first time after a pause of several years, and now admired the wonder-child of such great promise as a complete mistress of her art. These last years, in which Fri. Menter has been studying with Tausig and Liszt, have ripened her with wonderful rapidity, and developed her great talent to the highest bloom. No wonder, if the great masters, after whom she has striven so successfully, look with pride upon this scholar. The technique is for her a standpoint thoroughly achieved; for her there are no difficulties left; nay, it seems to give her a peculiar pleasure to seek out new hindrances, that she may overcome them in her playing. In strength and endurance, in brilliancy and clarity of delivery, she is a match for any pianist; at the same time there is a thoroughly genial trait, a charm that may be called almost demure, in her playing; and yet she unites with it a genuine feminine grace and elegance. She controls her instrument with sovereign power; she stands completely above her tasks, and this enables her to impress upon them the charm of an individuality, which is entirely artistic, free and independent. Fräulein Menter had chosen three pieces, which had been composed by those piano-Titans, Rubinstein, Tausig and Liszt, for their own concert performances. Thereby she gave us not only her own artistic confession of faith, but also the measure by which she is to be judged. One who can play Rubinstein's Etude (on so-called "false notes"), Tausig's Concert arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and Liszt's bravura transcription of the Waltz from "Mazurka," as she played them, can venture upon any thing. There is in fact no task to which she is not fully equal; in the last concert she gave us comparatively small proofs of what she can do. Had it been a soirée with orchestra, and could we have heard from her a Concerto of Beethoven, of Chopin, or of Liszt, then indeed the most intrinsically valuable phases of her great talent, those of pervading intellectuality and poetic coloring, would of course have come out into a far clearer light, than in the rendering of those three bravura pieces, in which she showed herself more as the sovereign mistress of technique.—We hope we have not heard Fräulein Menter here for the last time. If only America does not seduce her from us too soon! Alas! we see all the signs of that already! Laurels she can never lack, whether in the old world or the new."

Well, we shall see; meanwhile a formidable rival awaits the lady here already in the person of the Fräulein MARIE KREBS.—Speaking of orchestras, we read of quite a unique importation, from Vienna, soon expected in New York: actually an Orchestra of Women! The band is small, we are told, some twenty instruments, but of all classes, strings, wood and brass. This will make it easier to credit what that extravagant, luxurious Englishman of the last century, Beckford, relates of a female orchestra he heard somewhere in Italy or Spain. We wonder why some enterprising fellow does not bring us over one of those small bands or orchestras of Hungarian gypsies, such as we have heard in cafés in the South of Germany, who play together with such a furor of enthusiasm that they seem each to improvise his part. Finally there is a new JULLIEN in the field, a son of the famous one, already giving promenade concerts in New York, who is said to take after his illustrious sire in dress and manner, if in nothing else. He too has an eye upon the Music Hall.

—Here memory fails; hosts of new-comers we have seen mentioned somewhere; whether we herald them or not, they will not hide their light under a bushel, for artists they all are in this modern art of arts called advertisement, if in nothing else. To come back to the more wholesome and important matter of our own domestic fare:

For classical Chamber Music Boston will not thirst in vain. It is now considered settled that the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, weary of wanderings, will stay at home and draw the bow pro aris et focis. So we shall not experience another winter without a hearing of the Violin Quartets and Quintets of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann and the rest. And the pianists we have always with us, as many and as good as one can reasonably wish. Leonhard and Lang, Perabo and Parker, and as many more risen or rising into at least local fame: what more need we have? And they all play the best kind of music, making their appeal mainly and directly to the best kind of audience. Content with these, why need we sigh for Lisztian virtuosity clad in the beauty of Eve's daughters! Then we have such singers as Kreissmann, Mrs. Barry, and more, soulful and intelligent interpreters of what is best in song. The two "Conservatories" also will keep up their perpetual round of chamber concerts.

The visit made us last May by the Mendelssohn Club of male part-song singers from New York, has had the effect to quicken a vague ideal or desire for something of the same sort which has long existed here, into some positive, organic action. The result is the formation of the amateur Club, of which we copy an account below. It is a welcome sign. But it suggests yet other wants, of which we shall have more to say.

LEIPZIG CONSERVATORY. The following communications, just received, will be of interest to many:

A CARD.

The undersigned has been requested by Director Conrad Schieblitz, of the Conservatory of Leipzig, to publish in some American paper a Card, containing the desire of that gentleman to possess for his album a photograph of all Americans who have studied music at the Leipzig Conservatory and have been honorably dismissed from the Institution. Calling the attention of all concerned to the above, I take pleasure in offering my services to those intending to come to Germany with the intention of studying music, languages, etc. Every information by which they may be benefited will be cheerfully given, and an "International Educational Guide" for the instruction of all will soon be published.

EDWARD WIEDE.

Leipzig, June 4, 1871.

[late of Springfield, Mass.]

Leipzig, June 4, 1871.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, Editor "Dwight's Journal of Music."

DEAR SIR:—I take pleasure in being able to contradict assertions, made some months ago by several Boston music advertising sheets, that Kapellmeister CARL REINECKE soon would follow Carl Glogner to Boston. The Kapellmeister has never thought of leaving his European sphere of usefulness in which he has been so admirably successful for more than twenty years. Mr. Glogner has been replaced by Mr. Konawka, and it does not seem as if the Leipzig Conservatory has been the loser by the departure for America of the first named gentleman. Yours, etc. EDW. WIEBE.

CAPOU, THE NEW FRENCH TENOR, who is to be a member of the Nilsson opera troupe, has won an unequivocal success this summer in London, at Her Majesty's Opera. The Musical World says of him:

Mr. Capoul is perhaps the most irreproachable French tenor in the Opera Comique style since Mr. Roger, whom he resembles in very many respects. He sings like Mr. Roger, acts like Mr. Roger, and even looks like Mr. Roger. There is the same delicately refined management of the "head notes," the same redundancy of expression and gesture, the same predilection for "tempo rubato," which distinguished his renowned predecessor, for so many years the glory of the Rue Feydeau. We can easily understand the unanimous favor with which Mr. Capoul has been accepted by French connoisseurs, and can as readily believe that he will win unanimous acceptance in any country where genuine art is understood—seeing that, in his way, he, at the present epoch, stands alone. His voice is by no means so rich and powerful as the voice of Mr. Roger, but it equals it in sweetness of quality, is quite as flexible, and quite as much under the control of its possessor. Mr. Capoul's view of the character of Faust is precisely that which every French artist adopts; and as the Faust of Mr. Gounod is an opera essentially French in its tendencies, no one can logically object to that view, especially when we take into consideration that the masterpiece of the distinguished French composer had already been heartily welcomed in Germany before its production by Mr. Mapleson at Her Majesty's Theatre, when M. Gounod himself was in the house. M. Capoul both acts the character in the French manner, and sings the music in the French manner; but as in either case what he does attains the acmé of perfection in the school to which he belongs, it cannot fail to please. We need not enter into details. Enough that at the end of Act I, when, by the art of Mephistopheles, Faust is once more restored to youth, M. Capoul had produced an impression not to be gainsaid. This, in spite of certain drawbacks not dependent upon himself, was strengthened as the opera went on, and his tender and graceful, if somewhat spun out, rendering of the well-known soliloquy "Salve dimora," which was unanimously asked for again, confirmed M. Capoul's success in so emphatic a manner that there was no fear of the sequel. The sequel, indeed, showed an end, worthy the beginning. This result is the more to the credit of M. Capoul, inasmuch as his brief career has been exclusively devoted, if we are not mistaken, to the repertory of the Opera Comique, to which it is scarcely necessary to say Faust does not belong.

A NEW MUSICAL CLUB IN BOSTON. The Easy Chair in the current number of Harper's Magazine discourses in its usual pleasant vein on a recent concert by the New York Vocal Society, an organization composed of the best singers in the metropolis, and devoted to the practice and performance of madrigals, glees, and matter of a kindred nature. It is not the first time he had aggravated us by reports of entertainments the like of which, despite the assumption that Boston is the musical centre of America, have not been heard here. There is a mine of music in the old English writers, which might be worked to the most profitable advantage, not only of part-songs, but of solos for every variety of voice. The coming season, however, will, it is confidently expected, bring some reforms in this direction. First, in the Dolby Ballad Troupe, whose intention, it is said, is to present selections from English writers mainly in the way of both solo and concerted matter. But the concerts by this company will be few, and its departure will leave us almost as hungry for the simple but nutritious food as it finds us. By the new society now forming, the want long felt by music-lovers and students, generally, and by those who have read of or heard the madrigal societies in New York especially, will be to some extent supplied. There is, probably, no abuse of confidence in stating all that is known of this organization. The active members will be limited to one hundred, and will include nearly every good male voice in the city. The associate members will number five hundred, and besides an admission fee will be subject to an annual assessment, thus creating a fund for such necessary running expenses as rent, compensation for a conductor and pianist, and providing as well for the formation of an adequate library. The Chickering Club, though forming the nucleus of the new society, will continue its present course independently. All will unite in the election of trustees and other executive officers, but with the active members only will rest the choice of conductor, and from their number a music committee will be appointed. The associate members will have certain privileges of admission for themselves and friends to the rehearsals and concerts, it being intended that one of the latter shall be given monthly. It is to be understood that the club are never to sing "for money," and thus much of the jealousy which seems to be inseparable from professional people will be avoided. And the entertainments, instead of serving as means of introducing one or two good musicians, whose efforts are made to extinguish those of every one else, will be, as they ought,—and as those of the New York society are said to be—a logical arrangement and an amalgamated composite. The gentler sex will not be admitted to membership. But, if there should be a demand for performances by mixed voices, ladies may be "invited," as is now done in making up the choir of the Handel and Haydn Society. Such an association deserves all the encouragement that can be given to it. And there is room for still another. Among the works of modern masters are many cantatas and choral compositions of a secular character, which cannot be taken up by the Handel and Haydn Society; such as Schumann's Paradise and the Peri, Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night, and others without number. These works, it is true, may be performed by the new society, but as its concerts will be given to a limited circle, those outside will not be permitted the opportunity of enjoyment and edification which would be afforded by a club, organized and conducted like the Handel and Haydn Society.—Sunday Courier.

NEW YORK HARMONIC SOCIETY. The election of officers, to serve for the ensuing year, took place recently, and resulted in the election of the following officers: President, Thomas J. Hall; Vice-Presidents, James H. Todd, Dr. James Pech; Secretary, F. R. Battsbury; Conductor and Musical Director, Dr. James Pech. This society will, during the coming season, give, in conjunction with the soloists of the London Sacred Harmonic Society, Miss Edith Wynne, Mme. Whytock-Patey, Mr. Wm. H. Cummings, Mr. F. G. Patey, and the renowned basso, Mr. Santley, a series of oratorios and cantatas comprising "Elijah," "Samson," "Judas Macabaeus," "The Messiah," "Creation," "Acis and Galatea" and the "Hymn of Praise." The chorus is to be three hundred strong, and the orchestra will be composed of sixty-two performers. The New York Harmonic Society in previous years has done good service in the cause of religion and musical art, and if within the last few years its energies have been somewhat paralyzed by untoward circumstances, the directors at the present time are evidently determined to carry through the coming season with the utmost vigor.

MUSICAL PROJECTS IN PHILADELPHIA.—The extraordinary success of the open air concerts of Carl Sentz's Orchestra, at the Männerchor Garden, has encouraged their enterprising leader to form new projects of a musical nature on a much grander scale. Early in the autumn—say in October—he proposes to give a couple of monster concerts in Fairmount Park. He will reinforce all the available talent of this city, with additions from New York, Boston and Baltimore, and thus create an orchestra of about one hundred and fifty. As there can be no charge for entertainments in the Park, he hopes to have the money for the necessary expenses contributed by liberal citizens. It may be expected also, that the city railway companies, which would profit greatly by the concerts, will each give a handsome sum. As these concerts will be on a particularly grand scale, they will attract thousands of strangers to the city, and the hotels, as well as the railroad companies, would thus derive benefit.

We merely allude briefly now to this one project of Mr. Sentz's, and add a word concerning another. It is to arrange for a continuous series of open-air concerts next season, with a much larger orchestra than the present one, to be given in a much more spacious garden. He has his eye on one or two localities, either of which, if obtained, would be as good as Central Park Garden of New York, or better. He would aim to have as large and as fine an orchestra as Theodore Thomas, and as the admission price would be equally moderate, there can be no doubt that the concerts would be as attractive and popular. Everyone visiting the Männerchor Garden concerts on a fine evening must know, from the crowds that attend them, that the Philadelphia public craves good music, and will pay for it even in a limited space and from a small orchestra. If Mr. Sentz can carry out his design for a permanent series on a much more extensive scale, it is quite certain that the support given him would be proportionately liberal.—Eve. Bulletin.

This will be a Symphony night at the Männerchor Garden. Each Wednesday evening Mr. Carl Sentz has determined to indulge himself and his audience with a complete Symphony in addition to other pieces. Last Wednesday he gave a charming Symphony by Haydn, and next Wednesday there will probably be one of Beethoven's. The success of these open-air concerts has been extraordinary. The good music, the pleasant company, the perfect arrangements for comfort and good order, and the excellent business management of Mr. Torchiana combine to make the concerts the most attractive ever given here in the summer.—Ibid., July 19.

NEW MUSICAL INSTRUMENT. We find the following in a Cincinnati paper, and copy it for what it may be worth. But will this hook-harmonium play everything in "octaves"? Heaven save us! And save us also from that dreadful day when "Music of the Future" will be played in every house."

Among the patents issued last week was one to Mr. Thomas Atkins of this city, for a new musical instrument. A working model of this instrument can be seen and heard at the piano rooms of Atkins & Co., 161 Fourth Street. It presents externally somewhat the appearance of an upright piano, and has a similar keyboard and action, including hammers and damper. In other respects it differs from the piano, having no strings, no tension, and consequently fewer imperfections. The tones are produced by the hammers striking upon steel hooks of a peculiar construction. These hooks have three prongs, the center one being used to attach the hook firmly to a metallic support. The outer prongs differ in length, and herein lies the value of Mr. Atkins' discovery. We speak of it as a discovery, not an invention. Mr. Atkins, who is both an excellent musician and an ingenious mechanic, has devoted years to the construction of an instrument that would obviate some of the insuperable imperfections of the piano. In the process of experiment he hit upon the hook of the form described, and upon testing it, discovered, to his delight, the development of a new acoustic principle, the only like discovery made in nearly a thousand years. When struck, the hook gives out not only a pure unstained tone, but a perfect harmonic. It would be long to tell how many years have been wasted by musicians in reaching after the effect which Mr. Atkins produces by this contrivance. Liszt himself spent some years in experimenting with tuning forks, but found himself limited to a scale of about four and a half octaves. Others have tried, and after tedious labor have met with no better success. The attempts to construct a keyed instrument out of steel have hitherto been failures. Now imagine Mr. Atkins seated at this novel instrument. It is as if a musical box fifty times enlarged were playing. The high notes have all the brilliancy of strings, but in descending the scale the tones approach the timbre of wind instruments, like the organ. The purity of tone throughout makes other musical sounds comparatively coarse. It is continued and singing, and its volume is regulated by the touch of the player and the pressure of the pedal; its only harmonic is the octave. It is a wonderful success, considering the steel hooks were forged upon an ordinary anvil, and have flaws and imperfections that will be avoided when they are cut by proper machinery. Doubtless there will be many modifications and improvements, but there can be none in the acoustic principle developed. Theoretically its power is without limit. It would be as easy to give it a range of ten octaves as seven, and its volume may be vastly increased by greater bulk in the steel hooks. Chimes could be as readily constructed as an instrument for the concert room or parlor. As there is no tension, it can not get out of tune, and nothing about it out of order but the action. Its simplicity, its durability, its quality of tone, its possible cheapness of construction, point it out as the instrument on which the "music of the future" will be played in nearly every house in the country.

AMERICAN ART AND GERMAN MAGNANIMITY.—Under this head the Christian Union (the Rev. H. W. Beecher's Organ), has the following remarks:

At that very interesting trial of skill which took place at the recent German Musical Festival—we mean the Sing-Tournament—an incident occurred which reflects great credit upon both the American and the German character. In one of the departments, there appeared (for the first time, we believe, at any of these German festivals) an American club, the Choral Society of Washington. As this company filed upon the stage, the contrast between their very physique and that of their Teutonic rivals was striking; and when they began to sing, the difference was still more manifest in the timbre of their voices. Now the Germans have been always charged—especially by disappointed American performers and composers—with clannishness and prejudice against everything that does not emanate from a German source. We do not doubt that there is some truth in the accusation. They naturally prefer the types of art with which they are most familiar, and which they have made illustrious in all the world. They naturally turn with disgust from the crudities and the superficialities which sciolists would fain palm upon the unskilled public as works of merit, using the matchless skill of German performers to cover their deception.

On the occasion to which we have alluded, American art was most fortunate in its representatives. The Washington Choral Society, under the leadership of a young amateur of the Capital, furnished the best example of perfect choral singing, so far, at least, as dynamic chiaroscuro, the light and shade of expression—was concerned, that it was ever our good fortune to hear. Yet an old and eminent German professor said to us: "Ah! you must have German voices, if you want the true music of the Männerchor." He preferred the broad, rich diapason effect of the organs to which he had been accustomed—coarse and strident as he confessed they frequently were—to the more graceful, flexible, Italianesque voices of the Americans. It was only a question of galatin aux truffes and champagne against lager, leberwurst and kartoffel-salat.

But what we wish to signalize in the affair is the generous reception accorded by the Germans to their American brethren, their hearty appreciation of genuine excellence in an unexpected quarter, and the still more creditable sequel which we proceed to specify. In the first place, the prize (a $700 piano-forte) was awarded to the Americans; in the second place, the German managers added a present of a harp; and finally a subscription has been started to make the $700 Steink a $1500 Steinway. This is honor at once bestowed and reflected. We shall not soon forget the pride and pleasure awakened in us by the full-voiced Teutonic salutation, the showers of bouquets, and the evident largeness of welcome with which the American society was received on that occasion by an audience purely German, and the unstinted applause that was heaped upon them as they retired. And we rejoice especially to know that such magnanimity will draw other American Societies within this most salutary art influence, and that that progress of our people in music which is almost entirely referable to it will thus receive a new impulse, and lay us under fresh obligations to our German fellow-citizens, to whom we already owe so much.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Songs. J. R. Roeckel.
- | | | |
|-------------------------|-------------|----|
| No. 1. Orphan Gertrude. | 4. D to e. | 35 |
| " 2. Midnight Song. | 4. Eb to e. | 40 |
| " 3. Going to Sleep. | 4. A to d. | 35 |
- "The shadows grow and multiply.
I hear the thrushes evening song."
"The moon looks down on a world of snow,
And the midnight lamp is burning low."
"Orphan Gertrude,
Little bird out in the rain:—"
The above complete give an idea of the text of these three songs, which is in exquisite taste, and the melodies are well adapted. The mixture of major and minor keys give an air of sadness to the music, which will be none the less effective for that, and all are well calculated for Alto or Baritone voices.
- Happy Hours of Long Ago. Song and Chorus.
- | | | |
|------------|------------|----|
| 3. C to f. | M. Keller. | 40 |
|------------|------------|----|
- Fine lithograph title and taking song.
Waiting for Papa. 2. G to f. F. Wilder. 40
Lithograph title. Pretty child's song.

Instrumental.

- La Bohemienne. Fant. Brillante. 5. G. E. Ketterer. 60
A compound of lightness, brilliancy and power, and very effective when played with spirit.
- Happy Thoughts. 3 Easy Pieces. L. Streabbog. 25
No. 2. Rondo Villageois. 2. C.
Reminds one of an air in Martha. Very neat, and will bear a strong accent. For little learners.
- No. 3. Reverie. 3. F. E. Mack. 30
Golden Echoes.
No. 1. Ye Merry Birds. March. 2. F.
Well-known favorite melody.
- No. 3. Danube River Mazurka. 3. G.
There are 24 "Echoes" in the set, but the "Danube" echoes resound as pleasantly as any.
- No. 4. Little Maggie May. 3. G.
The variations are too short to be tedious, and all is pleasing.
- No. 5. Russian National Hymn. 2. Ab.
Melody of the "Prayer for Peace."
- Cape Girls Galop. 2. F. L. Mason. 30
Good for Cape girls, but all are welcome to galop to it. Try it on the sea sands.
- Golden Stars. Six Easy Dances. L. Streabbog.
No. 4. Polka Mazurka. 2. G. 25
" 5. Galop. 2. C. 25
" 6. Quadrille. 2. 40
The Quadrille is more difficult than the others. The whole set excellent for beginners.
- Rhine Galop. 3. Bb. Henry Eckmeier. 30
Varied by runs, beats, arpeggios, chords and octave passages. Powerful and brilliant.
- Tyrolean Song without Words. 3. G. E. Palat. 30
Of the general character of "Sounds from Home"
Waltzes. Very rich and sweet.
- Le Chant de Berceau. (Cradle Song). 5. F. E. Ketterer. 40
Charming lullaby. Modulates to the key of D and back again, and is brightly graceful.
- Three Sonatas for Four Hands. Pleyel.
No. 3. 4. 50
Like the other numbers, neat, classical and sweet.
- Mignonne Fantasie. 4 hands. 4. C. Concone. 75
Air and variations, with a pretty "Italian air" character.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 792.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 12, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 10.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Faith.

Silence forever in the boundless sky!
No voice from out its depths of starry light!
Raise your wild pleadings higher and more high,
Day answers not, nor yet the solemn night;
And the great throbbing sea, from age to age,
Rolls the same measures on its beaten shore;
Its waves, that sometimes murmur, sometimes rage,
Are inarticulate forevermore.
Turn ye to men, whose ever eager minds
Search past and present for some sure reply,—
One in another man his idol finds,
One fancies Science solves Life's mystery.
Then say, sad hearts, where can ye rest your faith?
The faith itself is all that answereth.

Carl Loewe's Story of his Early Life.*

I. LOEBJÜN.

In travelling by rail, dear reader, from Köthen to Halle, you will touch, among other stations, that of Stohnsdorf. To the right, away beyond Stohnsdorf, you will see a tower peep forth. This is the church tower of the little town of Löbejün. Here was I, JOHANN CARL GOTTFRIED LOEWE, born in the year 1796, on the 30th of November. My birthday was also the name-day of my father, Andreas Löwe. I was the youngest of twelve brothers and sisters. My father came originally, from Könnern, and had married a rich maiden, Marie Leopold, the daughter of a rope-maker. Accordingly I wished as a child to become a rope maker; the quiet handiwork, which then seemed to me so favorable to free thoughts and dreams, pleased me. When I said that my mother was a rich young lady, I should have added that her "great fortune" amounted to just 1500 thalers ($1125). According to the ideas by which things were measured in my native town at that time, this was a considerable amount of wealth, which my mother brought to my father in the form of a house, a barn, and half a dozen acres of ploughed land.

The house and barn lay back of the school-house. My father was Cantor and teacher in the village. He lodged with his superior, the rector Noesselt, a little man with a great black peruke, and with the Cen-rector Reichel, in the school-house.

Our dwelling room was warm and comfortable in winter. Under it the second class of boys were warmed by anthracite coal, a heating material not commonly in use at that time, but which was there to be had in abundance, as Löbejün has large coal mines employing 300 miners.

The peculiar life of these people busied my childish fancy in a lively manner. I often stood at the mouth of the shaft, when the men went down; but if one of them proposed to take me down with him, I felt no particular inclination to descend into that dusky world. But my vivid imagination painted before me very clearly what an awful aspect it must have worn down there. My fancy wrought sufficiently to give me a lively picture of that subterranean labor in such close relation with the spirit world; it impressed this very deeply on my soul, and when in later years I composed music to L. Giesebrecht's ballad of "The Miner" (Der Bergmann), all these impressions were revived in me and came before me vividly.

* Translated for DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC from "DR. CARL LOEWE'S Selbst-biographie. Für die Öffentlichkeit bearbeitet von G. H. BITTER. Berlin, 1870."

In the winter my mother used to get our dinner ready in the great three-windowed sitting-room, and as I was fond of peeping into the pots, I was obliged, as soon as I became a little stronger, to help her in all sorts of ways, as bringing water, going to market, &c. I took delight in working with her.

Early one morning I was sitting at the window, gazing now upon the market place, and now upon the hands of my mother, busy with her household duties, when suddenly the great magisterial usher of the town, Herr Becker, who pleased himself best with the title of Unter-Offizier, walked in. The great man closed the door, raised his hand to his cap in military style, and spoke, as well as I could understand, as follows: "His honor the Rath (Mayor) would request the Herr Cantor, with the first class of boys, on the coming in of the New Century, to spring from the tower."—My heart sought vent through a scream of horror; I really thought that my father and the school-boys were to celebrate the great day by pitching themselves headlong from the tower. And not until it was explained to me, that the Herr Unter-Offizier had said not spring, but sing, were my fears quieted.

And so the good Löbejüners ushered in the New Century with the beautiful old melody of the Chorale: "Ich singe dir mit Herz und Mund" (I sing to Thee with heart and mouth).

The mention of this Chorale reminds me of another event, which made some impression on my mind. A married couple in our town were about to celebrate their golden wedding, and at that time it was the custom for the school children to sing a Chorale in the house of the jubilee pair. For that service they were richly rewarded with wedding cakes. "Please Papa," I begged, "let me sing with them, the Jänke's have such lovely cookies." "Thou art too little now, it would not do," said my father. "But I can sing just as well as the big ones."—"Only see what possesses the child's imagination," said the father turning to the mother. "But he is right, he sings quite as well, and better too." "Then I'll come along!" I cried with new hope. "Thou stayest here," decided the father; "such little boys don't go there with the rest. Thou shalt go with me after dinner into our potato field and gather in the potatoes as I take them from the earth."

I fancy I made somewhat of a wry face at such a consolation, in which there was not the slightest allusion to cakes. "Thou dost not like field labors?" said my father with a smile; "I'll tell thee what: Study Latin industriously, then thou need'st not work in the field. To improve the time, we'll take the grammar with us into the field this very day."

The wedding anniversary came, my father took his peruke from the peg, hung his choir mantle over his shoulders, and the happy singers assembled with their little flags before our door; away they went toward the festal, decorated wedding house.—I ran on behind them, heard my father and the children sing the Chorale: "Sei Lob und Ehr' dem höchsten Gut" to the melody: "Es ist das Heil uns kommen her," but also saw how they consumed the cakes, and tears of bitterest grief ran down my cheeks.

How deeply such impressions fasten themselves in a child's mind! Even at this day, if I play upon my organ in St. James' church the tune: "Es ist das Heil," there creeps over me a feeling of sadness, and the choir scholars with the wedding cakes, the little festive house, and the father with his peruke and chorister's mantle, step vividly back before my soul.

The potato task just now alluded to was conscientiously performed upon that wedding day, and I had to stoop industriously for every one of the potatoes. My father took care that I should observe attentively all there was about me, and kept my eye for useful labor always open. While we were on the way, I was to let nothing lie that was worth picking up.

"Why do Cantor Löwe's fruit trees always bear more than our own?" the Löbejüners asked each other; that was known only to my father and to me. That industry, which in other places is carried on by so many, was here pursued by us alone. I had to collect with care the horse dung that lay out on the road. For that purpose I took with me a spade and a little bag. The manure thus collected I had to lay into a furrow at the feet of the fruit trees, where it was dissolved by the rain. The road, too, that led past our front garden wall, was made useful to the cultivation of our garden. From there the muddy rainwater ran down into the town. Now in the rainy times we lifted stones out from the wall so that the water might trickle through, and in a trice our garden was watered in the most fruitful manner. As we were accustomed to a useful exercise of our active faculties, so too our powers of observation were awakened. We listened to the birds and watched their goings on. A nut tree stretched its branches over the garden wall; crows one by one bore off the nuts into the neighboring field and buried them. With my sharp eye I saw the tiniest sprout of this bird gardening, and I transplanted it into our garden. With joy I think of that beautiful time of early youth. With what delight I rested during the warm summer nights in the little straw huts in which I had to watch the ripening fruit. On the clean straw one slept not badly; before me burned a cheerful fire, but near me lay an innocent pistol laden with mere powder for effect. But not alone to practical life was my attention turned; the intellectual field too was cultivated with zeal, though partly in an original way enough.

Türk's "60 Hand-pieces" were played through assiduously. But the most important note treasure of our house consisted in a corpulent volume which contained the evangelical Chorales, copied in my father's own hand, and provided with signatures. How often did I hear these earnest melodies! Indeed I may say that I owe very much to the simple beauty of this old music; for on the foundation of the Chorale every true musical talent will develop itself happily.

Quite original was the way in which, under my father's leading, on Good Friday, the passion and death of our Saviour were musically represented in the Löbejün parish. Every singer had to take the hymn book in his hand, open at the history of the Passion printed in the Appendix, and himself set to music the character assigned to him; thus the part that fell to me on my first public appearance was that of the Maid, who says: "Verily thou also art one of them, for thy speech bewrayeth thee." To this day I remember how I sang those words. Of course everything had to be conceived in a church-like sense, and the style of expression approximated to that of the Responsoria in the Catholic liturgy.

How deeply must the musical feeling have been rooted in the inmost being of the inhabitants of the Saxon province, where these peculiar Good Friday performances were possible and found acceptance! Here in Pomerania, had I desired such a thing of my scholars, I should not have been understood at all.

(To be Continued.)

Concerning Certain Great Pianists.

Than John Baptiste Cramer, the eldest son of William Cramer, a violinist, and native of Mannheim, who took up his residence in England on being nominated chamber-musician to the sovereign, and leader of the King's theatre and the ancient concerts—no one of greater celebrity in his peculiar vocation—that of a pianist—can possibly be named. Brought over to England at a very early age by his father, he may truly be said to have become, in every sense of the word, an English musician. The elder Cramer, being passionately attached to his own instrument, had resolved that his elder as well as his younger son should excel in the same instrument that he himself had. As soon, therefore, as the youthful John Baptiste's hand could grasp the finger-board of a violin, he was put to the practice of that instrument. That the violin was, however, by no means to the boy's taste, may be inferred from the fact that he shirked practice whenever he found an opportunity of doing so, and was invariably found, at the early age even of six years, secretly practising upon an old harpsichord. Although his father—like many other self-willed parents—was most unwilling to give his consent to his son's adoption of that instrument, as the means of his future livelihood, he was at last prevailed upon by numerous friends and acquaintances to permit this mere child to follow the bent of his own inclination. Making the best of the matter, he forthwith apprenticed him to a German professor, named Benser, from whom he was not long after transferred to Schoter, a celebrated Polish pianist and composer, who, having been brought over from Warsaw, obtained the favor and enjoyed the patronage of the Prince of Wales. With this master the young John Baptiste remained but a single year, being next placed with the justly celebrated Muzio Clementi, who was so great a proficient on the harpsichord that Schoter himself, when asked on his arrival in England whether he could play his (Clementi's) compositions, replied that "they were only to be performed by the author himself, or the devil!" Under this master, John Baptiste Cramer studied with the utmost perseverance till he was thirteen years of age, when, after another year's assiduous practice, he began, for the first time, to play in public. Although somewhat jealous of the growing reputation of his pupil, Clementi was clever enough to perceive that he would not only eclipse himself, but every other competitor—an opinion he, it is said, was at the utmost pains to disseminate. After a brief exercise of his profession in England, the young pianist proceeded to the Continent, where, being only seventeen years of age, he was looked upon and received as a prodigy. In 1791 he came back to England, his reputation having been largely increased by his publication in Paris of several sonatas for his favorite instrument—the piano-forte. There is no reliable information extant to tell us that he now made any great way amongst his own countrymen; the information with reference to that period of his career being so scanty as to make it to be naturally inferred that he had to submit to the mortification of discovering that a "musician" had no more reason than a "prophet" to expect that he would find honor "in his own country, or in his father's house." He, therefore, again started speedily for the Continent, and visited Italy, as well as Vienna. At the latter capital he renewed the friendship he had formed with Haydn, during that master's visit to London, to write the most celebrated series of his symphonies for Salomon—a circumstance which tended very considerably to his (Cramer's) ultimate professional advantage. On his return home he married, and at once settled in London as a professional pianist, composer, and pianoforte teacher, where his fame continued to increase year by year with undiminished rapidity. With respect to his peculiar qualifications as a pianist, brilliancy of touch, genuine taste, and exquisite sensibility may be said to have been marvellously prominent.

Early impressions are invariably the most permanent, and doubtless, from the circumstance of John Baptiste Cramer being the first eminent pianoforte player to whom I was privileged to listen, my "Recollections" of him are the more vivid. At the time I first heard him I had myself become acquainted with his "Exercises," which I still believe to be the very best extant, and by many degrees superior to those of Kalkbrenner or Czerny, by whose Studies Cramer has now been wholly superseded. I was not, however, prepared for such effects as he produced, the charm of which was not so much derived from his brilliant manipulation as from the feeling his exquisite, purely cantabile playing produced. In point of taste, expression, and feeling, I believe John Baptiste Cramer to have been unrivalled; for he possessed the power of making the pianoforte "sing," as if it were a human voice, perfectly under control.

At a later period than that to which I am referring, when Hummel was in England, the four greatest pianists of the day met at the house of a mutual friend—an amateur of universally acknowledged celebrity, Mr. Alsager, as I believe—Hummel, Kalkbrenner, Moscheles, and Cramer. The first having been asked to play, improvised at some length, but by no means with his usual facility of invention or execution. When he had finished Kalkbrenner and Moscheles were requested to give some "touch of their quality." Each having absolutely refused to do so, Cramer was asked to contribute to the gratification of the company. For some time he also declined, but being earnestly pressed by Hummel that he would let him hear what he could do, because of what had been told him as to his reputation, he at length consented. Sitting down to the pianoforte after his usual unpretending manner, he began one of Beethoven's Sonatas, then almost entirely new to English—although by no means so to German ears. In a few minutes the whole audience were literally entranced, and sat breathlessly listening to every note and phrase of the several motivos, which seemed to reveal some new inspiration at every turn. When he had concluded, Hummel rushed up to him, seized him in his arms, and kissed him on each cheek, exclaiming, "Never till now have I heard Beethoven!" To their credit, be it said, both Kalkbrenner and Moscheles, although not after quite so demonstrative a manner, echoed Hummel's praise; for, to all intents and purposes, they too had been made to understand—perhaps for the first time—the intention of "the giant of harmony," which they had hitherto failed to comprehend or appreciate to its full extent.

Of Kalkbrenner, there is no need that I should speak at any length. Although he obtained a prominent position about this period, and was much fêted and followed, he never by any chance touched the feelings, or gave an indication of being anything else than a mere brilliant machinist. His execution was indeed prodigious; but he could play scarcely any other compositions than his own with anything like taste or proficiency, and the almost total absence of genuine method or phrasing therein caused a repetition to be both tedious and wearisome. Most of Kalkbrenner's compositions were little less than frivolous fantasies, consisting of five or six variations upon some popular Italian (operatic) air, an English ballad, or a vulgar Scotch song, which, being anything but agreeable when even performed by himself, were absolutely intolerable whenever they were attempted by either inferior performers or mere commonplace amateurs.

Incomparably superior to Kalkbrenner in every respect was Cipriani Potter—a really sound musician and a genuine artiste, who must always be remembered with gratitude for having at a very early period of his career manifested a decided preference for Beethoven's works, as he has in later years manifestly stood up against unmitigated opposition to those of Schumann. As, in the former instance, he was somewhat ridiculed by older members of the musical profession for his devotion to Beethoven, on the presumption that he was too young to appreciate that composer's peculiar merits, so he has been in later years sneered at for his admiration of Schumann, on the ground that he has become old and infatuated. As, however, Cipriani Potter has lived to witness his own enthusiasm for the older "master" equalled by the whole profession, so it is devoutly to be hoped that he may be spared a few years longer to ascertain that his judgment has been quite as sound with regard to the latter. It has been my privilege to hear Mr. Potter play on numerous occasions, as well as to enjoy the honor of his friendship, and I have no hesitation in saying that, after John Baptiste Cramer, he must be reputed to have been, between the years 1810-22, nulli secundus.

Another pianist, of foreign extraction, Pio Cianchetti, made an ephemeral sensation about this time, but failed to secure a permanent position. But for his having come to England in 1809, to act for Mme. Catalani as her pianist and accompanist, and returning with her for the same purpose in 1822, it is doubtful whether he would ever have obtained the slightest consideration. So far as my memory serves, I should say he was the most flimsy player I ever heard during this or any other time: for both his execution and his compositions were of the most mediocre quality. It was, however, far different with respect to Moscheles, whose command over the keyboard of the piano was truly extraordinary, whether considered in relation to force, delicacy, or rapidity of execution. As Mme. Catalani burst through all the fetters commonly imposed upon other singers, so Moscheles seemed to disdain all technical rules, because of his having been thoroughly acquainted with them. As the opinion of a well instructed critic—whose opinion had great influence about this time—thoroughly coincides with my own, I have the less hesitation in quoting it respecting the talent of this eminent German professor, to whom the Leipzig Conservatoire, in later times, owed so much of its excellence and pre-eminence as the very best modern training school of the Fatherland. This critic says: "Moscheles' wrist, hand, and finger-joints exhibited a variety of position and a pliability that were truly wonderful; yet so nicely did he control his touch that when, from the elevation of his hand, the spectator might have expected its descent in thunder, as it were, the ear was never shocked with the slightest harshness. There was a spring and an elasticity in his fingers when applied to quick arpeggio passages, that brought out the most brilliant tones, whilst in those touching movements that constitute generally what is termed expression, his manner was no less effective. But the most extraordinary part of Moscheles' playing was perhaps the velocity and certainty with which he passed from one distant interval to another. His thumbs—they were very large and thick—"seemed to act as intermediate points, from which his fingers were directed almost to the remote parts of the instrument, over which they flew with a rapidity wholly inconceivable; yet the uniformity of his touch and tone was so strictly observed, that an imperfect note was never, and an unfinished note seldom, heard. Every great player has his forte; but in this species of execution Moscheles was unrivalled." With respect to expression Moscheles was, however, considerably inferior to John Baptiste Cramer. Had he possessed this quality in proportion to his other excellences, I should have pronounced him as one of the greatest pianists I ever heard. Failing, however, in this most important feature, it never could be said of him, as of his truly eminent contemporary, that although he "Could swell the soul to rage," it was within his means to

"Kindle soft desire."

—English Magazine.

The Passion Play.

THIS SEASON'S REPRESENTATION AT OBER-AMMERGAU.

[Correspondence of the Tribune.]

A busy place is Ammergau on the day before the play. All during the morning troops of boys are carrying things to the theatre for use on the morrow. The communal council holds an extraordinary sitting; the booth proprietors are erecting their frail structures, while the hotels are constantly receiving fresh instalments of visitors. Toward evening the crowd in the village increases every few minutes, showing that the friendly invitation issued by the community of Ober Ammergau has been well received. This little invitation document read as follows: "The Passion Play at Ober Ammergau, in Upper Bavaria. From the southern border of the German empire we send friendly invitation into all the provinces of the German Fatherland, as far as the shores of the North and East seas, to visit the performance of the Passion Play in Ober Ammergau, interrupted last year by the war, and which will be continued in the present summer. (Then follow the days of performance). May the Passion Play, this heritage from primitive times in Germany, see very many German brothers, from north and south, united in love as members of the newly arisen German empire: The community of Ober Ammergau." Many peasants had walked a distance of over one hundred miles; some hundreds had walked from various parts of the Tyrol; the neighboring mountain villages had furnished a good quota; while the carriages and post-wagons brought some few hundreds of English and American tourists. I noticed two eminent German theatre directors among the guests, the one from the Berlin court-theatre, the other from Brunswick. English clergymen, in their church coats, were conspicuous for their numbers; and the cockney dialect and tourist manners were, unfortunately, well represented.

COMMENCEMENT OF THE PLAY.

The eve of the festival-day is announced to the stranger in Ober Ammergau by the village music band, headed by the village firemen in state ornaments, passing through the principal street at 7 o'clock, going to the theatre. We were waked up early in the morning by the firing of a cannon, and at 5 o'clock all the bells are rung, and people begin to turn out of their houses to enjoy the fresh air and the novelties of the scene. The play commenced at 8 o'clock, but as early as 6 long rows of peasants were seen before the doorways, patiently waiting to enter. The sky had been overclouded in the early morning, and rain was threatened; but it cleared up as the people began to take their seats in the theatre, continuing very pleasant during the entire performance. At 7 o'clock the theatre was filled (except the reserved seats), and we had time, not only to examine the theatre, but also the surrounding country. To the right rose a lofty mountain, sparsely covered with trees, and dotted here and there with hay huts; to the left was a high range, and between the mountain stretches the valley of the Ammer, with the little village of Unter Ammergau in the distance. Pure mountain breezes passed across our faces, high above us larks were warbling in the air, singing songs of thanks to the warm sunshine. Though the theatre itself has often been described, a brief description of it is necessary, to understand the play. The whole structure reminded us, as we entered, of a traveling theatre, except that it was of larger dimensions and open at the top. The seats, which form rows of benches, rise as we retire from the stage, the box places being in the rear, and covered over by roofing. Thus from every part of the theatre the view upon the stage was unhindered, and hardly a word was missed, even in the extreme corners. There were in all 65 benches, each capable of holding 70 to 80 persons, the last 15 rows alone being under cover. The stage was the most noteworthy part of the structure. Before us, first of all, we saw the proscenium, an open space, 80 feet long, and 15 to 20 feet broad. It is generally occupied by the chorus or for some street scenes, and that of Jesus carrying the cross, in which nearly 500 persons are seen. Back of this the stage proper was erected, bounded on either side by a narrow, two storied building with balconies and folding-doors; the building on the right, as we faced the stage, was the house of the high priest, Annas, that on the left the house of Pilate. Close beside each of the houses, open gateways allowed us to see into the streets of Jerusalem, through which the processions at times came and disappeared. The middle stage had 12 movable scenes, and it was used for the tableaux vivants, including some of the principal scenes, the crucifixion, resurrection, etc. The whole theatre seats easily 5000 persons. On the stage 500 persons had ample room. The orchestra was entirely composed of natives of the village, dressed in plain uniforms, with hunters' caps. It was well directed, and the music was very fine. Stringed instruments predominated.

Precisely at 8 o'clock, the second cannon-boom announced that the Passion Play had commenced; the music began, and the chorus, or, as beautifully expressed in German, guardian spirits, entered upon the stage from either side, led by the choragus. They advanced toward the centre, one after the other, met and turned toward the audience, forming a curved line nearly the whole way across the wide proscenium. The spirits had an important part to play during the entire performance, and were at the same time peculiarly attractive in dress, action, and song. The chorus consisted of 20 persons, including the choragus, who occupied the centre of the stage. At his side, on the right and left, were three male spirits, and then on each side of these were six female figures. The tallest stood in the centre, and the figures were so arranged as to gradually diminish in stature on either side. The dresses were peculiarly rich in color, the forms good, the faces generally very attractive. The choragus wore a long alb of cashmere, reaching to the sandaled feet, and bound by a loose golden girdle. A crown of gold bound his hair, which fell upon his shoulders. He had a long, dark beard, and was pronounced one of the most handsome of men. I may add, in passing, that 20 years ago a rich German lady saw him, and was so attracted by his appearance that she offered him her hand and fortune, and they are now living in the handsomest villa in Oberammergau. The other members of the chorus were most effectively arrayed as regards the color of the dresses. The two outside ones were dressed alike. The others were all in different colors; each wore a long, loose-flowing garment of cashmere, ornamented at the bottom with silver or gold, falling to the sandaled feet, over this a kind of short muslin tunic fell nearly to the knees, and over this was a loose-flowing mantle of cashmere, of a color harmonizing with the lower garment, and trimmed with gold or silver, as contrast required. The effect of the distribution of the colors was singularly beautiful at times. After the passion scenes, it was extremely soothing to the spirit. The head was bound with a gold circlet, of patterns slightly differing, below which the hair fell upon the shoulders. One never tires of looking upon this arrangement of the chorus, of listening to the intonation of the choragus, and the singing of the entire corps of guardian spirits.

THE EXPULSION FROM PARADISE.

The curtain of the central stage was still down, the chorus was in position, when the deep bass voice of the choragus was heard, urging the human race to bend low before God, to receive grace from Zion, and telling them that God does not desire that sinners die, for He sent his Son for their salvation! The prologue changed into a song taken up by the whole chorus, whereupon the curtain of the central stage rose, exposing to view the first part of the tableaux vivants, that were so exceedingly well done that one could only compare them to wax-work figures, so accurate the position, so fixed the limbs; the chorus then retired toward the stage. The first tableau represented Adam and Eve being expelled from paradise by the angel with the flaming sword. The curtain fell, the chorus resumed its semi-circular position, sang a song of reconciliation, and then fell back into a position from the outer edges of the stage to the walls of the proscenium. After the chorus sang "Eternal God, O hear thy children's faltering prayer," the curtain rose, revealing a second tableau: A group of children kneeling before a crucifix, the symbol of salvation, while seraphic music was heard proceeding from the stage. The beautiful picture vanished in a few minutes, when the choragus repeated the prologue to the first principal scene. He pointed out the lesson taught by the tableau in deep, well expressed words, and finished by exhorting the audience to follow the Redeemer, who, through his blood, obtained for us salvation. While the choragus was still speaking, we heard the shouts of "Hosanna" in the distance, the chorus then disappeared entirely from the stage, when the central curtain was raised, exposing a scene representing the entry of Christ into Jerusalem. The central stage was opened up to its full extent, and the background was a sunny landscape. Great crowds of children with palm branches came out of one of the side streets; men, women, and children joined them, all with palm branches. In the midst of this crowd of some 300 persons, dressed in variegated costumes, the Saviour was seen sitting upon an ass. Every eye was strained to catch a glimpse of Christ (Joseph Mayr), a noble figure, and one of the best delineators of the Saviour that Ammergau has ever produced. The acting followed very closely the description given in the Bible. As the procession slowly advanced, having emerged, when about half way down the central stage, into a side street, and thence upon the proscenium, the chorus and the multitude sang, "Hail Thou! Son of David, Hosanna! Blessed is He who cometh to take possession of David's throne," etc. Christ sat with sad face upon the ass; he then descended and imparted his teachings to the people. The effect that this scene produced was remarkable. The Jesus of the people's childhood was there, the veritable Jesus that we have seen in the pictorial Bibles ever since boyhood, and the slight exclamation of surprise and wonder that rose from the people can well be understood. Christ was over six feet in height, well made, but somewhat slender, with black beard and hair, the latter falling in locks far over his shoulders. For the first part of the performance it has been said that his features were too sad, that he did not excite enough sympathy. There is truth in this; his full power, earnestness, and majesty only came fully into play during the representation of the Passion proper.

SCENE IN THE TEMPLE.

The scenes followed each other in rapid succession. While the people were singing hosannas around the Saviour, the curtain of the central stage rose, and displayed the interior of the temple, wherein buying and selling were going on. Buyers and sellers were standing around booths containing doves and other animals. The money-changers, Jews of true Polish type, were there. Christ approached them, and addressed to them the words, "My house is the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves," overturning at the same time one of the money-tables. I shall not attempt to follow the play through the 18 following scenes, nor describe the many beautiful tableaux vivants. From the beginning to the end it was one sublime whole, of which I can only give a slight idea. The second act represented the sitting of the high court of the Sanhedrim; Caiaphas, Annas, priests and counsellors sitting in judgment as to what should be done with Christ. The preceding tableau was that of Jacob's sons keeping their sheep; Joseph, in his flowery garment, advancing toward them, while the brothers were plotting his destruction. The third act, representing the parting in Bethany, was one of the very best of the morning scenes. It is preceded by two significant tableaux—first, the departure of young Tobias from his parents; secondly, the lamenting bride, in the Song of Solomon—both having reference to the parting of Jesus from his mother, the explanation being given in the usual way by the singing chorus. "Where is He gone—where is He gone—the grandest of all people?" said one part of the chorus, as the bride's song of lamentation, to which the other answered, "Dearest soul, be comforted! Thy friend will come once more!" The music and singing were extremely simple and sweet. In the parting scene introduced by these two tableaux we had our first glimpse of Fräulein Franciska Hunger, who personated the Virgin Mary. For the Virgin, great care is taken by the committee to select a girl of the village whose fame is spotless. It is a difficult part, but one which Franciska filled to perfection. She is a charming, sympathetic being, full of tenderness, and neither she nor Christ could control their emotions at the parting scene. The eyes of both were filled with tears. During this scene the delineator of Judas had the first opportunity to exhibit his truly dramatic talent. In contrast with the deep emotion of the Virgin, Judas was lamenting at that useless outlay of 300 denarii for the precious vestment. Franciska's form was hardly so fully developed as we could wish, but her face was extremely expressive. Among the female actors Franciska took the first place; she acted her part with such power and fitness that little room was left to criticize her. Indeed, we doubt if criticism should be admitted in judging of the whole play. That has grown up with the life of the people, and is infinitely above the ordinary run of dramatic acting. The fourth act represented the last journey of Christ to Jerusalem, and is followed by the Last Supper, the betrayer and Jesus at the Mount of Olives, which usually concludes the first half of the performance, when a pause of an hour is made to give the actors and spectators time to partake of some refreshments. It must have been a great relief to the chorus, which had been standing in the hot sun a long time, and not less to the spectators not under cover, since they had not been allowed any shade except their hats. The peasant women were literally burned. The acting in the above scenes was well maintained. The role of Judas became constantly more interesting. The act representing the betrayal was introduced by a tableau, showing Jacob's sons selling their brother Joseph to the Midianitish merchant, the chorus explaining the text in song. Gregor Lechner, who personated Judas, was perhaps the finest actor among the Ammergauers. Throughout his long and arduous role he never became extravagant. It was his desire of gain that obtained the mastery over him, and he retained it until the moment when remorse seized him, as he found that he had betrayed the Master to death. When the blood-money was paid down to him, Judas grasped it and placed it in his money-bag, with an acting that was not to be surpassed. After the play was over, I noticed several parties of both Englishmen and Americans address Judas, and thank him personally for his exquisite performance. He was everywhere acknowledged to be the best actor.

CHRIST BROUGHT BEFORE THE HIGH PRIEST.

When the second part was about to commence, the youths and maidens of the chorus, in gay-colored cloaks, trooped out from right and left, and formed a line in the front of the stage. The deep voice of their leader, the choragus, was heard explaining the tableau about to be shown, and they wheeled back in two lines flanking the approach to the inner theatre just as its curtain rose. We had a scene represented wherein the prophet of God received a blow for speaking the truth to Ahab. This was typical of the treatment of Christ before the high priest. The figures in the tableau remained motionless as rocks for several minutes, until the curtain slowly fell again, and the chorus renewed its line across the front. When the song was over, the singers filed off to either side, and the action of the play was taken up. Jesus was seen dragged as a prisoner before the high priest, taken up into the balcony of his house, and questioned with brutal harshness. Many accusers appeared against the captive, and the rabble clamored against him; but he retained his patient dignity, and answered nothing. He was cuffed on the face by a serving man for refusing to speak, and that sensation of looking on at cruelty which it was intended to foster in this part of the play, began to grow strong with the spectators. Joseph Mayr sustained the lefty character assigned to him with perfect skill. It was impossible to see him brought by degrees to his death without a warmer and warmer sympathy with his terrible position. The spectators dwelt on every detail of this mockery of justice with painful interest. Even the rather lengthy proceedings before Caiaphas were watched unweariedly by an attentive "house," and each step of the visits to Pilate and to Herod was gazed at with eagerness. Pilate was very well rendered by Tobias Flunger, who himself played the principal part in former years. The cold dignity of the Roman noble was fully brought out. His utter disdain of the accusers of Christ could scarcely be concealed, though he ultimately yielded to their clamor. It was a most effective scene—wonderfully effective, considering the circumstances of the play—when Pilate, in the balcony of his house, one of the permanent balconies that flanked the inner theatre, received Jesus for judgment, and was inclined to release him. The Jews cried loudly for blood; the Roman governor, in his purple robe, remained sternly impassive, and the bright equipments of his legions glittered in the sunshine. We were all of us so intent on the play that the surroundings of Ober Ammergau seemed quite forgotten. The spectators were carried back to Jerusalem, to the time of the unjust accusation, and of the shouting rabble which demanded that Christ should die. We could almost shudder for them as we heard them exclaim, "Sein Blut komme über uns und unsere Kinder!"

MERITS OF THE PERFORMANCE.

There is one reason why the fact of acting in the open air in broad daylight should help rather than hinder the effect of the scenes. Most of them were supposed to occur in the open air and in broad daylight, and no arrangement of theatrical gas jets could be so much like nature as a glow of real sunshine. It would be different in case of rain. But then, rain would spoil in any case such a meeting as that of Ober Ammergau. We were most fortunate, yesterday, in having all the freshness of the previous night's shower with a blaze of sunshine well suiting the supposed scene of action in Judea. These peasant actors were so little "made up" that they could bear daylight. Their hair and beards were worn according to the requirements of their particular parts, so that no knocking about on the stage could disarrange them. It was a great point to have this natural preparation complete. Another point in favor of the effect of the Passion play, despite its being given in the open air, is the very strong array of secondary characters which the village can produce. I cannot style them "supers" in current stage parlance, for they were as much in earnest, and often as artistic in their way as the principal actors. From the round-about chubby little urchins who stood so immovable in the tableaux vivants, to the stalwart men who depicted the Roman soldiers with such brutal simplicity and truthfulness, all did their parts with good effect. The Romans were rigidly drilled. There was no comparing the followers of the high priest with them for a moment. These last had helmets and spears, and a somewhat military look, but the villagers brought out very clearly the fact that the Roman discipline was far superior. It was the bright, strong legionaries, nevertheless, who were shown us in the midst of their odious task of persecuting Christ. They were the blind instruments of the sins of others, and their combination of personal indifference with ferocious rivalry was very well realized.

THE CROWN OF THORNS.

We were also shown a good tableau of the murder of Abel, to introduce us to the scene of the remorse and suicide of Judas. The appearance of the treacherous disciple before the sanhedrim and his passionate appeal to the elders to undo his work, and his flinging back of the blood money amid their sarcastic laughter, was most vividly rendered. There was the same difficulty about its being night time, when the moment of the suicide approached, as there was with the scene on the mount of Olives. But though this difficulty puts the out-door play at a disadvantage, yet, by shading the middle stage from the sun rather more than it was previously shaded, an effect of gloom was certainly produced. The actual suicide was not shown, for the curtain fell just as Judas had attached his girdle to the branch of a tree. It was not intended to lessen the force of the final sacrifice by allowing other scenes of too painful a nature to be witnessed beforehand. Thus, though a little later on Jesus was discovered, when the curtain arose, bound to a pillar, where he had been scourged by the soldiery—we did not actually watch the scourging. The most shocking thing which was seen before the crucifixion, was the pressing on to the head of our Lord of the crown of thorns. This was done with a grim appearance of reality by two soldiers, who crossed their spears over the crown to press it down. But it was done in a moment, and the spectators had but time to give a gasp of horror, when the meek head which had sunk under the pressure was raised again with patient dignity. We were coming to the end of the play—coming slowly but surely, with a fixed and sorrowful interest, which seemed more and more to take hold of every one present. Pilate had brought out Christ and Barabbas, and had set them before the people, and the people had clamored for the release of the murderer. The Roman had washed his hands of the innocent blood which was to be shed, and an officer of his household had read aloud, from the balcony, the warrant for the execution. Then we had the sad procession winding across the outer stage on the way to Calvary, and a most pathetic interlude, when the Virgin Mary, entering the extreme left, heard the murmur of the advancing crowd, and half feared, half wondered what it might be. She caught sight of Jesus, and fell back into the arms of those who were with her, sobbing out, "My son! my son!" It was not until the procession had moved out of sight, after Simon of Cyrene had been compelled to take up the cross, which Jesus could no longer support, that the spectators could breathe freely for a moment. The chorus came upon the outer stage, robed in black. There was no tableau shown, but the tapping of hammers could be heard behind the curtain of the inner theatre, as Jesus was nailed upon the cross. The leader of the chorus sang, or rather recited, in deep melancholy tones, a description of the sacrifice which was to be offered, and all the singers joined in solemnly at the end with these words:—

O bringet dieser Liebe
Nur fromme Herzenstriebe
Am Kreuzaltar
Zum Opfer dar!

CHRIST'S DEATH AND RESURRECTION.

The chorus wheeled back to either side as the curtain rose, and we saw the cross about to be raised on the middle stage, with its living burden already attached to it. This was the crowning moment of the whole play. The two thieves were discovered crucified to the right and left of the middle stage, and were merely hung the traditional way, with their arms bent over the arms of the cross, not nailed to it. The large cross on which Jesus was nailed was seen slowly rising between the other two, and it was impossible to distinguish how the body was attached, supposing, as we must suppose, that the appearance of being nailed was feigned. Joseph Mayr possessed great physical strength, or he would never bear 20 minutes of this uncomfortable position. He was dressed in flesh-colored tights, with a cloth about his loins, and had the crown of thorns on his head. The pictorial effect was perfect. Like so many other of the scenes in the Passion play, the scene of the crucifixion was modeled on an engraving of Albert Durer, and was modeled to the life. We held our breath. We watched the soldiers and the people passing to and fro before the cross, and saw all the details of the tragedy enacted according to Holy Writ. We could but faintly wonder how the real Bavarian villager, raised aloft before our eyes, was able to endure the severe strain upon his muscles. The executioners squabbled over the clothing of their victim, the priests and elders uttered the bitterest taunts, and those money changers expelled in the opening scene from the temple were present to rejoice at the crucifixion. When all was over there was the stroke with a lance-point in the side of our Lord, and a rush of what looked like blood—so that the spectators shuddered—and the soldiers and the people withdrew from sight, and the descent from the cross was reverently and skillfully managed. The Virgin Mary, John and Mary Magdalene, with Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus, who had been present all the time, were seen supporting the body of Christ, or lamenting over it. They had to come forward a little too soon as an artistic question, on account of the immense fatigue to the chief actor of every additional minute; but they did their part very well. The curtain fell, and we had a strange feeling of relief that the worst was over. What remained to be seen was less effective, though not less earnestly played. The resurrection of our Lord was given in something between an act and a tableau. He appeared rising from the grave before the astonished soldiers, and passed quickly out of sight. Then, when He had been seen for a moment speaking to Mary Magdalene, we reached the end of the play. The chorus, once more in gay-colored cloaks, sang a joyous song of triumph, and the scene displayed on the middle stage represented Christ in the distance, with the banner of the cross in His hand, and a crowd of people kneeling before him. Unless a play were so quietly and earnestly acted, by men and women who devote themselves to it as almost a religious duty, it would be impossible for any Christian with the ideas of our generation to sit watching it. There was of necessity so near an approach to what would be sheer blasphemy, with many styles of treatment, that one can well see why Passion plays in other places have been put a stop to. All that can be said is that, where alone it now exists, the old institution is kept up with due reverence, and that it is a most curious sight to see.

New Oratorios.

(From the London Orchestra.)

The season has passed over without the presentation of a new oratorio, but the Festival Carnival in the country is to be distinguished by the advent of two fresh illustrations of the highest order in musical composition. There is good reason for the quiet of our modern oratorio writer during the great London season. Handel is pre-eminent in Exeter Hall and during this season he has not only been heard in great force in the Strand, but also with the utmost magnificence at the Crystal Palace. Further, his grand contemporary has come in—Sebastian Bach has been heard in his immeasurable work of the "Passions," and stands no longer outside. He has entered the charmed circle in his true character, and points to his hundred folios with grave yet benignant aspect, saying, "These are mine, let them be heard in their turn." Whatever may be the immediate effect from hearing the great choral school of composition which marked the art musical world of the middle of the last century we stay not to inquire, but there is one abiding result ever manifest and utterly incontrovertible. However apparent the inadequacy of the means to the end, the sensation of power in this school of composition is of the highest possible kind, it is enormous—perfect—overwhelming; and it completely dwarfs all modern effort and wipes it out of the memory. However cheering and kindly may be the public feeling to the modern oratorio composer, however merciful to his forgetfulness, his inexperience, or even his errors, watching for the good and turning away eyes and ears from the bad, still there is at work an irresistible power which governs and subdues all impulses and imaginings, and compels the hearer of Handel and Bach to the administration of a stern justice and a bowing down to the ever-living truth. The older art—the result of inherent power and prolonged exertion—reigns supreme. The life spent in acquiring a subtlety of expression, a boldness, fearlessness, and swiftness in doing the thing, is victorious and triumphant; and it is felt that modern life cannot realize such results, and hardly indeed enter into its methods and details.

There was a time, and not so very long ago, when this state of the public mind and the brush-work of the English painters were at opposite points of the compass. Haydon—the unfortunate—the ill-taught and misguided enthusiast—tells us he accompanied Sir Thomas Lawrence to visit the first display of pictures by the old masters seen in this county, and he describes in his amusing yet caustic way the wrath, petulance, and dismay of the most beloved of fashionable painters. "What do they mean by it?" said Sir Thomas, "this will do us great mischief; it will ruin us." Again, when the great picture by Rubens of the Chapeau de Paille was exhibited, Haydon took the then famed Milton-Jerusalem Martin to con it over. "How pure and brilliant, how soft and silvery, how wonderful!" said Haydon. "It is fine," rejoined Martin. "Ah!" said Haydon, "how few in these days attain to anything like this; and yet, perhaps, even this may not rank with Titian in all his tremendous effects of golden brilliancy and power of color. It is a perfect lesson to any painter." As a commentary to this, let any of our readers go to the South Kensington Gallery and look over the vaunted contents of the Vernon Collection and the works of the painters in this country of that period and the thirty years preceding it. It will be found that some of the pictures stand forth in imbecility, untruth, and deformity almost as the efforts of maniacs, and that a picture the result of right motive or unjust action is the exception. And then to turn into the next room, and see that "Blue Boy" of Gainsborough, and the specimens of Reynolds who, if here and there wanting the power of the old artists, never failed in conception or the appreciation of grand effect!

The real secret of old art is, that the artist was true to himself, true to his work, and when young labored until imagination, invention, and calculation of result filled his heart and governed his hand. Nothing was done without activity of mind and utility of spirit, and the possession of power to do in the best way whatever was required to be done. It was the union of high thought with consummate knowledge. The large heart and the lofty spirit seems to have departed with Handel. Herein Haydn fails; and, to quote the words of Beethoven, "the Creation will die." Again, with the power there must be the opportunity. A great work must be done continuously, and without effort in its mechanism. Look at the oratorios of Spohr, all ground up—one melancholy looking grist—in one Lilliputian mill. He is like the tiniest of Shetland ponies mauling round and round his confined circle, pulverizing grain against which the appetite unceremoniously revolts. Consider again the long, but not large, works of Schubert, a man well competent to do any work that could be finished by dinner-time and bring him the two florins for dinner, wine and tobacco, but utterly unequal, through necessity and position, to think out a long work, [?] and utterly wanting the power to present it in any pleasant or sufferable form. [?] The early thorough training of Handel and his Court pensions gave us the Handel oratorios. The years of solitary labor and the church position have given us the Bach Litanies, Motets, and Passiones. Give an Englishman, of good musical talent and acquirement, the run of Westminster Abbey, enough to eat and to drink and the wherewithal he can be clothed, we may then perhaps squeeze an oratorio out of him, but oratorios have never yet and never will come out of Ladies' schools, West-end concert rooms, or from men who have to run here, there and every where to give a lesson to young girls at boarding-school or at home, or to some rubicund full-blown amateur too old to work and too idle to remember. How can any one so situated gain any freedom, any power of thought, any certainty in development, any beauty of finish? Art takes its tone from the reiterated action, from the true or false life, from custom, from accident, and in these days the rule is to machine the poor artist into a state bordering on puerility if not tending to palsy. An oratorio when written must be sold, or its composer will die of starvation. If written with solemn purpose to arouse noble emotion—an utter impossibility, however, as things now stand with the English composer—who would purchase it? If written in the old school, who would listen to it? If in the modern, who could bear it? If made up of songs to sell and choruses penned in the school-room years ago as exercises—childish exercises—in single or double counterpoint, what subscriber to Exeter Hall or St. James's would ever put up with it? Unfortunately for the oratorio, Mendelssohn set the fashion of laying out its movements in parcels for sale or applause—a song here, sweet and sugary, a trio or quartet there, a tender bit, and then a fiery rush. No one in these days sends for half a ream of paper, takes the libretto and writes straight on with nothing but the dramatic intention to guide him. And yet this did Handel do. And did Handel disdain the works of his predecessors? Quite the contrary; he looked back, studied the great thoughts of the dead, and profited by their spirits and mechanisms. Now-a-days every one is flinging from his next door neighbor, and taking what is assuredly not worth the stealing. To our young hands at the oratorio we can only say—"Don't go to Paris, there is nothing there; don't go to Modern Germany, there is nothing there; look back, do as Handel did; first learn how to do it, and then consult the works of those that have done it. Leave Mendelssohn and Spohr alone; never touch Schubert or Schumann, avoid Wagner, and go back to the mummy cases that have the spirit-bird fluttering upon them. Catch the bird if you can, and you will not fail in your oratorio."

Mario's Farewell.

THE GREAT TENOR'S ADIEU TO THE STAGE—A SKETCH OF HIS LIFE, WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

LONDON, July 19, 1871.—Signor Mario, the justly celebrated tenor, has sung his farewell song, and last night bid adieu to the stage. The scene of his last public appearance was Covent Garden, and the opera chosen for the occasion was the well known and much admired "La Favorita." On the appearance of the celebrated singer the utmost enthusiasm prevailed. It proved a demonstration unparalleled almost in the history of the lyric stage. The whole audience rose to do honor to the artist, and it was some time ere the performance could proceed. All through the entertainment the emotion of the tenor was noticeable, yet he carried himself bravely through to the end. He felt the influence of the surroundings. Eleven times he was called before the curtain, to receive the homage of royalty itself, associated with the beauty, wit, talent, wealth and elegance of the British metropolis. Showers of laurel wreaths and rare flowers were strewn before the footlights at the feet of the artist. It was amid such a scene as this that the great tenor took his farewell of the stage.

Your readers will no doubt call to mind the immense furor created in New York on the appearance of Signor Mario and Mme. Grisi at Castle Garden in 1854, and as a sketch of the life of this gifted singer may not at this time be inappropriate, the particulars of his extraordinary career, as drawn by himself, will no doubt prove interesting. Thus he tells his story:

A SKETCH OF MARIO BY HIMSELF.

I was born in 1810, on the 18th October, at Cagliari, in Sardinia. My father was the Marchese di Candia. I was sent to the Military Academy, and served in the army seven years. I was aid-de-camp to my father, at Nice, where he had been appointed Governor. At that time the Duchesse de Berri made her expedition to the south of France, and I visited her on board the steamer in which she was concealed. My father being ordered to Genoa, where he also filled the post of Governor, I followed him thither, still in the same capacity. When at Genoa I was suspected of associating with those who were politically opposed to the Government, and was, in consequence, deputed to carry dispatches to Sardinia. This being evidently a pretext to get rid of me, I protested, and was anxious to appeal to the King, Carlo Alberto, against what I considered an indignity put upon me. However, the Marchese Paolucci showed me the general order and the note affixed to it, according to which, if the lieutenant objected to the duty, he was to consider himself at the disposal of the general in command—which, in fact, was equivalent to my being placed under arrest. In spite of the advice of my good friend, the Marquis, I sent in my papers to the authorities and decided to embark for Spain. It being some time before the preparations for my departure could be made, I had to conceal myself in Genoa, which, thanks to the assistance of a young lady to whom I was much attached, I successfully accomplished for a month. At the expiration of that time I took passage on board a boat bound for Marseilles, intending to proceed thence to Spain. On arriving at Marseilles and making myself known to the authorities, I was received with the greatest hospitality and strongly advised not to continue my journey as I intended, but to make my way to Paris, which advice I followed. I remained in Paris but a short time, and was persuaded to join a party going to London.

Being well acquainted with Admiral Fielding's family, through them I was introduced to the Duke of Wellington. Still anxious to visit Spain, I asked the Duke to give me some facility for so doing. He assured me it was a country in which I should make no progress—that the more energy I displayed the more enemies I should make, and the only thing I could hope for there, with any certainty, was a coup de fusil. He concluded his advice by telling me, "Amusez vous, et je ferai quelque chose pour vous plus tard." This counsel I followed to such good purpose that time passed away and with it all my money, until at last I found myself without any means of support. I then resolved to go to America, and secured a cabin on board a sailing vessel, starting from the Thames, having with some difficulty managed to scrape together £40 to pay the passage. A week before the ship was to sail I fell ill. I had to abandon the idea of going to America, and, what was worse, to forfeit the £40. During this illness I experienced the profondeur of English hospitality, and was treated like a brother by those with whom I had the good luck to become acquainted. I was urged to go to Paris to consult the doctors, and was taken there by one of my English friends in his travelling carriage.

In Paris I improved in health and made the acquaintance of the Marquis Aguado, then the director of the two theatres—the Opera and the Theatre des Italiens. I was also intimate with the Prince Belgioioso, with whom I used to sing duets en amateur. My financial circumstances, however, became so serious that I made them known to the Prince, who insisted upon my turning my vocal abilities to account. This was at first very obnoxious to me. I had looked forward to a very different career from that of an artist, which I then thought unmanly and unsuited to my tastes. But the Prince would not listen to my objections, assuring me that, were it not for family considerations, he would, in spite of his social position, go himself upon the stage. He spoke to the Marquis Aguado on my behalf, and obtained for me an engagement for three years. For the first year, which was passed in study, I received 14,000 francs, for the second 32,000, and for the third 45,000 francs. For the first six months I was placed under the tuition of Meyerbeer, whom I daily visited. No composer who ever lived took such pains with his work as Meyerbeer—and of this I had frequent opportunities of judging while studying with him.

I made my first appearance in Paris on December 1, 1838, in "Robert le Diable," at the Grand Opera. I sang there two years and a half, and played in the "Comte Ory," "Le Drapier," and other operas. In 1840 Aguado made me sing at the Italiens, where I appeared in "L'Elisir d'Amore." I really forget whether it was in 1839 or 1840 that I came out at Her Majesty's, in "Lucrezia Borgia," with Giulia Grisi, but it was about that time. I was not considered a success at any rate; and, in fact, my career did not begin until 1842, when I sang in Dublin with Tamburini, Grisi and Lablache, and with Benedict as conductor. After that I returned to Paris, and sang the "Rubini Repertoire," in which I was most fortunate. Since then my life has passed but too quickly away in going from Paris to London every season, and meeting always with the greatest kindness everywhere. In the winter of 1849 I went, for the first time, to Russia, and in 1854 to America. London and Paris, however, have been the two cities of which I shall always have the most pleasant recollections, unless it be Dublin, where I first received the greatest encouragement. Strange to say, I have never sung in Italy.

Mario's Retirement.

COMMENTS OF LONDON JOURNALS.

The Times remarks that Signor Mario had before him an admirable exemplar in the late [?] Giulia Grisi, of whom, both in comic and in serious opera, he was frequently a colleague. From Grisi he learnt a vast deal, and to such good purpose that in the course of time he became Grisi's equal, and, further on in the course of time, her superior. It is worth noting that, whereas at Her Majesty's Theatre Signor Mario used to be almost exclusively associated with Italian vocalists pur sang, he has, at the Royal Italian Opera, been continually associated with vocalists of other nationalities—German, French, Spanish, American, English, &c. All that was worth learning from the, so to speak, exotic elements by which he has so frequently been surrounded was used for his own peculiar advantage. It was no detriment to him that in the "Huguenots" and the "Prophète" he should have as his earliest partner an artist of such high intellectuality as Mme. Pauline Viardot Garcia, one of the most distinguished of musical Spaniards. He doubtless caught much from the gifted sister of Malibran, but added a grace of his own which invested with a double charm what he had appropriated. Signor Mario's genius, indeed, from the beginning was appropriate; and it was only as he advanced in years that it assumed an undeniably inventive power—a power to which in Italian Opera we are indebted for his superb impersonation of Fernando, in the "Favorita," his Raoul in the "Huguenots," and, perhaps, most striking of all, his Jean of Leyden in the "Prophète." When he first essayed the operas of Verdi, it was generally thought he would fail. But no. His "Jacopo Foscari" was a masterpiece of vocal and dramatic power not easy to forget; while in later characters of the now most popular of Italian composers, and, conspicuous among the rest, the Duke (of Mantua) in "Rigoletto," and that other Duke (of Naples) in "Un Ballo in Maschera," to say nothing of Manrico in the "Trovatore" if the fourth act, the chef d'œuvre of Verdi, be the test—he has long shone peerless. Lastly, among French operas in which Signor Mario has earned well-merited distinction may be named, "Romeo et Juliette," which many amateurs are disposed to look upon as the "capo d'opera" of M. Gounod, and which at all events has every pretension to rank with the eminent composer's "Faust"—and even with his "Birra," on the whole the most original and freshest of his dramatic pieces. None who witnessed Signor Mario's impersonation of the "star crossed lover," associated with the incomparable Giulietta of Mme. Adeline Patti, can remember it without deep and abiding interest. Romeo, Signor Mario's last new "creation," was in many respects perhaps his very finest.

The Daily News wonders how many great singers of the other sex have been rivals and successors, and challenged together, or in turns, the admiration of the world of London, while Mario ruled not merely supreme, but almost alone. Giulia Grisi, with the beauty and symmetry of an antique statue, with her superb voice and the unsurpassed splendor of her dramatic genius; Jenny Lind, the most popular and successful, if not the greatest singer to whom the world ever listened, and who quitted the field magnanimously and wisely while yet in her prime; Viardot, with her thrilling lyric power and passion; Bosio, that bright light of the firmament of song, so prematurely and suddenly extinguished; the bold brilliancy of Cruvelli; the vivid force of Piccolomini; Patti's exquisite purity and sweetness; Lucca's energy of dramatic expression; the noble classic dignity and grandeur of Tietjens; the sympathetic tenderness of Nilsson—these are only some of the names and gifts which will spring at once to every recollection as we think over the years of Mario's career. But during that time how many great tenors have crossed the stage whereon he appeared! On a small scrap of paper one might write down all their names; and it is not too much to say that not one could claim to be, in the union of lyrical and dramatic qualities, the rival of Mario. It is a wise resolve that bids him now to withdraw from the scene of so prolonged and complete a success.

The Standard speaks of Signor Mario as indebted to no accident of time, place, or association for the splendid triumphs which he has won. But the highest genius can still profit from a felicitous combination of circumstances, and the circumstances of Signor Mario's entrance to artistic life were felicitous in an eminent degree. The constant colleague of the incomparable Grisi, he was indisputably influenced by the careful study of her performances. And at no time has Signor Mario ceased to derive advantage from the artistic examples of those with whom he has associated. It is not too much to say that there has ever been noticeable in his genius a strong eclectic or appreciative power. He has ever not indeed imitated, but made indisputably his own, all that careful observation suggested as excellent, or the unerring instinct of art marked out as worthy to be followed. As Signor Mario's triumphs have been exceptionally brilliant, so the Standard thinks is the art in whose service these triumphs have been attained beyond all others happy in its nature and fortunate in its opportunities. It is the unique privilege of actor or singer that the fruition of success is almost simultaneous with its achievement.

The Daily Telegraph is of opinion that one of the most remarkable characteristics in this hero's remarkable career is its gradual development. When he first tried his powers on the lyric stage in 1838, he was simply a good-looking young nobleman with a pretty voice, ignorant of everything appertaining to the arduous profession on which he had embarked as much, perhaps, from vanity as from hope of reward. When in the succeeding year he made his début in England, it was to introduce to us what was then a character—Gennaro, in "Lucrezia Borgia,"—for which he was singularly well fitted. Signor Mario, indeed, is one of the few Gennaros over whose sleeping form Lucrezia could sing "Com' è bello, qual' incanto," without provoking a smile. The handsome appearance of the young tenor struck his hearers much more forcibly than his voice; and while stern critics spoke of his musical acquirements with contempt, he was at once dubbed the "young Romeo of the Italian stage." For many years afterwards Mario was but a "stick" in acting—a cold emitter of luscious sound. During the early part of his career he had to endure the redoubtable rivalry of the accomplished Rubini, who, with his larme dans la voix, awakened the enthusiasm of the established opera-goers. Not till 1843, when Mario created the character of Ernesto in "Don Pasquale," and witched all hearers in the famous serenade, did he achieve the honor of having an original part composed for him; but then, improving steadily both as singer and actor, he was gladly accepted as the sentimental hero for most of the lighter lyric pieces in the pure Italian school. When in 1847 the famous schism took him, in company with Grisi, to the rival establishment in Covent Garden, he began to extend his repertoire; and feeling his way by slow degrees, he developed those high histrionic powers for which he is now justly distinguished. For more than a generation—for full three and thirty years—Mario has given delight to thousands, meanwhile gradually ripening his powers, even after they had passed their meridian of perfection; atoning in his first years by natural grace for his lack of artistic training, and in his later seasons making up by consummate skill for nature's failure. Mario also has the rare advantage of a generally artistic nature. He is a draughtsman of no mean pretensions, and an archæologist of much research; hence his picturesque costumes, which are invariably not less strictly accurate than they are full of grace. Hence, too, the gestures which are as elegant as they seem unsought—as much in keeping with the character as with the situation. Mario, in fact, is artiste jusqu'au bout des ongles. Even strong democrats will feel disposed to attribute something of the eminently gentlemanlike demeanor that invariably and under all circumstances distinguishes the famous tenor, to the sangre azul which flows in the Conte di Candia's noble veins.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 12, 1871.

What Lack we Yet?

Our city, as we have seen, is well provided, even richly, with permanently organized supplies of great Orchestral music (Symphony Concerts, &c.); of Oratorio, through the Handel and Haydn Society, now drawing to itself the coöperation of the best solo artists from England; and of Chamber Music, at least those forms of it in which the Piano-forte plays the leading or the only part; while for Violin Quartets and Quintets we may count upon the Mendelssohn Quintette Club for a fair modicum, if not for all we want.

We were glad also to copy, in our last, an account of a new organization,—private and social in its purpose, to be sure, but yet such that, if it succeeds as it bids most fair to do, it must have an influence on the musical culture of the community—for the practice of Part-Songs and Choruses by men's voices, on a larger scale than the Chickering Club, or even than the Orpheus (of our German brothers),—of force enough, indeed, to be effective in a large hall. We are requested to correct one item in the statement: The number of active (singing) members is limited to sixty, instead of a hundred. Furthermore we are informed that the name of the Club will be "The Apollo." From what we know already of its roll of "actives," it will be composed of more choice singing material than we have ever had united here before, including those excellent voices which it has been a delight to hear in the Chickering and the Parker clubs, with others fit to be combined with them. The Harvard Musical Association is quite well represented in the list. And this suggests to us a new-born hope, that through the good genius of "Apollo," possibly, one element which we too long have lacked in our Symphony Concerts, that of the Choral pieces with Orchestra, of which Mendelssohn in his "Antigone" and "Œdipus" music, Schubert in choruses with more or less accompaniment of horns, &c., have given us such noble examples, may be occasionally represented. A private choir perhaps can aid, consistently with its ideal, in what is done for culture, and not at all on speculation and for money.

And this reminds us of the next need. One thing more we lack,—at least a further step in this direction. We want a chorus of mixed voices, sopranos and altos as well as tenors and basses, select, well-trained, drawn together by a common liking for what is pure and true in music, and glowing with artistic zeal. A model of that, within too small a compass, we have had for half a dozen years or more in Mr. Parker's Club, and much we grieve to hear that there is any prospect of its dissolution. A good thing never should say Die! But Music here in Boston needs just such a choir, only of double the number of voices, for the finer kind of public service. Far more one of from one to two hundred voices, male and female, whose special mission it should be to study and become able to bring out, with orchestra, numerous Cantatas and other compositions, secular and sacred, which do not come within the scope of the Handel and Haydn, or indeed of any Oratorio Society. Works much shorter than the Oratorios, yet of goodly length, say of from half an hour to an hour, or an hour and a half. Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" have already been named in this connection. There are many more, covering a wide range in variety of style and character, which certainly have waited too long for a hearing in so musical a city. For instance: Handel's "Acis and Galatea," "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso" (Milton), "Alexander's Feast," and others;—Sebastian Bach's quaint Dramma per Musica, "The Singing Contest between Pan and Phœbus" (of which such a Society might have the honor of giving the first performance that we ever heard of!);—the music of Gluck's operas;—Mendelssohn's "Loreley" fragments, "Äthalia," &c.; Schumann's wonderful music to Byron's "Manfred," with reading of the connecting passages of the poem; perhaps one or two of his Scenes from Goethe's "Faust"; Gade's "Comala" (in which he has so caught the color and the soul of Ossian), with the orchestral background and environment,—it was charming as we heard it only with pianoforte;—Ferd. Hiller's "Nala and Damayanti," &c., &c. Moreover such a Society, or perhaps better, still another one, might charge itself, as a most important speciality, a duty far too long postponed, with the study of some of Sebastian Bach's religious Cantatas, which are almost innumerable (80 of them having been already published in the Bach-Gesellschaft's splendid serial edition of his works, and several of them having been made more practicable for performance by Robert Franz), of convenient length, and great variety, each embracing orchestral Symphonies, Chorales, elaborate Choruses, Recitatives and Arias for every kind of voice. It was through such devotion on the part of a Society, the "Bach-Verein," specially formed for this purpose in Berlin, that the power and depth and beauty of the Cantatas began to reveal itself to our day and generation. And when will any earnest band of singers search out for us the hidden mysteries of Palestrina? or even give us to drink of famous waters we have always heard of, from such springs as Leo and Durante and Marcello? Will no one move, no keen and eager spirit, with a gift for leadership, in the resolute and pious exploitation of some one or several of these rich neglected veins?

We return to the subject of classical Chamber Music. What we have had for some years, what we are likely to have, seems but a meagre and uncertain supply for a city which contains so many persons who take not only an enthusiastic, but an intellectual interest in music, and who desire to know the great composers in all the important forms of composition which their genius has enriched. Why can we not have something approaching, even if at an humble distance, the idea of those admirable "Monday Popular Concerts" of London? There, at very moderate prices, except for a certain section of reserved seats, audiences of six or eight hundred people listen every week, throughout many months, to the best of quartet playing, piano music, and all the various combinations of a few instruments,—a very varied and extensive repertory of nothing but the choicest,—with a few nice songs thrown in,—and for the interpretation of these masterworks the greatest artists who congregate in London, or pass through it, are employed in turn. Such violinists as Joachim, Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski and Wilhelmi lead sometimes in a Beethoven Quartet; such violoncellists as Piatti take part in it; such pianists as Mme. Schumann, Arabella Goddard, Halle, &c., keep bringing out new treasures from the "Clavier-werke" of Bach and Beethoven and Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Chopin, and many more. Now this of course is more than we can do. Great artists are far less available, and Boston is a small town compared with London. But Boston and what lies within an hour's ride of it by rail certainly can furnish music-lovers enough, not to fill a St. James's Hall once (and even twice) a week, but at least to make a goodly show, and a reasonably paying one, in a nice hall, like that of the Mechanics' Association in Bedford Street, holding three or four hundred; and we have artists enough among us to fill out a long series of rare programmes, and execute the music well with such inspiring opportunity. The permanent nucleus being formed, and kept in constant use, it would soon become easy to enlist now and then the service in one or more concerts of this or that celebrity who may be visiting our cities. Had we our "Monday Pops," though on a much smaller scale than London, no great violinist, or pianist, or real artist upon any instrument, who came along, could well escape giving us a taste of his quality in this form.

Then consider what a variety of really classical compositions there are for small groups of instruments, which we never hear; especially for wind instruments, whether by themselves, or with those of the violin tribe, or the piano, or with both. Besides the Septets of Hummel and of Beethoven, which we have sometimes heard, there are the Octet of Schubert; the Octet of Beethoven, purely for wind instruments; a long list of such works by Mozart; Oboe Concertos by Handel and others; the Clarinet Concertos which Mendelssohn wrote for his friend Bärmann of Munich; and no end. It would be a great benefit to our orchestral music, also, could frequent employment in these smaller circles be made not only for our best violinists, cellists, &c., but more especially for our best performers on wind instruments, the oboe, clarinet, fagotto, horn, &c. Such employment would be a means of keeping permanently with us the good artists upon instruments otherwise so little in demand, yet most essential to the proper rendering of the Symphonies. Has no one, then, the faith, the enterprise and tact to try the "Monday Pop" experiment in Boston? Verily we need some of these small things, much more than we ever did or ever shall the "big things," musical monstrosities and "Jubilees" which give us such a questionable name where the musical devotion is sincere and modest.

Music Lessons.

I often wonder that there are any children left to take them, when I consider what a vast number of teachers we have. But music is so extensively cultivated, that in nearly every house there is a piano, and a teacher employed. In passing some house in a dingy street, suggestive of nothing but poverty and want, I have often been surprised to see through the open door that the room contained a piano, or I have heard its unmistakable tones. The poor washerwoman, who cannot pay money for lessons for her little girl, does washing for the music teacher, in exchange for them; the seamstress makes up for them by sewing. And if you question them as to their intentions, they will tell you that they do not wish their daughters to do hard work for a living, that they are educating them for music teachers. The teacher employed is probably quite ignorant; perhaps she has taken but a few quarters instruction herself. After she has taught her hopeful pupils, as far as her knowledge will allow, they are pronounced perfect, and are then ready to enter the field as teachers themselves, charging very moderate rates at first. Advertisements of lessons for $5.00 a quarter and "use of instrument for practise" are not unfrequent.

An amusing example of the degree of proficiency which some think enough for the profession of teaching music, occurs to me now. In a country town in one of the Central States, noted for its institutions of learning, a lady of doubtful age called upon the best established music teacher of the place, stating her desire to have instruction, in the following manner: "I am tired of my present employment (teaching a new system of dress-cutting) and have concluded to teach music. I will give you $10 if you will teach me one tune so that I can play it as well as anybody." Her proposal being indignantly refused by the teacher applied to, she went elsewhere and, on advancing the $10, learned the tune, and finally found much employment as a music teacher in an adjoining village. That parents in country villages, and in towns where there is little culture of any kind, employ such teachers, is not to be wondered at. They do the best they can to procure for their daughters instruction in music; because it is fashionable, or because papa might die, or become involved in his business, and it would be well to have this means of earning a livelihood; and sometimes, because they love it. Not knowing the requisites of a good teacher they are incapable of judging of the merits of one, and are satisfied if the price of tuition be moderate. But it is true that in large cities, where there is every opportunity for cultivating the musical taste by hearing good music both publicly and privately, parents often are equally careless in the choice of a teacher, falling into the common error that a beginner can teach a beginner, that it is not worth while to pay for good instruction at the outset.

This rule does not hold good in other branches of education, why should it in this? Many of our best educated men devote their whole time to the education of the young. In the "Kinder Garten" the learned Professor not only joins in the studies but the games of the little ones, teaching them how to make their own playthings, and, without their knowing it, combines instruction with amusement.

With teachers so ignorant, is it then a wonder that every trace of musical feeling and love for the art is often driven out, when we see the stupid way in which many pupils are taught? When lessons are dull, what must practising be? The pupil watches the clock while she mechanically moves her fingers, anxious that the time at the piano may be got through with; and the minute it is up, away she runs, feeling that she has performed a most disagreeable task, and that she "hates music." Many pupils after taking lessons for several years are ignorant of the simplest rudiments. It is in the last degree painful to hear them play. Often, in all this time, they have only learned to read notes with some facility (generally excepting those on ledger lines high above the staff) and to play a few common-place pieces. The lesson amounts to nothing on the teacher's part but pointing, and monotonous counting. The pupil becomes so used to this one, two, three, four, that she cannot play without it; if she hesitates, she is told the notes; and if she continues forgetting them, their names are sometimes written above them. As soon as the pupil can play through the piece she has a new one, learning none perfectly. As the teacher does the counting, the pupil often has not even learned what time the piece is written in, and makes a rhythm of her own for each measure. Quick notes are played in the same time as slow ones; groups of thirty-seconds as quarter notes. Easy passages she plays fast, and difficult ones slow; and often she does not know in what key she is playing. As for rhythmic accent, there is none; one monotonous twang continues throughout. The hands are held in as many different positions as it suits the convenience of the learner to put them in; the fingers now extended, then contracted; wrists above and then below the key-board. In this manner the finger exercises from the Instruction book are gone through with, merely as a matter of form; the teacher thinking it her duty to give them, having heard that they are indispensable. At the same time her own knowledge of the fact often is very indistinct and dreamy. Another teacher, thoroughly incompetent, devotes a part of the music lesson to teaching her pupils trashy songs. It pleases papa and mamma so much to have Araminta sing and play for visitors, or at a party. And she is "such a nice teacher," and "Araminta makes such progress with her!" This of course describes the most uneducated class of teachers. We will not speak of the charlatan methods which some teachers do not blush to employ to make themselves notorious.

Still there are many good artists who are equally wanting in ability to teach what they know. Some are too nervous, and start with a thrill of horror at some discordant notes, frightening the pupil so that she cannot play. The dreamy composer, whose thoughts are more in the ideal than the real world, seldom has system. He judges the ability of others by his own, selects a piece altogether too difficult, finds his mistake and substitutes for it one too easy; he is full of contradictions. Between these two extremes there is still another class. Professors of music, who, on the strength of their title and their showy playing, gain a name and much patronage. Such a one, having established a reputation and being much sought after, manages to do as little work as he may for the money paid him for lessons. If the pupil has no great talent, the monotony of her performance puts him into a light slumber; he dozes away the better part of the time; or perhaps he keeps himself awake by drumming on one end of the piano. If this fails, he coolly pulls a newspaper out of his pocket and reads. If his pupil has talent, he uses her as an advertising medium, by teaching her brilliant pieces without any regard to her general musical culture. I knew a girl who was taught to play runs and scales occurring in her pieces in octaves, because she had a wonderful talent in that particular, and could not play them well as they were written. Her teacher advised her to make the best of this ability, as it would astonish people.

There are indeed not very many parents whom good, honest music lessons satisfy, at the beginning of instruction at least. They are anxious for pieces; they wish to make much of their children and show them off. This fact, besides the ignorance of many music-teachers, is one reason why so few, comparatively, give good, sound, earnest music lessons.

S. M. C.

Jottings.

Our good old friend the "Diarist" of yore, and most devout biographer of Beethoven, ALEXANDER W. THAYER, is here on a short leave of absence from his Consulate at Trieste. Would that he could remain here! Music and musical literature would find much use for him. But he is completing a great work abroad. Anxious inquirers will be glad to learn that the second volume of his "Beethoven" (the first appeared in 1866) is nearly through the press in Berlin. Of course it is in German, the author having adopted that plan for the present in order to secure the full benefit of the German criticism, and make the work as nearly waterproof as possible before it appears complete in English and in German; for it is the work of a life. This second volume brings Beethoven's career down to the year 1806; it will take still two more volumes to complete the work. It is pure, unmitigated biography, the presentation of carefully sifted, amply illustrated facts, with total abstinence from all vague subjective criticism and æsthetic speculation. The book will be a model in its way. Thayer's "troop of friends" (of whom alas! he misses not a few) rejoice to see him looking fresh and bright, and full as ever of enthusiasm, and of what the Germans call Gemüthlichkeit, while he is and ever was one of the staunchest and truest of Americans and "Yankees" in the best sense.

CARL ROSA and his wife PAREPA-ROSA arrived in New York on the 8th, and are passing a few weeks at Sharon Springs before entering upon their English Opera season in October in New York.

The new pianist, FRANKLIN MENTER, it appears, is not, after all, to play next season in the Thomas Concerts. Mr. Thomas has engaged Miss MARIE KREBS; and verily he might go farther and fare worse; a rich repertoire travels with that young woman, and her hands are sure and nimble to display all its treasures.

THE COMING SINGERS. The New York Evening Post has the following interesting news from "W. F. W." in London:

The metropolis of Great Britain is the metropolis of America, as far as amusements are concerned. It is to London that American managers look for novelties, and it is in London that the arrangements for the campaigns in the United States are generally made. At present, whole flocks of singing birds and troops of actors and actresses are in this great city on the point of starting for America.

Prominent among these are the artists engaged to support Miss Nilsson during her coming season of Italian opera in New York. The tenor,

CAPOUL,

I am convinced, will win a prompt recognition in America. His voice is very rich and well-trained.

He has an exquisite sotto voce, and can send forth prolonged notes in one long line of linked sweetness, the tone dying softly into silence. He is very handsome, parts his hair in the middle, and exactly answers the ideal of a young lady's hero; but his style is not effeminate. This is his first season in London, and it is but very recently that he left the French for the Italian opera. He has made a great sensation here as Faust. In "Rigoletto," which he sang the other night at Drury Lane with De Murska and a new baritone named Mendioroz, his vocalization was perfect, and from the beginning to the end of his part he was unexceptionable. It is to be hoped that the management will produce this opera in New York, so as to let American amateurs hear this delightful artist in one of his best parts. In "Sonnambula," too, he is very effective. This lovely little pastoral of Bellini's has been revived for Mlle. Marimon, the new soprano who is at present attracting so much attention in London.

It would be difficult to find a tenor voice which will blend with Nilsson's more happily than that of Capoul. There is a tender delicacy in Capoul's style which will make the love duets of these two great artists incomparably charming. In fact, now that Mongini has gone away in a huff, and Mario and Tamherlik belong to the past, Capoul gives good promise of becoming the tenor of Europe, as far as the operatic stage is concerned. In going to America this year he goes thither in his early prime, and not when his powers have begun to fade.

Another tenor intended for the Nilsson troupe is Mr. Charles Lyall, who has sung here in Italian opera with good success. Besides being a clever singer, Mr. Lyall is very skilful with his pencil. He has recently made a series of inimitably droll caricatures of all the leading singers of the day, giving their peculiarities of appearance in a pronounced but by no means offensive manner. Patti is taken in her part of Caterina in "L'Etoile du Nord." Lucca is a wonderful success in this series; and Nilsson's sentimentality of style is so humorously exaggerated that its effect is irresistibly comic. Among other notabilities figuring in this collection—which adorns the drawing-room of a well-known London impresario—are Arditi, Costa, Mario, Graziani, Sherrington, Lind, De Murska, Gye, Mapleson, and many, many others well-known in musical circles.

THE DOLBY TROUPE

will leave for America in a few weeks. It has been my good fortune to hear the members of this company at various recent concerts in this city. Their services are in constant demand, and their absence will create a marked vacuum in musical affairs in England. Miss Edith Wynne, the soprano, is a Welsh girl, with an interesting manner and good musical culture. She is well schooled in almost all classes of music, and has met with special success in oratorio and ballad singing. She will introduce into New York many very interesting songs not yet known to your amateurs. Miss Wynne cannot be termed a sensational singer, but in artistic circles here she ranks very high, and the purity of her style will at once be acknowledged by connoisseurs. She sang, a few nights ago, at a state-concert at Buckingham Palace—a distinction only awarded to artists of acknowledged position.

Mrs. Whytock-Patey is the contralto of the troupe, and, since Mme. Sainton-Dolby has retired into private life, is the most eminent of English contraltos. Her style is exquisitely pure and simple, not unlike that of Miss Cary. Her voice is deep and tender, and as an oratorio singer she is unsurpassed. She will not dazzle like the fireworks style of vocalists; but there can be no doubt of her immediate success in New York.

Mr. Cummings, the tenor, is the only singer of his class who shares with Sims Reeves a general popularity in England. His style is pure and delicate, and his voice is a genuine high tenor. Mr. Cummings has already made his mark in Boston as an oratorio singer, but is as yet unknown in New York. His repertoire includes all the standard English ballads, the leading oratorios, and a variety of foreign music. He is a "Gentleman of the Royal Chapel of St. James," and his name has been seen in almost every concert programme of prominence during the present London season.

Mr. Santley, the baritone, enjoys a wide reputation in America as well as in England. Hearing him the other day at a concert at St. James's Hall, I was obliged to confess that his reputation is fully deserved. Santley sings an immense variety of music. English and Italian opera, oratorios and ballads are all in his line, and he sings all well. I think his ballad singing will make a great impression in New York. Among his selections which will please are the baritone ballad air from Lortzing's "Czar und Zimmermann" and a delightful love song of his own composition. Mr. Santley is now in Switzerland enjoying a brief respite from his professional duties, and gaining fresh vigor for his American campaign. He will be a very marked feature of the Dolby concerts. Mr. Patey, a fair basso, is also in the troupe. Mr. Lindsay Sloper, the accompanist and solo pianist, is a player of excellent repute here. His style is delicate and graceful, and well suited to the music of Chopin and Heller.

Altogether this troupe is essentially English and will appeal very closely to the more domestic musical tastes of the Americans. The members of the company will speedily become personal favorites. Sensationalism will be avoided; but the good, sterling and attractive music to be produced cannot fail to especially delight the thousands of amateurs in New York who are more interested in English than in Italian compositions. I have seen the repertoire of this troupe and find that it includes the works of many more composers than I had expected. Among them are Bishop, Handel, Wallace, Lover, Pissuti, Hullah, Shield, Mendelssohn, Benedict, Hatton, Gounod, Schubert, Lortzing, Mulloy, Balfé, Claribel, Dibdin, Randegger, Lee, Sullivan, Mme. Sainton-Dolby, Arditi, Braham, Beethoven, Hobbs and Prince Poniatowski.

THE PAREPA TROUPE.

After a long nervous illness Parepa-Rosa is herself again, and is looking forward with pleasure to her return to America. She will sail at an early date and will pass part of the summer at Sharon Springs, opening her season of English opera at the Academy of Music, New York, on the 2d of October. Besides the usual repertoire of English operas, Mme. Parepa tells me she hopes to bring out a version of Donizetti's noble work, "Anna Bolena" which is quite unknown in America, and has not been heard in London for over twenty years. It was one of Pasta's great parts and subsequently Giesi made a fine success in it. The tenor part was written for Rubini.

Mme. Rosa does not intend to depend entirely on her own attractions as a prima donna, for she has engaged Mme. Vansini, and Clara Doris. Vansini—so well known in New York as Mrs. Van Zandt—has declined a handsome offer from St. Petersburg, to fill her American engagement. She has been singing for four consecutive seasons at the Covent Garden Theatre. Clara Doris is a daughter of the English composer John Barnett. She has been singing in various Italian theatres, and the papers speak well of her; but Italian newspaper criticism does not usually amount to anything.

The new tenor of the Parepa-Rosa troupe is Tom Karl, of whom little is known here. Lately, at Malta, he made a hit in Petrella's opera "I Promessi Sposi" and, like every other opera singer in vogue, he has sung at La Scala, Milan. There is a new basso profundo, Ellis by name, and two other singers of good repute, Mr. and Mrs. Cook. Besides these fresh importations, the English opera troupe will include Mr. and Mrs. Seguin, Messrs. Castle, Campbell, De Solla, Whiffen and others. This will, altogether, be the best English opera troupe ever known in the United States; and the management expects to give the operas in excellent style as regards scenery and accessories.

The whole enterprise is a bold and risky one, especially in view of the great counter-attractions in the United States next fall; but, on the other hand, all the different undertakings are of different characters, and really should not interfere with each other. The Parepa-Rosa Troupe will remain in New York only three weeks.

WHAT MIGHT BE!—In a few weeks there will be four singers here, who are looked upon as being at the head of their profession in the musical world at large. Their names are: Parepa-Rosa, Nilsson, Santley and Capoul. We doubt, whether the present operatic stage in Europe can furnish as good a quartet as the above. Mme. Parepa has a grand voice and a grand school. Her intonation is the purest, her enunciation the most distinct on record. What she lacks in emotional powers, she fully makes good by her glorious voice and her grand delivery.—As to Nilsson, we all know her winning ways, her charming appearance, and her Mignon-like voice and art. She was born and educated to be the Mignon of the age.—Santley is considered by all whose opinion must be respected, the best baritone of the present time. His voice is superb and he is a thorough artist. Moreover, he is in his prime.—Capoul, the tenor, has been pronounced by good reliable critics to be the tenor par excellence, a second Roger.

Thus, in a few weeks we shall have the materials for perhaps the best opera which can now be heard anywhere. What a glorious performance, for instance, of "Don Giovanni," we might have—Santley [Don Giovanni], Parepa [Donna Anna], Elvira [Miss Cary], Zerlina [Mlle. Nilsson], Don Ottavio [Capoul], and Leporello [Carl Forster]. Yet what will be?—Mme. Parepa will sing in English Opera, Mlle. Nilsson and Mons. Capoul will illustrate the music of Ambrose Thomas, and Mr. Santley will go through the land like a modern minstrel and sing ballads. Thus the finest results of musical art are frustrated.—New York Weekly Review.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Bells across the Hudson. 3. A♭ to f.

M. W. Hackleton. 30

"O'er the bright blue Hudson stealing, Evening bells are sweetly pealing."

Charming melody, words and accompaniment, all of which must be credited to the gentlemen mentioned above.

Miss Bessie Ludlow's Songs. Lithograph title.

W. F. Wellman, each 40

A Little after Eight. 2. F to f.

Kiss the Little Ones at Home. 3. F to g.

Two pleasing songs which must be very acceptable to Miss Ludlow's audiences. The last has a chorus.

A Wife's Letter. 3. C to e. A. Randegger. 40

"My own, you won't expect to hear

As you have just departed,
But I'll be better than you fear,
And write as soon as you have started."

A very peculiar but very taking song, sung in recitative. Capable of much expression.

The Happy Days gone by. Quartette for Male

Voices. 3. C to g. M. F. H. Smith. 35

A first-rate quartette, and "Father Gray's Old Folks" who introduced it were happy in their selection.

Yes, He's Coming. 3. C to g. M. W. Hackleton. 30

"He is coming, yes, he's coming.

See the dewy violets glisten,
See the snow drop and the fly
Bow their dreamy heads to listen."

Bright, quick and pretty.

Instrumental.

Echoes from the Ball Room. For Violin & Piano.

Festival Waltzes. (Wein, Wein und Gesang.)

Strauss. 75

Beautiful Blue Danube Waltzes. " 75

Well-known favorites. The whole set includes twenty or more pieces, and may be procured by those who wish the best of Dance Music for the two instruments.

Here we go. Galop. 3. A. H. B. Hart. 30

One of the kind that, when played, invariably causes the passers by to stop and listen, and to exclaim when it is finished, "I declare! that's pretty!"

Oberon. (Perles Musicales.) 4. C. Oesten. 30

Exquisitely neat and graceful. A play on two or three favorite melodies, one of which is something like "Star of the Twilight, Beautiful Star."

Oberon. Fantasie Brillante for 4 hands. 5. D♭.

Leybach. 1.00

First class music, as the name indicates, and good piece to study for exhibitions.

Bahn Frei. (Clear the Track). Galop. 3.

B♭. E. Strauss. 30

The name is very suggestive, and aptly indicates the prompt, decided, wide-awake movement of the Galop.

Richieu Polka. 3. G. G. McNeill. 30

Spirited.

Books.

THE HOUR OF SINGING. By L. O. Emerson and W. S. Tilden. For High and Normal Schools. 90

High and Normal Schools seem to have been almost forgotten by compilers of School Books; so much so, that teachers in many instances have adopted Common School singing books, Seminary singing books, or Glee books. The present book is ably edited. Mr. Tilden has had valuable experience in High Schools near Boston, and Mr. Emerson has a rare gift in choosing what will please the "public ear."

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 793.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 26, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 11.

Carl Loewe's Story of his Early Life.*

(Continued from page 78.)

Thus usefully and productively, on all sides, were the years of my early boyhood spent. Much as music and its practice stepped into the foreground, I still remained entirely aloof from our present virtuosity, so fatal to all genuine creative faculty; indeed it did not prevail so widely then as it does now. My father was no respecter of the theatre; how much less attractive must the rope-dancer arts of music have been to him!

On the contrary it was his constant effort to implant a steadfast moral sentiment in my young soul.—Sometimes a beggar from the neighborhood knocked at our door, and it seemed to me as if he had once seen better days: "Was the man always so poor?" I asked, after I handed him a gift. "No," said my father, "this man was once deacon in our church, and he baptized thee in this room. On that occasion he made a beautiful discourse, telling us how we ought to thank God for giving us another boy in our old days, and how we should prize these latter gifts; for he was in his heart convinced that God would wish to see this child nurtured with especial love and trained to good."

"This, and what else the Lord hath laid upon us," continued my father, "we will leave to Him, who gave thee to us. But do thou take an example from this beggar; there was a time when he was a respectable man. Then sin overcame him, he lost his office and will die despised. Promise me that thou wilt never consent to sin!"

I reached him my hand and said: "Papa, I will become no such man as this!" To this very day I feel how my father's remarkably well-formed hand, hardened though it was by labor, grasped my own. I never have forgotten that hour, but I have striven evermore to keep my promise.

Every third Sunday my father directed the church music. The town musician Wiprecht arranged a little orchestra; this man was particularly interesting to me, because he lived so high up in the tower. School children, with some apprentices and journeymen, formed the choir. After I had several times successfully performed the part of the Maid in the Passion narrative, I was soon promoted in these church musical services to the part of solo soprano. I knew by heart the whole year's round of the church music, and I selfegged with my father all the primo and secondo violin parts through, upon a wager, carefully observing all the trills, mordenti and runs, in which these pieces were not poor.

But with the already mentioned hand-pieces for the piano, by Türk, our note treasury was now exhausted. The chorals I had long been able to sing and play, and the hand-pieces too I sang as fluently as a violin could play them. That came altogether of itself, for while my father instructed me he sang, and I sang with him.

I attended the school now very irregularly, because my father maintained that I could learn nothing more there.—Much surprised was I one evening, after I had played the Chorales as usual, and had given free play to my fancy and in the Præ- and Postludium, to hear my father say to my mother half aloud: "The lad plays already better than I do." While I played in this way in the evening, my father used to go to bed and fall asleep.

As in my music, so too before long in Latin I outstripped my father, he having forgotten a good deal since his youth, when he went as far as the Prima through the Lutheran school at Halle.

So I roved about actively in the garden, in the shafts and quarries of the mines, in the limekilns, on the church tower and under the church roof. Everywhere I felt around me the working and weaving of the forces of Nature. At night I often suffered from the fear of ghosts. In the daytime the wide spaces of the church floor excited my imagination livily. It had a singular and awful charm for me, to be there alone, or to wander about there. I was happiest in the fields and in the open air. In the neighboring woods I hunted for Maybugs, for which I have still a fondness, plucked fragrant Maybells for my mother, gathered wortleberries in a little pot, picked nuts for myself fresh from the bushes, and then came home, as my father would say, laden with treasures, all of which Nature had poured out for me from her full horn of plenty. But those merry little people, the birds, engaged my attention especially: I had real satisfaction in recognizing every dweller of the branches by his own peculiar song and twitter.

"Come, Härzer," I often said to the husband of my oldest sister Marie, "we'll set springes." And the man, who as miner had to pass so many hours of his life in the gloomy shaft, went gladly in his free hours with the boy out into the green woods, where we set our traps. I liked particularly to set snares for the redbreast; I had springes everywhere, and the haunt of a stag, called the stag's watering place, was not unknown to me. What a vivid recollection I had of this time afterwards, when I composed my "Henry the Fowler!"

But in winter the evening brought me the finest hours. When the mother had toiled indefatigably all day long for us, and the evening began to darken, then I seated myself at the great stove; my place was at her feet and I laid my head upon her lap. Thus we sat half dreaming for a long spell. "Now let me go," she would then say to the father and the brothers and sisters; and then she, whom I loved before all others, would begin to narrate wonderfully beautiful reminiscences of her young days, old long-forgotten histories, which ever stand like strange fairy tales before my soul. But especially, when she had had a beautiful and marvellous dream, she knew how to tell it to me so distinctly, that I seemed to have dreamed it all myself. Often then would my eyes wander through the windows of our sitting room, which looked out upon an old ruined churchyard, away over its crumbling mounds and decaying crosses, and bury themselves in the dark foliage of the old lindens, which wrapped it in so deep a twilight. My mother's dream-forms seemed to come to life in the moonlight on those hillocks. They turned their faces to me, and half anxiously, half longingly, I sought to fix them in my mind.

When the mother had in this way become silent at last, and I pressed myself still more closely to her knees, then I used to beg of her: "Mama, now play us something," and smiling she would take the violin, with which my father led the singing in the school, and play on it the sweetest melodies. Ah, how those melodies became alive to me out there in the moonlight! She never had had any instruction in violin playing, and yet her tone sang into my heart so deeply.

My mother was very serious, never gay, but always uniformly amiable and likewise busy. The father on the contrary was often out of tune and moody, particularly early in the morning. Later and for the rest of the day he grew cheerful, indeed merry. Though I could do nothing to suit him in the morning, though he often overwhelmed me with unjust reproaches, yet he came cheerfully to the table and talked much about his happy domestic state. In the afternoon he went into the field, where, witty and jocular, with might and diligence he labored in the sweat of his brow. But active as he was, in these mechanical labors he never got beyond a certain awkward foresight, which often made me laugh right heartily. But with the evening came the Papa's rosy humor; he told many stories of his youth, never without pointing the moral for our good, thereby unfolding a great worldly prudence. At this time too he used to smoke the only pipe which he allowed himself during the day, and it was my duty at stated intervals to bring him a paper of tobacco from the dealer in the village. When I handed this to him, I never failed to hear the remark "Never form the habit of smoking; it is neither for hunger, nor for thirst." This wish of my father, unfortunately, I have not fulfilled, for, as everybody knows, the youngest "fox" in the University is soon put to the proof ("probiert") at least in smoking, and virtuosity is pretty sure to follow all too soon upon this first proof.

Very interesting reading to my father, in the evening, was our only weekly newspaper, and verily in my boyhood the Halle Courier brought news of immense importance. It was remarkable how my father from his hermitage, into which a stranger seldom penetrated, made original and yet just observations on the perplexed and tangled politics of the time. I have still a distinct remembrance of his saying to us one evening: "I see it coming, this Buonaparte will rule not only France, but all the world." But when Napoleon stood before Vienna in 1805, he said; "This Cæsar has transplanted the blood bath of the Revolution." But when the Courier was read through to the end, politics was forgotten.

The mother and two sisters used to spin in the evening hours. The older one was particularly interesting to me from the fact, that she knew by heart the then brand new Ballads of Bürger. Those poems made a great impression on us all. They were written in the spirit of the people. The popular life had seized upon them and borne them even into our little mountain village. My sister had especially to keep repeating to me "The Pastor of Taubenheim's Daughter;" I was also very fond of Stolberg's "Penitent."

* Translated for DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC from "DR. CARL LOEWE'S Selbst-biographie. Für die Öffentlichkeit bearbeitet von C. H. BIRRM. Berlin, 1870."

† He was the uncle of the present General Musical Director of the Prussian Garde-Corps.

But my sister Marie Härzer, the miner's wife, had a most unique vivacity. The intellectual sphere, in which she moved by virtue of her social position, was naturally a limited one; but our church, which, like its great founder, allows every one to draw out of its spiritual spring, turned also to account the intellectual soul-life of the miner's wife. Both of the ministers of Löbejün were dry and shallow moralists. They lacked a deep religious faith; the spiritual substance of the Christian doctrine had not been unsealed to them. So they preached and labored on in a dull round of routine. That was nothing for a woman of such lively feelings. "The sermon to-day was worth nothing at all," she often used to say: "only let me speak once upon that text?" And then she straightened herself up, like one inspired, and gave us a searching discourse worthy of any religious enthusiast of her sex. These peculiar preachments moved me deeply, coming from so sweet a mouth. For my sister was beautiful. Her blue eyes looked down upon me, as clear and bright as day. And when the discourse was ended and I went softly up to her and said: "That was beautiful, Marie," then she smiled so friendly and two deep dimples showed themselves upon her rosy cheeks.

My brother Andreas was the ablest of us all. He spoke Latin as fluently as German, but in spite of his successful studies he had not the moral energy to keep himself in any office. He was alike unfortunate in philology and as a theologian. So he became a weight upon my father growing old.

Fritz, on the contrary, the oldest of my brothers, was nothing but a source of joy to him. He was marked by strength of character and earnest moral sentiment. He too studied Theology, and was destined by an accident to be of extraordinary use to me. He had the fortune, as candidate, to become private teacher in Berlin in the house of the famous Capellmeister Righini, and as he was uncommonly musical, he easily appropriated to himself the singing method of the great Italian. Afterwards, when he came as Con-rector to Wettin, on a visit to the paternal house, he often made me sing. That excellent method suited me quite well, and I soon mastered it, on which account I have sometimes playfully called myself Righini's grandson. Through his intimate relations with the first Capellmeister of the Royal Opera, Fritz became a friend of the theatre. One can imagine how little this suited my father. He begged us repeatedly to enter into no alliance with this fantastical world of misrepresentation and vain show, but to build our future on the rock of the church. Such views of life grew out of the conditions of the common town society of those times, and out of the narrow life and office of a little town.

How vividly those words of my father came back to my mind, when I called upon Carl Maria von Weber! I was then a student, and in the course of the conversation Weber said to me:

"Never go to a theatre; that is not for a creative talent. When I come home from the rehearsals, with my eyes affected by the perpetual lamp light, and my head full of opera melodies, I am so exhausted, bodily and mentally, that it is impossible for me to compose."

A second time I was reminded of that wish of my father, when I was called to Stettin to a position in the church and school, and the wish was expressed that I might never occupy myself with the theatre. Mindful of this double warning, in the year 1830, I declined a call to the Capellmeister-ship of the Königstädtische Theatre in Berlin. And finally, after all my efforts to bring my operas upon the stage have failed, I have again thought of my father and of the faithful care from which his warning proceeded.

My father was a devout, enthusiastic Christian. He deeply impressed upon my mind the love of Christ and fear of God. By perseverance in praying aloud it was sought to fix in me these sentiments. At times in tranquil seriousness he spoke of his death, which, to the joy of all of us, however, was far distant; he did not die until I had been established for some years in Stettin; but he never alluded to the departure of my mother. He knew that I would not have borne any such remark, but would have interrupted it with loud weeping. My love for my mother became almost morbid.*

Thus I reached my tenth year, with no important circumstances to influence my free, untrammelled life, or bring about decided changes in its course.

*Later, as a man of twenty-four, Löwe wrote from Halle to his betrothed, Julie von Jacob, at Dresden: "You wish to know whether I am like my father. I believe not. My father has more brown hair and a soft, quiet, self-complacent look, but not without vivacity. He has an extraordinary memory, which really deserves admiration, but not much original judgment. My mother is in her way a knowing woman; of swift resolution and a quick and lively temperament. In bodily constitution and in the mould of my face, I am, they say, like her altogether."

Löwe's brother said afterwards of him, that he combined the wisdom and vivacity of the mother with the goodness of heart and gentle manliness of the father.

[To be Continued.]

The London Opera Season.

The opera season of 1871 has proved the most disappointing in our recollection. Never before have there been such terrible shortcomings in the realization of the promises put forth in the prospectuses—those most deceptive of literary productions. "La Donna del Lago," "La Juive," "La Prophète," "Les Diamans de la Couronne," "Il Matrimonio Segreto," Flotow's "L'Ombre,"—all these novelties, besides several important revivals, were promised at one or other of our two opera-houses, and not one of them has been produced. The experience of this season ought to give a death-blow to the custom of issuing documents with a string of promises, the fulfilment of which is impracticable, and which in many cases there is not the least intention of attempting to fulfil. Mr. Gye has adhered to his favorite plan of bringing out one novelty so near the end of the season as just to admit of its being played twice. No one who read the prospectus would have guessed that all the other novelties promised would be shelved in favor of Cimarosa's "Astuzie Femminili," but such has been the case. We would not, however, find fault with the selection; for, though the work is rather unsuited to representation in such a large theatre as Covent Garden, it has qualities which may usefully serve as a corrective to some tastes which meet with too much encouragement from opera-goers of the present day. There is nothing sensational or immoral in the story, the music is neither noisy nor elaborately scientific, and there is no scope for spectacular shows or stage-carpentry; but it is rich to overflowing in simple and graceful melodies, and its concerted movements are many of them masterpieces of dramatic propriety and constructive skill. The duet for the two lovers in the first act, and the quartet in which they frighten the two unwelcome suitors in the second act, may serve as specimens. It is curious that though our public will not, as a rule, go to see unknown works, those who happen to be present almost always receive them with kindness, and judge with discrimination. We think more confidence might safely be placed in the willingness of English audiences to learn to love novelty, if the chance were afforded them. The performance of Cimarosa's work was not such as it ought to have been, indeed it can only be described as discredit-able to a house which claims to be one of the chief musical theatres in the world. The manager, with an inaccuracy and carelessness characteristic of the whole getting-up of the opera, states that it was composed in the year 1784, though the introduction of Russian ballet-music in the finale might serve to show that it must have been written after the composer's return from Russia, in the year 1792. The true date is no doubt 1794, as given by the best authorities. Mdlles. Sessi and Scalchi and Signor Cologni deserve praise; Signor Bettini was not up to his usual mark; and of Signor Ciampi we need only say, that he allowed one of the principal songs in the opera to be executed by the orchestra alone, and that whatever humor there might seem to be in his acting, consisted simply in constantly thumping the boards with his stick. The sensation of the evening was produced by the interpolated air "Non son bella," beautifully sung by Mdlle. Scalchi, who has been making great progress in popular favor this season. So beautiful a voice as hers deserves thorough cultivation. There is little else among the doings at this house that needs particular mention, for we cannot stop to speak at length of the great tenor who has now retired from the stage on which he so long reigned without a rival, and on which he has unfortunately left no tolerable successor. But Mario's unapproached supremacy for so many years need not blind us to the fact that this year (and for some years past) his presence has been injurious to the true interest of musical art. Everything has been sacrificed to the supposed necessity for gratifying the public anxiety (artfully created) to see Mario in his famous roles. We will hope that the manager will now be driven to seek popularity by methods more consistent with the encouragement of musical art. One artist remains, whom it would be grossly unjust to pass over without a word in recognition of his great ability. This is M. Faure, who as a master of all styles of singing has no superior, and who as an actor shines "sicut inter ignes luna minores." His Hamlet is most masterly, particularly in that remarkably dull scene (musically considered) with his mother: he wants only one thing, unfortunately a thing out of his power to acquire, viz. a beautiful quality of voice, to make him one of the most popular singers of the time. The two new singers at this theatre, Madame Fabbri and M. Jourdan, require no special notice. Perhaps, as an indication of public taste, we may mention that the operas most often performed have been "Don Giovanni" (7 times), "Faust" and "Il Barbiere" (each 6 times), and "Guillaume Tell." "La Favorita," "Le Nozze di Figaro," and "L'Etoile du Nord," (5 times each.)—Musical Standard.

Auber.

[Paris Correspondence of the Athenæum.]

Several funeral orations were poured upon Auber's tomb; they lasted six whole hours. Poor Auber! He was the wittiest, driest, keenest of composers; cynical and tasteful; ironical and good natured; careful of appearances and careless of morals, as to women, at least; with a dandified, coldish, gentle, Hookish (Theodore Hook's) manner; an epicurean, never canaille, of the Horatio school; a man who knew well how to steer his brilliant bark among the rocks, changing waves and winds of Parisian fickleness; no hypocrite; neither a red Jacobin nor a fawning courtier; with no tint of exaggeration in him; no pretence; no kind of small vanity but a good deal of pride; putting no mask on his little foibles, and delighting to be called Auber-Pasha like Omer-Pasha; keeping the best society and fond of solitude;—in short, a very curious, complex figure, a puzzle and an enigma,—a very fine one, too. He liked horses, rode well, and was dexterous at fence; but fought no duels, however. He husbanded cleverly his life, spirits, youth, maturity and old age. Even his melodies were put à interest. No capitalist managed as well as he did his genial, intellectual, even his bodily resources. Whatever inspiration he had, he improved. He did not set up for a genius, so he escaped a terrible danger,—envy, which, in France, decides all. He had no enemies, and deserved none. He affected no enthusiasm, and inspired none. But he deserved admiration, the stream of his vivid inspiration was Horatian, not Tyrtæan, and it flowed unchecked, unabated, bright, strong, unpolluted, and free, to the very limits of age. His shrewd wit and knowledge of men, such as they are in France, kept his genius in check. He was artificial-natural and natural-artificial;—exactly as a well bred woman, rather coquettish, but not flippant, has no objection to fine ribbons and diamonds, and bijoux, and embroideries, and showing a little of the well shaped form, and the well proportioned shoulders and neck.

Mario.

(From the London Telegraph.)

Some months ago travellers in Italy found themselves amidst the seeming ruins of Signor MARIO's splendid palace in the neighborhood of Florence. "Seeming ruins," we say—for the historic "Villa Salviati, ora di Candia," is in itself as well-preserved as any of the mediæval Tuscan palaces, heightened in beauty though they generally are by the tender hand of Time. The Villa Salviati witnessed many a tragedy—the murder of a Bishop among other trifles—during the stormy civil wars of Florence, and the stones of the building could tell many a tale of passion and violence; but the weather-stains on the walls enhance the freshness of the green foliage that mantles them, and the castellated mansion is still strong enough to defy the inroads of many years to come. In its last aspect, it was filled with massive furniture, carefully collected from many a city, and heaped up in most admired disorder. Objects of virtù of every imaginable description, from rare old Venetian glass to modern statuettes of danseuses, from delicate vinaigrettes to meerschaum cigar-tubes of quaint device, were disposed around on every available table or console. Even personal toys, such as opera-glasses without number—every actor spends his leisure time in looking at his fellows—and painting materials—for Signor MARIO is an artist with the fingers as well as with the voice—lay heaped about. Paintings were there, too, of every degree of mediocrity; originals bought from pity of the artists, many bearing the names of authors who had never even looked upon their assumed handiwork; a fine portrait of GIULIA GRISI, radiant in all her superb beauty, shining out from amongst its poorer companion subjects. Let it not be imagined that those who tell us these facts are revealing the secrets of hospitality; for the occasion which disclosed the interest of the Villa Salviati was, alas! too public. Not even a tenor can be all-perfect; and Signor MARIO's neglect of ordinary business precautions had brought about the seizure and sale of most of his effects. But stone walls can be restored with more ease than the delicate fibres of a human throat. Last night the greatest tenor of his age bade farewell to the stage on which his noblest triumphs have been achieved.

MARIO in ruins, however, is far finer than any other living tenor in his prime. Just as the Colosseum of Rome is at once grander and more beautiful, lovelier and more imposing, than any uninjured building in the world—so MARIO, with all the freshness of his voice worn away, and altogether uncertain whether a single note will ever come at his call, is a finer singer, a fairer interpreter of his composer, a more engaging object, more full of youthful passion, than any among his younger rivals. One of the most remarkable characteristics in this hero's remarkable career is its gradual development. [Here follows a passage already copied in our last.]

Why make such a fuss, Mr. Gradgrind may ask, about a mere singer? Is it not enough that the earnings of a popular tenor average double the salary of a Prime Minister of England? It may seem very wrong for the gentleman in question that a singer should be paid more than a diplomatist or a statesman; but let us recollect the rare union of many qualities, physical, mental and moral, which go to making up a great lyric actor. The money question, after all, is a mere matter of supply and demand; but the combination of a number of rarely-united qualifications is, from a mere statistical point of view, a phenomenon worth noting. To reckon up the proportion which the possessors of each faculty required bear to the general population, and then to work out the probability that those powers should be found in any individual, would bring forth a total of unexpected magnitude. Let it not be supposed that voice is everything. It is rare indeed to find a natural tenor voice of good compass, without break or flaw, of sympathetic quality, flexible enough to take training, strong enough to bear it. But voice is nothing without the natural gifts of a musician; and, paradoxical as the thing may seem, it is actually true that it is easier to sing without voice than without ear. Indeed, there was once a consummate connoisseur who said that he "hated a good voice, because it was never possessed by a good singer." It is unfortunately too true that the majority of vocalists do not begin to sing well until their natural means begin to fail. Thus a correct ear is above all things essential. Then comes musical sympathy, without which the finest composition in the world is but as "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." To all these qualities must be added dramatic feeling—which is by no means to be confounded with musical. Without the faculty of memory it is obviously impossible to get through the smallest part; and without very great application and patience no results can be obtained in music, any more than in mathematics. Then, for the lyric stage, exactly the same physical attributes are needed as for the purely dramatic—but in higher proportion; for the Opera, being far more ideal, requires natural advantages that approach more nearly the pitch of perfection. Histrionic capability is almost as indispensable; and it happens that in this respect the lyric stage has at all times been singularly rich. Nothing more powerful than the acting of Adelina Patti and Mario in last Monday's performance of "Les Huguenots" is to be seen on any theatre in Europe. Indeed, the suggestion recently made, that Mario should now take to the acting drama, has had more than one precedent. Among others we may point to the case of Johanna Wagner—who, her voice having failed in this country, is now the principal actress at the admirably conducted Court Theatre of Berlin. Mario has not only all the qualifications we have suggested, as well as many others which we have not time to enumerate; but he has also the rare advantage of a generally artistic nature. He is a draughtsman of no mean pretensions, and an archaeologist of much research; hence his picturesque costumes, which are invariably not less strictly accurate than they are full of grace. Hence, too, the gestures which are as elegant as they seem unsought—as much in keeping with the character as with the situation. Mario, in fact, is artiste jusqu'au bout des ongles. Even strong democrats will feel disposed to attribute something of the eminently gentlemanlike demeanor that invariably and under all circumstances distinguishes the famous tenor, to the sangre azul which flows in the Conte di Candia's noble veins. And this strange, inexplicable charm is especially useful on the lyric stage, where all is, to a certain extent, ideal. When Mario appears in a peasant's costume, we feel at once that the dress, with its silken ribbons and satin laces, is a disguise, and that Nemorino or Elvino is used to a rapier and accustomed to "the nice conduct of a clouded cane." So with the great tenor's Al-ma-viva—we feel instinctively that, though feigning to be drunk, a real nobleman can never even simulate coarseness, and that he must always be "gentle." Of the indefinable quality of "genius" we will not speak; but we have said enough to satisfy even the most captious that the farewell of such a lyric actor as Mario merits a word of public gratitude. With mixed feelings, with much thankfulness, and with great regret, we bid him farewell; live as long as we may, "we shall not look upon his like again."

Signor Mario's Repertory.

Since his first appearance here on the 6th of June, 1839, the occasion being the benefit of Madame Grisi, Signor Mario has been altogether absent but from one London Opera season—that of 1869—when the rival impresarios, Messrs. Gye and Mapleson, rashly combining their forces, deemed they were strong enough to dispense with the services of the eminent tenor. In 1842, however, he sang but three nights, resigning his engagement upon a difference of opinion with his manager, Mr. Lumley; he had been required to play the part of Pollio to another Norma than the Norma of Madame Grisi. With these exceptions, Signor Mario has sung here on an average thirty nights in every opera season since his début. He has appeared on 935 occasions. His repertory consists of forty-four operas. A list is subjoined of his characters in the order in which they were undertaken by the singer, with the number of times he has played in each in London, these performances being, of course, distributed in the majority of cases over several seasons:—

1839.—As Gennaro in Luzia di Lammormoor (Donizetti), he has appeared 91 times; Nemorino, in L'Elisir d'Amore (Donizetti), 21 times; Pollio, in Norma (Bellini), 14 times.

1840.—Rodrigo, in La Donna del Lago (Rossini), 3 times.

1841.—Orazio, in Gli Orati e Curiazi (Cimarosa), 3 times; Arturo, in La Straniera (Bellini), twice; Crispus, in Fausta (Donizetti), twice; Almaviva, in Il Barbiere (Rossini), 102 times; Un Gondoliere, in Marina Falso (Donizetti), 4 times.

1843.—Elvino, in La Sonnambula (Bellini), 17 times; Ottavio, in Don Giovanni (Mozart), 47 times; Giannetto, in La Gazza Ladra (Rossini), 13 times; Arturo, in I Puritani (Bellini), 44 times; Carlo in Linda di Chamouni (Donizetti), 6 times; Ernesto, in Don Pasquale (Donizetti), 32 times; Don Ramiro, in La Cenerentola (Rossini), 3 times.

1844.—Paolino, in Il Matrimonio Segreto (Cimarosa), 9 times; Edgardo, in Lucia di Lammormoor (Donizetti), 9 times; Don Carlos, in Don Carlos (Costa), 5 times; Otello, in Otello (Rossini), 5 times; Roggero, in Corrado d'Altamura (Ricci), once.

1845.—Gualtiero, in Il Pirata (Bellini), 5 times; Ferrando, in Così fan Tutte (Mozart), twice.

1846.—Oronte, in I Lombardi (Verdi), 11 times; Percy, in Anna Bolena (Donizetti), 9 times; Enrico, in Don Gregorio (Donizetti), twice.

1847.—Jacopo Foscari, in I due Foscari (Verdi), 3 times; Uberto, in La Donna del Lago (Rossini), 17 times.

1848.—Fernando, in La Favorita (Donizetti), 49 times; Raoul, in Les Huguenots (Meyerbeer), 119 times.

1849.—Masaniello, in Masaniello (Auber), 12 times; Jean, in Le Prophète (Meyerbeer), 45 times.

1850.—Rambaldo, in Roberto il Diavolo (Meyerbeer), 6 times; Lasaro, in La Juive (Halévy), 4 times.

1851.—Tamino, in Il Flauto Magico (Mozart), 8 times.

1853.—Il Duca, in Rigoletto (Verdi), 32 times.

1856.—Manrico, in Il Trovatore (Verdi), 28 times.

1857.—Alfredo, in La Traviata (Verdi), 9 times.

1858.—Lionello, in Marta (Flotow, 30 times; Don Giovanni, in Don Giovanni (Mozart), 11 times.

1859.—Viscardo, in Il Giuramento (Mercadante), once.

1861.—Il Duca, in Un Ballo in Maschera (Verdi), 29 times.

1864.—Faust, in Faust (Gounod), 59 times.

1867.—Romeo, in Romeo e Giulietta (Gounod), 11 times.

These 935 performances have been thus divided among the fourteen composers:—In operas by Donizetti, Signor Mario has sung 225 times; Meyerbeer, 170; Rossini, 143; Verdi, 112; Bellini, 82; Gounod, 70; Mozart, 68; Flotow, 30; Cimarosa, 12; Auber, 12; Costa, 5; Halévy, 4; Ricci, 1; and Mercadante, 1. It may be noted that on forty-one occasions, not included in the above reckoning, the singer has appeared in fragments of operas. But two new impersonations were attempted under these conditions. In 1843, he three times appeared as Arnoldo in the second act of Rossini's Guilherme Tell, and once as Lindoro in a selection from L'Italiana in Algeri, by the same composer. Tenor parts almost invariably demand of their impersonators youthful looks, graceful presence, and gallant bearing. How completely Signor Mario, after the decline of his vocal gifts, met these requirements, there is no need again to record. There is perhaps but one tenor part of importance in the whole operatic repertory, the adequate portrayal of which exacts of the singer an appearance of age and infirmity. This is Lasaro—Eleazar he is named in the original—the chief character in Halévy's La Juive, and especially devised for M. Duprez. As Lasaro, Signor Mario was required for the first time in his life to whiten his locks, line his face, and present himself as the father of the heroine. The opera has not been repeated since its first production in Italian in 1850. A revival of the work was promised in the prospectus of Covent Garden of this season, with a view to Signor Montgini's attempting the great part indeed of Lasaro, and the appearance of Mlle. Lucca in the character of Rachel. But the plans and pledges of impresarios seem to be rather designed to entertain the credulous than to serve any really useful purpose. Halévy's music has at no time obtained favor here commensurate with its popularity on the Continent. Some day or other, however, La Juive may be worth reproducing in London, if only on the ground of its being the one opera in which Signor Mario consented to look otherwise than young, winsome and chivalrous.

Farewell Benefit of Signor Mario.

19TH JULY, 1871,

WHEN HE PLAYED FERNANDO, AS HE ALONE CAN PLAY IT, IN "LA FAVORITA," FOR THE LAST TIME IN LONDON.

("From Punch.")

House densely crowded. Enthusiasm from the commencement shown in fitful flashes throughout the opera. Whenever Signor Mario is recalled, he gracefully leads on Mademoiselle Scalchi, the Leonora of the evening. But, at last, the opera over, enthusiasm bursts out ablaze, and demands no longer La Favorita, but The Favorite of the music-loving public for the last thirty years.

With this slight prologue we are now in the Stalls. "Valete," Signor Mario is saying: it is quite necessary to add "et plaudite." Allons donc! Shouts of "Bravo, MARIO!" gradually swelling into a deafening roar as MARIO appears in front of the curtain. Bouquets in showers.

WELL INFORMED PERSON (to FRIEND). Mario's a—bravo!—Count in his own right. Bravo! Hurrah! HIS FRIEND (applauding). No; he's a—bravo!—Marquis—(afraid of having, in his enthusiasm, contradicted too peremptorily—Exit MARIO, first time)—at least, so I think. (Immense applause. Re-appearance of MARIO). Here he comes again. Bravo! Bravo!

(Three dozen bouquets, and several wreaths thrown on the stage. Signor MARIO picks them all up.)

OLD GENTLEMAN (sympathetically). Hope he won't suffer from lumbago to-morrow. Bravo! (More tumult, cheering, hurrahing. Signor MARIO bows right and left.)

ELDERLY LADY (feelingly). He's very nervous. YOUNGER LADY (rather hysterical). He's very pale. (Applauds, and feels she could almost cry.)

HIS BROTHER (who is an Amateur Singer at Private Operetta parties, and of course knows all about it). Pale! Booh! that's 'cos he hasn't washed the paint off. (His sister thinks this very unkind. Tears. Cheers.) (More cheers—people rising tumultuously—bouquets—wreaths!)

FRIEND OF WELL-INFORMED PERSON (renewing the discussion). He is a Marquis, because Princess Mary bowed to him.

(Immense applause, consequent upon the ever popular PRINCESS MARY OF CAMBRIDGE, as she will always be in our memory, throwing a wreath to Signor MARIO. The DUCHESS OF CAMBRIDGE throws another, which Signor MARIO catches. Immense applause.)

A PUBLIC SCHOOL DUKE (in private box, jocularly). Well felled. Bravo! (Exit MARIO backwards, gradually bowing himself out.)

WELL-INFORMED PERSON (determined to argue with Friend). That doesn't prove he's a Marquis. He was a great friend of Princess Mary's. (More cheering. Everybody stands up. Evidently they will have him on again.)

FAMILIAR PERSON (next to Well-Informed Person.) The Tecks have sent him a handsome dinner service, gold.

(Bravo! Cheers. Exit MARIO, backwards again, probably backing on to the prompter's toes.)

WELL-INFORMED PERSON (not to be outdone). No, silver.

(Bravissimo! Cherissimo! Re-enter MARIO. OLD HABITUE (generally languid). No—never—gad. (Becomes languidly interested.) Bravo! (Taps two fingers of right hand against three of his left, and is rather ashamed of himself for such a show of weakness.)

(MARIO collects a few hundred bouquets, bows a few hundred times, and then disappears, sideways this time.)

EVERYBODY (including the languid enthusiasts, who begin to think that if they must applaud, they'll take off their gloves). Bravo, Mario!

(Re-enter Mario, evidently having commenced taking off part of his monk's costume. More bouquets, more flowers, more wreaths. People in side boxes nod at him encouragingly, as if he was a young beginner, then smile at one another, as much as to say, "There—we aid it that time." Royal Box enthusiastic.)

DISCONTENTED PERSON (who can't have enough for his money). Wish he'd speak.

ENTHUSIAST (excitedly). He—bravo!—will. (Hurrah! Bravo!)

ENTHUSIAST No. 2 (more excitedly). No, he—bravo!—won't: he can't.

THIRD ENTHUSIAST (almost angrily). What!—bravo!—hurrah!—not speak English!

ENTHUSIASTIC LADY. Yes, he's going to—

(Waves pocket-handkerchief.) PERFECT STRANGER (to her. Enthusiasm being one of Nature's touches, makes everybody kin for the moment). I'm afraid he won't—

(Tries to get a speech out of MARIO by shouting "Bravo!" several times.)

ONE VOICE FROM SOMEWHERE ABOVE. Speak! EVERYONE (drowning the little Voice.) Hurrah! Bravo!

(Handkerchiefs, bouquets, &c., &c., ad. lib.) UNBELIEVING WORLDLING. Wonder if it's—bravo!—his last appearance?

(At last MARIO makes his exit, beginning sideways, then disappearing backwards, for the fifth time. Lights begin to be extinguished. Enthusiasm subsides, and everybody leaves solemnly, as if coming out of church. Enthusiasm outside. MARIO cheered to his carriage.)

YOUNG HABITUE (loudly to a Friend in the Hall, so as to be heard by Admiring Crowd). I went to say good bye to the old boy. Very much affected. (He probably went round to the Stage Door to see MARIO come out.)

OLD HABITUE (also loudly). I remember Marie when, &c., &c.

(The usual thing about his first appearance, with additions about RUBINI, PERSIANI, and GRISI's debut.

Carriages gradually receive the enthusiasts, and by half past twelve Covent Garden is still and dark, for MARIO has gone, and so has everyone else.)

MR. PUNCH. Fare Thee Well! and if forever—then for ever—Mario, Prince of Lyric Artists, fare thee well!

(Bids SIGNOR MARIO adieu, and adds when he is gone,)

Though lost to ear,

To memory dear,

I ne'er shall look upon his like again.

Musical Influences in England.

The Quarterly Review for July, in an article on "Music, its Origin and Influence," says:

"It is difficult either to estimate or to over-estimate the influence of Mr. John Hullah on music and musical taste in England, which we have the more pleasure in recording, as many persons seem now to forget the services he has rendered. In 1840, under the sanction of the Committee of Council on Education, Mr. Hullah brought over from Paris the French system of Wilhelm, and singing schools soon sprang up throughout the country. Exeter Hall was the scene of the first great Hullah Concerts, and in 1853 St. Martin's Hall was built and fitted up by Mr. Hullah's own exertions. Here was performed every then existing work of importance, many for the first time. He brought out a large number of the best living singers—Madame Sherrington, Sims Reeves, Santley, Thomas, Cummings; and many of our best instrumentalists made their first debuts under him. He also inaugurated the class-teaching in schools under his charge, and a large number of the students in the training schools who have shown special talent for music have become choirmasters and organizing masters in different parts of the country, and real centres of civilisation. Mr. Hullah is the author of several operas which were produced with success in their day; he has also written songs and part-songs, besides numerous exercises and vocal studies of all kinds for the instruction of his classes.

"It is impossible not to mention here the name of the Rev. John Curwen, who within the last few years has introduced the Tonic Sol-fa system into this country. The notation he employs is a letter notation, and the prominent tonal difference between the Hullah and the Sol-fa methods turns on this one important fact that Do is a fixed sound in Hullah's system, but Do stands for the keynote of any key whatever with the solfaists. Thus Mr. Curwen's method is based on the principle of key relationship, which regards tones not as high or low but as grouped about the governing or keynote. The rapid spread of this system in schools, factories, and the rural districts seems to indicate that it is especially well adapted for teaching the more ignorant masses the elements of music. But upon this subject there is a great difference of opinion amongst good musicians. However, the Committee of Council on education announced in 1869 their resolution to accept 'the Tonic Sol-fa method and the Tonic Sol-fa notation upon the same terms as should from time to time be applicable to the ordinary method and notation.' In connection with the progress of singing in England, it must be noted for the honor of our country that Mr. Henry Leslie has produced out of English voices and English enthusiasm a choir so perfect that we may doubt whether anywhere in the world there exists or ever has existed such a body of trained voices both male and female. To hear Bach's motet, 'The Spirit also helpeth,' Mendelssohn's 43d Psalm, or Schubert's 23d Psalm, by this choir, is to listen to a delicacy of execution which has probably reached the limits of choral perfection. Mr. Leslie is also known as the author of a fine oratorio, 'Immanuel,' and numerous songs and part-songs.

"Jullien (Louis Antoine) was too popular for his own fame—a scornful smile is apt to pass over the sound musician's face at the very mention of it—yet no man did more than Jullien to kindle the love of music, good, bad and indifferent, throughout the length and breadth of England. Let us be pardoned if we pause to pay a passing tribute to one who has been a little underrated. Jullien arrived here in 1838, with a prodigious reputation as a popular chef d'orchestre, and his promenade concerts soon became the rage. The music played was at times extravagant; pistols, crackers, and even blue and red fires and musketry, were employed to enhance the powers of the orchestra and astound the audience. A new polka by Jullien was an event—for no mortal could tell what would take place before the end of it. But Jullien was also a lover of good music; he knew his public, and stooped to it, but he also to some extent trained it. At his concerts thousands heard for the first time in their lives, for the small sum of one shilling, some of the finest overtures of Weber and Mendelssohn, and parts of the immortal symphonies of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. But these classical pills were so excessively gilded in every programme with sensation dance music, that poor M. Jullien to this day passes with many as a mere charlatan. In justice to him we ought at least to remember that he secured for popular hearing almost every great soloist of his day, and that such men as Vieuxtemps, Sainton, and Sivori were to be found amongst the violins of his band. This band, with their mises en scène and voluminous impedimenta, were as ubiquitous as a corps of Garibaldians in the great days of Garibaldi—they overran the kingdom—they were often announced at one time for a dozen different concerts in different parts of the world—they even went bodily to America, and were back again before they began to be missed here. M. Jullien had many followers but no rivals. After running through several large fortunes, and making many disastrous speculations, he at last went mad, and cut his throat at Paris, in 1860, at the age of forty-eight.

"For many years the influence of Mendelssohn, which at one time threatened to extinguish even that of Spohr or Weber, kept the works of many excellent composers in the background. Chopin and Thalberg succeeded in establishing a speciality for the piano, and in these last years the merits of Schubert, Schumann, and let us hope we may soon be able to add Richard Wagner, have been amply acknowledged. If in this place we do not refer at length to the labors of Cipriani Potter, Sir Sterndale Bennett, Mr. Moscheles, Sir Michael Costa, Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, Sir J. Benedict, Sir M. Balfe, Mr. Henry Leslie, the brothers Macfarren, Mr. Arthur Sullivan, and a few other important names, it is not from any want of respect, but simply from want of space. Most of them Englishmen, they have all worked for and in England. The immense progress of music, owing to the above-mentioned causes, will be realized by these two facts—that in London alone there exist at the present time no less than 104 well-established musical societies, and 2,150 resident musical professors; and London supports at least eight musical journals. The most powerful and accomplished orchestras are those of the Crystal Palace (conductor Mr. Mann); the best quartet concerts are the Monday Popular, the Musical Union concerts at St. James's Hall, and Mr. Holmes's Musical Evenings at St. George's Hall. For refined choral singing there is no choir equal to Mr. H. Leslie's. The Sacred Harmonic under Sir M. Costa and Mr. Barnby's Choir give annual splendid performances of the principal oratorios at St. James's and Exeter Hall; and the Albert Hall promises to be a formidable rival to the Crystal Palace as a new and magnificent centre for giant concerts of all kinds. The late Handel Festival has been a great pecuniary and choral success above its predecessors, but the superiority of the Albert Hall for the execution of solos was never more apparent. We may also well ask why the seats in the arena blocks are always the highest in price, as they are undoubtedly the worst for hearing. Being so much below the level of any part of the orchestra, the sound floats over the listener's head. The Birmingham Festivals and the Cathedral Festivals at Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester, have done an incalculable amount of good to the cause of music in the English provinces; and musical societies abound all over the country. England, therefore, at this moment is rich in the most splendid raw material for a great national organization for the promotion of the musical art. There is plenty of private enterprise, but there is great want of union, of system, of organization, and we must add of generosity and goodwill."

Gilmore's Next Strike for Glory.

(From the Springfield Republican, Aug. 14.)

Mr. Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore, having successfully launched on the public his book containing the autobiographical account of the Boston peace jubilee, on Saturday launched himself on the briny deep in his Alexandrian search for new worlds to conquer. He goes with credentials from President Grant, commending him and his scheme to our representatives abroad, and with a serene confidence in his ability to impress the potentates of Europe with the importance of both. This scheme is for a "World's Peace Jubilee, an International Musical Festival, a Union of all Nations in Harmony," all of which is to take place at the Hub of the Universe in June and July, 1872, beginning on the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill and closing on that of the Declaration of Independence. Whether the selection of these dates will be construed as an insult to Great Britain, and cause a discord in the "international harmony," remains to be seen; but Gilmore flatters himself that he can cajole England as well as the other European powers into sending their finest musical organizations here at government expense. And he promises to bring together a chorus of 20,000 voices and an orchestra of 2000 instruments, or twice as many singers and instrumentalists as participated in the first "jubilo." There will, of course, have to be another "coliseum," in which 100,000 are to be provided for.

The scheme is one of those "stunning" ones, which start hard, but, when once in motion, roll on to success, almost by their own momentum. It is well calculated to stir up enthusiasm alike among singers and public, and when advertised and pushed as Gilmore, with the true Barnum instinct, will advertise and push it, it will sweep everything before it. Whatever Gilmore's success in Europe may be, there is little doubt that with proper effort he can raise his immense musical forces in this country alone, although the presence of some of the splendid military bands of the old world would of course give the jubilee special eclat.

So the festival is pretty sure to be a tremendous popular success; but Mr. Gilmore must have been a poor student of the results of his first attempts to suppose that it will be in any adequate sense a musical success. While the jubilee of 1869 demonstrated that thousands of voices can be trained to sing not too rapid music in unity, it also demonstrated that there is a thus-far-and-no-further point which voices, no matter how many, will not pass—a point (not so distant, either, as one might suppose) where the volume, mighty though it be, sinks into feebleness and ineffectiveness. Does any one suppose that a united shout from a hundred voices can be heard twice as far as a similar shout from fifty, or the shout of twenty thousand twice as far as that of ten thousand? It has been remarked many times and is doubtless true, that the Boston Handel and Haydn society is more effective with its 700 voices in the Music hall than Gilmore's 10,000 were in the Coliseum; yet now Gilmore proposes to erect a building twice as large as the latter structure, and expects voices to penetrate its immense distances. He is not such a dullard as not to know, after his experience, that it is simply an impossibility to mass 100,000 persons so that a chorus, of whatever magnitude, will be effectively heard by all or even half of them. This is not a matter of theory, merely; it is an inevitable deduction from the experiment of 1869. And inasmuch as a smaller chorus in a smaller place is unsurpassably more effective as to volume, and, further, inasmuch as the larger a chorus is the more unwieldy and hard to manage it of necessity becomes,—we are forced to the conclusion that if Mr. Gilmore wants to foster and encourage art, he can safely adopt humbler and less extravagant and sensational means. But such would not glorify Gilmore.

(From the New York Sun.)

Mr. P. S. Gilmore, the inventor of Boston Peace Jubilees, has acquired, among his other musical accomplishments, none more thoroughly in all respects than that of blowing his own trumpet. Whatever may be said as to his qualifications as a musical artist and manager of concerts, there is no doubt that for producing a loud, continuous Jericho blast in his own behalf, Mr. Gilmore need apprehend no rival on the American continent or elsewhere. The prospectus which the renowned conductor has issued for his proposed World's Peace Jubilee is in itself a wonderful work of art. If the Jubilee itself is half as sonorous, it cannot fail of success. The document is an extended one, and begins by saying that two years ago the great volume of song from the original Peace Jubilee held the nation spell-bound (!) by the sublimity of its music, filling every Christian heart with glad tidings of great joy; but that the proposed festival is to be of double the interest and magnitude. Mr. Gilmore speaks of the great war that has just terminated in Europe, and is evidently of the opinion that in the order of human events it occurred principally for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to celebrate its close by a jubilee. He accordingly proposes to collect a chorus of twenty thousand singers, with an orchestra of two thousand instruments gathered from all nations; and very modestly remarks that it is necessary that each nation of the earth shall be represented by a magnificent band in its full national costume or uniform, and adds that the nations of the earth through their several governments are expected to pay all the expenses of these different bands in return for the honor of being represented in his big show. It is possible, however, that he may be disappointed in this regard, and that the kings and potentates of Europe, Asia, Africa, and the isles of the sea may not look upon the affair in quite so favorable a light as he does. If they should, however, it will be all the better for him.

(From the Boston Daily Advertiser and the Chicago Tribune.)

Chicago believes in Gilmore and the Peace Jubilee. That is to say, she has faith in him and it to the fullest extent consistent with the maintenance of the glory of Chicago. The cardinal points in her belief and declaration are that the chief end of man is to glorify Chicago and speculate in grain; that elevators are absolutely necessary to the elevation of the standard of the human race and mercantile mortals, and that railways are the true ways of pleasantness. In the proud self-consciousness that the whole world (excepting St. Louis) coincides in her views in regard to her own illustrious individuality, she is willing to recognize in a pleasant way the efforts of less favored cities to obtain an occasional hearing in behalf of private projects of business or pleasure, feeling herself assured that in time all such loitering by the way will be given over, and the inhabitants of the whole world will find their destiny in Chicago. Of the "World's Peace Jubilee," the Chicago Tribune discourses thus:—

Patrick S. Gilmore has at last published the prospectus of the World's Peace Jubilee, which will commence at Boston, next year, on the 17th of June, the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill, and conclude on the 4th of July, the anniversary of American Independence. Gilmore, in New England, is known as the leader of Gilmore's Band, and Gilmore's Band is to New England what the American eagle is to the country at large. It is a condition of marital prosperity that Gilmore's Band shall play at the wedding of every Boston maiden; and your true New Englander would die contented if he could be assured that Gilmore's Band would play at the funeral. Outside of New England Gilmore is known as the projector of the Peace Jubilee two years ago. That jubilee was a colossal affair, as every one knows, but the prospectus before us is more colossal even than that. It is provokingly silent as to details, but in the midst of the glittering generalities with which it abounds, we gather that there will be a grand chorus of twenty thousand voices, an orchestra of two thousand instrumentalists, representatives from all governments, bands from all nations, a coliseum capable of seating a hundred thousand people, decorated within with the emblems of peace and harmony, and without with the flags of all countries; floating over all and above all the broad banner of universal peace. Gilmore is already on the broad Atlantic, on the way to Europe, to interview Victoria, Wilhelm, the Czar, the Sultan, the Pope, the Khedive, the Khan, and the head man of France, all of whom he will bring over with him as invited guests. He will also, if possible, bring the Bal Mabille, Cremorne, the cafés chantans, Coleridge's Damsel with a dulcimer, the harp that once thro' Tara's halls, the guitar that the Troubadour touched so gaily, the harp that Uhlund's Minnesinger broke, the Nautch girls from Egypt, and the dancing Dervishes, to add to this exposition of Universal Peace. It is not impossible, indeed, that he will extend his colossal idea into zoölogy, and place on exhibition in the Boston public gardens, the American Eagle, the British Lion, the Gallic Cock, the German two-headed Eagle, the Belgian Lion, the Russian Monstrocitry, the Chinese Dragon, the Egyptian Sacred Cat, all in peace with each other—a grand happy family, out-Barnuming Barnum. This weak, piping time of peace will be immortalized, and the shades of Balfe, and Wallace, and Auber, and Offenbach and Bellini, and Beethoven, and Bach, and Gluck, and Mozart, and Meyerbeer, and Mendelssohn will hover over the coliseum for three weeks in an ecstatic apotheosis.

We have faith that Patrick S. Gilmore will crown his undertakings with success, and that the bloated aristocracies and effete monarchies of the Old World will at once accept the proposition of the New World, and come over here and give the United States the benefit of one long, loud and lusty "barbaric yawp."

It then proceeds to give a very entertaining account of the attractions of Chicago, the slight spice of sarcasm with which it is mingled serving to season the dish and give it a relish which will be fully appreciated. The article concludes as follows:—

Chicago should take a direct personal interest in this affair. All of these people have heard of Chicago, and, if they come to this country at all, will do so with the primary object of seeing Chicago, visiting the tunnels and crib, betting on the White Stockings, and investing in Boulevard lots. They will take in Boston on the way, but their main object will be to see our sights and learn the art of statesmanship and parliamentary science from our common council, and, with this end in view, we indorse Patrick S. Gilmore's gigantic singing school, and we repeat his magnificent invitation:

"From both hemispheres and every nation let them come—from classic Greece and the Holy Land, from Turkey, China and Japan, from the Nile and the Ganges, the Alps and the Andes—aye, let not the continents alone, but the isles of the sea contribute, and with all their varied instruments of music swell the glad chorus of universal rejoicing, that shall fill not only every heart but the whole world with divine harmony."

Chicago alone is capable of receiving and fraternizing with this crowd. Chicago is cosmopolitan. The classic Greeks will find plenty of Greeks here as classic as they. The Holy Land will be at home in our churches, and Y. M. C. A. and board of trade. Turkey will find her own coffee and chibouques here. The heathen Chinese can roam our streets without fear of injury to his pigtail, and the Children of the Sun will find bootblacks who can give them a Japanese polish. The muddy Nile and turbulent Ganges will be at home on the banks of the crystal Chicago and pellucid Healy Slough, and the Alps and the Andes can refresh themselves by way of contrast, and shout to each other across our magnificent prairie distances; while the isles of the sea will not be obliged to give up their favorite menus, but will find plenty of people patriotic enough to devote themselves to the gridiron and skillet.

Therefore, once more in the eloquent words of P. S. G.:—

"Come ye representatives of every court and cabinet of Europe, the New World [i. e. Gilmore] invites you to join in the feast she [he] is preparing; come in your ships, not with implements of war to make war, but with instruments of harmony to inaugurate the new era of perpetual peace among the nations; come in the name of the King of Kings and Lord of Lords, and let the voice of all nations go up in multitudinous chorus for [Gilmore] peace on earth."

Come one, come all, and after you have sung your little piece, come to Chicago and see our sights, hear Montgomery's eloquence, drink our beer, and buy up the few lots Nilsson has left unpurchased. Then you can return to your respective families on the Alps, the Andes, the isles of the sea, etc., impressed with the idea that there is an Arcadia in this world, and that it is located in Chicago. We can feed you from our stock-yards, we can water you from our lake. We can supply your spiritual wants, whatever they are, from our five hundred churches. After three weeks in the pent up Uices and narrow streets of Boston, we can give you space to breathe. And, after being once imbued with our virtue, and goodness, and happiness, and smartness, you will know how it is yourself.

Music Abroad.

Bonn. The great centennial Beethoven Festival, postponed from last year by the war, was to take place in this the master's birth place on the 20th, 21st and 22nd of this month. The programme is as follows:— On the 20th August, Missa solennis; Symphony, No. 5, C minor. On the 21st August, Overture to Leonore, No. 3; Air from Fidelio; Sinfonia Eroica; March and Chorus from Die Ruinen von Athen; Concerto for Violin; Fantasia for Pianoforte, Chorus and Orchestra. On the 22nd August, Overture to Coriolan; "Elegischer Gesang" for four solo voices; Pianoforte Concerto in E flat major; Air: "Ah, Perfido"; Overture to Egmont; and Ninth Symphony, with final chorus.

Additional interest will be conferred on this approaching Festival by the presence of distinguished living musicians and composers. Among the celebrities who have already accepted the invitations sent them by the Committee, are Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, London; M. Niels W. Gade, Copenhagen; MM. Verhulst and Holl, Holland; M. Benoit, Antwerp; and Mdme. Schumann.

CRYSTAL PALACE, LONDON. Last Saturday week one of those agreeable afternoon entertainments was given, which, for want of some more distinctive title, are called "Opera Concerts." The artists who appeared included Mdle. Leon-Duval, Mdle. Bauermeister, and the well-known and popular singers, Signori Vizzani, Bentham, Mendiores, Rocca, and Foli. The list was headed by Madame Alboni, who, although she does not belong to Her Majesty's Opera, has on more than one occasion appeared in conjunction with the artists of that establishment. The programme contained one classical piece which could not fail to please even those who admire Italian music in preference to German. Beethoven's music to the Ruins of Athens formed, in fact, a very attractive as well as effective number. The singing of Madame Albani was magnificent. She selected for her first song Rossini's "O salutaris," from the Messe Solennelle; her second was the favorite "Ah quel giorno," embellished with some remarkable floriture, whilst for a concerted piece she introduced "Bella immago," and, in conjunction with Signor Foli, had to reap-pear to acknowledge the enthusiastic applause with which it was received. Mdlle. Bauermeister's singing of a valse, entitled "Tutto sorride," gained for her a fair share of applause. Signor Viazani, in Donizetti's "Alma soave," was still more fortunate, and was called upon to repeat it. Mdlle. Leon-Duval's rendering of Gounod's "Ave-Maria," with organ accompaniment by Mr. J. Coward, found numerous admirers, as also did Signor Foli's singing of "O Lieti di," from L'Etoile du Nord, and Mr. Bentham's expressive vocalization of Sir Jules Benedict's "Elly Mavourneen." The romance from Un Ballo in Maschera, entitled "Alla vita che t'arride," was finely sung by Signor Mendiores. The overture to William Tell formed the introductory piece, and the march from La Reine de Saba brought the selection to a conclusion. Mr. A. Manns conducted.

The series of concerts which thus terminated was in some respects more attractive than its predecessor, the experiment having been made of giving classical operas as concert music, thus avoiding the usual pot-pourri of isolated tunes. Beethoven's Fidelio, and Mozart's Don Giovanni and Nozze di Figaro were the operas chosen, and, as regards their universal popularity, well chosen; but, in our opinion, the repertoire of such recitals should be confined to works in which the dramatic interest is not paramount, as it undoubtedly is in the greater part of Fidelio, say the whole of the prison scene, and in not a small portion of both Figaro and Don Giovanni. Works like Mozart's Idomeneo, Gluck's Paris and Helen, either of his Ifigenies, or any of Handel's operas, which are intrinsically valuable as works of music, and do not imperatively demand representation on the stage to bring out all their beauties, would answer the purpose better; but it may be doubted whether they would have drawn sufficiently numerous audiences.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. The operas given this year, taking them, as well as we can remember, in the order of succession, have been Lucia di Lammermoor, the Traviata, Guillaume Tell, the Figlia del Reggimento, Faust e Margherita, Don Giovanni, the Favorita, the Sonnambula, the Puritani, the Flauto Magico, the Barbieri di Siviglia, the Huguenots, Dinorah, Rigoletto, Otello, Fra Diavolo, the Nozze di Figaro, the Africaine, Martha, the Etoile du Nord, Un Ballo in Maschera, Esmeralda, Il Trovatore, Hamlet, Le Austrie Femminili, and two acts of Mussanillo—25 in all, together with fragments from an opera, the Astuzie Femminili of Cimarosa being the only instance in which the desire to offer a new attraction to the public was evinced. La Donna del Lago, La Juive, Les Diamans de la Couronne, Le Prophète, Der Freischütz, Le Domino Noir, and Il Matrimonio Segreto, with the tempting distribution of the dramatis personae laid down in the prospectus, were none of them forthcoming. However, we may look forward to these as treats in store for the future.

Some recent letters in the Guardian have brought to light a curious piece of apparatus used in village psalmody of the olden days. This is a gigantic tin singing trumpet, of which several specimens still exist. One at East Leake, Notts, was in use within the last twenty years for the bass singer to sing through. It measures, when drawn out (it has a slide like a telescope) 7ft. 6in., with a bell mouth of 1ft. 9in. in diameter. As to one at Thorney, Notts, the old clerk's story was that it was used to call people to church before bells were invented! Another at Braybrooke, North Hants, is in good condition, with a stand about 5ft. high to rest it on. The possessor "has heard the voice through it, and it is rendered very powerful in singing. They say in the village that it was used for leading the singing within memory. The effect is rather like that of the Ophicleides one hears abroad, and they suit Gregorians capitally." It seems quite clear that these instruments were used in order to make the most of the voice of the principal village vocalist, whether in leading generally by singing the melody, or in leading the basses.

List of Sir Michael Costa's orchestras at Her Majesty's Opera, Drury Lane (1871):—

1st Violins.—P. Sainton (Principal), Amor, Buziau, Desardin, Haag, H. W. Hill, Kettinus, Loades, Rendell, Ries, Risegari, Wiener. 2nd Violins.—J. Willy (Principal), Clementi, Diehl, Easton, Morley, Newsham Nicholson, Snewing, Villin, Wilkins. Violoncellos.—Lasserre (Principal), Daubert, Lutgen, Petit, Van Bienne, Vieuxtemps, Woolhouse. Double Basses.—A. C. White (Principal), Durier, Edgar, Neuwirth, Pratten, Waud, Winterbottom. Tenors.—Waeffelghen (Principal), Baetens, Bornhardt, Colchester, Mapleson, Reynolds, Schreurs, Zerbini. Harp.—Mdlle. Jensen. Flutes.—Swendsen, Brossa. Oboes.—Dubruucq, Engel. Clarinets.—Lazarus, Snelling. Bassoons.—Watton, Haveron. Horns.—Paquis, Handley, Keovil, Waterson. Trumpets.—Reynolds, Newzerling. Trombones.—Webster, Tull, Bartlett. Ophicleide.—Phasey. Drums.—J. W. Hornton. Side Drum and Triangle.—Owen. Bass Drum.—Middleditch. Composer, director of the music, and conductor, Sir Michael Costa.

LEIPZIG. The projected "model performances" of Mozart's operas at Leipzig, which were to have been given during the present month, have all ended in smoke. The "stars" who were to sing in these performances, or, at any rate, an inconveniently large majority of those stars, instead of coming themselves have forwarded medical certificates, to the effect that the state of their health imperiously demands their abstention from all professional exertion, and their immediate presence at some watering-place.

VIENNA. The new season will shortly commence at the Royal Operahouse. In the way of novelty the management is hesitating between Don Carlos and Hamlet. The choice will, most probably, fall on Don Carlos, because, in the first place, the Hamlet of M. Ambroise Thomas, without Mdlle. Nilsson, is the Hamlet of Shakspere without Hamlet; because, in the second, Mdlle. Nilsson is not in Europe; and because, in the third, Herr Herbeck would not be able to pay her terms if she were.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 26, 1871.

Death of Carl Tausig.

Carl Tausig, of whom we have all heard so much for several years as one of the three or four most remarkable of all living virtuoso pianists—Liszt, and his other two distinguished pupils, von Bülow and Rubinstein, being the peers with whom he has been usually named—died on the 17th of July, of typhus fever, at Leipzig, at the early age of 31. Prodigious exercise of brain and nerve had worn him to a shadow, so they say who have seen him within a year. And physically he was small and always delicate. Liszt is reported to have said of him: "If he lives he will make me forgotten." His main, almost his sole, distinction seems to have been in the line of an executive, interpretative artist. As a composer so far he had made no mark. His intellectual eagerness and enterprise in many directions was decided, and he appears to have been fond of grappling with the profoundest problems, and familiar with the writings of deep thinkers.

A friend has sent us several numbers of the Berlin National Zeitung, from which we translate a few paragraphs, relating to the man and to his funeral.

"Tausig's prominent importance as a musician, his unexampled genial virtuosity in the faithful reproduction of masterworks of all times on the piano, will undoubtedly receive full appreciation from competent judges. An enemy to all rèclame; incapable of making the least concession, to persons or to interests, for the sake of his own profit; an impassioned partisan for that much assailed tendency in art, in which he found the fulfilment of his own ideals, during his whole career Tausig had his full share of mortifying opposition and hard conflict. But the self-forgetting devotion to Art, the indefatigable zeal with which he never ceased to labor energetically at at his own development, won for him more and more the entire respect even of his adversaries, while his ever more perfected playing finally compelled the unanimous admiration even of the most reluctant.

"Comparatively few persons knew of Tausig's various, comprehensive knowledge, of his rich culture in other fields than music. With a great natural gift for mathematics and the natural sciences, he had in the latter years of his life resumed his ever favorite studies, and with a penetrating understanding devoted a great part of his leisure to the works of Mayer, of Tyndall, and of Helmholtz, whom he admired above all; he was a reader of Darwin and of Huxley; while on the other hand he was never weary of returning to the greatest of all German thinkers, Kant, to whom he had already been brought near through Schopenhauer. Among his favorite plans, at times, was that of sooner or later devoting himself entirely to the sciences.

"In ordinary life Tausig was often shy and retiring, rather difficult of approach. Only in smaller friendly circles could all his devoted amiability unfold itself; for those of whom he had once become fond he possessed a rare capacity of self-sacrifice. He was slow to form attachments; but toward those who had won his confidence he was full of the most open, naïve trustfulness, while the sensitiveness of his character and the experience of many a bitter illusion could easily render him suspicious toward others.

"In view of this sad close of a life so short and yet so full of significance, we cannot help recalling words which were spoken of another who was snatched from us at the same age of fruit bearing activity with Tausig:

" 'Whether more would have come of him, had a friendly fate from the beginning smoothed the way for his exertions, who can say? It was a nature that needed light and air for its development. In the midst of his power and his unfolding he has been broken; he had yet a future. And yet to how many he had become endeared,—this energetic, highly gifted, but at the same time so often sensitive and undecided man! ' "

The same journal, (July 20) speaks of the funeral honors paid to Tausig:

"This forenoon, at eleven o'clock, a not large circle of mourners assembled at the cemetery of the Jerusalem and Neuen Kirche in the Belle Alliance street, to follow the earthly remains of Carl Tausig to their last resting place. The coryphæuses of Art were wanting, most of them being on their summer vacation journeys. It was rather the narrower circle of friends and relations, besides a number who appeared from general sympathy, that stood around the richly decorated coffin. Amid the sounds of the Choral: "Jesus, meine Zuversicht," performed by a corps of wind instruments, the mournful escort moved toward the open grave. Immediately after the coffin followed the nearest relations with the clergyman, as well as the bearers of two splendid palms, whose stems were wound with laurel, probably the offerings of some societies. A great many forget-me-not bouquets and wreaths of roses also had been sent. The grave was bordered with blossoms and green branches. At it stood the Berlin Symphony Orchestra (Kapelle) ready with their instruments to send a last musical greeting after the master of tones. The preacher Thomas, of the Nicolai Kirche, pronounced the memorial discourse at the open grave. The clergyman left to other voices the appreciation of the artist, who, while yet so young, stood at a lonely height of the hitherto unattained among his striving fellows. He dwelt upon the universal human lesson to be drawn from the completed life-career of the departed. This life, too, had unfolded itself out of the two fundamental conditions of every existence, the gifts which God had lent him, and his own voluntary effort. Gloomy impressions very early fell upon this life, and it was just these that ever prompted him anew to bury himself in the consoling realm of tones. The sweet enjoyments of family life were denied to him; his reverence for God was of that cosmical character which satisfies the keen understanding, without having penetrated into the deep essence of Christ's doctrine: God is Love. Nevertheless he served his God in the full earnestness of his creative life and effort, and stood upon that height of moral purity and cleanliness, which comprehends as duty, what others call the worship of God. He had, like all of us, his weaknesses. He frequently met men with caution, even with mistrust; so much the more devoted and amiable was he in the trusted friendly circle. With deep earnestness, not for vain display, he buried himself in the philosophy of Kant, especially in that sharp logic which distinguished the German master above all philosophers, and in his worship of the Creator in his own infinite creation. Far from him was the pursuit of wealth or purchased approbation. Modest in self esteem, he could not satisfy himself, but strove continually for higher goals in his art.

"A terrible thunder storm prevented the carrying out of the funeral programme. Amid torrents from the clouds, the distant roll of thunder, and the roar of cannon firing a salute, the grave closed over the master of the peaceful art of music."

The Boston Transcript has the following brief sketch of Tausig's life, translated from Schubert's Biographical Lexicon:

Carl Tausig was born Nov. 4, 1841, near Warmaw. He was son of Alonso Tausig, and his pupil till his fourteenth year. He finally became a pupil of Liszt; and as regards piano technique, was without a rival. He was perhaps the only one who played by heart all the works of any value, from Bach to Liszt, not excepting the most prominent compositions in the chamber music of such as Beethoven, Mozart, Hummel, Raff, Schumann, and Rubenstein. Tausig knew no difficulties on the piano, and was at home in all modern and classical compositions; so that he took every composer to his heart; and no one better knew how to render them. Liszt's prophecy, "He will sometime make me be forgotten as a piano-player," seemed likely to be realized, since Tausig's wonderful performances had already given it probability.

In 1869 and 1860, he lived in Dresden, and the two following years in Vienna, where he made a great sensation as director, by the style in which he brought out the most difficult work of Liszt, Wagner, and Berlioz. In 1865, induced by his friend Bülow, he went to Berlin, and was soon appointed Court pianist. His institute for piano virtuosos stood unrivalled. But as it interfered with his desire for travel, he gave it up in the fall of 1870. It remains to be seen whether he will take rank as a composer, as no great works of his have as yet appeared. It is known, however, that he has left a large quantity of manuscripts, among which are mentioned a piano forte concerto, an orchestral arrangement of Schumann's Opus 109 and some Elaborations of Classical Etudes for Technique, and Disciples of Hand. Among his published works are the "Sol-rées de Vienne," "Caprices on Themes from Strauss," three numbers and a few Transcriptions. He has often been pressed by the publishers for manuscript, but has always coolly replied, "I as yet publish nothing."

Tausig's imputed habit of changing standard works, such as the E-minor Concerto of Chopin, and others no less endeared to the lovers of classical music, apparently to display his enormous powers of execution, deserves rebuke. It is like the elocutionist, who, for purposes of mere show, would attempt to remould the immortal thoughts of Shakespeare or Milton.

The Musical Department of the Boston Public Library.

Probably most of our citizens are not aware that this admirable institution includes in its large and generous plan a representation of the history of music, so far as possible, by the collection of musical scores and all the important literature of the art. The following statement of the strength and the deficiencies of this department of the Library has been contributed by Mr. John K. Paine, of Harvard University, to the last Quarterly Bulletin.

"The Library received, in 1858, as a part of the gift of Mr. Bates, a collection of about 500 works relating to the history, science and art of music, which was procured through the intelligent and zealous intervention of Mr. A. W. Thayer, the distinguished musical writer. The basis of the collection was the library of the late M. de Kondeika, of which it was well said, that 'any one knowing the extreme rarity of books of music, particularly of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, will be surprised at the richness of the collection.' To the Kondeika Library, Mr. Thayer added more than one hundred volumes. The theoretical writings of Aaron Artusi, Bonon-cini, Bontempi, Coellus, Doni, Gaffori, Galliet, Glareanus, Heyden, Kircher, Ornithoparchus, Praetorius, Zarlinus, and other learned medieval authorities are embraced in this collection. It has, besides these, many works of noted excellence by later writers in musical science, history and biography; namely, Albrechtsberger, Adlung, C. P. E. Bach, Burney, Fux, Gerber, Gerbert, Forkel, Jones, J. A. Hiller, Hawkins, Laborde, J. G. L. Mozart, North, Quanz, Martini, Rousseau, Scheibe, Schubart, Tartini, Ambros, Belletrani, Brendel, Coussemaker, Chrysander, Dehn, Drieberg, Fétis, Hauptmann, Hand, Heimboltz, Jahn, Klesowetter, Lobe, Marx, Riehl, Rochlitz, Reissmann, Schumann, Winterfeld, Wagner, and others. Mention should also be made of twenty-eight quarto volumes of manuscript music selected and copied by Prof. S. W. Dehn, late custos of the musical collection of the Royal Library, at Berlin. This selection was made from the best published and unpublished musical compositions of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, including the works of Anerio, Caldara, Cherubini, Clari, Colonna, Gabrielli, Hase, Hammerichmidt, Lasso, Leo, Lotti, Jomelli, Marceli, Palestrina, Scarlatti, Porta, Pergolesi, Schütz, and other masters. During the last twelve years, books have constantly been added to the collection, and it is now comparatively rich in works relating to the history, biography, theory, and criticism of music.

The collection, however, is almost wholly deficient in the following branches:

1. The works of the English madrigalists of the sixteenth century.—Tallis, Byrd, Dowland, Bull, Bennet, and others.
2. The German sacred music of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries.
3. The operas of the Neapolitan, French, German, and English masters of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

It is also desirable that the Library should possess,—

1. The complete works of the so called classical masters, Handel, Haydn, Gluck, Mozart, and Beethoven.
2. The principal vocal and instrumental compositions of the later German school of Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann and others.
3. The most noted operas of the German, Italian, and French composers of the nineteenth century.

These important additions would place the Musical Department of the Library in advance of any other collection in the United States.

No more practical step could be taken towards the advancement of musical knowledge and taste among us, than the formation of such a museum of musical art. With the scores of all great masters, of every epoch and school, at hand, it would be comparatively easy to bring their works to publication and performance, and many treasures, now wholly neglected by the public, in this country, would ultimately find appreciation and use, and thus lead to a more enlightened and catholic taste.

It is to be hoped that friends of the Library will assist in making this department complete.

"Light" and "Heavy" Music.

"Too much heavy music." "Too little variety." "Selections not popular enough."

This is the usual talk after an unsuccessful concert; and even the givers of successful concerts are sometimes frightened and "demoralized" just at the height of their success, by sceptical complaints and croakings about their music being too good for the many, and above the comprehension of some flitting youths and misses in the audience, whom it would seem of more importance to conciliate than all the rest. But let us see.

Is heavy music identical always with the highest kind of music? Cannot a composition be as superficial and full of clap trap as you please, and in the popular form of polka, potpourri, French overture, or what not, and still be heavy, dull and unenjoyable? Do you mean to say that a greater sense of heaviness does not oppress one after sitting through a miscellaneous hodge-podge of virtuoso solos, variations, waltzes, operatic arrangements laden with stunning brass, &c., &c., with all the senseless encores thereunto pertaining, than after hearing a good symphony, which, if it somewhat tax the intellectual attention, yield for that reason more excitement and refreshments, instead of the listless passivity with which you endure the former? Considering how many times, for years past, the music-loving part of our society have heard the symphonies of Beethoven, is it too much to say that most of them do really find the "Pastoral Symphony" refreshing after a melange of Verdi, Gungl, Donizetti, Flotow, Jullien, &c., served up in the most fantastical shapes?

Again, what if an audience do not perfectly comprehend the symphonies of Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn? Is perfect comprehension by any means indispensable to great and profitable enjoyment of them? We know many cases of persons merely having a general susceptibility to the beautiful, the elevating and the spiritual, who know not perhaps the first A B C of musical science, who yet are among the most deeply interested, the most enthusiastic and devout listeners to these great works. Must one understand the wonderful art with which the four themed fugue finale of the "Jupiter" is worked up, before he can feel and be uplifted by its beauty and its grandeur? Then should we all be writers of symphonies, rather than listeners. As well say, go not to the picture galleries to admire the works of Raphael and Reubens, until you are able to tell how they were painted. Knowledge of course enhances the enjoyment, provided there be inspiration enough in the composition to keep it from being hacknied before you have half analyzed it. But the beauty, the effect, may be, and should be simple, though the art concealed in that effect be infinitely complex. Is it not so in every beautiful product of Nature?

It is true that most persons do not listen to a composition on account of the science and learning displayed in it. But it is not true, therefore, that they listen merely for the charm of the melody. Diverge the melody of all the wonderful complexity of harmony, and counterpoint, and instrumentation, into which it is woven, and see if the charm remain. This complexity none but the taught musician mechanically understands; but the susceptible, poetic soul can feel the beauty, can experience the spiritual effect, can recognize the end of which all this art is but the means, sometimes with a livelier zest than the technical musician himself. And therein musicians very often miss it in supposing that the public cannot appreciate their best music, because it cannot apprehend it technically, as they themselves do. Do painters paint only for painters, or doctors preach only to doctors, or musicians make music only for musicians?

But you say no audience is "equal" to a whole symphony a week. Then what in the world are we equal to? Or when shall we ever be equal to so much, if thirty years or more of pretty frequent exposure to nearly all the symphonies of Beethoven, have not yet brought a Boston public any nearer to the point? Not equal to listening half an hour in a whole week to a fine work, with which we have grown somewhat familiar, and which, by the universal testimony of all musical persons, only grows more beautiful by repetition!

As to the policy of beginning with light music and elevating our audiences gradually to the power of appreciating better, we would suggest two things. 1. This is just what we have been doing now for forty years; and now that we can at last congratulate ourselves that we have nearly reached the point (as seen by the attendance upon classical concerts,) must we go down into the lowest forms and begin the long, slow schooling over again! There will always be the same necessity, if we admit it to exist now. 2. But is it so clear that the hearing of light music prepares one for the understanding of higher music? We believe this notion is a fatal mistake. How many waltzes, polkas, "American Quadrilles," variation pieces, and brass band arrangements must one hear, to lift him to the level of enjoying Beethoven? How long must the musical stomach fortify itself upon candy and whip syllabubs and spices, before it shall have strength enough to like and to digest Beethoven? How long a course of sentimental, blood and thunder novels, of clap-trap melodramas, and of popular weeklies with pictorial fronts bristling with American patriotism, does it take to nurse up a true appetite for Chaucer, Shakespeare and Milton? No, this is not the way. This will but make sickly babies of us all,—that is to say, of all who have not already had the good fortune of a better sort of training.

It is true that each year's audiences are swelled by new recruits, by the incoming of a new generation of listeners. All the more therefore should we see to it that the taste of the young should have a chance to form itself from the outset upon the best models. Not that we should deny them the mere amusement of light, gay, brilliant music; but at the same time we should take them up with us, as far as possible, at that point of culture, which we ourselves through greater disadvantages have painfully and slowly reached. It is a fatal policy to set the standard of our concerts mainly to the level of the lowest comprehension, to make the programme for the idlest and the youngest portion of the crowd. So surely as we do that, will the real music-lovers, and all earnest persons, seeking higher culture, cease to go at all, and then the need for a good orchestra will die out; all artists who have self respect, will one by one forsake a sphere where there is no call made upon their best powers, and the concert-room will sink to an arena of mere physical amusement, where the violin may as well give way at once to the old country fiddle, and all idea of music as an Art be set at rest!

NEW YORK. The musical prospects for the coming season are summed up in the Sunday Herald; among them these:

The New York musical and dramatic season is pretty well mapped out. One of the most important events will be the advent of Mlle Nilsson in opera. Mlle Nilsson will be supported in a style fully worthy of her vast reputation. Her manager has been successful in securing as tenor M. Capoul, a singer for whom Auber and Offenbach have written several of their best operas of recent date. Capoul has been singing in London, at the Drury Lane, this season, for the first time in Italian opera, and he has suddenly won a position as the leading tenor of the day. He is a Frenchman and a blonde—quite different in appearance from the average run of stage heroes, who are invariably given over to black hair and fierce moustaches. Capoul wears a slight blonde beard, has curly hair and is generally considered very handsome. It has been decided to open the season October 23, with Verdi's "Traviata," in which Nilsson and Capoul will both appear. This work will be followed by the "Mignon" of Ambroise Thomas, in both of which Nilsson has made very great successes. There has, also, been secured the music of Flotow's new opera "L'Ombre," a work for four voices, without chorus. As far as is known now the troupe consists of the following artists: Mlle Christine Nilsson and Mme. Monbelli, prime donne soprani; Miss Annie Louise Cary, prima donna contralto; Capoul, Brignoli, Lyall, tenor di grazia, and Jamet, baritone. A tenor di forza, that rara avis of the present day, and a second baritone are now required. Thirty-six good singers have been selected in New York for the chorus and the rest come from Europe. There will be eighty in the orchestra at the concerts which precede the season of opera and fifty on opera nights. A number of the best orchestral soloists from Covent Garden, Drury Lane, and Paris have been engaged.

Mme. Parepa-Rosa has already arrived in the Scotia. The arrangements for her coming season of English opera in America are completed. She will open at the Academy of Music on the 2nd of October, with a troupe undoubtedly better than any which has hitherto given English opera in the United States. Of course she herself will be the primary attraction, but Mme. Vansini (Mrs. Jenny Van Zandt) will also share public attention with her. Clara Dora is also in the Parepa troupe. Despite her forlorn aristocratic name she is an English girl—a daughter of Mr. Barnett, the composer, and granddaughter of Robert Lindley, the once famous violoncellist. She is a florid singer, and has been successful (in Italy) in "Lucia," "Sonnambula," "Maria Padilla," "Maria di Rohan" and other operas. It is understood that she will make her American debut in the "Bohemian Girl." The troupe will also include Tom Karl, a new tenor; Mr. Ellis, a new basso profundo; Mr. and Mrs. Seguin, Castle, Campbell, Gustavus Hall and other well-known singers; in fact it will be a double company throughout, and will be capable of giving opera both in English and Italian. This troupe will open in Boston January 8, 1872, for three weeks.

The Vienna Lady Orchestra, under the management of Mr. Fred. Rullman, will appear, for the first time in America, at Steinway Hall, on Monday, September 11. Mr. Rullman is now in Europe completing arrangements for the season. The orchestra will consist of twenty-six young ladies, under the leadership of Mlle. Josephine Weinlich. We may state here, en passant, that these young ladies are all under twenty-one years of age and all of them handsome to an eminent degree. Their playing is praised by the unanimous voice of the German and Austrian press, and their repertoire is very extensive.

Theodore Thomas has reorganized and enlarged his orchestra. The proportions of the orchestra are as follows: Sixteen violins, led by Bernhard Listemann; five violas, four violoncellos, four double basses, one harp, one piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, one corno anglais, two clarionets, two bassoons, four French horns, two trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, kettle drums, side drums, bass drum, etc. In addition to the orchestra several celebrated soloists have been engaged and negotiations are pending for others. Mlle. Marie Krehs will exclusively perform at these concerts during the fall and winter season.

Wagner has addressed the following circular to the "friends of his art" with respect to the performance of his "Ring der Nibelungen" at Bayreuth:—

"The festival stage-play, 'Der Ring der Nibelungen,' shall be completely performed, under my especial direction, on three principal evenings, immediately succeeding each other, and on a preliminary evening, and similarly repeated twice in the two next weeks. Bayreuth is selected as the place of performance, and one of the summer months of 1873 as the time. A special theatre will be erected for the purpose. The internal arrangements of this theatre will be perfectly adapted to my peculiar aims, while its external ornamentation and solidity will correspond with the means placed at my disposal. For the erection, as well as for the scenic arrangements of the theatre to suit the especial purpose of the performance of my festival stage-play, I devote the time from the autumn of this year, 1871, to the spring of 1873. The singers and musicians, who shall have been selected by me during the interval, as the best, will then assemble in Bayreuth, for the purpose of exercising themselves in the parts of the festival play. Fifteen hundred convenient seats shall be placed at the disposal of the promoters of my undertaking, who, by means of an association of friends, in whose hands I place the sole management of this branch of the measures to be taken, shall have collected money enough for carrying out my plan. These well-wishers will receive the name and the rights of patrons of the festival stage-play at Bayreuth, while the carrying out of the enterprise itself will be left exclusively to my knowledge and my exertions. The real estate accruing from this common enterprise shall be considered placed at my disposal, and subject to such future arrangements as I shall consider most appropriately serviceable to the sense and the ideal character of the undertaking. The details of realization connected with the work of procuring the necessary pecuniary means I leave entirely to those near friends, who will consent to take that trouble on themselves, and whose exertions I thankfully greet both as a satisfactory proof of their active zeal in the cause of German art, and of the universal confidence reposed in myself.

"12th May, 1871.

RICHARD WAGNER."

The total cost of the production of the piece is calculated at 300,000 thalers. A single seat for all the performances will cost 300 thalers.

After a performance of "Le Domino Noir" at the Opera Comique, Paris, an ode in praise of Auber was read by one of the singers: during the delivery of this, the band played softly themes of the various operas of the deceased maestro. The French reporters state that a great emotion was produced, and describe the effect of this odd combination as grand and impressive.

M. Carl Wilhelm, the composer of the famous "Watch on the Rhine," has received a most flattering letter from Prince Bismark. Recognising the important part this song has played in binding the Germans together, the Prince, as chancellor of the new empire, has sent the composer a present of a thousand thalers; and adds that he hopes to be able to allot him annually a similar sum of money.

La Liberté states that a musical composer who lived at St. Cloud was suddenly compelled to abandon his house on account of an unexpected attack, leaving behind him an unfinished score of a grand opera in which he was engaged. On the conclusion of peace he returned to his domicile, but it was utterly destroyed. A placard attached to a portion of the ruins informed him that his score was safe, and directed him where to find it. On opening the work he was astonished to find it completed, and on the last page were these words, in German:—"My dear colleague, pray accept my assistance; if my music should chance to please you, here is my address. Place Goethe 104, Francfort-sur-le-Main. KENNEMANN, Bandmaster of the 22nd Regiment of the Line."

The directors of the Philharmonic Society in the presentation of the gold medal struck in commemoration of the Beethoven Centenary, have wisely resolved to honor the representatives of each branch of the art, composers, conductors, vocalists and instrumentalists. The recipients of this distinction are confined to those artists who have rendered service to the society, including Mme. Arabella Goddard, Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Sir W. S. Bennett, Mr. Cusins and Mr. Santley. The foreigners to whom the medal is to be presented are Mdlle. Linzbauer, Mdlle. Nilsson, Mdlle. Titiens, Herr Joachim, and M. Gounod. Casts of the bust of the great composer, presented to the society by Mdlle. Linzbauer, are to be supplied to the University of Cambridge, the Royal Society of Musicians, the Royal Academy of Music, the Crystal Palace, and Messrs. John Broadwood and Sons.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Deserted. 3. Eb to c. D. C. Addison. 30
Expressive, and good for Alto voice.

The Irishman's Wooing. Song and Chorus. 3.
D6 to d. W. A. Smith. 30

"Will you give a kiss now my Rosebud?"

Not a comic song, as one might guess by the title, but a sweet Irish ballad with a fine melody.

Think to-day, and Speak to-morrow. 3. Eb to e. E. S. Hime. 30

Good harmony and wholesome moral.

There's One that I love dearly. (Swiss People's Song.) 4. C to g. Quartett. Kücken. 30

In the first part this seems to be a German Four-part Song, with the usual fine elaboration of harmony; but, on the last page, it suddenly changes to the cry of the Swiss mountaineer. The change and combination are very attractive.

The Scout. A Trooper's Ditty. 3. C to e. Campana. 50

"Come here, your 'petit bleu'!"

I war not, friend, with you,

'Twas for this can a bold Uhlan

His bridle draw."

A hearty Uhlan song, with a dash of sentiment in it. One (chose) note runs to g for the benefit of a tenor, if he sings the song.

Nell the Village Pride. Song and Chorus. 3. A to f. G. F. Morris. 40

Lithograph title. Popular ballad and pretty melody.

The Buccaneer. 3. F to f. Berthold Tours. 35
A very gay and festive Buccaneer. A bright, merry sea-song.

Ten Vocal Duets. Frans Abt. each 30

No. 1. Greetings. (Grüsse.) 3. Bb to g.

"When I watch the star's bright ray,

Soft and low they seem to say,

Greetings find they would convey."

Beautiful "greetings."

No. 2. Gladness. (Frohsinn.) 3. G to g.

As "glad" as it can be.

No. 3. The Return of Spring. (Frühlings Wiederkehr.) Duet. 3. C to g.

A very Goss and Dew-drop, and Bird-chorus of a sweet little Spring Duet.

"Soft it whispers where the Tulips blow,

Gently murmurs where the Daisies grow."

The whole set are well worth possessing.

Instrumental.

Fata Morgana. Polka Mas. 3. Bb. Strauss. 35

Has a little of the "mysterious" in its character, and is, with this exception, in the usual Strauss-like vein.

Jays of Youth. Three Easy Pieces for Little Hands. L. Streabog. each 25

No. 1. Marche Triumphale. 2. C.

No. 2. Tarantelle Mignonne. 3. C minor.

No. 3. Pas Redouble. 2. G.

"Little Hands" in plenty will clap in applause of Herr Streabog, who succeeds to a remarkable degree in combining beauty with simplicity.

The Tarantelle is a good exercise of velocity.

Golden Echoes. E. Mack. each 30

No. 7. Come back to Erin. 2. F.

No. 8. Take back the Heart. 2. D.

No. 9. I cannot Sing the Old Songs. Galop. 2. G.

No. 10. Les Roses. Grand Waltz. 3. C.

No. 11. Castles in the Air. Galop. 2. C.

Well-known airs prettily and simply arranged for learners.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 794.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 9, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 12.

(For Dwight's Journal of Music.)

The Morning Glory.

The Glory of the Morning! who shall say
Whence first thy tender flowerets took their hue,
What pencil touched those petals gemmed with dew,
And spread their splendors to the opening day?
No chemist e'er with curious art has caught
From Nature's secrets such a glorious prize;
No painter, from full palette rich with dyes,
Such lovely forms and tints on canvass wrought.
Did Adam e'er to Eve bring gifts so fair
As when he, hastening through the charmed air,
Twined with thy purple bells her golden hair?
When the first morning broke in Paradise,
And all Creation woke in glad surprise,
Thou gav'st the Morn new glory to his eyes.

Carl Loewe's Story of his Early Life.*

(Continued from page 82.)

II. KÖTHEN.

It was in October 1806, when suddenly a great excitement seized upon the dwellers of the little town. They hastened to the churchyard and, laying their ears to the graves, could hear distinctly the thunder of the cannons from Jena. I looked on with astonishment and remained quietly standing, for my well trained ear even in that position clearly heard the thunder of the ill-boding battle.

A few days later French troops, whose exterior made an extremely repulsive impression on me, marched through our village. This bad impression may well have sprung from my love for the Fatherland, which, fostered from the cradle, lived in the soul of the German boy. Rage and grief took possession of the inhabitants of Löbejün. All were indignant at the idea of recognizing such highway robbers for their masters. For like a horde of robbers looked the so-called Löfelfande who formed Napoleon's advance guard. On a long train of wagons were borne the contributions they had levied on the town. Upon my father alone, with his small income, came 200 thalers.

When a victorious and insulting foe stands in the land, and every individual begins to feel the calamity of war with all its bitter burdens, then, both for the country and the individual, it is a hard fate to bear. He alone can measure it, who has been obliged to live through it. But the feeling of bitterness and rage is aggravated, when the lord of the land stands unfortunate, depressed and crushed before his people.

An indescribable sense of gloom and agitation spreads around. Imagination seeks for help and for deliverance in regions where the call of the voice, the cry of despair does not penetrate. From such a feeling sprang at that time the song;

"Fred'rick, rise from out thy grave!
Lead again thy nation on,
Crown and goods and honor save,
Save them from Napoleon."

The Löbejüners used to call the invincible conqueror of 1806, "Bunbert," and his generals

* Translated for DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC from "DR. CARL LOEWE'S Selbst-Biographie. Für die Öffentlichkeit bearbeitet von O. H. BIRNBAUM. Berlin, 1870."

"Mordthier," and "Bärthier" (Murder-beast and Bear-beast). A second popular song, which they used to sing just after the heroic death of Prince Louis Ferdinand, begins:

"Klagt Preussen, auch er ist gefallen," (Mourn, Prussians, for he too is fallen)

As I sang this song then, with my boyish voice, I did not dream how I should one day prize the truly regal compositions of that Prince.

The turmoil of the war receded further and further from us, and the depressed people bore their burden in unwilling helplessness. But I was thinking more and more about how much longer I should still stay in our little village; for I felt that here there was nothing more for me to learn. The ropemaker's trade I had renounced entirely. But my father did not make himself anxious about me; he trusted in my musical talent and let my fate draw near. So came the year 1807.

Then one day there came three large choir students to our house. I was the more startled by this sudden visit, since my father seldom saw a stranger at his house; our domestic life was very uniform and quiet, without change or excitement, and one day had the same aspect as another. But those three scholars had actually important business with us. They stepped before my father and said: We come from Köthen. Our Cantor has heard that your son is a good reader [literally "hitter," Treffer] in singing. If he should pass a good examination, we should like to take him into our choir.

My father called me. "That we can do, I guess," thought I to myself, and I sang to them at sight whatever they laid before me. I was in fact a good "hitter," and I cannot remember that I ever had to learn a piece of music or an interval beforehand.

But my soprano voice was by no means particularly euphonious; it had rather a screaming tone. Now although the three choir students after this trial regretted that my voice had not a pleasanter sound, they made me an offer at once to go with them to Köthen, where I was to receive free instruction in the art of singing, besides free lodging, with lights, wood, board and schooling.

My father consented to these proposals. For us, in our narrow circumstances, they certainly were not to be rejected. And from this time I, a ten-year old boy, needed only the blessing of my parents, before setting out upon my independent journey through the world.

The separation from my mother, I confess, came hard to me. Thus far, whatever had appeared to me as noble, beautiful and worthy to be loved, had been for me combined in her. But Löbejün was only three leagues from Köthen, and the holidays gave frequent opportunity of seeing the dear ones again.

So off I started with the choirboys, who seemed to me like men of high importance, quite consoled on reaching the ducal Residenz and the blue reformed church.

Köthen, where once Sebastian Bach had passed his happiest years under an Art-loving prince whose friend he was, is a lovely, garden-like place, of idyllic beauty, where a multitude of pleasure parks, pheasant preserves, graceful masses of trees, with a luxuriant vegetation and the ornament of variegated meadows and fields, delight the eye.

At that time there were two schools there, one Lutheran, and one Reformed; as I was of the Lutheran Confession, I attended the school to which I belonged. It had four classes, and each class had its teacher: the Prima had the Rector, the Secunda the Conrector, the Tertia the Cantor, and the Quarta the Organist. Whatever just objections may be brought against a class system, in which one teacher has to teach in all the different branches that may come along, there is no denying this advantage, that the scholars become very clever in particular branches.

As I already possessed some preparatory knowledge, I went into the second class. The Conrector, Franke, was a severe man, who swung a thick leather strap quite vigorously; he seated me upon the Latin form. Not through my industry, but through my previous knowledge, I came through pretty fortunately and soon rose to the second place. The son of a court tailor, Fritz Asch, took the first place; he took to me with especial love, and during the week I got some nice meals at his parents' house, which I liked very much. The fare at the severe old Cantor Lehmann's was tolerable, to be sure, but it tormented me that he would insist on teaching me to eat with knife and fork, a knack to which I had not been trained, and which was hard enough for me to acquire. In the paternal house my mother had always relieved me of the task of cutting up.

Our choir consisted of sixteen scholars, four of them singing on each part. This choir had to earn its living by singing three times in the streets before the doors of the more well-to-do inhabitants. The singers were very adventurously clad, and the old traditional official costume was never to be left off either on these circuits or during divine service; it consisted of a three-cornered hat and a long black mantle; but from the back of the head there hung a venerable cue, which testified that this costume belonged to the preceding century. I had come from Löbejün, according to the newest fashion, with a "Swedish-head" so-called; that is, my light blond hair was cropped short. As I possessed none of the conditions for my appearance in the official dress, I had recourse to a second-hand clothing store. Here I found a worthy three-cornered hat, a mantle of the prescribed length, and finally I looked about after some elegantly hung cues. To my joy, these cues were very cheap, but unluckily there was not a single blond one to be found among them. So I saw myself reduced to the unpleasant necessity of buying one of a black-brown color. To secure this treasure more completely, it was fastened to my "three-master," where it did duty during the hours of service. To be sure, it was an awkward thing, whenever I met in the street one of my superiors or some respected personage of Köthen; there was nothing left for me but to take the cue off with the hat. But I soon got accustomed to it; I was glad to possess my official costume in all its dignity. So all went well, so long as the service rendered order and strictness necessary. When that was over and I was on the way home with my comrades, new embarrassments began. My school fellows, those who did not belong to the choir, took a particular satisfaction in pulling and snatching at my sombre cue. A lively, wild youth as I was, I could not put up with such an insult to my pride of office. The cue was torn from the hat and vigorously plied as a defensive and offensive weapon.

The musical life of Köthen was in the hands of these sixteen cue-wearing heroes. The little Residenz possessed neither a theatre, nor an orchestra, as Dessau did; indeed there was not even a military band. Consequently no concert could take place. But the selections of church music which we performed, and which were accompanied by the organ and a pair of violins, were sometimes of a very pretty pattern. Among other things we sang the Stabat Mater of Pergolesi, a work whose pious melody has not remained without impression on me. At leisure times we received permission to arrange little performances on our own hook in the houses of the wealthy inhabitants.

One half of us understood how to perform a Quartet, and so in the evening, besides more serious pieces, we brought out single numbers from the operas. For our reward we got an excellent supper, which at that early time of life, when one is used to meagre fare, is apt to be a very welcome gift. But we received money also, for which we could buy clothes and other useful articles. Among the houses in which we sang was the palace of an old princess of the line of Köthen. Here we commonly received money for our artistic efforts: but at Christmas a basket full of very small buttered rolls was sent to us. This "fies' feast," as we called the little biscuits, put the crown on all that was vouchsafed to us the whole year round. Even to this day I grieve to think that the biscuits were so small and the preparation of them so fine.

I also received subsidies and proofs of love from other inhabitants. Of free meals there was no lack. But I received also books and clothes, and what not; particularly kind towards me was a merchant by the name of Eisenhut. How many persons look upon such circumstances with commiseration! We were by no means to be pitied. The people prized and loved us in that little Köthen, just as to-day they prize the artists of a theatre or a Kapelle in great cities. We were to them the representatives of Art; we were the ones who made the divine service beautiful to them, who adorned it in a noble manner. Small burgher families esteemed it an honor to have the choir perform a chorale or a sacred aria in their house. Moreover we all felt the poverty of our condition the less, that some of the older singers were far beyond our own age; the Præfectus was certainly some thirty years old.

After I had been half a year in Köthen, I came one day to Löbejün and told with not a little pride that I had been promoted into the first class. My father laughed out loud, as much as to say: "A pretty Primaner thou, indeed!"—And my father was too nearly right, for I soon felt, in spite of my youthful age, that this Prima could not be much of a stepping stone of culture for me. The Rector had no real calling for the school life; he was a lazy man, who did not lack in knowledge, but in all method for teaching. So little love had he for his vocation, that every one perceived his joy when he could dismiss the school on pleasant days.

For two long years my father saw this idleness in silence; but then he spoke out of his own accord and said, how necessary it was that I should go to another school. But that was easier thought than done; I was a useful singer to the choir. Moreover they liked to fill the posts of Cantor, organist and clerk in the little region with the grown-up singers of the choir. To be sure they carried into their office no more thorough culture than they could acquire in the town school of Köthen. But my father had more far-reaching plans with regard to my scientific education. I understood his purposes quite well, though only thirteen years old, and I busied myself with them in more ways than one.

One afternoon, when school was over, I set out, of course on foot, on the way to Löbejün. I thought to myself: "Now thou wilt not come back to Köthen. The father was contented, had my clothes brought from the Residenz, dissolved my connection with the choir, and took me, to my great joy, to Halle."

III. HALLE.

Who does not know the busy, productive, vaporous, sparkling salt works? Far and wide the salt is diffused into the viands and the veins of men. But farther than its salt, the scientific, spiritual life of Halle is diffused. Important men have here lived and taught and worked. A great artist, of whom the world has known few equals, (Handel) was born here; other tone-masters have here served their art, and with it their God.

I approached the old University town with a certain awe and shyness. Already from afar the salty vapor floated towards us. The first huts, or entering the town, had a peculiar aspect, decayed and wretched as they were, evidently belonging to the deepest poverty. The whole country appeared to me dreary and poverty-stricken. Those heights, on which no cattle grazed, those gardens, in which only tall grass and some crippled fruit trees grew, whose spare growth too was choked by hop vines,—all formed a melancholly contrast to the beautiful and smiling Köthen, which I had just left. With other eyes my father looked upon the town and its surroundings; he trod here a home-like soil, and through his soul passed cheerfuller thoughts than through mine. To him lived in those smoky walls the golden recollections of his youth once more. He had made his studies in the old, now forsaken Dominican cloister, in which there was a Lutheran school in those days. Now indeed the rooms were empty, and the porta Lutherica was no longer open to the eager young candidates for knowledge.

Our first walk was to this old cloister. We wandered through the cross passages and visited every class room, in which many a great teacher and scholar had taught and learned; for instance, von Jacob, known through his philosophical works and his lectures on political science; also Voigtel, the historian, and Schmieder, the author of the atlas of the ancient world.

As we passed through the dreary cells, formerly inhabited by the choir scholars, we found in a window niche, engraved upon the stone moulding: "Andreas Loewe," and above this name countless others, which came down from the monks. This had always been the Præfect's cell, and it had a lovely outlook upon the cloister garden. Here too had my father dwelt. From the cross passages of the cells we went into the church. The old empty spaces looked so strangely down upon me! The resounding echo of our steps incited me to sing the scale; the only living thing I heard here was this sound. After a few years the old church disappeared; and on this spot was built a theatre, which was inaugurated by the famous Weimar troupe. The old cloister walls were torn down.

My father now gave in my name for the Lutheran school incorporated by Chancellor Niemeyer into the Franke foundation. One gained admission after passing the musical examination for the choir by Türk. This distinguished man in many ways had already in the year 1810, when I came to Halle, established his musical empire in a very aristocratic manner. He possessed a large house in the Steinstrasse, playfully called the "Türkei" (Turkey). He had formerly been Cantor and schoolfellow at the Lutheran school in the old Dominican cloister before mentioned. The Franke foundation had adopted this school, and, as they were glad to keep Türk in Halle, they appointed him with the title of City and University Musical Director. Soon afterwards he took a degree and became Doctor of philosophy and Professor liberarum artium. My father spoke with him of my musical talent, and Türk began the examination. I sang with ease all that he put before me. But my soprano voice, in spite of the practice of solfeggi, had not lost its old quacking tone. With such a voice I could make no parade. But my musical ear was now to be put to the extreme test. Türk gave me the names of tones, which I was to sound without seeing the keys. With my father I could always do that easily, but, strange to say, this time I constantly gave the fourth below the tone. Türk quietly proceeded a few moments more with his examination; then he said to my father: "Herr Cantor, your piano must stand a fourth below pitch, the boy persists in giving the tones a fourth below." "That is just what I have thought," said my father. Now the riddle was solved; Türk saw that I had a thoroughly true ear, and with a card from the Professor's own hand to the Rector, Diek, I was received into the Waisenhaus (orphan house).

When you step out from the Raischenstrasse in front of the Waisenhaus, you see two black eagles flying into the bright sun; beneath stands:

"illo splendente levabor"

(under his splendor I shall soar aloft.)

Ascending the outer steps, you see in golden letters the following words:

"Fremdling, was Du erblickst, hat

Glaube und Liebe vollendet,

Ehre des Stiftenden Geist, glaubend und liebend, wie er."

Under the splendor of the spiritual sun of this house was I too, the poor choir scholar, destined to lift myself aloft.

[To be Continued.]

The Quarterly Review on "Music: its Origin and Influence."

....Regarding all deliberate attempts to express emotion through sound as so many rough elements of music—we may fairly affirm that the art of producing musical sounds is the most ancient, because, according to Mr. Darwin, it is a quality common to the animal creation as well as to the earliest races of mankind; and it is the most universal, because we can find no race, ancient or modern, which has been entirely without it.

Hitherto we have spoken of all kinds of sounds as musical; but it would be more correct to say that most of the sounds found in nature, or used by savages, are the mere rough materials out of which musical notes have to be manufactured. It is true that any noise acts, in some way or other, upon the emotions by setting the auditory nerves in vibration; but for the purpose of musical art we must select only those kinds of sound, those forms of vibration, which possess certain properties of pitch, intensity, and quality.

First, then, what constitutes Pitch? When we speak of the pitch of a note, we mean that the sonorous body or instrument from which it comes is vibrating so many times a second. These vibratory movements are communicated to the air, and the air communicates them, through the elastic pressure of its waves, to the complex system of fibres stretched upon the drum of the ear, which collects them for transmission, through a winding labyrinth, to the auditory nerve, from which they are passed on to the brain. But the perceptive powers of the human ear are limited. No sound can be heard if the vibrations are too slow, or less than four or five (or, according to M. Savart, six or seven) to the second; or too quick, that is to say, more than 67,000 to the second. Shrill sounds of 30,000 are very unpleasant; but cats and other animals, whose ears are in some respects more highly organized than ours, can hear many sounds inaudible to human beings. As to pitch, then, the limits of musical sound will be within about six octaves.

Secondly, what constitutes Intensity? As pitch is regulated by the number, so intensity is regulated by the force of the vibrations. This force is communicated to the air, and the air waves produce, in proportion to their force, a greater or less degree of tension in the membrane of the tympanum. A very feeble sound is not sufficient to make the tympanum vibrate at all, and a very violent one—such as the explosion of a cannon—sometimes cracks it; and thus it is no mere metaphor to speak of the drum of the ear being broken. The intensity of musical sound will, therefore, be found to lie in the mean between the too feeble and the too forcible.

Thirdly, what constitutes Quality? The quality or timbre of a sound, i.e., the quality which makes the difference between the same note played on a flute or violin, depends neither upon the force nor on the rapidity of the vibrations in the instrument—in the air—in the ear. Upon what, then, does this all-important attribute of sound depend? We must try and imagine a vibrating body, such as the back of a violin or the tube of a diapason, to consist (as is actually the case) of a vast number of lines distributed in a vast number of different layers of matter. All bodies are composed of such countless different molecules, arranged in layers, and packed in different degrees of density. When we set our board violin, or organ-pipe in vibration, these molecules begin to move; some vibrate feebly, some strongly, whilst certain others remain at rest. By strewing sand on the back of a violin whilst in vibration, or affixing a pencil to an organ-pipe, the form of the vibrations representing the disturbance of the molecules may in either case be obtained in lines. These lines then indicate the different arrangements of the molecules of matter in violin wood, or organ-pipe, which yield a different order of molecular vibration, and transmit to the air differently formed waves, and consequently a different stroke and quality of sound to the ear.

We have now refined our rough element of sound by determining its pitch, its intensity, and pointing to the existence of various qualities or timbres; but we have yet to distinguish properly between musical sound and noise.

M. Beauquier gives the following explanation of the difference between noise and musical sound.

A true note, or musical sound, contains in itself a third, a fifth, and an octave. In addition to the fundamental note, a cultivated ear will be able, under certain experimental conditions, to recognize these other three, like faint musical emanations. These three are called the fundamental harmonics of a note, and every sound is thus complex, just as white light is complex, containing within itself what may be called the three harmonical colors, blue, red, and yellow. Now, when the ear receives one distinct sound, and the accessory harmonics are at the same time of very faint intensity and very high in pitch, then we have a pure or clear musical sound called a note; but when the accessory or harmonical sounds are so loud, confused, and so near to the fundamental note that we have difficulty in separating between them and the note itself, then we have the negation of musical sound—that is to say, noise. The Chinese gong is an admirable example of unmusical sound, or noise, and a well-tuned kettle-drum is almost as good an example of a true musical note.

But when we have thus manufactured our materials we have not arranged them. We have got the threads, but we have not woven them into any fabric—we have not invented any pattern—we have not given them any form—we have not created any work of art. We might as well give a man a bundle of colored threads, and expect him without machine or instruction to produce an Indian shawl, as give him musical notes without teaching him the secret of the scale, or of symmetrical arrangement, and expect him to produce melody and harmony. We are still a long way off from what we call music.

Now, before we enter upon any further account of the rise and progress of the musical art, the question naturally arises, What claims has it upon our attention? What wants does it meet? Why is it worth studying?

We might point to the fact that people nowadays spend much time and money upon music. But why do they do so? Because it gives them very keen enjoyment. Why does it give them enjoyment? What is the enjoyment worth? Is it pleasure and nothing more, or is it pleasure and something besides? What right have we to speak of Beethoven in the same breath with Goethe? In what sense is the musical composer a teacher or an intellectual and moral benefactor? All such questions, and many more like them, which are asked more frequently than they are answered, may be summed up in a single sentence.—What is the dignity of the musical art? To this question we hope to give some definite reply.

Speaking generally, all the arts may be said to have arisen out of a certain instinct, which impels us to make an appeal to the senses, by expressing our thoughts and emotions in some external form. When a man is haunted by the beauty of the outer world, when he has been for a time purely receptive, watching the light upon summer fields or through netted branches, or at evening the floods of liquid fire that come rolling towards him upon the bosom of the sea, at last before his closed eyes in the dreams of the night there arises within him the vision of an earth, and sky, and sea even more fair than these; and seizing his palette and canvas in the morning, he endeavors to fix the impalpable images which have almost pained his heart with their oppressive loveliness. Who can look at some of Turner's pictures, and see there "the sunshine of sunshine and the gloom of gloom," without feeling that the picture stands for the deliverance of a soul's burden? It is its own justification. No one asks first why it gives us joy, or why it is so good; that questioning may come afterwards, and may have to be answered, but our uppermost thoughts are such as these:—"I, too, have had such visions, but never till now have they lived and moved before me: henceforth their life is doubled because revealed; their beauty is painless because possessed: now that I have prisoned this fleeting memory, it is mine forever—πρῆμα ἐξ ἀντι. In freeing his own soul the painter, the orator, the poet has freed mine; I shall not suffer in this direction from the void and the agony of the unattained, for it is there worked out for me and for all men to rejoice in and to love." Therefore the great justification of all art is simply this—that all life tends to outward expression, and becomes rich in proportion to the degree and perfection with which it is mastered inwardly and realized outwardly.

It is evident that the artistic instinct is involved in the constitution of our nature, and only waits for the peculiar times and seasons favorable to each of its several developments. Hence in all sorts of ages and countries we find traces of the arts, but only in certain countries and at certain epochs the full development of any. The seed of a political system, of a religious creed, or of a new art, may lie long in the fallow ground of history, waiting for the mysterious and happy combination of circumstances necessary to its special development. By and by this nation will be ready for such a government; and that form of government, which may have tried in vain to spring up before, will then rise. Such has been the history of representative government in England. By and by a nation will feel the need of a new intellectual form for its religion; and not before, will the new system prevail. Such has been the history of the Protestant Reformation. By and by the æsthetic and imaginative impulses of a people will demand a certain appropriate channel of expression; and then the art which can best express the imperative mood of the popular life is certain to spring up. That is the history of all Literatures, and also of the directly sensuous arts of Sculpture in Greece, of Gothic Architecture in modern Europe, of Painting in Italy, and, finally, of Modern Music in Italy, France, Belgium, Germany, and England. Each art has been strikingly appropriate to its own age, and each art has more or less exhausted the impulses which it was destined to express. We will now endeavor to show the real position and speciality of music amongst the arts, by a general glance at some of the art developments of the past.

No doubt the art of sculpture existed in a rude form amongst those Eastern nations from which Greece derived the germs of all that she ever possessed. Yet we do not admit any high development of sculpture to have taken place before the period of Grecian art, or about B.C. 500; nor do we venture to say that the works of Phidias and Praxiteles have ever been surpassed. The fact is, that sculpture was the art which rendered concrete, or gave outward expression to, the Greek's highest idea of what was desirable and excellent in life. He was passionately enamored of the external world. Beauty had no hidden meaning for him; the incompleteness or insufficiency of life never occurred to him; there seemed no moral, no aspiration written upon the face of man or nature: hence he loved outline better than color, and cared more for form than for expression. His life was exceedingly simple; his intellect remarkably clear and active and subtle; he lived much out in the open air, gossiping incessantly, learned a little Homer and a few lyrics, sometimes peeped into a work of Anaxagoras or Zeno, at other times amused himself with the disputations of the Sophists, or listened to the orators in the Agora. But whatever else he did, his body was his first care. The staple of his education consisted in gymnastic exercises and the cultivation of rhythm as applied to motion. His greatest admiration was lavished upon a beautiful human body, and in Greece there was never the slightest difficulty in studying the human form divine. What every one was proud of, every one was prone to exhibit; and what was universally exhibited and admired naturally became the object of the most elaborate and successful cultivation. Hence Greece, in her eager simplicity, her exquisite perception, her naïve enjoyment of life, and her material prosperity, found an appropriate expression for her ideal in the art of Sculpture.

If we glance at Rome in her best days, we shall hardly be surprised to find that she had no original leanings in the direction of the sensuous arts. The art expression, if such it can be called, of her ideal is to be found in the Justinian code. Her notion of life was not beauty, but law, in its most prosaic aspects: stern patriotism, regulated by military despotism; stern justice, regulated by civil law. She had no time to design her own public buildings; she borrowed the designs from Greece. Her statues and her ornaments, when not actually made by degenerate Athenians, were but the cold parodies of Grecian art. It was not until centuries later, when the old Empire had been split up into a thousand fragments, that a new and genuine art began to arise in Italy,—but an art responsive to a new age, and to an utterly changed state of political life and religious feeling. We allude, of course, to the art of painting, which culminated in the sixteenth century in the schools of Padua, Venice, Umbria, Verona, Bologna, Siena, Florence and Rome.

But there is one growing characteristic of the art of the new world after Christ, as contrasted with the art of the old world before Christ, which it is highly important for our present purpose to notice. That characteristic is its ever-increasing tendency to express complex emotion. The Greek schools which succeeded Phidias indeed supply numerous expressions of suffering, such as the Laocoon; action, such as the Diacubolos; and occasionally some simple and strong emotion, such as the Niobe.

But even in the post-Phidian, when emotion is expressed at all, it is usually of a simple and direct kind; the fever of the new world had not yet set in. Upon the religions of the past the accumulated moral influences and religious feelings which we are in the habit of expressing by the one word Christianity, broke like a second flood, submerging the old philosophies and the old faiths. The rise of that tide was irresistible, and it brought with it the elements of a new ideal life, in violent antagonism to the traditions of many an earlier civilization. Thanks to this antagonism, which drew hard and fast the line between the Church and the world, the emotional life of the early Christians was also simple and strong. Missionary work afforded an ample and sufficient outlet for feeling; there was little time for anything else. The New Church shrank from Heathen art, as the Jews had shrank from Egyptian images; and although a reformed Orpheus cropped up later in the character of the Good Shepherd, preference was given to mere symbols, and only a few coarse representations of Christ, His apostles or His miracles, were allowed to grace a religion which was intended to appeal to the spirit more than to the senses. Then, when the Christian seed had been sown throughout the length and breadth of the Roman Empire, the beginning of the end drew nigh; and we have heard to satiety how the Gothic hordes came down from the Northern Alps upon the plains of Italy, and how the worn-out organization of the Empire fell like an avalanche before the breath of spring. But the imperial sceptre had only passed from the Emperor to the Bishop of Rome, and it was under the timidly admitted presidency of the Pope that the Christian Church first stepped forward as the inspired guide, ready to reduce to order the confused life and weld together in new combinations the heterogeneous elements of the old and the new worlds.

The rise of the Roman Church and the rise of the nations of modern Europe after the death of Charlemagne (814) gave birth to what we call the modern spirit, which is emphatically the spirit of a complex emotional life. In Italy, after the close of the ninth century, the stiff forms of Byzantine art had entirely ceased to have any charm for a nation distracted with wars, and in the eleventh century Italian art had reached its lowest condition.

But another art had already begun to assert itself in France, in Germany, and in England—an art which, taking its rise amongst the masonic guilds, found its perfection in the cloister, yet mingled freely with the world, and became in a remarkable degree the monumental expression of its "lights and shadows, all the wealth and all the woe." Gothic architecture received some of its finest developments at the hands of priests, but the Gothic temples were the darlings of the people and became the models of popular architecture for the nation. Into them, as we can see to this day, were woven the miseries and the joys, the wild fancies, the morbid tendencies, and the confused aspirations of a spiritual faith, struggling with new and untried aspects of social and political life. It is unnecessary to describe all that the Gothic architecture of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries strove to express. How highly emotional it became they know who have marked the faces that peep out between the network of leaves or clustering fruit in florid architrave and capital. When the art began to lose all temperance, and assumed wild and flamboyant forms, it was simply because the artist was in despair at not being able to transcend the plastic limits of his material—to express the varied emotions which were daily becoming more numerous and more oppressive, and which neither stone-carving nor any other known medium could suffice to express. But a more highly emotional art was already preparing to take its place—the art of Italian painting—which, beginning with Cimabue (born 1240), gradually rose along with the decline of Gothic art until, with the successors of Titian and Tintoret, that too had exhausted its emotional functions and began to decline along with the rise and sudden ascendancy of the latest and most perfect art-medium of emotion, MODERN MUSIC.

There never was a time in the history of the world when life was so rapid and human emotion so complex as it has become during the last three centuries. The printing press, the discovery of America, the increase of commerce, the general circulation of thought, have given rise to abnormal combinations and changes of which the old world never dreamed. This has generated a peculiarly restless and feverish temperament of life. Can we wonder that art should try to keep pace with these developments—that in its own region, that of the emotions, it should twist stone into every conceivable shape, and then cast it aside as inadequate; then seize upon color, and after depicting through its aid every possible scene capable of exciting the imagination, still pine for some more complete expressional medium? And now what more could be done by art than Raphael, Titian, Michael Angelo, had accomplished? What still cried out for direct expression which they had not been able directly to express? Something there was in those independent states of consciousness generated within the mind—something there was, in what we call emotion, and especially complex emotion—which called for direct expression, and which found it not in carved stone or limited canvas. What was that something? In a word it was movement or velocity. That is a fundamental property of all emotion. There was no direct expression for that in sculpture, or architecture, or painting; the stone did not move; the scene on canvas, however excited, required an effort of the imagination before it became a thing of motion; the battle raging on canvas was an æsthetic fiction—it acted upon that inner movement of the mind, which is so fundamental a property of emotion, not directly but only through the imagination; the colors did not change; the canvas was as still as the stone. For a perfect emotional art actual velocity was indispensable, and it is the addition of this one property which the art of music alone possesses in combination with all the other properties of emotion that makes music the supreme art-medium of emotion.

One thoughtful glance is sufficient to show us that the rough elements of emotion and the rough elements of musical sound have all the common properties which fit them for meeting upon a common ground and for acting upon each other.

Emotion is never long at the same level; it has its elations and depressions. Sound, as manipulated by the art of music, has its elations and depressions—musical notes go up and down in the scale.

Emotion has various intensities. Musical notes, as has been seen, directly communicate various intensities of sound to the drum of the ear; music has its ff and pp, its crescendos and diminuendos, its loud and soft combinations of instruments.

The progressive steps in a continued state of emotion have something like form; they can be arranged; they have a beginning, a development, an end, or, at all events, somewhere a transition to a different region of feeling altogether. Music has a form, obvious even to the eye; the notes indicate a theme or subject which is developed and brought to a close; the words unity, proportion, development, are sufficiently familiar to all readers in connexion with music.

The meeting of two or more emotions—such, for instance, as is the case when we pass out of a dark room into the light, or when we hear a sudden burst of laughter in the midst of intense grief—these are simple enough forms of complex emotion; but in all complex emotion we get simultaneous variety. Need we say how wonderfully harmony in music, even a simple chord, possesses the property of such simultaneous variety?

And lastly, the progress of emotion is fast or slow; at all events, it is incessantly beating out time with every pulse and throb of the blood; in other words, it has its velocity; and this is the important quality which makes the "Sound Art," of all arts hitherto discovered, the great medium for the expression and for the generation of emotion, simple or complex. No outward presentation of scene or action is needed, as in the drama—no aid from imagination, as in painting or sculpture—in order to supply velocity or movement. The sound vibrates directly upon the drum of the ear; the auditory nerve receives pulse after pulse, and transmits it to the emotional region of the brain. Emotions, simple or complex, are thus generated directly and physically by the power of sound, without the aid of imagery or thought; and, again, emotions already working in the brain find relief in the sort of outward and concrete expression which the art of music procures for them.

If, then, at this stage of our disquisition it be asked what is the use of music, we ask in reply, What is the use of stimulating, regulating, and disciplining the emotions? What is the use of providing for them a psycho-physical outlet, when they are excited or roused? Music excites, expresses, regulates, and relieves the life of emotion. These are its functions and these are its uses. Life is rich almost in proportion to the fulness of its emotional activity. As a physical fact, music recreates exhausted emotion by nerve currents generated through direct vibration of the nervous tissues, and by the same means music arouses and cultivates emotion into its highest activity. Again, life is noble, almost in proportion to the strength and balance of emotion. Control of emotional activity is as essential to worthy life as the abundance of emotion. Noble music possesses this power of controlling and disciplining emotion to a consummate degree. The notion that music is only intended to please and tickle the ear is a notion worthy of a savage. To listen to a symphony of Beethoven is not at all amusement. The emotions aroused are steadily put through definite stages, just as definite and just as salutary to the realm of feeling, just as well calculated to bring it into discipline and obedience as the athlete's progressive exercises are calculated to strengthen and discipline the muscles of the body. The emotions are not allowed to run wild. The music, if we put ourselves to the strain of following it, checks them here, rouses them there, holds them as it were in suspension, gives them a fair vent at times, shows them the way out of unrest into rest, and out of varied and apparently inconsistent states of discord to harmonious development and unity. The mere intellectual task of appreciating the technical form and excellence of a truly great musical work or tone poem is no light one, but it is a highly refining one. Nevertheless, the intellect in music must be held subordinate to the plain purpose of elaborating schemes of complex and simple emotions; it is this power which raises music, through, but beyond, connection with the senses, into a moral agent.

That all music is not of this kind, is not calculated to stimulate and arrange the emotions beneficially, may be taken to be a self-evident fact. Much of Italian and French music is so wedded to languishing sentiment or absolute frivolity that the best-disposed musician cannot treat it ou sérieux, as the presentation of emotion in any salutary or re-creative order. Place any Italian love-song by the side of one of Schubert's romances, and the emotional difference will be apparent to any one at all capable of enjoying music. The Italian view of love, and the German view of love, are well represented in the different emotional atmospheres of Italian and German songs. The music of Italy expresses passion without restraint; and then follows of necessity sentiment vamped up with artificial shocks and thrills to supply the place of exhausted passion. That, with all its exquisite gift of melody, with all its cunning appropriation of melting, though limited, harmonies, is the morale of modern Italian music—of course we do not allude to the great schools of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

But when we pass to Germany, we have come to the "true and tender North." Life is there no dream on a Venetian balcony, love is there no short-lived rapture of summer days and starry nights; but "life is real, life is earnest," and love is of such fabric as will last out a lifetime and be true to the end; and, therefore, there must be restraint and economy of passion, there must be the middle tints as well as the glowing lights, there must be midnight watches as well as noonday dreams. Parting must be real pain, and meeting must be real rapture; the fount is so full, there is no need of pumping-up sentiment; the life is a life within as well as a life without; and hence the German music is not dependent upon external scenes or exciting stories: it can be cast in the mould of opera, but it can also do without it; above all, it can play upon the whole keyboard of existence, instead of confining itself to a few tragic octaves of passion; it can carry out symphonies as well as operas, and can make songs for every event, and preludes and sonatas for every phase of feeling—from its most glacial intensities to its most glowing heats—and for every gradation of delicate emotion which may lie between the two.

Much more might be advanced in support of the moral and emotional functions of music, but we trust enough has been suggested to vindicate the almost passionate conviction of thoughtful musicians, that music is more than a pastime; that it holds a distinct, a legitimate, and clearly defined position amongst the arts; and that it is capable of exercising the most powerful and beneficial, as well as the most delightful, influences upon the cultured few, and upon the uncultured many.

A Parisian Institution.

[From the Musical World.]

A change had come over the theatrical world when Napoleon I. ascended the throne. There were eleven theatres in Paris, and the claque was a recognized institution, working for public order in general and the Prefecture of Police in particular. The Emperor did not like civil turmoil, and a riot in a theatre or in the streets was put down at once. If a man was caught hissing, the least that could happen to him was to go before the Commissaire de Police, show his passport, state who he was, and what were his means of living. During the Restoration it was worse; party spirit between Royalists and Bonapartists ran so high from 1815 to 1830 that a piece applauded by one party was cried down by the other. Had it not been for the claqueurs half the play-houses would have been converted into battle-fields; as it was, the claqueurs had more than enough to do in stifling the groans of the Quartier Latin students, who went en masse to "first performances" at the Théâtre Français and Odéon and howled hideously when any anti-liberal sentiment was uttered.

Up to 1820 it was usual for managers to covenant with a chef de claque, and give him so much a year to bring five and thirty or forty claqueurs every night. One day it was discovered that this arrangement was not a paying one. The only thriving man was the chef de claque, who made his fortune at the end of a few years and retired, while the manager often ended his career in bankruptcy. The chef de claque had several ways of making money. Besides his fixed salary he received so much a year from actors and actresses, especially those who had no talent, and frequently sold at a high rate the forty seats he received gratis. Nowadays this is changed. Instead of the manager paying the chef de claque, it is the latter who pays the manager. Three or four years ago, when a cabal was organized by the Quartier Latin against the "Henriette Maréchal" of the Brothers Goncourt, the chef de claque of the Théâtre Français, on the second and third nights, brought five hundred claqueurs to the rescue. The uproar in the theatre was terrific; the claqueurs raved, the students shrieked, but in the end got the best of it. They had stronger lungs than the mercenaries, and after the third performance, the piece was withdrawn. It is curious to see a chef de clique recruiting his troupe. Within a few doors of every French theatre is a café, where the chief claqueur establishes headquarters. Towards five or six o'clock he puts in an appearance, and is mobbed by the forty or fifty anxious to be enrolled for the evening. As a rule, the first thing the chef de clique looks at is the dress of the candidates. He accepts no blouses and no slovens. If he sees a man well arrayed, hearty-looking and florid of countenance, endowed with broad shoulders and big hands, he enlists him at once. The terms of admission vary. Sometimes (especially in summer) if there is a dull piece, it is difficult to find claqueurs, and the chef presses every one he can get, accepting eight sous, six sous, and even as little as four sous from each of his troupe. Should the piece be so dull or the weather so hot that no one will volunteer to pay even two pence, the chef must then have recourse to such raggamuffins as he can find, and pay, instead of being paid. When there is a popular piece the chef de clique has several hundred candidates to choose from, and he can make his own terms. On the nights of a first performance of Augier, Sardou, or Alexander Dumas fils, the seats in the claque fetch five or ten francs apiece. If a row is expected, as at the revival of Ernani and Lucretia Borgia, the places fetch fancy prices.

In addition to the income derived from selling seats at a profit, the contractor of the claque makes a bonus by lerying a tribute upon actors and actresses. It is easy for a spectator to guess which of the performers pays the claque and which not. No matter how slight the part an actor has to play, he is sure of warm applause if the chef de clique has been paid. For a debutant to refuse would be folly. Some of the more popular dramatists, Alexander Dumas among them, have, at different times, endeavored to abolish the claque in so far as their own works were concerned, but the attempt has always failed. As under Napoleon I. and the Restoration, the claque is in too good odor with the police to be now superseded. Before the noisy bands of applauders can be safely dispensed with, French playgoers must become different. So long as the French mind evinces a sly relish for furtive hisses, and takes overt pleasure in dramatic rows, so long will the chef de clique be at his post, crying in a stage whisper to his honorable troop, "Allons, mes enfans, tous ensemble; chaudement et à bas la cabale!"

The Oratorio Question in New York.

This is the view taken of it by the Herald, (August 10):

For years and years our city Choral societies have been in a state of almost hopeless demoralization. Various coteries of vocalists—and their name is Legion in this city—have been devoting themselves to the formation of small knots of singers, each one possessing a strong desire to be more individual in character than great and noble in connection with a large combination. Their design has appeared to be the cultivation of separate interests and personal prejudices, the institution and promotion of petty officers and offices. It has not been so much their object to study the great masters' compositions as it has been their desire each one, to stand alone and to look down with contempt upon its neighbor, and if possible to paralyze, by various means, the efforts of the one or the other in any temporary success. The oratorio, then, one of the highest intellectual and artistic efforts to which the minds of some of our greatest composers have been addressed, has not as yet received the interpretation, by means of numbers in orchestra and chorus, it deserves, nor have the people been taught to appreciate a class of compositions, the sublimity of which, in such works as the "Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," "Samson," "Judas Maccabeus," by Handel; "Elijah" and "St. Paul," by Mendelssohn; "The Creation," and "Seasons" by Haydn, is without a parallel in the wide domain of music, not to mention other oratorios as yet untouched here, such as "The Last Judgment," "The Fall of Babylon," &c., making in all a list of works the study and performance of which might, with advantage to the community for the next ten years, occupy the time and attention of all our petty societies, not individually, but as one concentrated body, by which power and majesty of performance might be made to keep pace with the dignity and grandeur of thought contained in such glorious works.

In the midst, then, of all this unfortunate diversity of thought and action it is not surprising that sooner or later some powerful and wealthy organization should arise. Such a body has appeared and has established itself with extraordinary success. In the past two seasons the Charch Music Association, with the élite of singers and audiences to be found in this city, has pursued its course regardless of trouble or expense. The orchestra has been the largest and the chorus the most select. These, under the direction of a reliable and talented musician, Dr. James Pech, have given performances in this city in completeness of ensemble and detail far outstripping any previous attempt.

It was not, however, to be expected that all the choral bodies would tamely rest as mere spectators of the progress of a young rival society drawing every man of vitality out of their disordered ranks. The first, then, to show renewed vigor was the New York Harmonic Society. This, the oldest choral society in the city, and the oldest but one in the country, gathered up its strength, and at the recent annual election of officers for the nineteenth season, made a determined effort to enlist within its ranks new blood, money, ability and energy. In all this they have so far succeeded. There has been no want of money promised by our citizens, and the new President, Mr. Thomas J. Hall (of the firm of William Hall & Sons), we may safely state, will not allow the grass to grow under his feet. He is a thorough man of business, shrewd, energetic and determined in character, while the election of Dr. James Pech as musical director and conductor has brought to the society ability which argues well for the future welfare and usefulness of the society.

It is impossible, in our limited space, to point out as fully as we desire the pertinence of the oratorio as a social question or in a musical point of view, or to dwell sufficiently long on the true place which should be assigned to the greatest professions of the human intellect; but as a sign of the times the influence which music, and especially sacred music, is exercising on the present generation is not to be mistaken. Fast men and fast people, almost always uninformed and contumacious, are disposed to regard serious thought in any branch of study with shyness and indifference. Oratorios, as well as other sacred compositions, and indeed, even operatic works, when out of the region of simple and common—as, for instance, "Don Giovanni," "Guillaume Tell," "Fidelio," &c.—have been stigmatized by silly revilers with the title of "slow," and those who love and admire them considered "pretenders." It is gratifying, however, to know that art in its grandest manifestation is making rapid progress, and that fashion and prejudice, formerly twin antagonists to all advancement, are no longer to be feared. The people are gradually growing more general in feeling, and it will not be long before they will learn to listen with equal (1) pleasure to an opera by Verdi, Gounod and Meyerbeer and an oratorio by Handel, Haydn and Mendelssohn; can be amused with one of Wallace's melodious operas at the Academy of Music, or entertained with a miscellaneous concert in Steinway Hall. It is not to be denied that oratorios must always reign triumphant as a motive power to the highest intellectual feast. If a grand musical festival is to be given here or in the country, the oratorio is indispensable. It is only with the breath of life, in the native tongue of our common land, that we can completely address our praise and acclamations to an all-beneficent God. Wood and brass instruments may assist, but cannot lead the way; it is by large masses of human voices that music becomes that kind of pleasure on earth we know we shall hereafter enjoy in heaven. These are facts not to be disputed, and are worth a cargo of theories. The study and cultivation of oratorios then, must, eventually, become a necessity in the recreation of our people.

Concerto Organ Playing at the Royal Albert Hall.

Now that the great organ in the Royal Albert Hall has been completed and certificated, it is put into daily requisition, and at the performances thereupon at twelve and three o'clock the people leave off sight-seeing and go into the Hall to be regaled with the results of Mr. Willis's skill in organ building. The advertisement of the Royal Commissioners, offering a fee of fifty pounds to any foreign organist of mark and merit for eight days' performance, has secured us an exhibition of the talents of Herr Heintze, from the Conservatorium of Stockholm, Herr Johann Lohr, of Pessh, Herr Anton Bruckner, Court-Organist at Vienna, and M. Mailly, from Belgium.

The German organist is by birth and education a pedal organist, although in Germany until these recent times the playing of Sebastian Bach's pedal compositions for the organ was a rarity. In the early part of this century the only man famous for the Bach pedal playing was John Schneider of Dresden, and had John Schneider visited England in 1820, his performances would have been looked upon as next to impossible. But the simple-minded artist was told there were no pedal organs in England—a fact which could not be denied—and he remained in Dresden, happy in his beautiful organ by Silbermann, and contented with the approbation of all Germany. But when the Exeter Hall organ was fashioned into the large thing that it is, and the late Mr. Stammers became a speculator in the chances of the celebrated "Wednesday Evening Concerts" in that place, seeing the organ silent and useless he seized the idea of importing John Schneider and sitting him down at the Exeter Hall organ, to give all London an opportunity of hearing the eminent German organist and the way in which Bach's pedal music ought to be played. John Schneider of course, knew nothing of England, nothing of the Exeter Hall organ, and nothing of the tastes of the public. He was great in what was then called "extemporaneous performance," but in these days we say "improvisation." John sat himself down before the organ duly to improve the occasion, and the organists in London were gathered together to take the lesson. John's prelude was of no ordinary length, his theme was unobtrusive and rather common-place—a matter of no consequence to John, because he could talk musically upon any subject—and he found so much to say upon his well-worn text, that ten minutes passed and there seemed no prospect of the appearance of the Fugue. The audience got restless. There was a murmured buzz and suppressed chatter on all sides, and John was told he should play his Fugue and use as much counterpoint in as short a time as possible. John shook his head, and said, "These things must not be hurried." Five minutes elapsed and John entered upon his Fugue, a short, stern, solid theme, one which would evidently be supported by two, if not three counter-subjects, and would travel up and down, inverse and reverse, in quarter-time, half-time, in double and double-double time. Five minutes more, when John, who had been doing the playful in the diminishing and augmenting business, began the more solid stuff of the counter-themes. John took up a splendid roll upon the pedals and displayed his skill in the embroidery of suspensions. It was no dapper inter-twiddling, after the fashion of the late Thomas Adams, but a thing of length and breadth, and requiring time on the part of the organist, and patience on the part of the audience. But the audience had already exhausted their stock of the latter article, and there were cries on all sides, "Enough," "Leave off," "That will do," "Cut it short." But John kept true to his text, himself, and his country. The greater the noise, the more persistently did John trample on the pedals, as though he thus, there and then trampled on his enemies. Now there was a general cry for "Mr. Stammers," and Mr. Stammers came forward with his interpreter, and bowing his best to the great organist, "hoped he would defer to the strongly expressed wishes of the audience, and conclude as quickly as possible." John replied, "I have just begun the third subject, and then there is the stretto, and I may have a coda." Mr. Stammers, prudently blinking the entrance of the third subject, announced that all would shortly be over, for there were only the stretto and the coda remaining. Then came a universal shout of laughter and a little patience, or rather a lull, which lasted but for a minute. Now followed cries for the "coda," but John was in all the throes of his stretto, and heard nothing else: his eyes and his ears were lost to the outer world, and in vain did Mr. Stammers entreat and gesticulate. At last one of the committee, more practical and less polite than the impresario, reached up and seized the coat-tails of John. Had they not been stitched on by some honest German tailor they had certainly given way. All to no purpose, for by this time John had got to the coda, and a terrific coda it was. It was hailstones and rain, with "fire mingled with the hail." The organ shivered and quivered, and bellowed and groaned. One half of the audience were shouting with laughter, and the other screaming their topmost, crying "Seize his hands! Hold his legs! Off with his boots! Off with his head! Stop him! stop him!" Hereupon the wretch who had pulled his coat-tails seized a foot, Mr. Stammers caught at one arm, an assisting friend took possession of the other, and the three fairly lifted John from his seat. The audience, having gained their end, for very shame gave forth the most extraordinary burst of applause ever heard. John was cheered till the roof rang again, he bowing the while with all the complacency of one fully satisfied with himself and all the world.

The only person not altogether pleased was Mr. Stammers, who had engaged Herr Schneider for a series of performances for which he paid. But they never took place. The sensational pedal playing of the Chevalier Neukomm, and the neat, classical, and marvellous pedal playing of Felix Mendelssohn, had destroyed all interest in the quiet, unobtrusive method of John Schneider.

Since the episode of Schneider, many well-known organ players have visited London and given the connoisseurs a taste of their quality, among whom was the well-known Hesse; but these performances have ever been comparatively secret or unknown, from the want of a large pedal organ located anywhere but in a church. Now, however, we have the organ, and it would seem we are to hear the foreign organists. The first who has played was Herr Heintze of Stockholm, a young man still in statu pupillari. He executed some of the master-pieces of Sebastian Bach, and some of the sonatas by Mendelssohn, some fugues and fantasias by Töpfer, Merkel, Hesse, Köhler, Kahmstedt, Markul, and others of the modern German school. His performances were marked by much truth and considerable precision; but he failed in that iron, staccato touch which is essential for clear part-playing in the Albert Hall. Mendelssohn could make every note of the Grand Prelude and Fugue in A minor, by Bach, thoroughly intelligible on the organ in St. Paul's Cathedral—a bad organ, and utterly unequal to the proper rendering of such a composition; but Mendelssohn did this. It was all weak and puny, because the organ was weak and puny; but it was plain and all to be understood.

Now the echo in the Royal Albert Hall is mere nothing to the echo in St. Paul's Cathedral, and no more than is proper to a building of its size. There is no reason why every note played upon the organ in the Hall should not be as transparent as light. If it is not so, the fault lies with the player and not in the place. Of course, any organist, however celebrated, is heard with great disadvantage to himself at a strange organ; and the faults of Herr Heintze must be attributed to his inexperience and his want of familiarity with the details of so large an organ.

In Herr Johann Lohr, of Pesth, we meet with a good musician and a player of considerable power. He is a combination of the new and the old schools. He gave us extracts from the symphonies of Liszt, marches by Chopin, songs by Schubert, pieces by Gottschalk, Markul, Pitoche, and many others, interspersed with compositions by Beethoven and Mozart, together with the more distinctive organ music of Handel and Bach. Herr Lohr has great executive capabilities, and his ambitious attacks on the sonatas of Beethoven, and more especially on the monstrous vagaries of the Abbé Liszt, proved in the end, more astonishing than pleasing. He suffered from the same disadvantages as Herr Heintze, and certainly did not meet the requirements of the Hall, nor those of the instrument. There was much good playing, but nothing perfect. The only way to play a great organ is to play just so much of it as the player has been accustomed to handle. A man accustomed to manage fifty stops must not plunge at once into the mêlée of a hundred; he must select the fifty with which he is familiar, and increase his catalogue by degrees. But he must first use his fifty in accordance with the exigencies of the place: the Royal Chapel at Dresden is not the Royal Hall at Kensington, nor is the Royal Hall at Kensington our Cathedral at St. Paul's. Each place requires its own treatment, its own peculiar mode of playing.

The Court Organist of Vienna, Anton Brückner, was third at the organ, and announced specially, as great in "extemporaneous performances." We were told that Herr Brückner's strong points are classical improvisations on the works of Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn. He has given us a grand extempore Fantasia which although not very original in thought or design, was clever, remarkable for its canonic counterpoint, and for the surmounting of much difficulty in the pedal passages. There can be nothing said extemporaneously upon the National Anthem of Austria, and still less upon the Hallelujah Chorus of Handel; nor do we think any improvisation with any effect can be given upon the toccatas of Bach or the Sonatas of Mendelssohn. Great composers exhaust their themes. Nothing can be added to the Hallelujah Chorus, nothing to a toccata of Sebastian Bach.

Mr. Best has been playing three times a week, and is so to do until the close of the exhibition. In the making up of his programmes, he has been gradually paying more attention to the wishes of the public, and he now gives his audience operatic overtures, operatic selections, some of the French Offertoire music, and the Handel Organ Concerto. These selections are more satisfying to English ears, and Mr. Best commonly retains an audience. The French Offertoire music, although an abomination in a church, is good to play in the Royal Albert Hall. As an artistic construction it is new and curious, and one to which the German organists seem quite unfamiliar; but it is the one "great fact" that has grown out of the new organ invented by Cavallé Coll of Paris, and well deserves repeated hearings from the new organ.

We presume that when the foreign organists have been heard, the way may be opened to English talent. There are in England many good organ players, and there are some few pre-eminent among the foremost in Europe. There is in this metropolis a young lad who, to use the Duke of Wellington's opinion of his army, can (on the organ) "go anywhere, and do anything." There is also an older and more experienced head who, we believe, would be listened to on the part of all foreign organists with wonder and astonishment. But he won't play.—London Orchestra.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON. SEPT. 9, 1871.

THE SOUL OF THE ORCHESTRA. Great means are only justified by great ends. A fine and perfect organism implies a fine and noble purpose. Truly considered, it is an organized aspiration and outfit for some high and pure ideal to be realized. Take this most perfect, infinitely curious and complex of all organisms, "the human form divine:"—for what was it contrived, for what has it grown up, through all the pre-Adamite æons, out of all the co-working elements of nature, into this crowning flower of perfect form, unless it be for the fulfilment of a higher, even an altogether holy, divine life? And just so surely as it becomes oblivious of that true end of its existence, just in proportion as it falls away from that prime motive and becomes willing (for content it never can become) to live for idler, meaner ends, does it not begin to degenerate into a lower type?

So too it is with Art, and with the organized means of Art; especially with Music, which aims to give expression to the motive principles, the vital tendencies and passions, yearnings, aspirations,—what the writer in the Quarterly Review well calls the "complex emotions," of the human soul. This art principle in Music has created for itself organs, organisms, more and more complex and complete, until it has reached the culmination in the modern Orchestra. And what delicious, earnest, heavenly music has been written for it! Hardly do all our orchestral opportunities taken together suffice to keep up the desirable acquaintance with only what the masters, not only of the orchestra, but of great orchestral music, have created. And yet on what a mass of mere ephemeral triviality and trash, on what strained, wilful manifestations of a false and spurious art, ambitious strivings for "effect," are not these glorious means continually wasted, prostituted! Not that there should be no "light" music; not that there should be no music that is "free," or even now and then extravagant. There is a time for all things, a time to laugh, a time to weep. The earnest life knows all these moods, but seeks first that which is above all and best.

Have you ever considered how vital to the existence of a true orchestra is the music of the great masters! The symphonies and overtures of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, &c., are the very life-blood of a fine orchestra, or rather the pure and heavenly air that vitalizes the blood of the whole system. Without it the blood grows corrupt and thickens, and the organization dies. What motive can there be, what inspiration, to real artists to band themselves together in so rare and precious a society as a true orchestra, if they are to play only the music that will tickle the vulgar and the thoughtless, if the real treasures of the Art of music are to be as much let alone as if they had never been created, and there were no Art! It is an indignity to an orchestra like that of our Symphony Concerts, or of the Philharmonic Society in New York, or of Theodore Thomas, as well as a monstrous over-proportion of means to end, to keep them playing trivial music as the rule, with only now and then a fragment of the better kind as the exception.

The same thought is applicable to the Opera, which, under most impresario managements, is equally unfaithful to its high end as a great form of Art. We have copied on our last page some remarks from a London paper, which chime with what we have been saying of the Orchestra, and which are as true, alas! of operatic matters in this country as in England. "CAN THE OPERA BE DISSOCIATED FROM ART?" we have made the heading of the extract.

Boston Singers Abroad.

MME. ADELINÉ DE LA MOTTE (well known in our Boston concert rooms some years ago as Miss Washburn), after studying in Italy and England, and singing as a prima donna in various theatres, has been attracting favorable attention by her appearance in several miscellaneous concerts in London during the summer. A "Recital" which she gave, with other artists and a chorus, of the music of Gluck's "Orpheus," was certainly creditable to her artistic taste in the selection, and the performance seems to have won good opinions from the critics. The Evening Standard, of Aug. 3, says of it:

Madame Adeline De la Motte, from the theatres of America and Italy, gave an interesting recital in St. George's Hall last Saturday, which fully established her claim to be considered an artiste of the first rank. The performance of an opera designed for the stage is not generally effective in the concert-room, unless the music is sufficiently dramatic to render scenery, action, and mise en scène superfluous. Amongst modern operas it would be difficult to name one which would bear the ordeal of a performance sustained simply by voices and instruments, so that hitherto all attempts to render the music of some of the most popular operas without stage accessories have proved failures. Madame De la Motte was well advised in fixing upon one of Gluck's operas for her recital. Like several of Mozart's grandest works first brought on the stage, Gluck's operas are so full of dramatic fire and expression that they require no elucidation, no appeal to the eye, to excite emotional feelings in the listener. In Orpheus the music nearly always suggests the scene, and no finer dramatic effects can be desired than those resulting from the performance of the air and chorus, "Che mai Erebo," which describes the visit of Orpheus to the furies in search of his lost Eurydice. On Saturday, this air and chorus, as well as the other numbers in the opera, were sung to English words, but the music lost none of its effect by the translation, and Madame De la Motte threw into her solos so much feeling and expression that nothing was wanting except a larger choir to render the performance worthy of the composer. Madame De la Motte's full-toned and pleasing voice was also heard to advantage in the romance, "Dearest, untimely gone," whilst the florid air, "O love with hope," showed how admirably she has been trained to execute with ease the most difficult fortitudo. Madame De la Motte was assisted at her recital by the clever artistes, Miss Banks, Miss Drummond, and Signor Urle. Signor Vietti was the accompanist.

The Telegraph, after regretting the choice of so unfortunate a time for a debut (the last week of July), remarks:

The object sought by the concert was the introduction of Madame De la Motte to an English audience, and it will suffice if we say that her rendering of the airs in "Orfeo" fully proved such reputation as the lady enjoys elsewhere to be well founded. Madame De la Motte—who was formerly known in the States as Miss Washburn—has a mezzo-soprano voice of considerable power and capacity of expression. She sings with earnestness and intelligence, moreover; while her appearance and bearing are such as encourage a belief that she would prove acceptable on the lyric stage. The verdict of the scanty audience was highly encouraging; and, seeing that empty benches are notoriously the most effective dampers of enthusiasm, Madame De la Motte had good reason to be satisfied with the applause she elicited. The lady must make herself heard again by English ears—but not in the last week of July.

Our excellent basso, of the Oratorios, Mr. MYRON W. WHITNEY, is in London, where he is to join

Madame Rudersdorff, with Miss Drasdl, the contralto, Mr. Arthur Byron, the tenor, and Mr. Oscar Beringer as pianist, on a concert tour through England during the months of October and November. Mr. Whitney is announced as "The celebrated Basso from the Handel and Haydn Society, Boston, America." We have before us the programmes of the concert tour, which in their way are rich and somewhat unique. The repertoire is divided into Oratorio (the solo parts, of course), "Opera Recitals" and Ballad Concerts. Under the first head are named solos from Handel's "Messiah," "Judas Macabæus," "Israel in Egypt," "Samson," "Solomon," "Jephtha," "Joshua," "Alexander's Feast," and "Ode to St. Cecilia"; Mendelssohn's "Elijah," "St. Paul," Hymn of Praise, "As the hart pants"; Mozart's Requiem and Masses; Rossini's Stabat Mater; Sir Michael Costa's "Eli" and "Naaman"; Sir Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria." Two selections of Sacred Music, "suitable for the first part of programmes," are offered as follows:

No. 1.

Solo, American Organ, March "Athalia".....Mendelssohn.
 Quartet, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord".....
 Mme. Rudersdorff, Mlle. Drasdl, Mr. Arthur Byron
 and Mr. Whitney.
 Song, "How willing my paternal love".....Handel.
 Mr. Whitney.
 Prayer, "To thee, O Lord".....F. Hiller.
 Mlle. Drasdl.
 Solo, American Organ
 Mr. Oscar Beringer.
 Song, "I know that my Redeemer liveth".....Handel.
 Mme. Rudersdorff.
 Song, "If with all your hearts".....Mendelssohn.
 Mr. Arthur Byron.
 Song, "Father of Heaven".....Handel.
 Mlle. Drasdl.
 Quartet, "God is a Spirit".....Sir S. Bennett.

No. 2.

Solo, American Organ, March "Eli".....Costa.
 Mr. Oscar Beringer.
 Trio, "Thou shalt love the Lord".....Sir M. Costa.
 Mme. Rudersdorff, Mlle. Drasdl, and Mr. Arthur
 Byron.
 Song, "It is enough".....Mendelssohn.
 Mr. Whitney.
 Song, "Bow down thine ear".....A. Randegger.
 Mme. Rudersdorff.
 Solo, American Organ
 Mr. Oscar Beringer.
 Song, "Sound an alarm".....Handel.
 Mr. Arthur Byron.
 Song, "Oh rest in the Lord".....Mendelssohn.
 Mlle. Drasdl.
 Song, "From mighty Kings".....Handel.
 Mme. Rudersdorff.
 Quartet, "Oh thou the true and only".....Mendelssohn.

And here is one of the miscellaneous programmes "adapted for second parts" of concerts:

No. 1.

Comic Trio, from the Operetta "Creatures of Impulse"
 A. Randegger.
 Mme. Rudersdorff, Mlle. Drasdl, and Mr. Arthur
 Byron.
 Song, "Star of hope".....Hope Douglas.
 Mr. Whitney.
 New Song "To-morrow".....A. Randegger.
 (Written expressly for this tour, and sung by)
 Mme. Rudersdorff.
 Pianoforte Solo, "Faust Valse".....List.
 Mr. Oscar Beringer.
 Duet, "La ci darem".....Mozart.
 Mme. Rudersdorff and Mr. Whitney.
 Song, "A little while".....F. A. Marshall.
 Mr. Arthur Byron.
 Song,
 Mme. Rudersdorff.
 Quartet, "Twas fancy and the ocean's spray".....Osborne.
 Mme. Rudersdorff, Mlle. Drasdl, Mr. Arthur Byron,
 and Mr. Whitney.

Four "Opera Recitals," good either for the first parts before second parts of lighter miscellany, or for second parts after sacred music, are to consist of Airs, Duets, Trios, &c. on one evening from Semiramide, on another from Il Trovatore; again from Lucrezia Borgia, and from Oberon.

There are also set down in the prospectus one programme wholly miscellaneous, and one entirely of the Ballad character. Finally a list of songs, &c., which the artists are prepared to sing only in concerts where there will be a band, which is as follows:

Mme. Rudersdorff.

Scena ed Aria, ("MEDA").....A. Randegger.
 (As sung by her at the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concert;
 the great Musical Festival, Boston, America; and the Crystal Palace & Philharmonic Concerts.)
 Scena ed Aria, ("Andromeda").....Mozart.
 (As sung by her at the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concert;
 the great Musical Festival, Boston, etc.)

Aria, "Parto".....Mozart.
 Aria, "Perfido".....Beethoven.
 Song, "Du gläubiges Herz".....J. S. Bach.
 Cradle Song, "Peacefully Slumber".....A. Randegger.
 Finale, "Loreley".....Mendelssohn.

Mlle. Drasdl.

Scena e Preghiera, "La mia prece".....Mercadante.
 Song, "In questa tomba".....Beethoven.
 Arioso, "Oh, Fatima".....Weber.
 Spirit Song.....Haydn.

Mr. Arthur Byron.

Aria, "Il mio tesoro".....Mozart.
 Aria, "Spirto gentile".....Donizetti.

Mr. Whitney.

Aria, "Non più andrai".....Mozart.
 Song, "Over a green hill".....Gounod.

Mr. Oscar Beringer.

Concerto.....Schumann.
 Concerto.....Beethoven.

It is more than probable that Mr. Whitney will be heard in some of the Oratorios, at Exeter Hall, &c, during the winter.

The Opening of the Season.

Like the prelude before the fugue, or the fantasia before the Sonata, skirmishers and forerunners will occupy the field here for a few weeks before the solid Season of Symphony and Oratorio and Chamber music, in regular supplies, sets in. Various popular attractions and appeals will take their turn first, before the permanent local organizations which are supposed to have Art, rather than personal eclat or money for their motive. Uncommonly good things of this kind are promised us.

First in order of time, we believe, will come the three miscellaneous concerts which Mme. PAMELA ROSA will give in the Boston Music Hall on the 20th, 22d and 23rd of this month. Partial as the Rosas are to Boston, they will thus make this their point of departure for their winter's cruise. No doubt we shall then have a first taste of the new artists enrolled for their opera season, which will begin soon afterward in New York, and will give us a visit in January. The troupe will be by far the best and most complete combination for presenting Operas in English that we ever had. Carl Rosa, the conductor, knows the importance of presenting a fair proportion of the highest kind of operatic music. Besides the "Marriage of Figaro," "Oberon," &c., which he gave last year, he also hopes to give us an opportunity of hearing, for the first time in America, the famous Wasserträger ("Water Carrier"), or as it is called in France, "Les deux Journées" by Cherubini. We hear that Rosa is negotiating for the great German tenor, WACHTEL, who has arrived almost unheralded in New York. (It is also surmised, and very naturally, that some combination for German Opera, of which Wachtel will be a member, is in process of formation).

2. Next comes Mr. PECK, our enterprising Superintendent of the Music Hall, with the first two of his long promised Popular Subscription Concerts, namely on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, September 27 and 28. For these he has secured the services of Ole Bull; Mrs. Anna Granger Dow, soprano; Mrs. C. A. Barry, contralto; Mr. F. C. Packard, tenor; Mr. Edward Herrmannson, a basso of good voice, (who has made careful study of such music as the bass airs in Elijah and the Passion Music); Mr. Charles Allen, violinist; Mr. Howard M. Dow, and others. Later (October 6 and 7), he will have Miss Kellogg; and on the 27th and 28th of that month, Miss Adelaide Phillips.

3. On the 9th of October Mlle. Christine Nilsson will make her first appearance in Italian Opera in this country. The enterprise is under the management of Messrs. Mauries and Max Strokosch, who propose to give at that time a series of ten nights and two matinees of Opera at the Boston Theatre. The list of new artists engaged includes: Mlle. Marie Leon Duval, prima donna soprano from Her Majesty's Opera, London; M. Victor Capoul, the famous Parisian tenor; Mr. Lyall, "primo tenore comique"; M. Armand Barre, first baritone, from the Grand Opera, Paris; and M. Jamet, primo basso from the same. Besides these, there will be the old favorites, Miss Annie Louise Cary, Sig. Brignoli and Signor Randolphi (baritone). The musical department will be under the direction of Max Maretzky, with Signor Bosoni as conductor. Much is promised in the way of chorus, orchestra and "new and splendid wardrobe." The piece for the opening night in Boston will be Gounod's Faust, and everybody will be curious to see and hear the fair Swede in the part of Marguerite.

What operas will follow we are not informed precisely; but naturally they will be those in which she won her name in Paris and in London: Adolphe Adam's "Mignon" and "Hamlet," Donizetti's "Lucia" and "Lucrezia Borgia," &c. We trust, however, that Miss Nilsson will not be discouraged in her worthy purpose of studying and producing, some time in the winter, Beethoven's "Fidelio." Great artists now-a-days must be interpreters of great Art.

Some terrible man of figures is guilty of the following statistical revelations in England:

Recent inquiries into the education of girls have established the following facts with regard to music. The acquirement of music on the part of the young lady seems to be the one absorbing responsibility of her school existence. Its study occupies one entire fourth part of the educational year. Upon an average every school girl spends 5,330 hours on music during her sojourn at the seminary, and allowing two hours a day, and forty-six weeks for the school year, the parent has to pay for ten years' instruction in music, and to expend on this branch of tuition alone, a sum not much short of two hundred pounds. Whilst the young lady receives 5,520 hours' teaching in music, she devotes 640 to arithmetic, and about the same time to the other branches of education. In fact music, as to time engaged upon it, is as thirteen to one with regard to history, geography, astronomy and arithmetic.—Tonic Sol-Fa Reporter.

A Title Page.

DEAR DWIGHT,

Turning over a portfolio of fine prints belonging to the noble Library of Alexander Farnham, at Providence, the other day, I came upon an engraved title page, well worthy of a note.

The upper half of the page is an engraving of an ancient prophet kneeling at the sea-shore.

"B. West, Inv., 1775. F. BARTOLOZZI, Sculp."

Then follows the title:

JONAH AN ORATORIO,
 DISPOSED FOR A VOICE AND HARPSICORD, COMPOSED BY SAMUEL FELSTED,
 Organist of St. Andrew's, Jamaica.

LONDON: Printed for the Author by Messrs. LONGMAN, LUCKY and BROTHERS, No. 25 Cheap-side, 1775.

If you will turn to the last number of your Journal for May, 1857, you will find in Mr. Winthrop's address, at the opening of the Handel and Haydn Festival of that year, that the oratorio of Jonah "complete" was sung in Boston in the presence of the President of the United States—Washington—in 1789—if my memory serves. A. W. T.

Our readers will be glad to receive trustworthy information as to the state of the famous organ in Strasburg Cathedral, and we therefore quote the following note on the subject from the Builder:—A horrible "obus" came crashing through the glass, flew across the nave of the cathedral, and smashing in the organ pipes, lodged in the organ itself; here, wonderful to tell, it remained without exploding! Had it burst, of course annihilation of not only the beautiful organ, but also of great part of the cathedral itself, must have been the consequence. The custodian of the tower has had the dreadful missile mounted on a foot of marble, and on it is fixed a brass plate telling the day, or rather the night, month, and year, when this fearful hail of iron and fire fell on the devoted town. The organ pipes have not yet been replaced, but white linen blinds are drawn down over the cruel gaps. More than half of the organ is so covered, thus showing the extent of the damage done. The marvellous mechanical clock is apparently uninjured.

ECHO IN MUSIC. Any one who had anything that could be called musical experience or knowledge could not but be aware that, of all qualities in a music-room, a decided and perceptible echo is one of the most injurious to the effect of music. Of course, in a building with a redundant echo, certain very fine effects may incidentally be obtained, such as the reverberation and prolongation of the sound of the organ in some of our larger cathedrals; but that is not music,—it is simply a fine effect of sound, which affects our senses just in the same way as thunder and other impressive sounds. But as "music" consists not in mere noise, but in an appeal to our mind and feelings through the medium of a language formed by the union and sequence of sounds regulated in pitch and duration by fixed laws, it must be obvious that everything which tends to interfere with and confuse the original rhythmic and harmonic proportions of such sounds must be inimical to their effect. Some persons, of course, (children especially), find more pleasure in listening to an echo than in attending to music, just as others like to look at an ivy-covered wall rather than at an architectural detail; but to imagine that echo has anything to do with music, because it occasionally accompanies and obscures it, is just as rational as to say that ivy is an essential element of architectural design, because it often grows over buildings.

The object, in a large concert-room, is, or should be, to have such materials as will not swallow up or imbibe too much of the sound (though to have it strongly reflected is seldom desirable), but to arrange roof and walls in such a manner that the reflection of the sound shall be broken and dispersed, and not collected and localized in any one focus; which would cause to a certain portion of the audience a disagreeable and concentrated echo. For this reason, I should look on a semicircular or domical roof as one of the worst forms for a very large music-room, as it is sure to concentrate the echo, and make it disagreeably prominent at one point or another. Behind the performers let there be anything that can reflect the sound forward; and here a semicircular wall at the back may have a very good effect; but in the auditorium there should be nothing that can tend to concentrate the sound reflected from the wall on to any one point. That seems to be the common sense of the matter; not very scientifically expressed, certainly. It should be observed that the echo difficulty only applies to large halls; in smaller-sized rooms it may be left out of the question, as the echo has not space to develop itself so as to be heard at an appreciable interval after the sound. Architects who are building concert-rooms would probably get more valuable hints from practical musicians than from acoustic theorists, who are not musicians, and who indulge in the wildest statements.—Builder.

CAN THE OPERA BE DISSOCIATED FROM ART? And, if it can, is the separation lawful? These two questions go to the very root of the matter; and, by way of propounding a clearly defined thesis, we answer the first in the affirmative, the second in the negative. With regard to the first point, careful observers do not require to be told that the tendency of all operatic management, when left to itself, is to disparage the claims of Art. So distinctly is this tendency recognized where subventions are in fashion, that securities are taken against it; and the impresario cannot, if he would, give the rein to his inclinations. Thus one advantage, at all events, arises from State aid and consequent State control—an advantage which, in this country, we do not, and probably never shall, enjoy. Unlike many of their Continental brethren, English managers are free men. They follow what is right in their own eyes, and may bend to the public humor, no matter how acute the angle of inclination. That they sometimes descend from a high standard is but a natural result; for the impresario, whom an idealist might picture as the missionary, and, at need, even the martyr of Art, is really a man of business. But while admitting thus much, it is impossible not to regret the consequences of a state of things by no means conducive to the highest interests of opera. Every one who looks beneath the superficial brilliancy of the season now ended will conclude that at the council table of management it must have been said: "Let us get together many famous artists; let our representations be called 'appearances'; and, for the rest, let it look to itself." Thus all interest was made to centre in the personality of distinguished performers, for whom well-worn operas were brought out repeatedly, and to suit whom work after work was put upon the stage at a rate which made a perfect musical ensemble absolutely impossible. This state of things obtained at Covent Garden; but Drury Lane supplied an even more noteworthy illustration. Everybody knows that, with Mademoiselle Tietjens at the head of a good working company, and Sir Michael Costa at the head of an admirable orchestra, Mademoiselle Mari-mon was really the be-all and end-all of the campaign; and when she could appear, it was considered quite enough to play La Sonnambula and La Figlia turn about. We can, however, imagine circumstances under which even such a state of matters would be both intelligible and unassailable. When, for example, the avowed purpose is an exhibition of personal charms or personal acquirements, no objection can be raised; nor is there much ground for complaint in the absence of pretensions to anything higher. But the managers of our lyric theatre close against themselves this possible haven of refuge, by offering ostentatious homage—in print—to the claims of Art. Year by year they engage to extend the public knowledge of operatic works, and to be instructors as well as entertainers; but year by year the self-incurred obligation is altogether evaded, or grudgingly discharged. Take the season of 1871 as a conspicuous example. Mr. Gye absolutely promised La Donna del Lago, La Juive, Les Diamans de la Couronne, Le Azucis Femminik, and Il Matrimonio Segreto; while Mr. Mapleson was not far behind in bidding us to look for Anna Bolena, L'Ombra, Il Matrimonio Segreto, and Der Fliegende Holländer. Need we say what came of all these grand prospects? At Covent Garden, Cimarosa's little farce was played by a second-rate cast in the last few days of the season; and, in the last few days of the season also, Anna Bolena appeared on the boards of Drury Lane. We do not, of course, lay all the blame of non-performance at the managerial doors, so long as an indifferent public deserves its share; but we would suggest that the habit of exuberant promise had better cease. If our opera houses really exist for the sake of the artists who appear at them, let us all agree not to pretend any longer that they fulfil a higher mission. Thus will an end be put to a system which excites hope only to produce disappointment.

Not a word need be said in proof of the fact that opera, carried on with no consideration for art, is a spurious thing; but the question how to amend the practice opens a wide field of discussion. Here it becomes necessary to guard against the Utopian ideas of those radical reformers who, taking counsel of strong classical leanings, would force an entirely different system upon the public. When enthusiasts of this stamp can persuade Mr. Lowe to set down Italian opera for a handsome sum in the Estimates, they may hope to work out their theory; but not before. Practical minds will take things as they are, and try what can be done with their existing materials; first of all recognizing the cardinal truth, that our operatic establishments are just what our opera-going public makes them. It is of no use—nay, it is positively unjust—to rail at managers for consulting the taste of their patrons. That, if the managers were so disposed, they could do more towards improving public taste, may be true; but when Mr. Gye or Mr. Mapleson points to the empty benches of a "revival" night, or to the unprofitable, if enthusiastic, house which welcomes a classic opera, it is hard to deny the cogency of the argument. The remedy, then, lies not with the managers, but with the public itself, and must be found in the ability to look at opera from a different standpoint to that now generally occupied. There is no hope of such a result while a performance of Don Giovanni, for example, is spoken of as a "Patti night," or the title of Le Nozze di Figaro appears in smaller letters than the name of Madame Lucca. Under any circumstances, a great artist enjoys honor, and nobody desires to subtract from it one iota; but in proportion to the greatness of the artist must be his knowledge that he is a means to an end, not the end itself. Precisely this fact—neither more nor less—is what we wish to have established as a guiding principle. Looking at the apparently slow progress of real musical taste, some may bid us absolutely despair of such a consummation. But without yielding to optimism, we indulge a belief that in society there is sufficient love of good music to work a mighty change, if permitted to exercise its legitimate influence. With the submission of Englishmen to that which is, the operatic public accepts, year after year, a system of management based upon the theory that the singer is greater than the song, and the composer second to his exponents. Even while submitting, however, not a few chafe under the yoke, and need all their raverence for custom to put up with repetitions of Lucia, La Sonnambula, and other old acquaintances, as a substitute for things of greater worth which never get a hearing. Let these genuine amateurs speak out in protest, and there would be little difficulty with the liberal impresario, who is naturally ready to follow the preponderance of opinion, provided he clearly sees which way it tends. In a recent "Communication to my Friends," after a bitter sneer at those operas which become a "diverting entertainment" only through an interest more or less purely personal, Richard Wagner observes:—

"The production of old and, as they are called, classical works, is never an act proceeding from the convictions of the theatrical managers, but only the result of a laborious demand of our aesthetic criticism."

[This is absolute truth; the lovers of art must decide whether truth it shall remain.]—London Musical World.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- My Sweetheart when a Boy. 3. C to e. W. Morgan 40
A pretty reminiscence of boyhood.
- Old Forest Home. Song and Chorus. 3. Bb to e. C. A. Fuller 35
Effective song and good chorus.
- Sighing for Thee. 4. Ab to e. J. Benedict 40
Well fitted for the concert room. Full of expression.
- They are Sleeping, Sweetly Sleeping. Song and Chorus. 3. Eb to f. C. A. White 30
A tribute to our fallen heroes, and is beautifully in keeping with tender and patriotic thoughts.
- O Sing to me the Auld Scotch Songs. 3. Eb to f. J. F. Leeson 40 Containing a fine Scotch air, and introducing others very neatly in the interludes. The words are by Rev. Dr. Bethune.
- Ship boys Letter. 3. C to e. V. Gabriel 40
Capital. Very good for a school concert or exhibition.
- All will yet be Well. 2. C to d. B. Covert 30
Mary Darling, Mary Dear. 2. Bb to d. " 30
Two excellent new songs by the veteran ballad singer, now near his threescore and tenth year, but as healthy, rosy and full of life as ever. His ringing voices will advertise these melodies to thousands.
- The Spot where I was born. 3. D to f. J. H. Waud 40
A fine ballad.
- The Iron Blacksmith. 3. D to f. J. L. Hatten 40
The Jolly Smiths. 3. Bb to f. J. C. Chamberlain 35
The Forging of the Anchor. 3. Bb to f. J. Benedict 60
Come see the Dolphin's Anchor forged.
Tis at a white heat now!
Three songs of the same sentiment, with not much to choose in goodness, as all are effective. The second is the jolliest, and has a picture title, while the third is the longest and most difficult. All are fine Blacksmith songs.
- Birdie, have you told my Secret? 2. G to E. W. A. Smith 30
A sweet little chat with a bird, with a nice chorus.

Instrumental.

- Gaieté de Coeur. 4 Hands. 4. Gb. Sydney Smith 1.00
Very brilliant and effective for exhibitions.
- Robert le Diable. Fantasia Dramatique. 6. S. Smith 75
A powerful piece, varying skillfully the favorite airs of the great opera.
- Barcarolle. 5. B. S. Smith
The leading melody is very graceful, and the piece well wrought.
- Sous Joyeux. Valse de Salon. 4. B. E. L. Hime 60
A brilliant waltz.
- The Blooming Rose. Mazurka. 5. Db. E. Hoffman 60
Very melodious. Generally soft and sweet.
- Air Tyrolien. Piano and Guitar. 4. A. W. Neuland 75
The air is "When the day with rosy light," and is very prettily varied.
- Cupid's Chase. Valse Brillante. 3. G. C. M. B. 30
A very delicate waltz, worthy of the name.
- Twinkling Stars. Waltz. 3. G. J. H. Waud 40
Very neat and spirited.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as G, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 795. BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 23, 1871. VOL. XXXI. No. 13.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Regrets.

Sunny sail, that nothing brought,
That nothing bore away,
That passed my isle, a moment's thought,
A gleam of fancy's play.

A flash upon the morning's glow,
Bright vision or surmise,
Forgotten when the mounting sun
Attained the noonday skies ;—

I seek thee o'er the darkening sea
With ever-longing eye,
For nothing now seems real to me
Save thy swift passing by.

Carl Loewe's Story of his Early Life.*

[Continued from page 90.]

All the other singers of the choir lived, as I did, in the house of Türk. It gave us the advantage of a familiarity at first hand with our master's restless musical devotion.

Our choir formed the basis of his musical activity. Türk brought out the church music and all the public concerts, of which he gave twelve in the winter, almost solely with the aid of this choir. For these performances and concerts severe rehearsals were required. But in Halle it was the custom, as in Köthen, for us scholars to sing in the streets, before the doors of the wealthier inhabitants; nor could we fail to be on hand at marriages and funerals. Türk received the tenth part of our earnings. Halle had as yet no public art institutions, and Türk's concerts were all of art that there was offered for the city.

In them the public had a chance to hear a large selection of musical pieces; and even to-day I cannot help admiring the geniality of the Director, who always knew how to bring forward something new and good; for how small, often, were the means that stood at his command! Even the solo parts were in a great degree taken by scholars, though we were admirably supported by a certain Mlle. Weimann and her brother, a bassist.

We performed all the Mozart and the other operas then modern, of which I will name only Naumann's "Cora." Türk gave the operas of Naumann with especial partiality, since the composer had been his teacher. The operas of Himmel and of Reichardt also occupied us. Of oratorio composers, Handel, Haydn, Graun, Schuster and Winter were most kept in practice.

Here too, as in Löbejün, we were accompanied by the orchestra of the Stadtmusikus; but he had other and better forces at his command than Wieprecht had. The Halle orchestra played Symphonies with tolerable precision.

In the third of the subscription concerts, which I attended that first winter, and which was considered as the symphony concert par excellence, the then young Beethoven was not overlooked.

* Translated for DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC from "DR. CARL LOEWE'S Selbst-biographie. Für die Öffentlichkeit bearbeitet von C. H. BERTZ. Berlin, 1870."

Türk had crossed out the droll ("schnackische") introduction of the violins to the finale of the Symphony in C (No. 1), because he was afraid the public would laugh so loudly at it as to make the orchestra ashamed.

In those Symphony concerts the pianoforte concertos of Mozart were played, with orchestral accompaniments, by a sister of Mlle. Weimann, the singer above mentioned.—Türk held an important position as a composer, particularly for the church. His admirably elaborated chorals are worthy of especial mention. In the church concerts we sang, besides Sebastian Bach, Emanuel Bach, Doles and Hiller, also twenty cantatas by our master. One of his Oratorios, of which the poem was by Ramler, "The Shepherds at the Manger in Bethlehem," was for years performed on Christmas eve by Zelter in the Singacademie at Berlin.

Türk had a remarkably fine ear, and a great gift and authority for conducting; he conducted, though not without vehemence, with great circumspection. The rehearsals were hurried through; commonly one rehearsal had to suffice for each performance. Often enough it seemed more than rash to go before the public so imperfectly prepared; but he who ventures, wins. Then, to be sure, director and performers had to gather up all their presence of mind, to have the performance go without mistakes and with the necessary fire. But this very process gave us a sure oversight and kept our souls fresh for our dear Musica, for in this way all sense of satiety was impossible. I have myself, in my own sphere of operations, frequently arranged more than one rehearsal for a performance; yet I never loved much studying and practising; for the performers it lies like mildew on the blooming plant of a work of art; and the impression, the effect upon the hearers is essentially dependent on the fervor, the enthusiasm which this awakens in the soul of the performer. It often happened during the performance that Türk in his zeal struck with his baton into the chandelier that hung above him, so that its glass pendants fell down with a jingle; or that he helped out the chorus with his strong and clear bass in a way that made the pillars tremble. The public did not take it ill, for they were already accustomed to the singularities of the old master and knew that such passages were particularly difficult; they smiled and enjoyed what went well all the more gratefully.

Türk had in his Market Church an excellent organ with three ranks of keys and some sixty stops, some of them beautiful, which in his time had been tried and approved by Sebastian Bach, and upon which Friedemann Bach, alike in his artistic greatness and in his wilful falling off, had played so long, now to the edification and now to the scandal of the congregation. As an organist my master was distinguished. His playing was as full of feeling as it was intellectual; in the church song he was always thoroughly penetrated by the character of the hymn, and never played without giving strict attention to the text. Therefore he was always in unity with the congregation. He was beloved by them, and his playing was preferred to that of any other.*

His labors as Professor too were not without success. His lectures on the history of music were gladly heard, especially because our choir performed the historically remarkable works, thus combining an artistic enjoyment with the scientific investigations. The hearers were put in a condition to judge from their own knowledge and observation. The Professor's delivery was free, animated and genial.

In piano playing he was useful to the scholars chiefly through his excellent system of fingering and his expressive rendering. But he could not persuade himself to exchange the soft old clavi-chord for the louder Forte-piano which first became known through Mozart. The scholar had to draw out the tone by an elastic touch, and flatter the gentle instrument, but not strike out the sounds, as is now alas! so frequently the way. The music of the Bachs, Mozart and Haydn, indeed, were well suited for this gentle style of playing.—Türk was excelled in piano playing by his amiable and unpretending daughter Nantchen.

From the foregoing one may see what manifold nourishment my musical talent received in that house. Above all I went through with Türk a thorough elementary course in singing, in which he emphasized reading (or the sure hitting of the notes), enunciation and the formation of the voice as the main branches. And now at last, through this judicious training, my soprano voice began to develop an uncommon charm. I soon belonged to the best singers of the choir, and while Mlle. Weimann had the first parts, the second fell to me. One of my favorite rôles was the Queen of the Night in Mozart's "Magic Flute," which in spite of its great difficulties I was able to sing well.

I have never received any instruction in piano playing from Türk or from any other teacher; Türk thought I could learn that alone. He lent me for study above all things Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord." Of course after this I mastered all the more easily the more modern things for the piano, particularly those by Clementi, Haydn, Mozart and the young Beethoven.

But while my musical culture was so well provided for, it was questionable about my intellectual and scientific progress. Türk kept me at school just long enough to barely reach the fourth class of that time; he thought that I had got enough of learning, and that I might gradually leave it off entirely. When I reflect now on this advice, which he thought suited to a boy of fourteen, I can only excuse it by supposing Türk afraid that my physical powers would not hold out for the development of my really conspicuous musical talent along with the study of the sciences.

My father, although he made no objection to my musical accomplishments, listened very unwillingly to such advice, and sought to make it clear to me that I should achieve nothing clever in the world out of mere music; but that, if I would only follow theological studies, a good position in the pulpit, honor and esteem awaited me; he knew well enough that I was by no means wanting in the capacity for science. He usually wound up his disquisitions with the words: "Thou knowest enough of music, but in the sciences thou art still a beginner; one must learn that which he cannot do, not that which he can." I admitted that he was right and went with zeal to school, where I read Cornelius Nepos, Phædrus and Eutropius.

*Compare his book on "The most important duties of an Organist."

But the distractions which the practice of music carried with it were too many, and my time would not always hold out. So I often fell short of my good resolutions. In fact, on the flowery ways of art I found praise, flattery, almost admiration; at school on the contrary I had to toil to learn. Here the praises were only to be won by diligence and pains.

I visited my father only in the few free hours, which allowed me to make the long walk from Halle to Löbejün. And so in this important epoch of my life there was really no one to interest himself in my poor youth. A friendly guide was what I needed. I was a wavering reed; was I to follow my father or Türk? My musical talent had led me into the most different social circles. In families whose life was penetrated by the breath of Christianity, they wished me well, they prized me. But gentle as the Muses are, our choir adorned also the social hours of quite another kind of company. To this day I must ask myself, how it was possible for me, so young, and so surrounded with temptation, to keep aloof from all coarse sins. But our choir also had its service in the church, and the church was and remained the fountain, out of which the germs of piety and Christian purity of morals, which my brave father had implanted in my soul in earliest childhood, were continually watered and renewed in strength.

And so the time arrived, when I was to be received into the Christian communion. Consistorial-rath Dr. Wagnitz initiated me. This took place, according to the custom of that time, in the confirmation chamber at the same time with other boys.

On the following Sunday, in Türk's Market-Church, I partook for the first time of the holy supper.—The sister of Secretary Wiese, at whose table I was a free guest, had dressed me up for the consecration. Through her kindness I could go neat and clean to the holy ceremony, and stand before the Consistorial-Rath. Even now I feel how he laid his revered hand on my head, to announce to me the blessing of the Lord for the long life road that lay before me.

Our winter concerts came too soon to an end. Weimar, then at its full height of bloom, was the cause of it. In the summer season the theatrical troop from there came into our city, and the public could hear the same operas, which had become well known favorites in our concerts, presented now dramatically and much better. The crowd therefore was immense, and the Opera, represented by its best solo talent and the choicer portion of its own orchestra, earned in Halle alone enough to cover its expenses in Weimar through the winter. Frau von Heigendorf (née Jagemann), Mme. Eberwein, Herr Moltke as tenor, and Strohmeier as basso, were indeed singers such as the other capitals of Germany could not show. In tragedy there were the Wolffs (husband and wife), and also Haydn, Denis, Oebis, and others. The comic muse was represented by Unzelmann and Lortzing (father of the composer). As the opera had brought no chorus with it to Halle, the thought occurred to the talented director, Eberhard Müller (composer of the Caprices) to engage Türk's choir for the opera evenings. This required the permission of the greatest pedagogue whom the Orphan-House then possessed, and who, it may be well said, was one of the greatest in Germany, Chancellor Niemeyer. How easily he might have refused it! He was unprejudiced enough not to withhold his assent from what was for the good of Art.

Of course we were only to sing behind the scenes and without costume. For our coöperation we received, besides some money, leave to attend the play in the parterre. These fortunate circumstances gave me the opportunity of cultivating my talent for music and my judgment for dramatic works, more than would ever have been possible to me otherwise. I must gratefully confess, that these representations had a beneficial influence upon my intellectual and moral development. With rapture and with shudders I beheld the first performances of Schiller's "Robbers." I clearly felt the moral and the high poetic ground, on which this mighty youthful work of the great poet, as well as his own and Goethe's later works, had grown up. If in the course of my artistic career I have been credited with a happy choice of texts for my own compositions, I surely owe this certainty of judgment to the impressions which those perfect presentations of the great master works had made upon me. I felt that my soul was purified by those impressions; they seem to have protected me throughout my after years, from all confusion and depravity of judgment. Thus through several summers I was, both in the theatre and the performance, by the side of the most excellent artists, whose personalities and whose whole effort were worthy of so great a school. And therefore, too, the most respectable inhabitants of our city esteemed it an honor to receive these great impersonators, to whom they owed such high enjoyment, into their family circle.

So passed in study and in toil, as well as in enjoyment, a considerable period of my youthful life. With simple wants and modest claims, I really had no cares.

Our choir, to the joy of the whole city, stood in the most flourishing condition; Chancellor Niemeyer especially was proud of his singers, who all belonged to the Orphan House. He took delight in letting us be heard before any important personage who chanced to visit Halle.

One day he commanded us before the Crown Prince hotel. When we had sung to an end, he beckoned to me to follow him. We went up one flight of stairs and entered a saloon, in which we found a lady who came forward to me in a friendly manner and accosted me in French. Luckily the lady talked herself with too much animation, to cause me much embarrassment about having to reply to her. So much I could translate out of her extremely rapid speech: that she had been pleased with my singing, and that she wished me further success in my artistic career. I stood there reverently; but now the Chancellor said to me in German: "Do not forget this hour, my son, but think of it, that you have stood before Madame de Staël."—At the same time this lady pressed an eight-groschen piece into my hand.—To my shame I must confess, that the silver piece, which at that time was like a little treasure to me, made more impression on me than the famous giver.—I had not troubled myself about a kingdom overthrown, nor about Minister Necker and his daughter; and while Schiller a short time before had sighed under the sparkling conversation of this Madame de Staël, I, thanks to my youth, came off happily enough with a short speech and an eight-groschen piece.

[To be Continued.]

The Beethoven Centenary Festival at Bonn.

A correspondent of the London Daily News has given an interesting account of the Beethoven Festival at Bonn, which commenced on Sunday, Aug. 30, from which we extract the following notes:

BEETHOVEN'S BIRTH-PLACE.

Twenty-six years have now elapsed since the first great public recognition of the immortal composer, who has largely added to the artistic renown of Germany—before pre-eminent in music by the production of such men as Bach, Handel, Haydn, and Mozart—and who has conferred a fame on Bonn of which the tranquil old Rhenish town is naturally proud. Born in this place on December 17th, 1770, Ludwig van Beethoven passed the earlier portion only of his life here; and in November, 1792, removed permanently to Vienna, where he died, March 26, 1827. As his great artistic career, and nearly the whole of his grand productions were associated with the Austrian capital—which, with the exception of a visit to Berlin and suburban excursions, he never quitted during the period just named—he was so thoroughly identified therewith, that the claims of his birth-place became overlooked until that noble enthusiast, Franz Liszt, originated the project for the erection of a statue of the composer in the Münster Platz of Bonn. For several years the great pianist pursued this purpose, which he brought to a successful termination at the inaugural Festival, conducted by himself, held here on the 10th, 11th and 12th of August, 1845; the closing day having been that of the unveiling of the fine bronze statue, the work of Herr Hahnel, of Dresden.

A MEMORIAL FOR THE COMPOSER.

Among preliminary efforts in this direction, may be mentioned the concert given at Drury-lane Theatre, on July 19th, 1837, at the instance of the citizens of Bonn, who addressed Lord Burghersh, by whom an appeal was made to the principal musical institutions of London—the Philharmonic Society, represented by Sir George Smart and Mr. Moscheles; the Italian Opera (Her Majesty's Theatre), by Mr. Mori and Sir M. (then Signor) Costa; the Ancient Concerts, by Mr. Knyvett and Mr. Cramer; and the Royal Academy of Music by Mr. Cipriani Potter and Mr. Charles Lucas. The only survivors of these are Sir M. Costa and Mr. Potter. The solo singers on the occasion referred to were Mmes. Schröder Devrient, Bishop, and Knyvett, Misses Birch and Wyndham, Messrs. Braham, Bennett, Balfe, Seguin, and H. Phillips. Sir G. Smart, Mr. Moscheles, and Mr. Knyvett were the conductors, and the selection comprised the oratorio, the Mount of Olives, the choral symphony, the pianoforte concerto in E flat (played by Mr. Moscheles), and Leonora's great scene, and the finale from Fidelio. It was at this concert that the Mount of Olives was given for the first time entire in England. The profits, including donations, only amounted to about £100. Other concerts were given in various towns of Germany, among them having been one by Thalberg and de Beriot, at Bonn. Besides his personal exertions in promoting the erection of the statue, Liszt, at an early stage of the proceedings, gave ten thousand francs.

THE BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL OF 1845.

The Festival of 1845 was rendered memorable, apart from its great purpose, by the presence of many of the noblest and most eminent personages of the day. Associated with Liszt in the direction of the performances was Spohr; among the visitors from Paris was Hector Berlioz; from Berlin, Meyerbeer; Moscheles was here; and other distinguished musicians of that day might be mentioned who were preent, and have since been removed by death—the greatest composer of the period, Mendelssohn, having been unaccountably absent. The occasion referred to also included the attendance of Royalty in the persons of her Majesty Queen Victoria and the late Prince Consort, the King and Queen of Prussia, &c.

The programme of the performances in 1845 included most of the important pieces comprised in the selection for the festival, representing works, indeed, without which any such tribute to the composer would be incomplete—such as the Symphony in C minor, the Pianoforte Concerto in E flat (played by Liszt), the Missa Solennis, and the Choral Symphony—productions which mark important phases in the progress and development of Beethoven's genius, and will ever rank among the grandest of his many sublime creations.

FRANZ LISZT AND THE FEST-HALLE.

The generous enthusiasm of Franz Liszt, often as it has been evidenced in various ways, was never more notably displayed than in reference to the erection of a concert-room for the Festival of 1845. But a few weeks before the time appointed it was found that there was no secular building in Bonn of sufficient capacity for performances on so large a scale and addressed to such numerous audiences. The hesitation at incurring a possible large money loss by the erection of a hall for the purpose, was met by Liszt's engagement to sustain the consequences in the event of the proceeds of the Festival not meeting the expenses. With this guaranty, and the ready professional skill of the late Herr Zwirner, the architect of Cologne Cathedral, a Fest-Halle was reared in an incredibly short space of time; but as this building was entirely of wood, and its proximity to the Library endangered the safety of the latter in case of fire, the hall was pulled down, and a permanent structure was erected (in the Viercksplatz), for the Centenary Beethoven Festival, which would have been duly held last autumn but for the war. This new building is oblong in shape, nearly twice the length of its width—about 135 feet by 70. It has galleries on each side and at one end; the opposite end being appropriated to a new organ, built by Herr Adolph Bach, of Bonn. Amateurs of the instrument may like to know that it has two manual claviers, and contains in all 25 stops; six of which belong to the pedals, three being what are classed as 16 foot stops. Having touched it for a short time, I can speak favorably of its qualities of tone. This, however, is but an incidental feature in the arrangements—the organ being designed merely for the support of the choral voices. The hall is calculated to seat comfortably about 1,600 persons, and the facilities for complete ventilation are unusually great.

THE PERFORMERS AT THE PRESENT FESTIVAL.

The solo vocalists engaged are Frauen Otto Alvensleben (soprano, from Dresden), and Amalie Joachim (alto, of Berlin). Fräulein Franziska (alto, of Bonn), Herren Vogel (tenor, of Munich), and Schulze (bass, of Hamburg). The solo instrumentalists will be Herr Joachim, from Berlin (violin), and Mr. Charles Hallé, of London (pianoforte)—both well known to English readers. Herr Franz Weber, organist of Cologne Cathedral, presides at the organ. The principal director and conductor is Herr Capellmeister Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, with whom is associated Herr von Wasielewski, of Bonn. The orchestra, consisting of 111 performers, including the organist, comprises 36 violins, 14 violas, as many violoncellos, and 12 double basses. The flutes, oboes, and clarinets are doubled; there are 3 bassoons, as many trumpets and trombones, 6 horns, 1 contrafagotto (double bassoon), and the usual instruments of percussion. The chorus comprises 373 voices, thus classified:—106 sopranos, 92 altos, 79 tenors, and 96 basses. Unlike the Festival of 1845, when a portion of the performances took place in the Cathedral, the present celebration is held entirely in the Fest-Halle already described. The monument is twenty-five feet high; the statue itself being ten feet, and the pedestal fifteen feet. Beethoven is represented with an upward look in the moment of creative thought, the right hand lifted as if to note down his imaginings on the tablet held in his left hand. The front relief represents imagination, with flowing robe, seated on a Sphinx. The opposite side shows a female figure supposed to represent Instrumental Music, the four genii who surround her being typical of the four movements into which the orchestral symphony is usually divided. The first holds a sword, the second a serpent and a torch reversed, the third a thyrus and castanets, and the fourth a triangle. The other reliefs represent each a female figure, one playing the organ as symbolical of Church music; the other, with two masks, being representative of dramatic music. The present surroundings of the statue—booths for the sale of gingerbread, toys, clothes, and the pastime of tir-au pistolet (Schie- sen Hallen)—are but the remains of a popular annual fair, and will have disappeared before the commencement of the Festival.

THE HOUSE WHERE BEETHOVEN WAS BORN.

Much misconception has prevailed as to the house in which Beethoven was born, No. 934 in the Rhein Gasse having long been erroneously stated to have been the dwelling in which the event took place; whereas it was only occupied by the family some years afterwards. The exact spot is a small garret at the top of the house, No. 515, in the Bonn Gasse, close to the market. The shop is occupied by a vendor of ready-made clothes, who attended me up stairs and duly received the stipulated fee of fifteen silver grochen. On the house front a tablet has been placed with this inscription:—"In diesem Hause wurde Ludwig van Beethoven geboren am 17ten Dezember, 1780."

FIRST DAY OF THE FESTIVAL (SUNDAY.)

In the selection of the works for performance at the Festival, order of date has not been observed. Thus the most imposing and appropriate effect possible was obtained for the opening by the choice of the grandest piece of Church music in existence—the Missa Solennis—the cherished and highly elaborated production of Beethoven's later period. The present celebration partakes largely of the character of a solemn recognition of a composer, whose works are without parallel for their reflection and suggestion of all that is purest and most sublime within the range of musical thought; and, the inauguration having occurred on a Sunday, the Mass gave an appropriate tone of religious feeling to the commencement of the Festival, while its close on Tuesday evening, with the ninth symphony (Wednesday's matinee of chamber music may be considered as a supplemental performance), will confer an effect of unity on the whole, as both belong to the closing period of Beethoven's career, and exhibit his genius and power in their highest development, the works given intermediately illustrating other phases thereof.

The performance of the Mass displayed the good qualities of orchestra, chorus, and solo singers, in the execution of the most difficult and trying music ever written for instruments and voices. The band is well proportioned and balanced in numbers and effect. The tone, of both wind and string, is resonant, without ever being harsh; ample support to harmonic combinations being afforded by the twelve double basses, all instruments with four strings, according to the German custom, whereby a deeper range of compass is obtained than in English orchestras. The careful and elaborate rehearsals that have been held, some directed by Dr. Hiller and others by Herr Wasielewski, have resulted in an excellent realization of the most delicate gradations of sound, from the extreme pianissimo to the grandest fortissimo, while the rich and elaborate details of the instrumentation, so often obscured, were brought out with due prominence. Similarity of howing, too, gave to the violin passages a unity of effect that is rarely obtained from many executants.

The chorus, consisting of amateurs who give their services from enthusiasm in the cause which brings them together, is characterized by a purity and sympathetic quality of tone, and a general refinement, such as were long exclusively associated with German chorus-singing. Of late years the chorus of Mr. Henry Leslie and Mr. Joseph Barnby have proved that London can successfully emulate these merits; and have, moreover, manifested that it is chiefly from the amateur class that such results can be best obtained.

The solo soprano, Madame Otto Alvensleben, is a dramatic singer of much celebrity from the Dresden Opera; the principal contralto, Madame Joachim, wife of the great violinist, is well known to London audiences by her refined singing there in past seasons; Herr Vogl has acquired a prominent position as a tenor singer at the Munich Opera, especially in the works of Richard Wagner; and Herr Schulze, the bass, comes with good report from Hamburg.

The enormous difficulties of the Mass—especially in the vocal portion, choral and solo—were surmounted with rare success. The frequent strain on the extreme high notes of the sopranos (A and B above the lines), and the intricacy of many of the passages—especially in the "Et vitam"—were encountered by the chorists with every sign of thorough and careful preparation, in addition to a genuine perception of the importance of their mission in the interpretation of such music. Similar praise is due to the solo singers, whose task was of course more arduous, as involving separate individual responsibility. The steadiness with which the members of the solo quartet (already named) gave the numerous important passages assigned to them (the "Pleni sunt," among many others) is worthy of all praise. Each portion of the Mass produced a profound impression, which was manifested by enthusiastic applause, especially after the opening "Kyrie" and the "Benedictus;" a large portion of the demonstration in the latter instance having been in recognition of Herr Strauss's excellent performance of the exquisite violin obbligato, which pours a continuous stream of lovely melody throughout the movement.

The execution of the Fifth Symphony (which, like the Mass, was conducted by Dr. Hiller), was admirable in every respect. Delicacy without affectation, power without effort, alternate subordination and prominence in the different divisions of the orchestra, according to the temporary comparative importance of each, and a clear and distinct enunciation of the smallest details—such were the technical merits of the performance; in addition to which must be recognized a certain traditional spirit and sentiment which rendered it agreeably evident that one was listening to grand German music worthily performed by Germans in their native land. In his direction of the Mass and the Symphony, Dr. Hiller took the tempo of most of the movements somewhat slower than is usually the case in English performances, to the great advantage of the effect. The English tendency to haste in all the transactions of life has had its effect even on musical performances; and it is a common thing in London concerts to hear an Adagio turned into an Andante, and an Allegro into a Presto, with other such changes as are attended with disadvantage to the effect. Here, fortunately, this kind of fever does not prevail, and its absence is a welcome feature in other respects besides that now specially referred to.

The success of the inaugural performance has been complete. Magnificent weather prevails, and the town is crowded with visitors. All the tickets for each of the three evening performances were sold many days before the commencement of the Festival, and several hundreds more could have been disposed of had the hall been larger.

SECOND DAY (MONDAY.)

The second concert, last night, fully maintained the interest of the occasion, and was attended with as great success as that obtained by the opening performances. The grandest of all dramatic preludes, the third of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his one opera Fidelio, formed an impressive and fitting introduction to the remainder of the programme. The overture was followed by the beautiful march and chorus from the music to Kotzebue's Ruins of Athens, "Schmückt die Altäre" ("Twine ye garlands," in the English version.)

The next piece in the programme was the concerto for violin—the one work of the kind produced by Beethoven. How magnificently Herr Joachim plays this great work, with what facility he surmounts its mechanical difficulties, and how admirably he interprets the distinctive character of each movement, neither English nor German readers require now to be told, his many performances of the concerto (including his own effective cadenzas) having rendered it familiar to all frequenters of concerts in both countries. At the conclusion of the concerto a perfect storm of applause burst forth from all parts of the hall; and an impromptu flourish of drums and trumpets from the orchestra greeted the great violinist on his return to the platform in acknowledgement of his reception. Another performance familiar to Londoners, although not so here, was Mr. Charles Hallé's execution of the pianoforte part of the Choral Fantasia. This composition (written in 1808) may have had some influence in suggesting to Beethoven the similar proceeding, adopted in his long subsequent Ninth Symphony, of supplementing an instrumental piece by a movement for chorus and solo voices. Some slight analogy, too, may be found between certain vocal phrases in the later and grander work, and passages in that which preceded it. Notwithstanding the well-known careful execution of Mr. Hallé, and the co-operation of the excellent band and chorus assembled, the fantasia scarcely produced the effect which usually attends its performance. The pianist had the advantage of playing on one of Messrs. Broadwood's magnificent "concert grand" pianos, sent over from the manufactory in London specially for the occasion. The solo vocal passages in the fantasia were assigned to Madame Otto Alvensleben, Mdles. Buschgens and Schreck, and Herren Vogl, Schneider, and Schulze.

The concert closed with the finest performance we have ever yet heard of the "Eroica" symphony. The performance of this grand work was of special excellence; it was indeed the realization of the highest ideal that could be formed of its capabilities, and produced a display of enthusiasm at the end of each movement, and especially at the close of the whole, such as was justly due to the occasion. The heroic grandeur of the first Allegro; the deep solemnity and devotional sublimity of the funeral march; the wondrous life and vigor of the Scherzo; and the mingled beauty and science of the finale, with its almost identical treatment of the same subject, as in the variations for pianoforte, op. 35—all were given with a perfection that can only be attained by such a combination of executive skill, sentiment and enthusiasm, and deliberate and careful preparation, as has reigned in the arrangements for this great Festival. Again, in the "Eroica" symphony were apparent a nicely adjusted balance of power between the different divisions of the orchestra, and an alternation of prominence and abnegation, which gave clearness to the minutest details, and brought out delicate tints and shades of the great picture that are too often obscured.

The symphony, the fantasia, and the overture were conducted by Dr. Hiller, who again evidenced his skill and power of control in the direction of an orchestra, and his admirable perception of the true spirit and tempo of the compositions. The other pieces in the programme were ably directed by Herr Wasielewski.

THIRD DAY.

The third concert, although offering some few points in performance that fell short of perfection, was remarkable for the splendor of its chief and culminating portion. The selection commenced with the overture to Coriolan.

It was followed by an "Elegiac Song" for four solo voices, "Sanft wie du lebstest, hast du vollendet" ("Gently as thou hast lived, so hast thou ended")—composed by Beethoven in 1814 in memory of the wife of his friend Pasqualati. This was worthily sung by Mesdames Otto-Alvsleben and Joachim, and Herren Vogl and Schulze.

The noblest of all pianoforte Concertos, even among the five by Beethoven—that in E flat, now as universally entitled the "Emperor," as Mozart's great symphony is styled "Jupiter"—was executed by Mr. Charles Hallé with the same careful manipulation as in innumerable performances in England, and the pianist was greeted with loud applause at its close. Here, as elsewhere, it was very noticeable that the audience reserved such manifestations for the end of each movement—never, even in the case of their great favorite, Herr Joachim, interrupting the progress of the composition by recognizing the merit and skill of the solo player the moment that he ceased, and the orchestral tutti began. Their invariable and utter silence too while the music was proceeding, was a feature at these concerts which might be imitated with great advantage elsewhere.

The fine scena, "Ah, Perfido," was declaimed with great effect by Madame Joachim. This beautiful piece involved a retrograde movement in date, having been composed in 1796, when Beethoven was still under the influence of Mozart, as several phrases testify. At the close of her performance, Madame Joachim was greeted with a perfect ovation and reiterated showers of bouquets. With the noble overture which—with incidental music—Beethoven composed for Goethe's drama Egmont, the miscellaneous portion of Tuesday's concert terminated; and the real climax of the Festival was attained by the grandest and most finished performance I have ever heard of the magnum opus of symphonic art; the Ninth Symphony, with the finale including a setting of Schiller's "Ode to Joy." Many times have I been present when this work has been given in England with various degrees of efficiency, and directed by conductors—some removed by death, as Berlioz, Lindpaintner, Moscheles, &c.—of more or less eminence—but such a realization of its sublimity and beauty as that attained here on Tuesday evening was beyond what I had ever hoped to hear. It has long been the practice with a limited, and now decreasing, number of critics, to point out not only the defects (!) of this gigantic symphony, but also the (alleged) impossibility of any satisfactory execution of its admitted difficulties. Of the work itself it is unnecessary now to repeat opinions and admiration that have been frequently expressed in this paper. Completed in 1823, the year after the Missa Solennis, the Mass and the Symphony both belong to the period of the highest development of Beethoven's genius and powers; and the commencement of the Festival with the former, and its (virtual) termination with the latter, gave, as previously said, impressiveness and unity to the celebration. The vast grandeur and sublimity of both works remove them beyond the pale of criticism—they are to be received with reverent admiration, not analyzed in a spirit of technical realism. In his direction of the symphony, Dr. Hiller evinced a true appreciation of its high idealism, as also of the tempo of each movement. The first Allegro was taken somewhat slower than is the custom in England, greatly to the advantage of distinctness in performance, as particularly evidenced in the several rapid scale passages for violins. This movement produced a profound impression, especially at that wondrous point where the basses reiterate a chromatic phrase that has all the mysterious sublimity of the ocean groaning under the influence of a coming storm. The marvellous vigor of the Scherzo, with the contrasted heavenly calm of its Trio, found also admirable interpretation, as did the exquisite Adagio, with its prolonged stream of lovely melody, enhanced by the most delicate tracery and fanciful embroidery. All these portions of the symphony were splendidly given, but the triumph was in the finale, including the Ode of Schiller. Here, indeed,

The force of energy is found,
And the sense rises on the wings of sound.

Never have I heard the recitative passages for the basses given with such fusion of tone and clearness of bowing as on this occasion. It was more like the effect of one gigantic instrument than that usually obtained by the co-operation of many; and this was likewise the case in the unison passages for the same instruments, in which the leading theme of the finale is first announced. In both instances the rich quality of the German four-stringed double basses and the merits of the players were especially evidenced. The enormous difficulties of the vocal solo passages and the choral writing were surmounted with a success that only high training, long preparation, and earnest enthusiasm can attain. The four solo singers—Mesdames Otto-Alvsleben and Joachim, and Herren Vogl and Schulze—gave the trying incidental passages with an unflagging energy and hearty good will that deserve special recognition; while the choristers distinguished themselves even more than in the performance of the equally difficult Missa Solennis on the opening evening. The enormous strain on the extreme high notes of the soprano register; the frequent long-sustained A above the lines, and the recurrence of essential and unavoidable B's, were met with unflinching readiness and unflinching intonation, while in several difficult points of "attack" the decision and certainty of the choristers were most admirable. A special instance of this was afforded at the commencement of the "Allegro energico," in six-four time, where the altos lead at the words "Seid umschlungen," followed immediately by the sopranos, "Freude, schöner Götterfunken." Apart from the excellence of the whole performance, the symphony had the advantage of the ode having been sung to the original German words, any adaptation of which must, as in all similar cases, be attended with more or less injury to the rhythm of the music and the spirit of the whole. The conclusion of the symphony called forth one of the most enthusiastic demonstrations I have ever seen displayed by a concert audience. Calls for Dr. Hiller brought the excellent Capellmeister forward amid a shower of bouquets and a complimentary flourish of drums and trumpets from the orchestra. The worthy conductor spoke a few words in acknowledgement, and attributed much of the success of the performances to the earnest co-operation of the artist with whom he had been associated. Besides the symphony, Dr. Hiller conducted the overture to Coriolan, the elegiac song, and the scena; the other pieces having been directed by Herr Wasielewski.

PUBLIC RECEPTION OF VISITORS.

A very pleasant feature of the Festival arrangements has been the throwing open to visitors the reading room, club, and Assembly-rooms of Bonn. Here, after each evening's concert, many of the most notable people attending the Festival were to be found. On Tuesday night special ovations were there rendered to Dr. Hiller and Sir W. Sterndale Bennett. Healths were proposed and acknowledged, among other toasts given having been the "English Press," responded to in German by Mr. W. B. Kingston.

THE CHAMBER CONCERT.

The supplemental proceedings of Wednesday formed an agreeable close to the Festival celebration. A Matinée, which commenced in the Fest-Halle soon after eleven, comprised performances of the following selection from Beethoven's chamber music:—Quartet in F minor, Op. 95, Cantata, "Adelaide," Op. 46; Sonata for Piano and Violoncello, Op. 69; Lieder, "Wonne der Wehmuth," and "Kennst du das Land;" Quartet in C, No. 3, Op. 59.

The quartets were finely played—the first violin by Herr Joachim and the viola by Herr Straus, who have often been heard in similar association at the Monday Popular Concerts—the second violin by Herr von Königslöw, and the violoncello by Herr F. Grützmacher. Herr Vogl gave the cantata with true German sentiment and earnestness, and the Lieder were sung with great expression by Madame Joachim. In the sonata Dr. Hiller proved himself to be still one of the best interpreters of classical pianoforte music. In touch, tone and style, his performance was alike admirable, and it found worthy co-operation in Herr Grützmacher. Dr. Hiller also accompanied the vocal music. The pianoforte was the same as at the concerts of Monday and Tuesday—a Broadwood "grand," sent especially from London.

A RHINE EXCURSION.

The Matinée was followed by a steamboat excursion on the Rhine. The starting from the Rhein-Thor was preceded and accompanied by reiterated firing of cannon; the balconies and gardens of hotels and villas on each bank of the river were filled with spectators, waving flags, scarfs, and handkerchiefs; even the boys bathing took special "headers" in the contagion of the general elation. Many went down very deep—I trust they all came up again safely, but cannot speak to the fact, as at the moment of their disappearance an excellent banquet was served in the saloon of the steamer Humboldt, as we ploughed our watery way to Rolandseck. In the course of the dinner various set toasts were proposed by Herr Kaufmann (Burgomaster of Bonn), Professor Heimsoeth, Herr Roland, Dr. Breuning, and Herr Sebes; and speeches were made (also in German) by Dr. Hiller, Herr Gade, Herr Joachim, and Herr Wasielewski. The Burgomaster having suggested that Mr. C. L. Gruneisen should propose a toast in French, that gentleman made some very appropriate remarks, choosing his native English as the medium, because of the large and early interest taken in the music of Beethoven by England; the speaker claiming a double interest in the celebration from his German descent and British birth.

COMPLIMENT TO MME. SCHUMANN.

On arrival at Rolandseck, at the suggestion of Dr. Gehring, a telegram was despatched to Madame Clara Schumann, at Baden-Baden, conveying the hearty salutations of the committee and the guests to one who, with her late husband, Robert Schumann, has contributed so largely to the recognition of Beethoven's greatness.

POPULAR DEMONSTRATION.

At Rolandseck the company divided into groups, mostly occupied with conversation, tea, coffee, or other refreshments, in the gardens by the river-side. My return was made on board the Schiller; the home voyage having been accompanied by renewed signs of rejoicing on each side of the Rhine. Houses were profusely illuminated; different colored fires cast their various hues on the water in contrast to the pale light of the moon. Rockets and other fireworks shot up into the air, and the arrival in Bonn, and the progress to the Münster-Platz, showed the town in a state of general illumination, and a universal condition of rational rejoicing, that had none of the coarse and vulgar features usual on like occasions in some other lands that might be mentioned. The weather had cleared up, after a smart shower, just before the commencement of the matinee, and the day altogether was one of such high enjoyment and delightful surroundings as to stamp it with the brightest colors in the memory of a life. Referring to the procession to the Münster Platz, Professor Oakeley says:—"Those musicians and amateurs who had energy left to accompany this expedition, and were not deterred by the presence of rather a large crowd, were rewarded by hearing—as a faint reflex of the festival music—if not exactly a moonlight sonata, at all events a serenade au clair de la lune. The last strains heard at this nocturnal ramble were those of 'Die Wacht am Rhein,' which was performed to a motley audience under the shadow of the three-spired minster of S. Helena, and hard by the bronze statue of the great composer, who, with his pen in hand, seemed to look down with somewhat offended majesty on the disturbers at that time of night of his profound meditations: to whom, however, a more glorious monument ars perennis had been raised that week by the splendid performances in the hall in the Vier-ecksplatz which bears his name, with which performances his compatriots of the Rhineland, in the presence of his ardent disciples from all parts of musical Europe, had commemorated the centenary of his birth."

THE VISITORS TO THE FESTIVAL.

The Festival, continues the writer in the Daily News, has succeeded beyond expectation or hope. Many visitors have been attracted from various quarters. The London press has been well represented, and newspapers from many other parts of the world, including America, have sent representatives. Besides the eminent musicians already mentioned as having been invited (nearly all of whom were present), many well known in association with London music were to be seen at the concerts—among others, Mr. J. Barnby, Signor Bevilacqua; M. Gevaert, M. Vieuxtemps, M. Jules de Glines, and M. Kufferath (all four from Brussels), Mr. George Grove, of the Crystal Palace, Signor Li Calsi, Dr. Oakeley (professor of music at the University of Edinburgh), Mr. W. Ganz; Signor Randegger, the Hon. Colonel Lake, &c.

THE CONDUCTOR.

I have scarcely laid sufficient stress on the important influence exercised by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller on the efficiency of the performances. The calm power, earnest enthusiasm, and consummate skill of this great and accomplished musician were such as belong only to artists of the highest order. The grand old master has his due position in Germany, as was frequently proved by various ovations paid to him.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

A Biographical Sketch of Carl Reinecke.

CARL REINECKE was born in Altona, on the 23rd of June, 1824. His father, who was an excellent musician, determined to rear his son in the same profession; and so the little Carl received his first lessons in music, when only five years of age. His progress was astonishing. Composition, the violin and the piano were studied with great enthusiasm for one so young, and with such surprising success, that at the early age of seven years he composed a number of little pieces, which were played with delight in the home circle. At eleven years of age he gave a very successful concert in his native city, in which he made his debut as a piano player with marked promise. After a short time he went to Leipzig, where he pursued his studies with great assiduity, his only teacher being his father.

Musical circles, such as only Leipzig could at that time boast of, were frequented by Reinecke, who always proved a valuable acquisition. The privilege of hearing so much good music was very beneficial to the young student, who, with his great natural endowments, needed but a congenial musical influence to develop his talents. When this was supplied he seemed to grasp intuitively all the mysteries of his art, and with indomitable perseverance surmount the most trying difficulties. Thus, with great natural gifts and the "genius of work," was the student being rapidly merged into the accomplished artist. In the early part of the year 1843 Reinecke undertook a "Kunstreise" to Copenhagen, stopping on the way to give concerts in Kiel, Lübeck, and Eutin, being everywhere greeted with enthusiasm. He was recognized as a pianist of great ability. In many places he created a furor by his finished performances. In Kiel he had the good fortune to play in the same concert with the celebrated violinist, Ernst, who was greatly pleased with the promising young musician; he took a lively interest in the welfare of Reinecke, providing him with letters of introduction to the most influential people in Copenhagen, and was in many ways a very valuable friend to the young artist. Reinecke's autograph album has a very pleasing and happy tribute of Ernst's affection for him. In Copenhagen he met with brilliant success. The praises of the young virtuoso's attainments soon reached the court of that art-loving king, Christian VIII, before whom he was summoned to play. At court Reinecke was received with especial favor, his performances eliciting the highest commendations of his noble and refined audience. The king was so much pleased that he rewarded the artist with a pension.

Still greater triumphs were in store for Reinecke in Copenhagen, who returned there a few years later, and added new lustre to his rapidly growing fame. From Copenhagen he concertized through Sweden and Norway, finally ending at Stockholm. In October, 1843, he returned to Leipzig, and for three years devoted himself to his studies with the greatest diligence. Although nominally a student, he was frequently invited to play in the "Gewandhaus" concerts, acquitting himself with honor at every performance. It was a very pleasant incident that brought Joachim, the great violinist, and Reinecke, together. These young musicians, maturing so fast into ripe artists, had the pleasure of making their debut in the "Gewandhaus" concerts on the same evening. Leipzig was then in the zenith of its glory, and Reinecke had the inestimable privilege of mingling freely with Mendelssohn and Schumann, both of whom spoke of the talented young artist in the highest terms of praise, predicting great things for him. Mendelssohn and Schumann both recognized in Reinecke a rich and rapidly developing talent; they gave him their advice on many occasions, and he was received by them with the "right hand of fellowship" as a brother artist. If we examine impartially the life of Carl Reinecke; if we consider his great native talent, cultivated by the most laborious study, dedicated at the early age of eleven years to the advancement, and still grander development of music; if we review the productions of his fertile brain, and rich imagination, embracing the whole field of musical literature from Symphony to a simple German ballad, we can but think that his name deserves to be as it were a "household word" in musical circles. Nor is it alone his genius as a composer, his talent as a pianist, his power as a conductor, that makes him so beloved by those who have had the good fortune to be numbered among his pupils and friends. It is equally his gentle, kind, endearing manners, courteous and affable to all. The reputation of the artist is not greater than that of the gentleman. Look at him as he stands at the head of the Gewandhaus orchestra during a rehearsal; when a mistake is made, his courteous request: "If you please, gentlemen, we will try that passage once more"—then either by voice or at the piano he explains how it is to be rendered. At his left stands the fiery David, whose method of explanation is somewhat different; rushing at a poor fellow who has made a mistake, with violin in one hand, bow in the other, he shakes them over the head of the frightened musician, until his "wrath is appeased," then pointing out the right way. Such outbreaks are of frequent occurrence. Meanwhile the affability of Reinecke is not disturbed, but he waits patiently until all is quiet, then calmly commences once more. In this way peace and harmony are maintained.

Probably two men never lived who had the interest of their orchestra more at heart than Reinecke and David; yet how different the manifestation! Undoubtedly two-thirds of the success and perfection of this celebrated orchestra are due to David, who has been "Concertmeister" for upwards of forty years. The string department is wholly under his charge, and they play with wonderful precision and fire.

The interval from 1843 to 1846, spent by Reinecke in Leipzig, was of the most happy description; the various musical "Abendunterhaltungen" held at the Conservatory and at the houses of the many lovers of music, together with the Gewandhaus, Quartet and miscellaneous concerts, created a musical atmosphere which the rapidly developing young artist drank in with pleasure and with profit. At this period Reinecke entered into a contract with the celebrated Leipzig music firms—Breitkopf and Härtel, Kistner, and Hofmeister,—for the publishing of many of his compositions. These firms still hold a number of choice manuscripts of Reinecke's which have never been given to the public; probably at some future day these works will be added to the musical repertoire of the world, so much enriched already by his genius.

At the beginning of the year 1846, another concert tour was undertaken. Reinecke's companion was the violinist Wasielewski, who later in life wrote a fine Biography of Robert Schumann. The cities of Danzig, Königsberg and Riga were visited with great success. At Riga Reinecke received an invitation from the King of Denmark to visit Copenhagen, where he was appointed court-pianist. Chamber music was but little known in the Danish capital at that time, and many series of delightful chamber concerts were given with great success. These classical soirées were patronized by the élite in taste and culture of the city, who in every way manifested their keen appreciation of Reinecke as an artist of the first rank. Although a young man, his position in the Art circles of Copenhagen was one of great preeminence. Two years were spent with honor and profit in this interesting old city.

At the beginning of the Schleswig-Holstein trouble in 1848, Reinecke went again to Leipzig, where he received a hearty welcome from his old friends and admirers. Leipzig seemed more like home to him than any other city; a greater portion of his life has thus far been spent there—some of the happiest periods, and some of the saddest, in his life. He was repeatedly invited to play in the Gewandhaus, also in all of the subscription concerts of the neighboring cities.

In 1849, Reinecke selected Bremen for his residence. Here, as at Copenhagen, he found a great field for his talents: chamber music being entirely unknown. Many fine concerts were given, and attended with great success. At first they were experiments; but with the rich conceptions, and superb execution of Reinecke, they triumphed brilliantly. In one of these concerts Franz Liszt assisted, and in another Jenny Lind. Both of these world-renowned artists took a great interest in Reinecke, who possesses several very pleasant souvenirs of their esteem and friendship. For two years he led a busy life in Bremen. Aside from his labors in that city, many excursions were made to the neighboring cities, concerts given and directed. His whole time was devoted to the art he loved; and with untiring energy he worked for its advancement. Still greater honors were in store for him. Experience was gradually ripening him into a thorough and refined musician. His fame was extending; already it had spread throughout all Germany. In every concert where he played, he was received with enthusiasm; while his compositions were acknowledged as works of rare beauty and originality. Reinecke imitates no model, but draws from his own rich resources. No spirit of the "vagrant poetic" inspires him either in his compositions or performances; the beautiful ideas are clearly and exquisitely developed in the one, while in the other, a finished technique and most beautiful touch combine to give his conceptions at the piano a rare elegance and charm. Not a "moody" pianist,—who can at one time electrify his audience, and at another time make them shudder at his indifferent performance—he comes before his audience and does his best; consequently he has never taken a backward step. At different periods he has been assailed by frosty criticisms; but these have always melted into enthusiastic praises.

At the commencement of 1851, Reinecke went to Paris, where he appeared as a piano player with immense success. Berlioz's concerts were at that time "all the rage," and Reinecke played in them often. The Parisians were captivated by his simple, unaffected style; he could touch their hearts with a simple Mozart melody, and affect them more than the most accomplished technician could, with his "tricks and fancies." It has been accorded by the most eminent critics, that there is no living pianist who can render Mozart's music in a more perfect manner than Reinecke. To hear him play the simple "Larghetto" from the D-major Concerto, by Mozart, is a pleasure never to be forgotten; it leaves a deep and lasting impression on the mind; technique is all lost in expression.

Reinecke, unlike most of the virtuosi of the present day, can play something besides his own compositions; in fact, he confines himself chiefly to the works of the old masters, in whom he delights. In Paris his greatest successes were achieved in his delicious rendering of Mozart and the other great masters. A few compositions were published by several of the most celebrated music firms in Paris, and several months were very happily spent, by the then quite famous young artist, in the society of the great art circles of the metropolis.

He retraced his steps to the "Vaterland," at the request of Ferdinand Hiller, who offered him a position as teacher in the "Rheinische Musikschule," where he worked until the year 1854. In 1852 Reinecke was married to a lady from Holstein, with whom he lived very happily seven years. From Cologne, where the music school was, Reinecke made many "Kunstausflüge" along the Rhine border. Although a teacher in a music school where his duties were many, he found time to visit Düsseldorf,—where he had a very pleasant interview with Robert Schumann,—Bonn, Crefeld, Barmen, Frankfort and Bremen, in each city giving one or more concerts with well-paying success. In Cologne Reinecke won a prize offered for composition, with his well known song: "Sie war die Schönste von Allen." Also later still another prize for the much sung song for "Männerchor": "Nun brechen aller Enden." Many choice compositions date from his sojourn in Cologne, also one of the brightest and pleasantest eras of his life. From here he was married, and in the society of that eminent artist, Ferdinand Hiller, time wore pleasantly away. During the year 1854, Reinecke was called to Barmen, to assume the position of Music-director. Here he composed many of his best works. In Barmen there was a small, but very select musical circle, and the talent of Reinecke received new impetus with each fresh composition. The overture to "Dame Kobold" was composed and brought out here, and was greeted with great enthusiasm by the public and his many friends. This favorite work has since had hundreds of performances from St. Petersburg to New York, and is a standard work in the repertoire of the Gewandhaus concerts. The operetta, "Der vierjährige Posten," also produced in Barmen, for the first time, was received with great favor; it has been performed throughout Germany with the most genuine success. At this period appeared Variations on a theme of Bach's, Op. 53, of which many thousand copies have been sold already and the demand is still large; the variations being worked up with great skill and ingenuity. The "Four-hand piano pieces," Op. 54, a work almost invaluable to the repertoire of the teacher, also date from this period, together with many other works. Many concerts were given in Barmen, also in many other cities, including Leipzig, Bremen, Bonn and Düsseldorf. He seemed almost indefatigable, so constant were his labors. In every city he was recognized as a man of decided genius, with but few equals. His fame at this period assumed a more definite shape; his compositions proved that he was not exclusively devoted to so one-sided an art as that of the pianist, but that his talent grasped a larger and higher field of action. While still a resident of Barmen, a journey to Italy was taken. This excursion was more in the light of a tourist than an artist. Naples, and all of the beautiful cities of sunny Italy, were visited with great enjoyment. While in Rome, Reinecke played often before a large circle of artists and connoisseurs. As a reminiscence of his sojourn in Italy, he composed "Bilder aus Süden," four charming morceaux, Op. 86.

In the year 1859, Reinecke was called to Breslau, where he succeeded Mosewius. In the fall of that year he had the misfortune to lose his wife; this event seemed to draw a cloud over his happiness in Breslau, and in the year 1860 he went to Leipzig, where he was offered the position of "Capellmeister" of the Gewandhaus concerts, and teacher of composition and "des höhern Clavierspiels" in the Conservatory. He accepted, and now for nearly twelve years he has held that high and honorable place. The successor of such men as Mendelssohn, Hiller, Gade and Riets, he has acceptably and gracefully filled a position which few men can. The name and fame of the Gewandhaus concerts have "gone out through all lands," and the greatest musicians of the age have been at its head as Capellmeister; is not the record of Carl Reinecke a bright one among them? He and his many friends can justly point with pride to the past twelve years of his life; we will not limit it to twelve years, as his whole life has been one noble and successful effort in behalf of music. It is since his appointment to the position of Capellmeister of the Gewandhaus, that his life has been more fruitful than ever for the musical world, and his reward more flattering and gratifying to himself and friends. In the Conservatory he now fills the place vacated by the death of that illustrious teacher, Moscheles, who without doubt accomplished a great work long before he died; but whose eccentricities ought to have placed him on the "retired list" long before. We can but think, that with such an accomplished musician and gentleman at the head of the Leipzig Conservatory, it will regain all of its old glory.

During the past few years Reinecke has added greatly to the musical literature of the world; his opus number reaching 120,—embracing all forms: Symphony, Overture, Opera, Concerto, solos and Ballads, in each branch equally successful. His style is solid, substantial, classical; rich in melody and masterly treatment of harmonies. We think his works are destined to live, for they bear the stamp of a master, catering only to the pure and the true in Art. In one year from his acceptance of the directorship of the Gewandhaus, he married a celebrated concert singer,—Carlotta Scharnke—a lady of rare attainments. This wife also lived but seven years—seven bright and happy years for Reinecke. The news of her illness reached him while on a concert tour; hurrying home with all speed, he reached her bedside just as she breathed her last. To this day there lies on his desk a small vignette of his wife, and every day it is decorated with a fresh green leaf, while in his "Wohnzimmer" a larger picture is decked with a wreath of green leaves. During these last few years very many "Kunstreisen" have been taken, both to give and direct concerts, and his fame extends "over the length and breadth of the land." The cities of Berlin, Dresden, Vienna, Stuttgart, Cologne, Hamburg and many others have each been visited many times with the greatest success. For three years past, every spring regularly, he has visited England, where he has been received with the highest honors they accord to any artist, his performances creating a furore at every concert, and his compositions being received with great favor by both press and public. Such men as Sir Wm. St. Bennett, Sir Julius Benedict, Charles Hallé, and others, have vied with each other in their efforts to honor and entertain the celebrated Leipzig Capellmeister. His orchestral works, given under his own direction, created a profound impression wherever performed. Now his works are studied and performed in England, with as much delight as they are in his own "Vaterland." Among his greatest works may be mentioned the Oratorio of "Belshazzar;" the grand five-act Opera "King Manfred;" the operetta, "Der vierjährige Posten," "Das Liederspiel," Kathleen and Charlie," a symphony, two piano concertos, complete music to Schiller's "Tell," a violoncello concerto, two masses, overtures to "Dame Kobold," "Aladdin," and "Friedensfeier;" a Piano quintet; a piano quartet, piano trio, Sonatas and numerous other works. The opera of "King Manfred" has had great success. The first nights of its performance in Leipzig, the theatre was crowded full, and Reinecke received each night a regular ovation. The overture, ballet music, and the "Vorspiel" to the last act are gems of rare beauty and finish. The text of the opera is extremely hard to set to music; still it abounds in the choicest melodies, while the orchestration is simply masterly throughout. This great work has been given with fine success at Wiesbaden, while the overture, ballet music, and prelude to the last act have been performed in all the large cities of Europe and America. His "celebration of Peace," festival overture, dedicated to the newly made emperor William I, created a profound sensation in all the musical circles of Germany. The emperor honored the composer with the "Order of the crown." Aside from his original productions, he has arranged, reviewed and revised very many works. All of Beethoven's symphonies and the Septet, he has arranged for two and four hands. The three symphonies, the piano quartet and the overture to "Manfred" by Schumann he has arranged for piano, also many works of Schubert, including the C-Major symphony. Many of Schumann's songs he has arranged as very effective piano solos. The entire Breitkopf and Härtel edition of Beethoven's works have been revised by Reinecke, and to three of the concertos beautiful and effective cadenzas added. A charming edition of Mozart's Concertos has been edited by Reinecke, and several brilliant cadenzas written for them; also one for the Weber concerto in E flat. All of Bach's works for piano, published by Breitkopf and Härtel, have been revised and fingered by Reinecke.

The clearest and most beautiful edition published, of the well known "Le Clavecin bien tempéré" is edited by Reinecke. The piano compositions of Handel are soon to follow. Thus it will be seen that the work performed by Reinecke, aside from his duties as teacher in the Conservatory, Capellmeister, and concert soloist, is simply prodigious. Every day a certain time is set apart for composition, and we are having constant evidence that his resources are far from decreasing. The work of composing and arranging goes steadily on, and it can be truly said that few musicians of the age have exerted such a great and good influence on music as Carl Reinecke. His list of arrangements is very long, embracing nearly all of the orchestral works of the masters, placing them within the reach of all piano-players.

In Leipzig Reinecke is beloved by a large and musically-inclined community; still the "river of life" does not run altogether smoothly with him. Like all other great artists he has to stand up against the cabals and jealousies of a few pigmies, who think they can stem the tide of popularity, by setting their faces against the production of new works, or drown the applause by their feeble attempts at criticism. But neither cabals nor jealousies can tarnish the brilliant record that Carl Reinecke has worked out for himself. The honors conferred on him are numerous: from the Emperor William of Germany, he has received the "Order of the Crown"; from the Duke of Sachsen-Meiningen, the "Hause-order"; from the Prince of Schwarzburg, "Cross of Honor"; from the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and the Duke of Sachsen-Coburg-Gotha each the "Hause-order" and a medal for Art and Science. The Emperor of Austria, the King of Württemberg, the Empress Augusta of Germany and the King of Hannover have each presented him with a gold medal for eminence in Art and Science. In the following societies Reinecke is honorary member: "des holländischen Gesellschaft zur Beförderung der Zonkunst," "Des Vereins zur Beförderung der Musik in Böhmen," "des Mozarteum in Salzburg." Also the singing societies of Cologne,—the "Arion" of Bielefeld, "Arion" and "Paulus" of Leipzig, "Sängerbund" of Breslau, the "Sänger-Verein" of Königsberg and the "Liedertafel" of Basel. Robert Schumann, Ferdinand Hiller, E. F. Richter, Franz Lachner, Max Bruck, Desprosse, Köhler and many other of the most eminent musicians of Europe have dedicated some of their most important works to Reinecke, who may well be proud and happy to receive the homage of royalty, the admiration of the public and the love and esteem of his brother artists—Words are inadequate to convey a fitting tribute to the character of this estimable gentleman. Should you look into his study early in the day, you would find him at his desk, busy with some new composition, while on each knee would be sitting one of his "little ones," with their arms locked around their father's neck. Should you visit him in the evening, you would find him engaged playing with his children, seven happy children, who are a source of great comfort and joy to their loving father. Over his household presides gracefully his sister-in-law. At his hospitable house can be met the greatest artists of the day, who, passing through Leipzig, call to pay their respects to Reinecke. His noble and aspiring nature makes him admired and honored, while an irresistible charm and grace pervades his manners and "draws all men unto him." Everybody that meets him admires him as much for his refinement and culture, as for his genius as a musician. His works bear the impress of his cultured mind; full of elegance and purity, they stand as a monumental tribute to his genius and as an index to his noble character.

EDWIN J. BUTLER.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 23, 1871.

Bands, Martial and Civic.

Brass bands have their uses and their excellencies. We have frequently had occasion to remark the beautiful harmony and richness and precision of some one of them. But one grows weary of their incessant loud appeal; one hears so much of it, that the state of mind induced is anything but musical; it becomes a part of the general din and rumble which one hears and heeds not, nerves permitting. Brass bands are splendid in the right time and quantity. But they should be kept to characteristic uses. No doubt they are good for military street parades; they reach the ears of rank and file more readily in noisy streets. Their sound is military. Its suggestion is of stir and action, of war and triumph, of physical energy, of material mass in motion; of soldiers on the march, or of political electioneering tramps and triumphs. It has a natural affinity with the hoarse shouts of party; and not indiscriminately there; it is most in character with the more border-ruffian, barbaric, filibustering, might-makes-right kind of politics, than with that which goes for peace, for freedom, and for civilization. It is a kind of sound too apt to terrify or stun the gentler instincts. We had rather leave it, for the most part, to the enemy, and cultivate a gentler music.

Brass bands, then, are essentially military bands. They mean war, brute force, threats, defiance. Not that they may not be employed to better ends sometimes. But we are speaking of this universal overdoing of the fashion. It is the military employment which creates and supports all our bands. When music for non-military purposes is wanted, as for a civic procession, a serenade, a concert on the Common, the same bands are called upon. All the instruments are brass, all made for war; or if subdued to smoothness by the use of valves, à la Sax, it is with an awkward grace, a quality of tone resulting which is ambiguous, emasculated, at once loud and characterless. Yet the temptation is quite natural to a skilful player to try other music than plain marches, to imitate the orchestra, the opera singers, and make mere brass astonish you by showing itself so marvelously at home outside of its own element. And we have often had to compliment the brass bands on the degree of expression with which they have contrived to render music thus appropriated. Still it ceases not to be true that, compared with orchestras, or bands not altogether brass, such renderings are and must be inexpressive.

Why can we not then, (to repeat what we have often urged,) why can we not have organized a civic or non-military band, expressly and primarily adapted to these gentler purposes, of music for the people in the summer evenings, and of inspiring accompaniment to civic festivals, processions, anniversaries, where the end is to humanize, refine and elevate? Give us at least one large band, composed as bands were wont to be before this filibustering age of brass, with plenty of reeds, clarionets, bassoons, &c., with the mellow and all blending French horns; not without necessary brass—trumpets that are trumpets, and not sophisticated into vain resemblance of less fiery natures—with the old forest bugle, so long banished, &c., &c.;—a band numerous enough to tell as widely as our bands of brass. Give us this, O City Fathers, if you would realize the full intention of the good resolution which has prompted public music on the Common. Is it not practicable? Would it cost too much? Consider the value of innocent amusements for the people, and that all such outlay is for constructive and not destructive ends. Consider particularly the refining, harmonizing, law-and-order-inspiring influences of music. Then consider how many thousands of dollars worth of patriotic gunpowder, such as you blaze away in senseless fireworks in a single hour, some Fourth of July night, would give good music every pleasant evening through the summer to the crowds that would seek fresh air and comfort on our Common.

Modesty in Musicians.

Of "native compositions" and "composers," in one sense, we have no lack. The country swarms with enterprising fellows who can put together notes and make up little pieces, that will sell. Inquire at the mills where all this grist is ground, inquire of the publishers who snow "sheet music" over all the land, as fast as it melts away, and they will tell you that the native crop is quite a vast affair, and pays the better as it is the more ephemeral. But these people would not be considered as composers in any other country; and why should they here? To have made or arranged psalm-tunes; to have drummed out a pretty waltz or polka in one's own way, (which is only a feeble following of Strauss's or Labitzky's) while yet under the tingling influence of some Jullien or Thomas orchestra; to have tortured airs from Norma into a flashy set of finger variations for the piano, according to some hacknied Thalberg or De Meyer formula; least of all, to have clothed some common-place feeling in a sentimental, namby-pamby little song, (which may have no fault but that it is like a thousand others, and that there was no sort of need for its existence)—such songs, for instance, as sentimental young men sing about their old arm chairs, or dedicate to their mothers, with a portrait of the author on the title page, perusing, with sad or sparkling face, a letter from the dear old lady:—these things, we apprehend, and far better things than these, do not in any artistic sense, entitle a person to the name of composer.

That amid all this superficial productivity there has been much that is good and useful, educationally, in the way of furnishing "milk for babes" in music, we have no disposition to deny. Moreover we can well imagine, and indeed we know, that among so many young Americans as have devoted themselves of late years to music, there is now and then produced a clever song, or four-part glee, or anthem, or something like a notturno or "Song without Words" for the piano. Mendelssohn wrote little pieces too; but whether any of their little pieces are likely to survive and become classical like his,—the treasured lyrics of the land and of the age,—is certainly a question that can hardly yet be settled in the affirmative. Creditable efforts, too, in higher forms and more elaborate, might be named with praise.

But "taking them for all in all," has there been aught among them yet to "give the world assurance of a Man" in music? Can we point to an instance of unquestionable musical genius of the creative kind? to any name that bids fair to be classed with the great names of the composers? Who can point us to one American composition, great or small, with much assurance that it is destined to become classical and to be treasured in the world's musical repertory? Granting that creditable works have been produced, sometimes in difficult and lofty forms, yet which of them is or is likely to be held of much account, say in the musical countries of Europe, supposing the work to stand simply on its own merits and not claim hospitable regard as the firstling of a beginner from a new country on the map of music? Which of them can the world not perfectly well afford to do without, and feel that, even on the score of novelty, its programmes do not need it? Of course the question is not put to Yankee Doodle patriotism;—that will answer glibly enough and place you a Jubal Smith, a Handel Corydon Siebhins or some other heaven-sealing native Titan alongside of every Mozart and Beethoven that the old world boasts. Indeed the very man has had us by the button, who (live Yankee that he was) has "mastered all of Handel's methods," and with his own hand has scored original oratorios as many and as grand as Handel's!

We are beginning to have our music makers and our music interpreters, who woo Music as an Art; with what depth of passion, or what genuine fire of genius, time alone can fully show. It is only when individuals of either class assume the attitude of musical Shakespeares, or of musical Siddonses and Garricks, that we find it so hard to suppress the smile of incredulity, even if a certain sort of sympathetic sense of what is due to our dear country's modesty does not cry out "For shame!"

There are two ways of regarding the achievements of our countrymen in the field musical. One is the boastful, shallow patriotic, "manifest destiny," all-the-world annexing, Yankee Doodle way, which keeps proclaiming our's the greatest country in the world; believes that Americans can do everything that any other people have done, only a great deal better; that the whole world—of Art, as of all other spheres—is our inheritance, and that we are the most capable of entering and occupying it, as we are the most capable of governing ourselves, brow-beating our neighbors, bullying the world, &c. This boastful, bloated, vulgar parody of the American idea is not confined to politics; its contagion operates even in the peaceful sphere of Art and Music. It mistakes enterprise for genius; the large scale on which things are attempted, for sublimity; familiarity with means, tools, mechanisms and forms, for Art; new combinations, for original ideas; and, in a word, bold "go-ahead itativeness" for inspiration armed with divine right to conquer and to charm the world.

The other way is more modest and reasonable. It leaves the patriotic rant to filibustering demagogues, and looks at music musically and not as one more peacock's feather in the tail of strutting patriotism. It is not ashamed to see ourselves just where we are in music, a nation of beginners, who have had heretofore but little time for Art, and who are not sprung from a particularly musical race. And it allows us to take just pride and pleasure in considering how much these few last years have done to develop in our people an appreciation of the musical Art and artists of the old world, as well as to tempt forth native efforts, in many cases quite successful, to acquire the art of writing and interpreting (with voice or fingers) musical works in many of the higher forms.

Miss ANNA MENZIE writes us that she has finally decided to return to America in the latter part of November, and will play in a Harvard Symphony Concert in December.

☞ The absence of all notice of the Concerts of this week is due to a few days' illness of the Editor.

A Few Notes From Bonn.

Bonn, August 25, 1871.

The excitement and harmony evoked by the Beethoven Centennial is over, and the artistic tribute to the memory of the sublime genius of Germany's greatest modern composer, is but a recollection of the past. With the agreeable sensations that it called forth have also passed away the unpleasant ones—the recollection of the intense heat which made Bonn so uncomfortable; of the extortions of landlords and lodging-house keepers who sent everybody home penniless, heaping execrations on the very name of the inhospitable town; of the petty jealousies that became apparent to any one who conversed with the many musicians present. All these are over: and may we all live to write and read about the next centennial anniversary! If it prove, after all, as good as this one, it will be worth attending even if we are a hundred, and I won't say how many odd, years old.

There were one or two musical characters of Boston at the Bonn festival, and, assuming that they have forwarded to Dwight's Journal critical notices of the performances, it is only worth my while to jot down a few random notes. The programmes—four in number, performed on as many separate days—included probably the best of Beethoven's works and no better school could have been offered to the young—no greater pleasure to the experienced musician—than to have enjoyed the rare treat presented in the performance of the works selected. The Mass in D is a composition which one very seldom has an opportunity of hearing; and as this was the first time that I had enjoyed this privilege it is impossible for me to make comparisons. The English musicians claimed that the Mass was comparatively familiar with the music-lovers of London, but the Germans freely confessed that it had not often been heard by them. The performance seemed to me to be superlatively fine. The chorus was certainly effective, though not particularly well balanced, for it needed a heavier substratum of basses, and in the altos I missed the clear, cutting quality in which this voice in America so generally excels; but the tenors were magnificent and the sopranos absolutely beyond all praise. Everybody in the chorus seemed to sing. There was very little of that leaning on your next neighbor, which is so common in American choruses, and the result was that a comparatively small body of singers made a greater effect than would have been supposed possible from their numbers. It was positively glorious to observe how promptly and vigorously the sopranos took up their parts, and how readily all the voices marched into the fugue movements without fear or hesitation.

The soloists were also admirable. Madame Alvensleben, the soprano, who came from Dresden, where she is the leading prima donna, has a full, high voice trained in a good school. Madame Joachim, the contralto, and the wife of the violinist, sing like an artist, though why she should attempt the "Ah! perfido" transposed to a lower key, it is difficult to say. She also sang—at the matinée—"Kennst du das Land" and another song, while her part in the Mass was admirably rendered throughout. Herr Vogl, the tenor, is a modest singer, but of decided ability and skill, and with a voice not brilliant but always agreeable. Herr Schultze the basso from Hamburg, belongs to the accepted type of German basses, being tall, slim, bearded, and spectacled, and having some very deep notes, which he cherishes with fondest care.

The orchestra was led by Ferdinand Hiller, supplemented at times by Wasielewski, a local conductor and the musical professor of Bonn. Hiller is a short, portly gentleman, with hair and whiskers of whitish grey. His mode of conducting is rather peculiar, but not affected, his earnestness proving that his whole soul is in what he does. He has the music stand placed to the left and is so familiar with the score that often he does not look at it for several pages; and in such cases he turns to the orchestra and beats the time with both of his hands and arms. The members of the orchestra appear to have unbounded confidence in him, and his popularity with German audiences is also very great. I should hardly call him a man of genius, but of his masterly ability as a composer as well as a conductor there can be no doubt.

The audience was in some respects quite a study. The ladies all attended in full dress, though this rule was not generally observed by the gentlemen. During the music the strictest attention was paid to every note, and after each piece there was a generous burst of friendly applause, which in the case of Joachim's violin solo amounted to absolute enthusiasm. During the half hour's intermission, the concert hall presented a most social appearance, for everybody seemed to know everybody else, and visits were exchanged, while the conductors themselves—those august monarchs of the scene—deigned to come down into the body of the house, and mingle with ordinary mortals. It was like the descent of a pair of Joves. Many persons went into the garden adjoining the hall, and partook of refreshments; but all under any circumstances were ready for the next piece of music, and a few taps from the baton of the conductor were effectual in securing speedy silence.

During the festival I saw quite a number of men who are of world-wide reputation in musical circles. Sternedale Bennett, the English composer, with a business-like aspect; Niels Gade, of Copenhagen, with a picturesque leonine head which would make an excellent bust; Carl Reinecke of Leipzig with rather a Hibernian than a Teutonic cast of features; and Viextemps with his cheerful, pleasant cordiality of demeanor, were all there. Raff, whose endless symphony produced at New York a few seasons ago the most somniferous effect; Brahms, a composer by no means unknown in America; Max Bruch, who is well spoken of here; Randegger, the successful song writer, and Barnly, the versatile English composer, were also among the audience at this Beethoven Festival. Whatever differences of opinion they may have had on other points, they agreed in a favorable verdict as to the rendering of the Mass.

The German press was fairly represented at the Festival; and of the English critics, Davison of the Times, Gruneisen of the Athenaeum, Lincoln of the News and Barrett of the Telegraph were present. The New York Evening Post had a representative.

It does not appear that any of the Austrian or South German musicians were at the Festival, while Wagner, Liszt, Bulow, Rubinstein, Clara Schumann, who are all great musicians, and Germans too, were conspicuous by their absence. It is said that Liszt was invited but sent no reply to the invitation. There is a feeling among amateurs here that he ought to have been asked to conduct at least one day's performance, and thus the whole affair would have been less local and would have certainly attracted larger crowds; though it is certain that no more could have gained access to the hall, which was filled to repletion at every performance.

Altogether the Beethoven Festival, though not enlisting the sympathies of the Germans to the extent that was expected, and not being in any proper sense a national demonstration, was a notable and enjoyable musical triumph, and it may be doubted whether a more satisfactory rendering of the principal selections has ever been given before or will ever be given again. Those therefore who were present, may well congratulate themselves on the fact. TROVATOR.

THE VIENNA LADY ORCHESTRA, imported by Mr. Pullman, gave concerts every evening last week in New York. Of the opening one Mr. Bowman writes in the Sun:

We hardly know how to adjust the critical lens to so level a constellation of bright stars as this. It seems ungracious to judge so fair a body of pretty women by the exacting rules that would be applied to an orchestra of men. As they grouped themselves on the stage in their snowy white dresses, each with a white flower in her hair, they formed as graceful and sweet a picture as the eye could wish to rest upon. But they did not come to be judged by their picturesque effects, but by their artistic attainments; and concerning these the fairest way both to them and to the public is to state the literal facts. The orchestra turns out to be only half an orchestra. It lacks some of the most important elements. There are neither horns, trumpets, trombones, clarionets, oboes, nor bassoons, and yet all of these are indispensable instruments. It was hardly to be expected that women could master the brass instruments, but the reeds need not have presented insuperable difficulties.

Then the orchestra had no foundation. There was but one double bass, and both that and the violoncellos were of reduced size, and consequently lacked power. The declivity was very inadequately supplied by a piano and cabinet organ, both of which instruments are out of place in an orchestra.

It was not in the nature of things that a band so constituted should play satisfactorily, even if the instruments were skillfully handled, which in this instance was not the case. Among the twenty young ladies there certainly were few if any who would be thought competent to fill a place in any orchestra having a high standard. Their tone was thin, they stumbled at the hard passages, their time was not good, and in fact, they played like scholars and not at all like artists. Between the first and third parts of the programme the young ladies changed their costumes, a bit of harlequinade for which there was not the least occasion, especially as they renounced very pretty white dresses for their very ugly green and purple ones.

There is this to be said for the orchestral performers—they played quite as well as any one could reasonably have expected. The violin and violoncello are instruments of the highest difficulty, requiring longer years of constant discipline from those who would master them, and nothing short of a miracle could produce an orchestra of girls under twenty who could play these instruments well.

Besides the orchestral performers there were two soloists. Mr. Müller and Miss Anna Eiser. The latter was announced as a soprano of twelve years of age. Her voice was a contralto, and she seemed some years older. Certainly, if she is but twelve, she is the most wonderful child we have ever had in our concert rooms. Her style is as mature and her voice as rich and mellow as those of a woman. She sings with admirable precision and execution, and her phrasing was something wonderful. We are not at all partial to infant musical phenomena, but this young lady is entitled to the highest praise upon her own merits, judged not as a child, but as an artist. The effect of youth, however, hardly needs to be sustained by the affectation of running off the stage. That piece of by-play suggests training rather than artlessness. Mr. Müller has a noble baritone voice, larger and fuller than one often hears at Steinway's, or indeed at any other hall. He does not use it however, to the best advantage by reason of conspicuous faults of method.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Ah! Do I love Thee. 4. F to G. A. Blumenstengel 30
Full of fire and passion. First-rate, if properly sung.
Dost thou love me, Sister Ruth? 2. Eb to G. J. Perry 30
Well-known comic duet. Very amusing.
The Heart's Offering. 3. F to f. W. A. Smith 30
A fine sacred song with Chorus ad libitum.
Lillie Bray. Song and Chorus. 2. F to f. W. A. Smith 30
Ruby Spray. Song and Chorus. 3. Ab to e. M. Loesch 30
Two ballads in popular style, both pretty, and either may have a "good run."
Ten Vocal Duets. Franz Abt 30
No. 4. The Day is slowly ending. (Der Tag geht nun zu ende.) 3. D to f.
No. 5. The Free Open Air. (Hinaus ins Freie.) 3. F to G.
No. 6. May Song. (Mailed.) 3. A to G.

It would be difficult to find a better collection of easy duets than the above "Ten Vocal Duets." The music is condensed so that the expense is much diminished, and one may easily afford to place the whole upon the piano, thus affording charming material for "dug."

Instrumental.

- The Emerald Pool. Nocturne. 2. F. J. M. Turner 30
Who can make a Nocturne if not Mr. Turner?
At any rate this is unusually easy, and good for beginners.
L'Inresistable. Galop Bravura. 5. Ab. F. E. Bach 75
Played with spirit is sure to bring applause.
Charivari Quadrille. 3. Ch. Fredhe 40
A mixture of opera and other airs, well combined.
An entertaining piece.
Golden Echoes. Easy Pieces. F. Mack 30
No. 12. Maggie's Secret. Waltz. 2. F.
No. 13. Away, away. Masaniello. 2. G.
No. 14. The Starry Night. 3. Eb.
No. 15. Joy, joy! Freedom to day! 3. Eb.
No. 16. Robin Adair. Var. and Waltz. 2. C.
No. 17. Beautiful Blue Danube Waltz. 2. D.
No. 18. Moet and Chandon Waltz. 2. C.
No. 19. Whippoorwill Waltz. 2. Eb.
Foamy Wave Waltz. 2. C. J. M. Turner 30
Good instructive piece, with a "glimpse," and one or two runs in octaves.
Salvia. Valse Brilliant. (Euvres Celebres.) Leybach 60
4. C.
Very neat and brilliant. Easier than most of Leybach's pieces recently noticed.
Magic Bells. (Zauberlöckchen.) 4. G. A. Jungman 50

Many composers have of late rung the changes of the chimera, but this is a new set of bells, and rung as never before. In Jungman's characteristic graceful style.

Books.

- EMERSON'S SINGING SCHOOL. L. O. Emerson 75
$7.50 per dozen.

This excellent and practical work may well give a new impetus to singing-school teaching in this country. We have, by no means, reached an epoch in which we can dispense with such schools and here is an abundance of useful material, ready for the hands of any teacher.

ASSERVATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 796.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 7, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 14.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Tears.

There's a tear in the eye, all unbidden it comes
In response to quick sympathy's call;
O check not the gathering drop at its source,
Let it flow for the sorrows of all.

There's a tear in the voice that words cannot express,
Which moves feelings beyond our control,
And the sweetest of singers without it, alas!
Cannot touch the deep springs of the soul.

There's a tear in the heart, which a sorrow reveals
That is born with us never to die;
'Tis a grief which will haunt us in happiest hours:
With unsatisfied longings we sigh.

Yet although we can find no pure joy upon earth,
And all pleasures are kindred to pain,
We know that deep longings bring deepest delights,
We aspire, though we may not attain.

Carl Loewe's Story of his Early Life*

(Continued from page 98.)

Halle belonged about that time to the so-called Kingdom of Westphalia, and stood, like Cassel, under French dominion. King Jerome, Napoleon's brother, played the part of sovereign prince. Now, much as all good Saxons sighed under his foreign rule, to me it proved a blessing. In the year 1810 the king came to Halle, and lodged with the Prefect of the Saale department, Herr von Gossler, in the Mückel house, on the great Berliner Platz.

On this occasion also was our choir brought into requisition. The king made known his satisfaction to me through Herr von Gossler. We had frequent occasion during this time, at the supper table of Chancellor Niemeyer, to sing before the Prefect. This truly musical man, therefore, became more nearly acquainted with me and with my accomplishments. He was pleased particularly with my person, praised my intonation, my expression in the delivery of solo pieces, and allowed me frequently to visit him. Türk put him up to the idea of granting me, out of the means of the State, the for that time extraordinary sum of three hundred thalers per year for the completion of my musical education. This seemed to me a finger point from heaven. I was now fifteen years old and believed it my duty to hold fast to my good fortune; particularly when I learned that the Prefect, not content with the yearly subsidy of three hundred thalers, had resolved to send me afterwards for some time to Italy, so that he might then prepare a surprise for the king, and in a certain manner make him a present of me as a complete, developed artist. All this achieved, I was then to become Kapellmeister in Cassel.

With such prospects I could finally give in to Türk's wish, and leave the gymnasium. Even my father, in the face of such prospects, had to renounce his darling wish to see me in the pulpit.

I now received a chamber to myself and thus became, to a certain degree, separated from the choir while I remained in Türk's house. In my room I found a piano, a violin, and the necessary books for theoretic study.

On the same floor with me there lived an original couple, at an extraordinarily cheap rent, a Herr and Frau von Pastineller. Herr von P. had served as lieutenant in the Prussian army in the year 1806; but the whistling of the cannon balls had affected him so unpleasantly that he preferred to betake himself in haste from Jena to Halle. His wife here shared with the quondam warrior the most modest of all human lots.

On the days on which I had no invitation out, I deemed it best to provide for my bodily well-being, at my stove, with my own hands. I found in Frau von Pastineller an example worthy of imitation. After greeting each other in the morning, in our common entry, I used to ask: "And what do you cook for dinner to-day, my gnädige Frau?" Whereat she replied: "Potatoes, dear Monsieur Löwe."—Now had the gracious lady occasionally thought a change necessary in her bill of fare, I too perhaps should have been led into lighter ideas in this direction. But I believed that I could not do better than by strictly following the experienced lady in this point.

So the singular pair lived on in quiet, and apparently without any further aspirations. He went out to walk, and when she was not cooking potatoes, she accompanied him. But deep in his heroic breast von Pastineller must have cherished greater projects and ideas; for one day, through the mediation of a relation, he was suddenly promoted to the captainship of the Westphalian Invalid company. But the Herr Captain and his lady wife in nothing changed their way of living; probably they both were penetrated with too lively a feeling of the fickleness of their fate, and feared a sudden change.

Thus emulating my Frau Nachbarin in making the care of my bodily nourishment very easy, I could spend all the more time on my musical studies, and I devoted myself to them with my whole soul. In the two years now following (from 1811 till near the end of 1813) Türk gave me every day several lessons, both in theory and composition. His lesson in the Thorough Bass was according to the old method; i. e. it required the chord to be formed from every single tone, whereas the same results are more conveniently reached in recent times, namely through Logier's and my own method.*

Besides his own instruction book, Türk also used Kirnberger's "Kunst des reinen Satzes" (Art of pure Composition). For the Fugue, Marpurg was made the foundation; for the history of music, Forkel; for the calculation of the Temperament, again his own work and that of Chladni. Of other teachers I learned Italian and French; only in piano-playing did Halle offer me no teacher.

The compositions of my student period are all lost. I had given them away as mementoes to my good friends.

*See Loewe's "Klavier und Generalbass-Schule."

At once, at the very beginning of my lessons, Türk set me for a task to write a grand concert aria for a soprano voice. My friend Carl Pfug, then studiosus theologie, had to furnish me with the text. He chose an antique subject: "Didone abandonata." The words had the real opera libretto ring:

"Der Troer hat mein Herz beswungen,
Erloschen ist des Gatten Bild,
Tief ist der Pfeil in's Herz gedrungen,
Die Liebesflamme lodert wild!"

I composed the aria in a lively tempo; it started in D minor, and was very short, with a great deal of ecstasy; but without any repetition of the text or music; it did not seem to me natural for a desperate woman, on the point of hurling herself into the flames, to repeat her words. And so I went with my Aria to Türk. He examined the notes and smiled: "What there is here is right good; but now the Aria must begin to proceed." I shook my head. "Yes, yes!" said the master, "that is good music, but no Aria." Then I will write another," said I, "but this must remain as it is." Türk yielded, for he knew that in what concerned my own labors I, in spite of all my childish inexperience, could give in only to a certain point.

Türk's instruction was anything but pedantic; on the contrary he often seized the subject by the hair. Here is a little example.

As the clock struck for the hour of the lesson, I knocked at his door. He called out with his sonorous bass voice: "Come in!"—I entered the room with a respectful compliment. One could catch him here in the most different situations. Often he had covered the whole table with numbers in chalk, and said: "I am making here a computation of the Temperament according to Chladni; come, help reckon; the tone D sharp must come out, how does D sharp sound?" I thought to myself, D sharp sounds like E flat; so in my thoughts I sounded the minor third in the key of C minor, named it D sharp, and sang it. Türk went to the piano, gave D sharp, and nodded with his head, on which a great versette of powdered hair formed a wreath about the fine brow. The work, for which I found him calculating, was his before mentioned "Temperatur-Berechnung," which in after years I made those of my own scholars study, who had any head and inclination for mathematics.

Another time I found Türk at the piano. I was obliged to tell him which of two songs, which he had before him, was the best. The text was by Cramer: "Klopfe nicht so bange," &c. Without knowing by whom the compositions were, I decided for the one which was by Louise Reichardt. Türk himself had composed the melody of the second song, and it had decided declamatory excellencies. Another time he set me to playing perhaps some of the larger compositions of Mozart, as well as those which had just then appeared by Beethoven. Nevertheless the old master insisted on it, that for a solid foundation of study it was better to toil through the scores of Bach and Handel. Those piano works of modern masters were good, he said, to play for my own enjoyment.*

* Translated for DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC from DR. CARL LOEWE'S Selbst-biographie. Für die Öffentlichkeit bearbeitet von G. H. BERTZ. Berlin, 1870.

I never liked to make alterations in my works. Much remained in them to be desired; but as the manuscript once ran, so had it to remain; I was never in a condition to change a single note.

I have preserved only two works out of my student period, and that because they were at once printed. The first was a Romance by Kind: "Clothar;" the other was a setting of the words pronounced by Christ at the institution of the Holy Supper, with the Lord's Prayer, in liturgical style. So far as I remember, these two pieces were performed in the Moritz-Kirche at Halle, by the superintendent Goerke, with soft organ accompaniment, in a truly edifying manner. These compositions, to my no small pride, appeared under the opus numbers 1 and 2. But as this first period of my artistic activity occurred during the war storm of 1813, and any immediate continuance of such occupation was for a long time impossible, I made a new beginning with the opus numbers.

[To be Continued.]

*That first Aria of mine has often come into my mind since then. My wife, who always criticised my things very severely, has often said to me: "You do not write your Arias so long and so grateful for the singers, as Handel, for example; in yours there is always a certain brevity, which takes from their full effect when they are torn from their connection with the entire Oratorio or Opera."

The Gloucester Festival.

(From the Orchestra, Sept. 8.)

The 148th Anniversary of the Festival of the Three Choirs this year falls to the turn of Gloucester to celebrate. That busy cathedral-town, so unlike most of its compeers in the extent and development of its commercial life, always finds itself many times busier at the advent of "the Music Meeting," as it is locally called. This year has formed no exception to the rule of activity and pleased anticipation. Gloucester has been very full and very busy, and has tried hard to keep up its spirits against malign influences of the weather. The doubts uttered after the last festival in this city as to the continuation of these meetings had disappeared; and though the Cathedral was in the normal condition of cathedrals—namely, undergoing repairs—the fact was not suffered to stand in the way of anticipating a thoroughly good celebration.

We regret to have to add that expectations so sanguine have not been realized; that the carefulness of the local preparation has not been proportionate to the enthusiasm of the visitors. Incompleteness of rehearsal marred many a fair effect; and several blemishes appeared which, if allowed to repeat themselves on future occasions, will end by bringing about the discontinuance of these festivals. The knowledge of music is much more generally spread now than it was in former years; railways and metropolitan performances on a large scale have familiarized the people of the country with what can be attained towards accuracy and perfection; and they know the difference between a careful and a careless execution. If these festivals are to maintain their hold on the faith of their supporters, they must be kept up to the mark at the cost of hard work and steady drill and application. There is no lounging way of organizing a sacred performance, if it is to be worth anything. Perhaps the short comings observable on the first day of the present festival may do good by calling attention to the necessity of maintaining tireless training and strict discipline in future.

The principal singers engaged for this year's meeting, which opened on Monday with a rehearsal of Mr. Cusins' "Gideon," Bach's "Passion" and the "Israel in Egypt" were Mdlle. Tietjens (soprano), Mdlle. Patey (contralto), Mr. Vernon Rigby (tenor), Mr. Lewis Thomas and Signor Foli (basses)—besides Mdlle. Cora de Wilhorst, Misses H. R. Harrison and Martell, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Bentham (from Her Majesty's Opera), and Brandon. The leading violins were M. Sain-ton and Mr. Carrodus, and the chorus was made up in the usual manner from the three choirs with a London contingent, Dr. Wesley having command of the orchestral forces. A deviation was made on the usual practice of having all the evening miscellaneous concerts in the Shire Hall. Two performances, morning and evening, in the Cathedral were substituted; and only a couple of Shire Hall concerts were retained.

The festival proper opened on Tuesday with the overture to "Esther," "Te Deum Laudamus," and "Jephtha," of Handel (the last with the additional accompaniments of Mr. Arthur S. Sullivan), besides Mendelssohn's hymn, "Hear my prayer;" in the evening the program comprised a selection from Haydn's "Creation" and Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The first performance was ushered in with the usual full service, the music being by Orlando Gibbons; the anthem was Dr. Boyce's "Oh, where shall wisdom be found?" Prayers were intoned by the Rev. Mr. Bowman; the first Lesson was read by the Rev. Canon Lysons, and the second by the Rev. Canon Harvey. The sermon preached by the Rev. Canon E. D. Tinling, was to a text from Malachi, chap. 3, part of verse 1—"The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to His Temple." The effect of this sermon was rather startling, for it embodied what was in effect a protest against the performances in the cathedral. The attitude of the preacher provoked strong comment on the taste which had led him, while responding to a solicitation to plead for the charity, to attack the means by which the charity was benefited. The revered gentleman was compared inversely to Balaam, called to bless an undertaking and replying with a curse. Canon Tinling appears, on the most favorable construction, hardly to have kept faith. He was expected to urge the claims of the music meeting: if he could not conscientiously do this, he should have declined the office altogether. After service a voluntary was played in the shape of J. S. Bach's grand and elaborate fugue in B minor—one of the finest of the series to which it belongs; the performer was Mr. J. K. Pyne, a pupil of Dr. Wesley's. The attendance at the opening performance was scanty and not encouraging; nor did the mode in which the Dettingen Te Deum and "Jephtha" were presented brighten matters. It is reported that neither of these works had been rehearsed; and the execution bore out the rumor. Censure is all the more deserved as the executants did not fail in natural ability, and the shortcomings must be ascribed to carelessness alone. There were, however, points happily rendered; thus the solo "Thou art the King of glory," sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas, produced an admirable effect, so did also Mr. Lloyd's singing in the solo: "When Thou tookest upon Thee;" and Miss Martell made a successful debut. Mr. Harper's trumpet obligato was also brought in with good results, and there was everything to show that with normal care and rehearsal the performance would have been entirely satisfactory. Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" showed yet more vividly the necessity of discipline. Conductor, chorus, and band were at cross purposes, and Mdlle. Cora de Wilhorst, as soloist, found it uphill work. In "Jephtha" the vocalists were Mdlle. Tietjens, Mdlle. Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Signor Foli. To the first lady fell the well known numbers, "The smiling dawn," "Tune the soft melodious lute," "Welcome as the cheerful light," "Happy they," and "Farewell, ye limpid springs." Mdlle. Patey declaimed with great effect the dramatic air, "Scenes of horror, scenes of woe." Mr. Vernon Rigby achieved his usual success in the recitative and airs, "Deeper and deeper still," "Open thy marble jaws," and "Waft her, angels." Signor Foli sang exceedingly well and with much taste. The choruses were marred by being hurried. We must not omit the services of Miss Martell and Miss H. R. Harrison, in the auxiliary parts. The latter is a débutante, we believe, and sang in very nice style the recitative of the Angel, "Rise, Jephtha." Dr. Wesley conducted, and Mr. Townsend Smith presided at the organ.

In the evening the Cathedral was lighted up, and presented an imposing appearance. The attendance, however, was far from as favorable as could be wished. The first part of the programme comprised a selection from Haydn's "Creation," commencing with the orchestral prelude, Representation of Chaos, and terminating with the jubilant "Achieved is the glorious work." The second part was devoted to a selection from "Israel in Egypt," in which the chorus had the greater part of the work. The choral effects in the first part ran more smoothly than those at the morning performance; but in the second part there was again a falling off. The conducting was at sea; the bâton impetuously urged its followers to greater and greater velocity, until the pace became more like saute qui peut than a sacred performance. Neither in execution nor patronage did the results of Tuesday as a whole afford room for congratulation.

On Wednesday morning a drizzling rain set in, and kept on with remarkable pertinacity; notwithstanding which the attendance at the Cathedral was far better and more cheerful than the day before. The work was "Elijah," and herein lay the attraction which tempted the country folks to defy the wet. The growing popularity of this oratorio is an incontestable fact: with frequency of hearing it bears increase. "Elijah" was first heard in Gloucester at the meeting of 1847, the year after its production at the memorable Festival in Birmingham, and has since been repeatedly given here, with what results it is unnecessary to state. On Wednesday the Cathedral was crowded in every part: nave, gallery, aisles, and transepts were full, apparently, to their utmost capacity. The performance went much better than Jephtha, though there had been no rehearsal: the reason being that its music was much more familiar. The soprano music was divided between Mdlle. Cora de Wilhorst and Mdlle. Tietjens according to the respective parts; the contralto music in the first part was chiefly assigned to Miss Martell, and in the second to Madame Patey; the chief tenor in Part 1, was Mr. Bentham, and in Part 11. Mr. Vernon Rigby; and Signor Foli took the whole of the music of the Prophet, according to general custom. Miss H. B. Harrison, and Messrs. Brandon and Hunt (both of Gloucester Cathedral) assisted in the double quartet, "For He shall give His angels charge." The general effect of this performance left little to be desired. Principals worked with a will: choruses were well taken; and time was accurately kept. On the whole a good rendering is to be recorded, though the hearers in the Cathedral, with a taste worthy a British audience, ran away to lunch in the midst of the final choruses, as the rain outside was illustrating the effect of "Elijah's" prayer.

The down pour continued all day, and in the evening a dank assemblage gathered to the Shire Hall. "Acis and Galatea," with Mdlle. Tietjens, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lewis Thomas, opened a miscellaneous programme. It was followed by M. Sain-ton's "Fantasie sur Faust," a brilliant violin solo with orchestral accompaniment; need we add as brilliantly played? The first part of the programme ended with the second finale to Spohr's "Azor and Zemira," after which came a selection from "Preciosa," and a few miscellaneous pieces, interpreted variously by Mdlle. de Wilhorst, Miss Harrison, Miss Martell, Mdlle. Patey, Messrs. Bentham, Lloyd, and Foli.

On Thursday the attendance in the Cathedral was exceedingly good, as might have been expected from the attraction offered by Bach's Passion Music, Mr. Cusins' new oratorio "Gideon," and a copious selection from Spohr's "Calvary." The great work of Bach had been heard but once before in an English Church in England, namely, in Westminster Abbey on last Maundy Thursday evening; and this was without the concert room adjuncts which somewhat mar the devotional effect of music in a Cathedral Festival. But at Gloucester the impression was powerfully felt, and it is evident that the more familiar the work becomes—both to the performers and their audiences—the greater will be the admiration and reverence for it and its author. On the whole the performance was exceedingly good—the rehearsals having been numerous and careful. One or two of the choruses went unsteadily, and in a single instance confusion seemed almost irremediable, though matters mended before the close. Mdlle. Cora de Wilhorst was most efficient in her solos; and much praise is due to the other soloists, Mdlle. Patey, Mr. Lloyd, Signor Foli, and Mr. Brandon. We believe it is already determined that the Passion shall be repeated at Worcester and Hereford.

Mr. Cusins' "Gideon" followed, the work having been composed expressly for this festival. Mr. Cusins occupies the front rank among English musicians, and his future career is full of promise. His position as conductor of the Philharmonic Society is calculated to make him careful in execution, and the necessary study in detail of the works of the greatest composers cannot be without influence on his own writings. The star of English musicians generally culminates early, and after a certain degree of eminence has been attained, a repetition of pet ideas and mannerisms show that the soul of the artist is allowed to slumber, and facility in production of stale "novelties" often contents the composer and his clique of admirers. We trust that Mr. Cusins may make "Excelsior" his permanent rule; and certainly "Gideon" gives earnest that he will do so.

The words of "Gideon" are selected by the Rev. F. T. Cusins chiefly from the Psalms and 6th and 7th chapters of Judges. The story refers to the interposition of the Lord in favor of His chosen people, and the miraculous overthrow of the Midianites by the son of Joash. The petitions of the Israelites in their distress, the conference of the Angel of the Lord with Gideon, the miraculous means suggested by the Angel to enable Gideon to discomfort the enemy, the battle in which Gideon with his 300 men destroys the armies of the Midianites, with the subsequent triumph and thanksgivings, are the leading incidents. The personages are five—the Angel, Mdle. Tietjens; an Israelitish woman, Mdme. Patey; an Israelite, Mr. E. Lloyd; Gideon, Mr. Lewis Thomas; and a Prophet, Mr. Brandon.

An instrumental introduction leads to a chorus of the People of Israel: "Lord, how long wilt Thou be angry?" followed by a tenor air: "O remember not," the chorus resuming: "Help us, O God," very carefully written and very attractive. A short choral recitative and a recitative for the Prophet: "Thus saith the Lord" introduce a contralto air, "The eyes of the Lord," admirably sung by Mdme. Patey. A long scene for Gideon and The Angel succeeds, admirably rendered. A quartet of angels, and recitative and chorus intervene between this scene and Gideon's air: "Though I sometimes am afraid," which Mr. Lewis Thomas gave with great effect. A spirited chorus: "Through God will we do great acts," written with no little contrapuntal skill, is as effective in execution as it is meritorious in design and construction. A Recitative and Air for the Angel, "The Lord, He it is," was capitally rendered by Mdle. Tietjens. A telling Battle Chorus, and a characteristic Air, "O sing unto the Lord," well given by Mr. Rigby; a Triumphant March with Chorus, an accompanied Quartet, "Ascribe ye the power," are the chief pieces introducing the concluding Chorus, "O God, wonderful art Thou." Mr. Cusins conducted his own work, and it was by far the best performance at the festival. We need only further remark that the Oratorio was entirely successful, and will no doubt be speedily and frequently heard in London and elsewhere. The selection from "Calvary" might as well have been omitted, for there was little interest after the conclusion of "Gideon." It included the overture, the choruses "Gentle Night" and "Beloved Lord," the soprano air by Mdle. Tietjens, with chorus "Through all thy friends"—and the trio "Jesus, Heavenly Master"—by Mdle. Tietjens, Miss Martell, and Mdme. Patey.

We take up our record from Thursday evening, when a miscellaneous concert was given in the Shire Hall—the second devoted to that locality. The first part of the programme was made up of a selection from "Figaro's Hochzeit," including the opening duet by Miss Harrison and Signor Foli; Cherubino's aria, "Non so più," and canzone "Voi che sapete," by Mme. Cora de Wilhorst; the Countess's cavatina, "Porgi amor," and scena including the air, "Dove sono," by Mlle. Tietjens; the duettino for Susanna and the Countess, "Sull'aria," by the two ladies just named; Figaro's martial song, "Non più andrai," by Signor Foli; and the sextet, "Sola, sola," from "Don Giovanni," by the singers already mentioned, reinforced by Mr. E. Lloyd and Mr. Lewis Thomas. The overture to the opera was also given. After Mozart in opera came Mozart in symphony—the "Jupiter" being given with excellent effect. Then a tolerable rendering of "Adelaide" by Mr. Vernon Rigby; a ballad by Pontett, sung by Mlle. Tietjens; the buffo duet, "Con pazienza," from Mayer's "Il Fanatico," by the same vocalist and Signor Foli; Wallace's song, "Sweet and low," by Mme. Patey (the second verse repeated), Sir J. Benedict's ballad, "Rock me to sleep," by Miss Harrison, accompanied by Dr. Wesley; Figaro's air, "Largo al factotum," by Mr. Lewis Thomas; and "God save the Queen" as a wind-up.

On Friday, as usual, the Music Meeting closed with a performance of the "Messiah," which, according to invariable practice, drew the largest audience of the week, every available place being occupied in the Cathedral. Mlle. Tietjens and Mme. Cora de Wilhorst were the sopranos: "Rejoice greatly" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth" falling to the one, and "How beautiful are the feet" to the other. Mme. Patey never sang better than in the solo with chorus "O thou that tellest," and "He shall feed his flock." Mr. Rigby's powerful voice was displayed in "Thou shalt dash them"; and Mr. Lewis Thomas and Sig. Foli were impressive in their parts. Familiar as the "Messiah" is, it was to be expected that its performance would present fewer obstacles than "Jephtha" to a choral force unprepared especially by rehearsal. As a matter of fact it did go much better than the oratorios of the preceding days; though Dr. Wesley maintained his own theories with regard to the use of the baton, and galloped the chorus through "For unto us a child is born," as though altos and tenors had been handicapped against each other, and the conductor's duty was to see the race fairly run.

The full-dress ball at the Shire Hall was a decided success. It was fully and fashionably attended, though some of the chief "Lady Patronesses" merely lent their names to the ceremony. There was a very efficient band, under the direction of that experienced conductor, Mr. E. Stanton Jones, whose selection of music was well varied and effective.

The following are the statistics of the attendance and collections at this year's meeting, compared with the two preceding Gloucester festivals:

ATTENDANCE AT THE ORATORIOS.
	1865.	1868.	1871.
Tuesday.....	1,000	800	970
Tuesday evening.....	—	—	900
Wednesday.....	1,700	2,000	1,800
Thursday.....	2,080	1,900	1,400
Friday.....	3,260	3,000	2,400
ATTENDANCE AT THE CONCERTS.
	1865.	1868.	1871.
Wednesday.....	630	400	550
Thursday.....	600	600	539

Handel or Erba.

Every grand performance of Handel's works revives the consideration of which is Handel, and what, not. It is said that old Dragonetti—the famous double-bass player—born, with Mozart, close upon the death of Handel—was accustomed to say to Robert Lindley, when the two were playing Handel's music together, "Oh! the robber," "Ah! what a robber." "Il Drago" knew the music of Handel's day, and the generation before Handel as well as Handel did, and fingers are quicker than ears in tracing resemblances in composition. That Handel made it a practice to write upon the thoughts of others no one can for a moment dispute. The facts are too overwhelming. And that he used up entire compositions cannot be questioned. He may be said in some cases to have taken the pebble and produced the diamond—to have seized the jewel in its old case, and reset it with a wreath of art and exuberance of fancy. Such was the fact in regard to the Te Deum Laudamus of Uria, and the cantata by Stradella. The first portion of the "Israel in Egypt," contains the ideas of the Stradella cantata, and the Stradella chorus, "He spake the word." The second portion contains the Magnificat—a composition which is alleged by some to be an early work by Handel, and written in Rome, 1707. Others declare it is not Handel's composition—not in his style—utterly opposed to all the other admitted music he wrote then, and that it is from the pen of an unknown musician named Erba.

The copy in Handel's own hand, now in the Royal Library at Buckingham Palace, is imperfect. The two last pages have been torn away. This is significant. The other psalms composed at Rome are all signed, perfect, and dated. But copies were made of this manuscript, and also of the Stradella cantata, by Smith, Handel's copyist, and it is believed there are three, if not four, in existence. One is in the library of the Sacred Harmonic Society and in every way complete. This copy does not bear Handel's name. On the contrary it is called the composition of Sy, or Dy, Erba—Dionysius Erba. Now Smith could not have invented this himself: Erba was never in England, the copy was made in England, written on English paper, and by the man who had access to the original in Handel's writing. No doubt Smith copied what he saw.

Again, in the copy of the "Israel," used by Handel in conducting, he has placed the word "Mag" against the movements he had taken from this psalm or canticle. It is true he did not do this in the case of the Stradella, used up in the first part of the "Israel," but with the exception of the chorus "He spake the word" nothing is taken bodily and literally from Stradella. He is simply despoiled of his ideas. Copies of the Magnificat had gone out—this Handel knew—and he may have written the word "Mag," to denote his obligation to the head and hand of another. If his own writing, why refer to it? He does not do this kind of thing when transferring his own music. There is nothing to mark that the chorus "Blest be the hand" in "Theodora" was taken from "Immortal Lord" in "Hercules." Nor does he do so when adding to his "Athalie" the movements from "Parnasso." Of what use could the memento be to Handel himself? Of what concern to others if Handel's own music? Why seek to identify what was known to himself, and, if his own composition, of no importance to others? This memorandum, compiled with the absence of the last pages of the copy brought from Rome, is at least remarkable.

Further, Handel when copying writes in a perfectly different way from Handel when composing. There is no score at all like that of the "Israel." Portions of it are as shapely and seemingly written as if transferred from print. There is none of the hot haste of the hurrying hand as in the "Messiah" and other of his oratorios. That the "He spake the word" is copy is as plain as the sun in noonday; for Handel had not allowed room for his buzzing-fly accompaniments, and was compelled to squeeze in the semiquavers in the most awkward, and occasionally, ludicrous way.

The "Israel" as a whole is, in MS., a foregone conclusion; a fair, clear, and premeditated piece of writing—a MS. not like any other by this great composer.

Now as to the internal evidence. This Magnificat is not like Handel's music as boy, student, conductor of the opera at Hamburg traveller in Italy, chapelmaster at Cannons, opera composer at the Haymarket, oratorio composer at Oxford; it is not like what he was, whether young or old. Every bar of his signed music written at Rome is like his music written for the Duke of Chandos at Cannons. It is the Germanized form of the school of Colonna, Stradella, Leo, and the men of Handel's day, and those just preceding him. The Erba music is the "too stiff" style as Handel called it, and the counterpoint is that of a composer accustomed to write for voices in church singing without orchestral accompaniments.

Handel was a big man and wrote in a large form. He took time to develop his ideas—his stride is enormous, his gait a huge roll. Not so the composer of the Magnificat. There is no stride, no roll, no time; all is sharp, terse, and condensed.

We would almost rest the case upon the two movements "Moses and the Children of Israel," and the chorus "He is my God"—one undoubtedly by Handel, the second most undeniably by some one else. It is the opening chorus of the Magnificat. We must remember that the second part of the "Israel" was written before the first part, and in this view it is Handel sitting down to do what he never had done, an entire cantata in eight parts with orchestral accompaniment. He commences with his own themes, "Moses and the Children of Israel," and in the next chorus, "the Horse and his Rider," he flies to Krieger for subjects and counterpoint. We have the book in England, and there can be no question about the fact. The succeeding chorus is "He is my God"—the "Magnificat anima mea." Now let us look at the counterpoint of this short Latin chorus. It is superb, magnificent. A stream, without stay or hindrance. The voices never break together, their movements are marvellously varied, their progressions as free as air, and as pure as sunlight, the idea perfect, the rhythm perfect. Nothing more classical, more true, more exquisite can be found in the whole course of Handel's career. Compare the counterpoint with that of "Moses, and the Children of Israel." Here is "Moses"—

Look also at the chorus, "The Lord shall reign," and what can be said of such successions as these: (read an octave higher)—

Contrast the effort and manifest embarrassment in this chorus with the grace, eloquence and freedom of the chorus from the "Magnificat." Can it be said that the grists are the same, or that they come from the same mill? This was the argument of Lotti when Bononcini stole his madrigal, and what better can be used? Where in all Handel's volumes is there anything like Kerl's chorus, "Egypt was glad," or like these choruses of Erba: "The earth swallowed them up," and "Thou sentest forth Thy wrath?" Of course Handel could not write the Kerl chorus; at least he never attempted to do anything like it; and these two choruses from the Magnificat are equally foreign to his head and hand. His common-place book, dated 1698, filled with music he heard when first at Berlin, contained compositions by Erba, by Kerl, and by Krieger. If he, as he did, took Kerl and Krieger, why not Erba also? We suspect Froberger supplied the first chorus of the "Israel," and Alberti, whose music was in this volume, the "Let all the angels" in the "Messiah."

Handel had not written any alla cappella choruses strictly so-called. There are none in "Ester," none in "Deborah," none in the "Acis," or the "Alexander's Feast," none in "Athalie." "Our fainting courage" in "Saul" is not his, nor is "O fatal consequence of rage," also in the same oratorio. His canonic alla cappella in "Solomon" is Cesti and Kalvisius; in "Samson" it is Carissimi; in the "Te Deum" it is Carissimi and Uria. Think of that little chapel at Cannons, scarcely larger than a good-sized drawing-room, a small hall, and then of Handel composing his largely-planned movements in the Chandos Anthems for such a confined, insignificant locale. If he could write the close vocal counterpoint—such as that in the Magnificat—if he was such a superb adept in short movements of rare, pure vocal part-writing, was not the chapel at Cannons the very best of all places on earth for its exhibition? Such music as Erba's was wanted at Cannons, and if Handel was up in the school and style why did he not write it?

The fact that the Magnificat is in Handel's handwriting is of no importance. The chorus "Awake the ardor of thy breast," in the oratorio of "Deborah" is in MS. in Handel's own hand, but it is not his composition.

It may be remarked, "But would Handel condescend to take the thoughts of other people?" In those days there was not a little of this kind of practice. Very little music was printed in comparison with the quantity that was composed, and "conveying," as Sir Walter Scott called it, was the order of the day. And so it is now; the new thought is rewritten before the man's ink is dry from whose brain it came. Everybody borrowed and stole, and no man could afford to do this sort of thing better than Handel. He always apologizes for it—puts something alongside of the borrowed thought that almost blinds the auditor by its transcendent originality and immeasurable strength. He laughs in your face—"What you heard just now was not mine; take this, and when you are sufficiently recovered we will go on." It is a sad thing that his commonplace book is lost, his entries of the queer, grand, outside things he heard and saw in his travels. It is worth its weight in gold. Lady Rivers, née Coxe—whose mother Smith married—had this book, but it was gone when her Handelian MSS. were sold. Mainwaring says it was full of pieces by Kerl, Krieger, Ebner, and others. Here, then, is the man: for Ebner, read Erba. In those days of trained thought and subtle treatment of a theme, it was of no avail to steal scraps as Meyerbeer did: the all must be conveyed or none. We may be sure Handel only copied what was worth copying, and never copied what he could get without copying. All he copied was very far from ordinary composition.

A word in regard to the æsthetic and classical view. The "Israel" is not like the "Messiah." Jennens, Handel's patron, who set him to work on these compositions, never complained of the "Israel," as being too light or irreverent. Contrast the opening of the "Israel" with that of the "Messiah." The two works are complete opposites; and it must be recollected that the "Israel" formerly began with the "Lamentations of the Israelites for the death of Joseph"—an application of that magnificent anthem, "The ways of Sion do mourn," composed the year before for the funeral of Queen Charlotte. This anthem begins in the grandest form—a kind of choral for the Canto fermo—but it is Handel from the first note to the last, very different from the chorus, "And the children of Israel sighed." "Israel" was composed in 1738, and the year before Handel had failed with the public in all he did. His operas, "Arminius," "Justin," "Berenice," had all proved disasters; he had added fireworks and all sorts of odd things to increase the attractions of "Atalanta." His Lent oratorios were fiascos—the public declined to listen to "The Triumph of Truth," "Esther," "Deborah," "Dido," or "Alexander's Feast." His great singers Farinelli and Senesino had run away, disgusted with singing to empty houses. The town was thoroughly tired of Handel, and at this time so far from there being any fanaticism for the special style of his writing, the facts demonstrate he had used up his material and wearied his audiences. In writing the Funeral Anthem he had defied the public, he had pleased himself and the King. Now comes the "Israel." Here he defies the public, and clearly writes without a thought of popular feeling. Nor had he the Lent Oratorio in his head when he first begins. He writes the second part first, then adds the first part, and when afterwards determining on public performance adds again the introduction of the "Lamentations," in fact his new Funeral Anthem. Whom did he seek to please by all this? Who was to pay him, for he was approaching bankruptcy with rapid stride? Mr. Jennens did pay him, and gave him a thousand pounds, and another oratorio to set to music. Something was to be done in hot haste, for ruin was imminent, and Charles Jennens would not pay for operas, or monsters, or fireworks, or any rubbish of this kind. We know how he set to work when pressed; his Ts Dezm for Dettingen is an ensample—if not wholesale robbery—borrowing on the hugest scale. It seems therefore almost certain that Handel had received his commission from Jennens to set the "Song of Moses" in a large, solemn, church-like way of style, and the case being pressing the composer did, as was his practice, avail himself of the thoughts of others. Hence the interest of the "Israel" is the variation of its style, its short forms, its long forms, its bright melodies, its massive harmonies, its quaint counterpoints. It is a cheque from Charles Jennens, and not a draft on the public. Handel ignored the public in this "Song of Moses." When he afterwards laid it before the sagacious public and brought in his Italian singers, he cut out the Funeral Anthem and introduced between the acts a lot of Italian songs.

Who was Erba? There were, it appears, three musicians of this name; one tolerably known, we incline to think of a later period than 1706, and not the composer of the Magnificat. We take this man to have been a priest—an outside, unknown person, of some small chapelry or church, writing like hundreds of his class for his own needs and his own choir, and perfectly careless as to the results of his works or the opinion of the musical world at large, with which he had no concern and no interest. At all events it is easier to believe that there was a priest called Erba—Dionysius Erba—capable of writing the Magnificat, than that Handel should have gone out of his way, his habit, his train of thought, his process of school, to have made an exception to all his work at Rome, and then to have torn his name away from the manuscript in England, some thirty years afterwards; or that he should have taken the trouble to indicate his comparatively juvenile effort in the score from which he conducted so many years in public. He pointed out "the conveyance" himself, for he well knew that some day it would be well ventilated, and satisfactorily established. The two suppositions are somewhat contradictory, but there might have come over him a change of mind, and had any one stolen the last page for his autograph, it would have turned up long ago. To sum up the point: Mainwaring says Handel's commonplace book had pieces in it by Ebner, plainly Erba; Smith says the Magnificat is by Erba; and Handel writes "Mag." at the head of his "conveyances." What more can be required?—London Orchestra.

The Naples Conservatory.

THE INTEREST OF THE NEAPOLITANS IN MUSIC—VERDI'S REPORT ON THE STATE OF THE CONSERVATORY—WISE RECOMMENDATIONS—THE ADVANTAGES OF NAPLES TO THE STUDENT.

(Correspondence of the Daily Advertiser.)

NAPLES, SEPT., 1871.

I have just succeeded in obtaining a copy of the report made by a commission directed by Verdi to the minister of public instruction, in regard to the state of the musical educational institutions of Italy, and especially of the College of Music in Naples. It is now some months since this report was rendered, and a considerable time has elapsed since it was put in type by the government printers; but very few copies have been distributed, and even in musical circles comparatively little is known as to its purport and effect.

In most respects the Neapolitans are indifferent to the censure which justly falls upon their city for its failure to advance with advancing civilization, and are content to sigh for the old Bourbon days when, if they did lack quays and open streets, light, air and water, sewerage and sanitary regulations, economy, sense and system, at least nobody bothered them about it, and no little group of comparatively enlightened citizens tried to afflict their brethren with rival candidates for municipal offices, and with schemes for improvement. Public neglect, and public affront alike disturb them little, and flagrant abuses meet no other notice than a half protest in the corner of an insignificant newspaper. Their port may remain but a roadstead; their great (and only) avenue to the southward be closed for a year to an almost incalculable travel, which must struggle tediously through tortuous by-streets, where but one line of vehicles can pass; their sewers may pile up refuse on the sands below their only garden of recreation; their streets may be dim and precarious by night; the coroner and his court may be unknown, and the sudden dead may lie for hours where he fell until some commissary of police can be found to take a procès verbal on the spot; these, and a thousand other things, which prevent their city from being as delightful as its site is gracious, are all roba di poco-trifles.

But on one point are they still sensitive and alert—the art of music; and they can ill brook that the old glories of San Carlo have faded, and that although still their massimo, it is no longer likewise the greatest of the world. The civic improvements and embellishments of Florence, the activity of Milan, the commercial progress of Genoa and Leghorn, they do not begrudge; but they cannot bear to think that the Italian should resort to Bologna, or the foreigner pause almost on the frontier in Milan, to acquire that education and finish in music, particularly in vocal music, which it has been, and still should be, the prerogative of Naples to impart. Therefore the gradual decadence of the Royal College of Music has been an affliction to bear and a problem to solve. And it may well be mortifying to think that their city where the opera was born, as one may say, where so many grand masters were trained and in their turn taught, where the chief artists of the world came for a seal of approval that could not be questioned, where the great writers came to present their compositions, sacred as well as secular, for criticism, and where even a popular judgment was almost sure to be correct, must lose not only the prestige of its opera-house,—a question now-a-days rather of money than of merit—but also see the school which for centuries had been the nucleus of all these splendors fade and lose its influence abroad and its impress at home.

Since the fall of the Bourbons the Conservatory has lived as it best could, the government having done nothing but assure it a revenue and a roof and never having even provided it with a new set of by-laws and internal ordinances. Excellent masters have not lacked, nor yet talented pupils. But the director has been a nullity. Never by any means so great as his reputation, Mercadante was not the man to be chief of such an institution. In a merely musical light he may be well regarded, and as a principal professor of composition he could never have been out of place. Himself a writer of little variety and much manner, his prolific hand traced few scores that can live except as curiosities or elements of biography and musical history, and the representations which his operas obtained were due rather to his friendly relations with singers than to the merits of the works themselves. But he knew thoroughly the laws of counterpoint and the value of orchestral instruments, and was thus a living source of useful information. Administrative capacity he had not, and during the last decade, when family griefs and his own blindness had affected his disposition and impaired his powers, he was but a name and a shadow of a director. To reform the Conservatory he must be removed; respect for his age, his fame and his genius, forbade his removal. In the mean time the diligent pursued their studies amid all the positive advantages which San Pietro a Maiella can offer, and the idle sauntered about the cloisters, shirked their exercises with small fear of supervision or discipline, and cast discredit then and afterward upon the college.

At last Mercadante died and was buried with a ceremony and a following rare indeed in this careless city. Flowers almost hid the pall, bands of music played dirges, distinguished citizens walked beside the bier, and hundreds of musicians and music-lovers came behind, while scores of aristocratic families sent their carriages to close the funeral in elegant procession. But even in that throng, as everywhere, the question of a successor to the maestro, not yet two days dead, was actively discussed, and a wide range of names, from Verdi to Petrella, was canvassed by jealous partisans, who were fain ultimately, to content themselves with their ignorance of even the possibilities of ministerial predilection.

For a wonder, the present ministry has shown not only coherence but capacity, albeit the question of finance is no less vexed in Italy than elsewhere. Signor Correnti, who holds the portfolio of public instruction, is energetic and active; if one hears of him to-day in north Italy inspecting a lyceum, a little later he will be in the south reviewing the clinical schools of a hospital, and anon at a cabinet council in the capital. He had had before him the whole field of musical culture for survey, and the then crisis gave the needed opportunity for initiating a reform, or rather a regeneration, in the Neapolitan college. Certain special questions were therefore incorporated in the charge to the commission, which consisted of Verdi, as president, Serrao, an eminent orchestral master of Naples, Casamorata and Mazzacato, representing other sections of the country—an indisputably able body.

From their report, an octavo pamphlet of about fifty pages, I shall cite a few points to indicate its scope; the whole is very interesting and very sensible, but it is impossible to make any extended extracts in the limits of this letter. Taking as a text, "the restoration to its glorious traditions of the College of Naples," the commission lay down as the prime essentials:—

I. A firm and decided character in the directory and professors. II. Their determination that all laws and rules shall be implicitly obeyed. III. The intrinsic excellence of such regulations,—which should, be it well understood, be uniform for all the similar institutions in Italy, except in those minor particulars which the nature of each locality dictates. The report explains its meaning of "glorious traditions" to be "those grand successes obtained in the last century particularly, by the dramatic and ecclesistical works written by pupils of the college," and, while regretting the present dearth of such works, passes to remark that elsewhere in Italy, as also out of it, the musical field yields likewise a comparatively unremunerative harvest.

After treating the subject of discipline and the necessity for full powers, administrative as well as instructive, to be vested in the directors, supported and advised by a council on the part of the crown, the commission proceeds to present as follows its views of the actual state of the Italian schools: "1st., the school of wind and key-board instruments is in a satisfactory condition, especially in its mechanical part; 2d., with the exception of a few eminent instances, the school of stringed instruments is generally much less satisfactory, and does not correspond to the needs of art; 3d., the vocal art may be said to be confined to a very few notable artists, who are by no means equal in number even to the wants of the theatre, now becoming constantly more numerous; 4th., the same must be said of the creative art, in respect of new composers; for if these do not absolutely lack, they are certainly far from fulfilling, either by the number or the quality of their works, the exigencies of a really flourishing Italian school."

Lamenting the decline of vocal art, which the report remarks once stood alone in Italy, giving the law to all the world of song, the commission finds one grand cause in the declamatory style of singing, "which dates from the time of Bellini," and which, by forcing the voice out of its natural mode of action, displaced it, injured its testitura, and in many cases positively ruined it. [This I find to be the only unwise point in the report; if voices have been strained and displaced, it would seem that Verdi might blame himself quite as much as Bellini; he has changed his methods in Don Carlos, to be sure, but a little verbal confession, or at least modification, would do a deal of good.] Declamation should go hand in hand with melodic delivery, it is granted, but the old ways of study must be brought back, and a natural development attained by skill and patience; masters must be steady and pupils modest.

The deficiencies of composition are attributed to various sources: the fact that young writers can only obtain a hearing at a good theatre by purchase, in spite of any merit their writing may have, the tendency to imitate the harmonic extravagances of an "ultramontane school"—evidently that of Wagner is meant—and to copy the characteristics of any modern writer who happens to arrive at popularity, in the hope of thus getting a hearing themselves. To counterbalance these difficulties the commission would have a periodical opportunity afforded by the government for the public essay of works approved by the college directions, and would prohibit the study of contemporary authors by the pupils. Believing that all necessary models can be found in greater purity among the older writers, the epoch beginning and ending respectively with Palestrina and Rossini is that assigned for study in the Italian school, the German masters being placed under no limit except so far as they may be obnoxious to the criticisms quoted above.

By way of giving clearer form to the principles assumed, the commission devotes the larger portion of their report to an ample and minute system of organization for the several musical colleges, which is in many respects the same as that in accordance with which the conservatory of Milan was remodelled in 1864, and is now conducted. One main point of difference is that at Milan there are no commons, an out-door boarding allowance being made to the free pupils, while the new regulation proposes to preserve the old plan of domiciling pupils within the college walls, but admits a limited number of day scholars. No point of general interest seems to have been passed over, and a truly wise judgment has apparently dictated each article. The pupils must study not only music, but language and literature,—including French and the elements of Latin,—history, geography, musical and dramatic history, penmanship, arithmetic and declamation. There will be adjunct schools for gesture, fencing and the dance. The proportion of scholars for each hundred for the voice, and for each orchestral instrument, is prescribed, and the number of pupils to be received by each master of music is limited narrowly; for instance, the vocal and contrapuntal teachers may not exceed six pupils, the piano and organ teachers seven, those of stringed instruments six, nor those of harmony ten. Some courses of study may reach eight years, and for most six or seven are allowed. The composition of the trial orchestras of fifty members in the colleges, and of eighty-eight in San Carlo or La Scala, is defined, and the balance of voices for the corresponding choruses; the educational rehearsals are to be limited to music of the period named above, and to be approved compositions of the older pupils. Inspection, discipline and an arbitrary ranking of the various professors and officials by which any conflict of authority is avoided, make up the balance of the provisions.

The adoption of this report, and the translation of it into action, should really recreate the Neapolitan Conservatory, which although long neglected and devoid of energy and power, is far from dead. Its atmosphere has ever been favorable to labor and to production, and its present dullness and oppression can be but temporary. Indeed the reaction has already begun, and the new director has this week assumed his chair,—not Serrao, whose name is attached to the report, and whose solid merits as a musician gave his fellow-townsmen hopes of his nomination, but Lauro Rossi, until now director of the College of Milan, a man who is said to unite to technical learning the clear head and the steady hand of the Piedmontese. From all that I hear of him, I should judge him to be an admirable choice, although advanced in years,—and I hope he may prove so, for if the old conservatory springs up again into vigor under his direction, the whole Neapolitan school, naturally so original, so rich and so admirable, will revive too; and the vocal school, at least, of the whole world reap in time a benefit.

For my own part, if we Americans were not so much like the English in sheepishly following some leader to a mountain, a hotel, a shop-keeper or a master, I could find it in my heart to wonder why dozens of American singers go to Milan to study instead of coming to Naples. But as two or three have been pleased with Milan, have got their names perhaps into a paper there (and most Italian papers are only too glad to get something to put in), all the others follow suit without reflection or investigation. After considering the subject thoroughly and long, I am compelled to the conclusion that every real advantage for the student is with Naples. Life is cheaper, and it is easier, for the climate is far more equable than that of Milan—a grave matter to the young singer; the traditions are clearer and better for the intending operatic artist, and the acquaintance with rarely sung and studied music wider. Above all, the school in general is better; not so much perhaps in point of style,—for any little city in Italy can furnish a little master, whose sense of musical taste and fitness is delicacy itself,—but in respect of development and delivery of voice, which is the greatest of all. The greatest name Milan has known is Lamberti, but he is of the past; Sangiovanni deserves the reputation of a great operatic teacher, but he is not a "voice-builder"; and of Lamberti's pupils there are many who have been forced to acknowledge faults in emission of voice when brought in comparison with the pupils of the Neapolitan Scafati, and defects of style beside the polished pupils of Florimo. Here are still the men who learned to sing by the genuine method of Busti the wise teacher, and of Lablache the great artist, and who know why those famous front benches of San Carlo applauded one note and hissed another. Here still—though the devotees of the German school may look incredulous—Beethoven is studied by many masters, who write ponderous fugues for their own pleasure, while living on waltzes and canzonette; and here Don Giovanni has filled the Teatro del Fondo night after night of this very season. If I were to advise a young singer, bent on study in Italy, for improvement first and notoriety afterward, I should earnestly recommend Naples as the school, and either Scafati or Cirello as the master. The former is difficult to obtain, for his time is mostly occupied by artists, but the latter is scarcely his inferior save in years. Of the former's success I can only speak generally; but I have myself watched the vocal development of some of the latter's pupils—who had nothing remarkable to commend them at first—with little less than amazement, and I can wish no better fortune (for singer and for hearer) to our American school than to have some really capable young singers pass a year or two under his serious, conscientious teaching.

Twight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON. OCT. 7, 1871.

The Vocal Works of Bach and Handel.— Letter by Robert Franz.

It is well known that Robert Franz, the most original of all the recent song composers, a thorough musician in the best sense, and capable no doubt of noble compositions in the larger forms, has chosen rather to devote himself for some years past to a great work of piety and love toward those older masters whose priceless scores as they have left them need "arrangement," additional accompaniments, or "Bearbeitung" (as the Germans have it, which means literally elaboration, working over), to bring out fully their intention and beauty in performance now. The Messiah, we know, is always given with Mozart's additional accompaniments; yet there are some numbers in it which he has neglected, and which sound therefore very thin, while others, like: "Behold, darkness," he has brought out with wonderfully sympathetic power. "Acis and Galatea" is given in England with Mendelssohn's arrangement. And most of the Oratorios, Cantatas, Masses, Passions, &c., of Bach and Handel require some such treatment. Not alteration, not the addition of another man's thought, but the art, which very few possess—perhaps no one in so high a degree as Franz—of divining as it were the real, full intention of the composer, of reading it between the lines of the mere sketch which he has often left us in his written score, where whole arias, for instance, are set down with no accompaniment beyond a figured basso continuo, not even the string quartet being written out. The composer in these cases had the whole thing in his mind, and played it all in person at the organ as he sat presiding.

The question how these scores are to be filled out and prepared for modern performances, how the great vocal works of Bach and Handel are to be made truly available and their full sense brought home to us, is certainly a most important one for art,—a "burning" question is the intense term which Franz applies to it, he who has faced this problem so much more earnestly than anybody, and has solved it so successfully: witness what he has done for the orchestral portion of Bach's Passion music, and the wonderful art with which he has furnished so many arias of Bach and Handel with a piano-forte accompaniment conceived in the very style and spirit of the master, and of which he has drawn the elements from his profound study of the intentions frequently concealed in the mysterious figures over that bare basso continuo. Yet these admirable labors of Franz have met with criticism and with opposition on the part of certain literal adherents to the old scores as they stand, who have authority in Germany. With singular modesty and candor, and yet with great earnestness and force and clearness, Franz has recently replied to their objections, relating the history of his experience in these labors, and unfolding the whole rationale of his method, in a pamphlet which lies before us, which takes the form of an "Open Letter" (Offener Brief an Edward Hanslick, über Bearbeitungen älterer Tonwerke, namentlich Bach'scher und Händel'scher Vocalmusik). Of this we propose to give the substance, translating for the most part as closely as we may be able.

After a few introductory remarks on the importance of the question, (alluding by the way to the friendly interest which the Vienna critic, Hanslick, has shown in his labors), and asking indulgence for adopting a narrative form as giving him greater freedom, he proceeds:

"Inclination, perhaps also natural disposition, drew me years ago to Bach's and Handel's music. My modest sphere of action in Halle was not entirely unfavorable to such pursuits; they soon became the central point of the Singakademie which I conducted. At that time (I speak of the years 1841, &c.) one was obliged to try to help himself, as matters then stood. Handel's Oratorios were limited for us to those which had been arranged (elaborated, provided with additional accompaniments) by Mozart and by Mosel; Bach's Cantatas and Masses, to the editions provided by Marx. We performed these things as they were laid before us, and quite naively took it for granted that the full meaning of these works of Art was thus exhausted. To be sure, the public sometimes opened its eyes very wide, when in a Bach

Cantata a singular dialogue occurred between the flute and the double-bass, or when the Basso continuo actually treated us to a long, dreary monologue. But we did not quarrel with it; we set it all down to the account of the good old time, which we believed it our duty to accept precisely as it was.

"Into the midst of this youthful activity suddenly fell the complete editions, first of Bach's, and afterwards of Handel's works, offering for performance a fulness of new material in well authenticated forms. Then indeed the Bach Cantatas began to look quite differently from what they did with Marx: everywhere you found richly figured basses, which could not have been put there without a purpose, and which enabled us to draw some definite inferences concerning an earlier Art praxis once in vogue. Still my doubts about the practicability of those old arrangements did not go deep enough to withhold me from the study and rehearsal of one or another work in those forms. The choruses, inasmuch as their composition is pretty conclusively determined, offered no serious hindrance; all the more difficult was it dealing with the solo numbers, by reason of their many defective passages.

"In the beginning I resorted to a desperate means, which is even now employed in many ways:—I cut away and struck out vigorously, and used at the utmost only the pieces for which Bach had in some sense provided the accompaniment. But that could not go on forever; the connection of the whole was often too seriously imperilled; and then again some single arias stood there in such splendid outlines, that one could not pass them over without ceremony;—in short I resolved to make the attempt to work out an accompaniment. At first I tried it with mere chord accompaniments, but I soon perceived that there was no getting through in this way: the harmonies fell with leaden heaviness into the Bach parts and no where found firm footing in the flexible continuo;—instead of supporting, such additions only encumbered the progress of the music. For a considerable time I held it utterly impossible to set a thing according to my wish, and I keenly regretted the necessity of renouncing many a finely sketched aria.

"One day, though, I went to work again; this time with the purpose of trying to solve the problem, for the sake of change, with the polyphonic style of writing. And lo! to my joyful surprise, all suddenly became alive, the parts seemed only to have waited for some one to write them down, and evidently had been premeditated. I quickly comprehended that the sketches were by no means hasty outlines, but fully as complete and definite as the rest of the composition which was actually carried out. While the old masters jotted them down, they at the same time created in their minds the web of parts which is yet wanting, and they could the better trust themselves to find it again, that they took care in person for the execution of the accompaniment. It must therefore be the chief task of the arranger (Bearbeiter) to come behind the peculiar purposes of the authors and keep in close relation with them; if for obvious reasons the reconstruction always remains problematical for us, still in very many cases a result may be obtained which will not differ too much from the intentions of the master. Bach's figuration is often carried into the smallest detail—it needs only a sharp eye and a skilful hand to hit with confidence upon the last decisions. Nevertheless the labor does not everywhere go on so easily; many a fine time have I sat all day at a loss before a couple of measures, and I know pieces, for the satisfactory solution of which the present technique of our Art would hardly be sufficient.

"Having arrived at this conviction, that the polyphonic style throughout was here premeditated, the next thing was to submit it to the most various tests: if one trial failed, I took the thing up in another way, and never rested until profitable results were reached. Gradually in this way a method was developed, which, based on the material of the sketches, and using just the elements which these afforded, mastered the problem of a true and satisfactory rendering. As well in the structure of the bass, as in the figuration of the cantilena, moments presented themselves well suited to the shaping of motives, and which could be worked up;—these once discovered, the further progress of the piece unfolded of itself. Clearly enough: the style of the old masters sprang from the simplest and most elementary laws—at the foundation of their Art-forms lies a principle entirely similar to that according to which plants, flowers and fruits spring out of one germ." [Doubtless it was this passage which led our great naturalist, Prof. Agassiz, the other day, on happening to take up this pamphlet of Franz, to read it through with eager interest, struck by such beautiful confirmation of the unitary processes of science in the laws of this profound, true school of Art.]

"But even the greatest dexterity in form would have furnished no pledge of any sure success, if it had been applied without a constant reference to the indwelling mood or spirit of the sketch: the two had to go hand in hand and mutually support each other.

"And so as to the accompaniment of the solo passages, I had become tolerably clear, and now proceeded to investigate the choruses. Not to waste words: the accompaniment had almost everywhere to coöperate with the voice parts, for really in it lay properly the centre of gravity of this sort of music. Whether the person entrusted with it performed his function at the organ, or at the cembalo, he was the nerve of the whole, in him were all the threads united."

—So much for the present; but we propose to go on and give our readers the entire substance of the Letter, partly by direct translation, partly in the form of abstract.

Symphony Concerts.

The committee of the Harvard Musical Association have nearly completed the arrangements for the seventh season of these well established feasts of great Orchestral music. Such concerts,—in the midst of all the distracting temptations from abroad, the excited expectations artfully worked up by enterprising impresarios who use Art mainly as a means of business, and in spite of strong personal interest so naturally taken in each new famous prima donna or instrumental virtuoso—have in a certain sense a first claim on the affections of our real music-lovers, not only for their intrinsic excellence (at least of programmes) and their single, pure artistic motive, but also because they are our own; they represent the aspiration of our own community to realize something ideal and unfailing, year by year, in a sincere and high direction of Art. The time, we think, has come, when what we do for ourselves, in any well organized way, from genuine Art motives, is of far more importance to our musical character and progress, than all the speculative flying visitations of transitory stars, however brilliant, from whatever spheres remote. Hospitable as we may and should be, and appreciative, to the good things from abroad, our home supplies always (of course in proportion to their purity of motive, their earnestness) are worthy to be cherished with our fondest love. It was precisely this conviction that led to the formation of our Oratorio, and particularly our Symphony Concerts; it was that we might be sure every year of something good without being dependent on the chances of foreign arrivals and the schemes of speculators.

The Symphony Concerts will again be ten in number, beginning on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 9, and continued once a fortnight as the rule, with two or three exceptions caused by the engagement of the Music Hall for Fairs. It is, as it is well known, a speciality of the plan, to which their marked success has been in a great measure owing from the first, that they aim to preserve a certain identity of sympathetic audience, as well as a certain standard of musical selection and interpretation. The members of the Association, who guaranty the concerts, first dispose of tickets among their friends (and others who apply to them) to an amount sufficient to virtually secure the enterprise; these have the first choice of seats, and very justly, for the reason that those persons who approve themselves year after year the sure, reliable supporters of such music have thereby earned a certain title to consideration in the competition for the opportunity to hear. Were the whole thing thrown open to the usual scramble at a ticket office, the chances would be that not a few of the most real, loyal audience might find themselves excluded. After the private choice of seats, however, there always remains a good third part, or one half of the Hall open to all who care to purchase tickets. Moreover, any person, who will give his order to any member of the Association (and they are many and well known) will be counted in for the private drawing of seats, provided he apply on or before the 13th inst. The price of season tickets this year has been fixed at $8.00 (instead of $10.00 as last year).

Mr. ZERRAHN will conduct the concerts, and Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG will no doubt be welcomed back as the leader of the violins (or what the Germans call the Concertmeister). The orchestra has been made more select, partly by a slight reduction of numbers where it could be done without real loss of power, and with increase of unity and accuracy.

Several of our best musicians have forsaken Boston; but in most instances their places have been fully made good. Mr. HARTDREGEN, last year leading violoncellist in Thomas's Orchestra, is now with us, and we have gained an excellent first Oboe in Mr. KUTZLER, who has been engaged expressly from Leipzig. The concerts will open with at least 10 good violins, 8 second, 5 or 6 cellos, 7 double basses, and the full complement of wood and brass, never more select than now.

The ten programmes are determined in nearly all the essential features, leaving room for alteration in a few numbers only as specified below. It will be understood that the pieces marked * are given for the first time in these concerts; those marked , for the first time in Boston, while  means first time in this country. And it will be seen that the proportion of new music is very large.

First Concert, Nov. 9.

1. Overture to "The Water Carrier,".....Cherubini.
2.  Concert Aria: "Ch'lo mi scordi," with Piano and Orchestral accompaniment.....Mozart.
Mrs. C. A. BARRY.
3. Short Entr'acte from "Manfred," (second time).....Schumann.
4.  Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella,".....Schubert.

1.  Songs with Pianoforte:
a. "Con rauco mormorio," from "Rodelinda,".....Handel.
b. "Aprilläuten" (April humors),.....Franz.
2. Pastoral Symphony.....Beethoven.

Second Concert, Nov. 23.

1. Overture to "Leonore," No. 1. (second time).....Beethoven.
2.  Concerto for Violoncello.....Gottmann.
ADOLPH HARTDREGEN.
3.  Symphony, No. 5, in C.....Mozart.
1.  Concerto for the Oboe.....Handel.
AUGUST KUTZLER.
2. Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven.

Third Concert, Dec. 7.

1. Overture to "Fanciulla," (second time).....Cherubini.
2.  Symphony, No. 8, in E flat.....Haydn.
1. Piano Concerto.....Beethoven, or Chopin.
MISS ANNA MARLIG.
2. Concert ("Fest") Overture.....Rietz.

Fourth Concert, Dec. 28.

1. Overture: "In the Highlands,".....Gade.
2. Piano Concerto, in F sharp minor (second time).....Norb. Burgmüller.
E. PHRADO.
1. Symphony, No. 4, in E flat.....Beethoven.
2. * Overture to "The Ruler of the Spirits" ("Rubezahl"),.....Weber.

Fifth Concert, Jan. 4, 1872.

1. Overture, "The Fair Melusina.".....Mendelssohn.
2.  Symphony in C (Grand Duo for Pianoforte, op. 140, instrumented for Orchestra by JOSEPH JOACHIM.—Copied expressly from MS. in Vienna).....Schubert.

1. Adagio and Andante from "Prometheus." Ballet.....Beethoven.
2. * Concerto for the Clarinet.
MR. WICKER.....Schumann.
3. Overture to "Genevieve.".....Schumann.

Sixth Concert, Jan. 18.

1. Organ Toccata in F, arranged for Orchestra by ESSER.....Bach.
2.  Symphony, No. 3, in A minor.....Gade.
1. Piano Concerto, in D minor.....Mozart.
RICHARD HOFFMAN, of New York.
2. Aria. (?)
3. Overture to "Fierabras.".....Schubert.

Seventh Concert, Feb. 1.

3. Overture to "Coriolan.".....Beethoven.
2. * Piano Concerto.....Bennett (?)
B. J. LANG.
3. * "Tasso: Lamento e Trionfo.".....Liszt.
1. * "Oxford" Symphony, in G.....Haydn.
2.  Overture für Harmonie-Musik (Wind Instruments), in C.....Mendelssohn.

Eighth Concert, Feb. 23, (Friday).

1.  Concert Overture, in C.....Gade.
2. Aria.
8. * Symphony, No. 2, op. 140, in C.....Raff.
1. Piano Concerto, No. 3, in C minor.....Beethoven.
J. C. D. PARKER.
2. Songs with Pianoforte.
3. Schorno, from op. 52 (second time).....Schumann.

Ninth Concert, Mar. 7.

1. Symphony, No. 2, in C.....Schumann.
2.  Overture: "Tausend und Eine Nacht" (Arabian Nights' Tales).....Taubert.
1. * Piano Concerto, No. 7, in C minor.....Mozart.
HUGO LEONHARD.
2. * Overture to Racine's "Athalie.".....Mendelssohn.

Tenth Concert, March 21.

1. * Overture to "Lodolika.".....Cherubini.
2. (?) * Choruses for Male Voices:
a. Part-Song: "Nachtgesang im Walde," with accompaniment of four horns.....Schubert.
b. Foresters' Chorus, from "Pilgrimage of the Rose" (with horns).....Schumann.
3. * Concerto for two Violins.....Spohr.
1. Heroic Symphony, No. 8.....Beethoven.
2. (?) Double Chorus from "Antigone": "Hear us, Bacchus.".....Mendelssohn.

Concert Review.

Illness deprived us of Mme. PAREPA-ROSA's three concerts, in which we learn that the great singer displayed some of her best power, especially in Beethoven's "Ah! perfido."

The first pair of Mr. PECK's Popular Concerts (Sept. 27 and 28), were very successful. The selections, miscellaneous of course, were mainly good, the artists excellent. The feature of most novelty and interest was the performance of the blind violinist, Mr. JOSEPH HIRSH, who indeed shows a remarkable mastery of his instrument and is perfectly at home in all the virtuoso arts. His tone is fine, his cantabile full of feeling and of breadth, and there is real nerve and vigor in his bravura execution. He played operatic fantasias by Ernst, Vieuxtemps, &c., and was well accompanied on the piano by his wife. The singing of Mrs. WEST and Mrs. BARRY, Mr. FESSENDEN (a very sweet light tenor), and Mr. BARNABES, both in songs, duets, and quartets, was highly acceptable. Two more of these concerts were set down for last evening and this afternoon.

Miss ANNE PHILLIPS gave a concert in the Music Hall on Tuesday evening, which was a remarkably good one of its kind. A small but quite efficient orchestra performed the overture to Yelva (Reisiger) and Egmont. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, in excellent voice and style, sang "Veni la mia vendetta" from Lucrezia Borgia; and then appeared Miss Phillips and her protégé,—for whose introduction, as we understand, she gave the concert—Miss CORNELIA STRICK, a young lady who went from this vicinity a few years since to study with Garcia in London, and who recently returned with Miss Phillips. The Duet from Semiramide "Ebben a te ferisce" served to show not only a pure soprano voice of great sweetness, flexibility and evenness throughout a large compass, but sound method and good style, and great fluency and grace of florid execution. Her appearance, too, was pleasing, and her manner altogether natural and modest. There was no particular intensity of expression, nor was that required. In "Qui la voce" from the Puritani she won still more upon an appreciative audience. It was an auspicious debut.

Miss Phillips herself sang in her very best style, both in the Duet, and in the Page's song: Nobli Signor, from the Huguenots, and was of course obliged to answer the enthusiastic recalls with some ballads.

Another admirable violinist made his first appearance here that night, in the person of Signor SARASATI, an Italian of refined appearance and a most finished, refined style of playing. His own fantasia on themes from Martha was cleverly constructed and displayed a wonderful perfection in all the technical points of modern violin playing. The Andante and Finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto were also very artistically rendered; the Andante with hardly breadth and largeness enough, but the Rondo with a fine vivacity and finish.

NEXT IN ORDER. Nilsson in Opera! On Monday evening and throughout that week and the week following, the Boston Theatre will be the scene of the first dramatic appearances of the admired Swedish singer in America. The combination—principal artists, chorus, orchestra, and stage appointments—appears to be of the best and most complete that we have ever had. The list is fully before the public and does not need recital here. The luxury will be expensive, but that does not seem to be a damper on the eagerness to secure seats. One fault we have to find with the announcement, and that is the (at least seeming) want of frankness in not stating, for the information of the public, that Nilsson herself sings only on alternate nights; most people (coming from a distance too) have no suspicion of the fact. The first night no doubt will give an admirable performance of Faust, to be repeated in the matinee of Saturday. Tuesday, the "Barber;" Wednesday, Lucia; Thursday, Martha. It will be a great week to those who can afford it.

Great interest awaits the debut in the Music Hall of Mrs. MOULTON, who in her maiden years, in the society of Cambridge and of Boston, excited greater admiration than we ever knew of any amateur by the wonderful beauty of her voice, her quick musical instinct, and the possession of so many of the natural gifts that go to make a singer. Since her marriage she has resided in Paris, where her singing in private circles has for years been famous. She has not been a "severe student" of music and does not court any exciting antagonism with those who have been trained to a public career; but wherever she has sung either in society, or (as in the New York Academy) for charity, the applause of artists and critics has always followed her efforts, to a degree that warrants her in seeking, professionally, a wider fame. Mrs. Moulton will first sing in New York, and will give her first concert here on the 30th inst., to be followed by others early in November. She will have the aid of Sig. Sarasati, the violinist, and an orchestra; what more we are not yet informed.

Mr. GEORGE DOLBY's first Ballad Concerts in Boston are announced for Oct. 14th, 15th and 16th. Of course there will be eager audience for such noted English singers as Miss EDITH WYNNE, Mme. PATEY, Mr. W. H. CUMMINGS (who will be truly welcome back again), Mr. PATEY, and the great baritone, Mr. SANTLEY, besides Mr. LINDSAY SLOPER, a London pianist of long established reputation. The thing will be unique and choice.—Twice in November, twice at Christmas time, and twice later, these English artists will join the Handel and Haydn Society in oratorio performances: Judas Macabæus, Elijah, St. Paul, Messiah, &c.

CLASSICAL CHAMBER MUSIC promises exceedingly well. Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG, aided probably by Mr. Hartdegen, the new cellist, Mr. Kutzleb, the new oboist, Mr. Kreseemann and Mr. Glogner-Castelli, true interpreters of the best German song, are to give six Trio Matinees on Thursdays, alternating with the Harvard Symphony Concerts. The most important Trios, Quartets, Sonata Duos, Sonatas, &c., for Piano alone, of Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, Chopin, &c., and songs by Franz and others, will compose the programme, which cannot fail to be thoroughly artistic and attractive.—Mr. PARANO will begin his concerts in January.—By that time too we may expect something from the Mendelssohn Quintette Club.—Miss ANNIE MEXLIN purposes to give several Piano Matinees in Boston.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 25. The musical season here was "inaugurated" on the 11th of September by the Vienna Lady Orchestra. It was not a very great success. The class of music played was of the poorest and of the most popular order. It can hardly be called an orchestra, as there are no brass or wind instruments, excepting the flutes, a piano and melodeon being used in their place. The audiences were not large, except on the first night. Twelve concerts were given, and they are to leave this week for the West. Mr. Theo. Thomas closed his season of concerts at Central Park Carden, last night, when he gave the 134th concert. It has been the most successful season he has yet given. The last two weeks the orchestra was increased to nearly sixty performers. The programmes always contain something good, and Thursday evenings the second part is made up of classical music exclusively. Last Thursday he gave us a fine performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and the week before of Schumann's fourth. His orchestra leave for the West about Oct. 1. He has engaged Mlle. Marie Krebs as the soloist, for the season.

The opera season, which promises to be unusually fine, will commence Oct. 2d, at the Academy of Music, when Mme. Parepa-Rosa will appear in the "Daughter of the Regiment." Among the novelties promised during the season, is Cherubini's "Water Carrier."

As soon as the English opera is over, the Italian opera will commence, with Mlle. Nilsson as the great attraction, and last five weeks. The opening performance will be "Faust."

The Dolby English Ballad troupe, consisting of Miss Edith Wynne (soprano), Mme. Patey (contralto), Mr. W. H. Cummings (tenor), Mr. J. G. Patey (bass) and Mr. Santley (baritone), will give four concerts at Steinway Hall on Oct. 9, 10, 11 and 12th.

The Harmonic Society, which has been apparently dead for some time past, has suddenly sprung into life. They will perform during the season the following works: "Samson," "Elijah," "Messiah," "Creation," "Hymn of Praise," "Judas Macabæus" and "Acis and Galatea." They have secured, as conductor, the inevitable Dr. Pech, and also the Dolby English Ballad quartet. The orchestra will number sixty-two, and the chorus three hundred. The first performance will take place at Steinway Hall, Oct. 31st, when "Elijah" will be given.

Among the musical events to take place next month, the debut of Mme. Charles Moulton is much talked of. She has never sung in New York, except in a Philharmonic rehearsal, some two years ago. The event takes place Oct. 16th.

The Church Music and Philharmonic Societies, will commence in November. The concerts of the former will probably take place in the Academy of Music.

The season certainly promises well, but why is it that New York is almost totally destitute of classical chamber concerts? None, or nearly none have been given since the Mason and Thomas soirées, which had to be discontinued, after thirteen seasons, for want of patronage.

I had almost forgotten to state that the great German tenor, Herr Wachtel, made his first appearance in New York, a week ago, at the Stadt Theater. He sang in a trashy French opera, and to-night sings in "Trovatore."

Of Wachtel, in his third rôle, George Brown in La Dame Blanche, the Sun says:

As Wachtel discloses his abilities, in the several works in which he has become famous abroad, it becomes evident that he possesses the rare faculty of singing equally well in serious and in comic opera. We believe that with the Americans he will be most in favor in the former, and with the Germans in the latter. Our people love tragic music, and are not half so merry-minded as the Germans. Besides, in comic opera there is much spoken dialogue, which to those who understand German is pleasant, but to those who do not a bore.

Boieldieu's is one of the best works ever written for the French stage. It has been one of Wachtel's greatest operas, but it does not give him that opportunity to make use of his highest artistic gifts that other and more serious operas afford. Still he makes it apparent even to those who have not heard him in any other work, that he is a great singer. His voice is brilliant rather than sympathetic, and it is without a break in all its compass; his vocalization is very perfect, and the ease with which he carries through a long and arduous part admirable.

MUSIC IN PHILADELPHIA. The season promises richly. Of course it would be superfluous to tell of what is set forth in the programmes of the various troupes of flying visitors from Europe, who will do the same in Philadelphia that they do in Boston and New York and Western Cities. The Quaker City has already had the Vienna "Lady Orchestra," and will of course have Nilsson, and Parepa-Rosa, and the Dolby Ballad people, and Jullien Junior, and all the rest; and Thomas with his orchestra, of course, will be welcomed there on his annual circuit through his extensive diocese. One other novelty, of which Boston sends the nucleus (the Mendelssohn Quintette Club), is in progress there this very week, opening the season ("inaugurating" is the Gulmorine for it) with a whole week of "grand vocal and instrumental concerts of classical and miscellaneous music" night after night. The Quintette constellation carry with them as attendant stars a quartet of our singers: Mrs. Weston, Mrs. Sawyer, Mr. Packard and Mr. F. J. Sprague; also Mr. Arbuckle, our unsurpassed cornet soloist; also Mr. de Ribas, oboist, Mr. Hamann, hornist, Mr. Becher, fagottist, and Mr. A. Heindl, contrabassist. These enable them to produce a rich series, not only of string quartets and quintets, but (what is too rare in this country) Septets, Octets, Nonets, &c., by Beethoven, Schubert, Spohr, and Onslow. The rest of the week's programme, the larger half, is very miscellaneous and "popular," and is all set forth at length in a whole column of the newspapers, showing a queer potpourri of Art and business, the whole winding up with a concert by the Seventh Regiment Band of New York. The entrepreneur is Mr. T. B. Pugh.

More important and more interesting, in a sincere regard to musical Art progress, is a survey of what Philadelphia is doing for itself in the building-up of permanent local institutions. Here a remarkable activity displays itself. We are indebted to the Philadelphia Inquirer for a glimpse of the good things in preparation:

CHARLES H. JARVIS'S SOIREE'S.

Mr. Jarvis, our most masterly piano player, has already completed his arrangements for giving the usual series of six soirees in the piano rooms of Mr. Dutton, on Chestnut street. He will be assisted as heretofore, by Messrs. Kopta and Hennig, with a possible increase of the force at some of the concerts. The prominent points of his programmes offer a rare selection of noble and beautiful compositions. Among them will be the Toccata in C major of Robert Schumann; the Trio in E flat, opus 100, by Schubert; a Sonata, opus 121, in D minor, for piano and violin, by Schumann, and probably the D minor trio of the same composer. The Schubert trio, as a whole, will, we think, be new here. The first movement of it was given at one of Mr. Jarvis's soirees last winter. In addition to these Mr. Jarvis will himself play Liszt's piano transcription of Bach's great G minor organ fugue, and as a memorial of two distinguished musicians who have died during the musical recess, he will give Thalberg's Masaniello fantasia, and Carl Tausig's transcription of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," the latter for the first time here. The above are only a portion of the works to be given, and they alone give promise of really healthy and solid music.

MISS JACKSON'S PARLOR CONCERTS.

To Miss Anna Jackson belongs the credit of maintaining the only quartette club in the city. She has done this for years by her own untiring exertions, and the public reaps therefrom increase of benefit and pleasure in each successive winter. We believe the season which is about opening is the twelfth during which this conscientious, industrious and zealous musician has continued her quartette concerts. No amount of public appreciation can repay the toil which such an undertaking has demanded, but there is a sense of pleasure after all in seeing such a genuine appreciation of cultivated efforts as has been given to the concerts of Miss Jackson during a few years past.

Her scheme for the coming season comprises the usual number of concerts, only four of which, however, will be given in the evening. Two of them will be noonday or afternoon concerts, and the same players as heretofore will assist her. The programmes are not sufficiently decided upon to be announced at present, but they are sure to be good, and, doubtless, many of them new and important. No chamber concerts given last year contained so many novelties nor so much music, and it will be remembered that some of them, in instrumental strength and importance, were almost orchestral.

MR. WOLFSOHN'S MATINEES.

Carl Wolfsohn has likewise continued his concerts for a long series of years, and they have become an institution which his admirers will no longer dispense with. His absence from the country renders it impossible to give his projects in detail at present, while the retirement of Mr. Stoll makes it uncertain what violinist he may select. A good portion of his time will probably be taken up in arranging for the series of afternoon symphony concerts which he had already projected before going to Europe. These will be ten in number, and he expects to model his programmes after those of his former co-worker in chamber music, Theodore Thomas. That is, he will devote the first part of the concert to symphony, and the remainder to lighter music. We have great hopes that these concerts will be successful, and if Mr. Wolfsohn can succeed in getting good material in his orchestra the public will undoubtedly sustain him.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS OF MESSRS. CROSS AND JARVIS.

Speaking of symphony concerts reminds us that those most definitely arranged and announced will be given by Michael H. Cross and Charles H. Jarvis. They will be three in number, and a picked orchestra of forty-five players has been selected, and will perform under the direction of Mr. Cross. These concerts are expected to be, to a large extent, sustained by subscriptions, and already, without any public announcement, more than half the necessary funds have been subscribed. The programmes, for musical importance, exceed any that have yet been heard in Philadelphia. The three symphonies selected will alone render the series memorable. They are "The Fourth" of Beethoven (never before given here,) "The First" in B major, of Schumann, and the great Schubert symphony in C. In addition to these Mr. Jarvis will play a piano concerto at each concert as follows:—The third, in C minor, of Beethoven, the Schumann concerto, and probably one by Sir William Sterndale Bennett. An important adjunct to these symphony concerts will be the public rehearsals which are to precede them. These in New York are almost as well attended as the concerts, and the experiment was tried successfully by our Philharmonic Society a few years ago, and last year by the Harvard Orchestra of Boston. One advantage of it must strike the mind at once, that is the additional interest which two or more hearings will furnish to any important symphonic composition. Another advantage will suggest itself to musical directors, viz., the greater inducement which it will furnish to full attendance of the musicians at rehearsal. The reader will not fail to notice, in looking over our list, the prominent place which the music of Robert Schumann is likely to hold this winter on our programmes.

THE GERMANIA ORCHESTRA.

This time-honored organization has completed its plans for the winter, and will continue to give weekly concerts on Saturday afternoons, at the Musical Fund Hall. The first of these will be given October 7, and they will continue without further interruption for twenty weeks. The orchestra has been increased to thirty-six members, and the experienced direction of William G. Dietrich has been secured. The prospectus announces "many renowned compositions never before heard in Philadelphia." Among these are to be symphonies, &c., and in connection with them a series of grand evening concerts is projected to be given at the Academy, at one of which the management promise to produce the "Ninth Symphony" of Beethoven, with an orchestra of eighty and a strong chorus. This, of itself, if properly rendered, will be the crowning event of the winter, and one more added to the many favors for which we have to thank the Germania. Considerable solo talent, both vocal and instrumental, will be added to the afternoon concerts. One project among their announcements we most emphatically condemn, and that is the design to give Beethoven's and Mozart's most celebrated pianoforte sonatas arranged for the orchestra. We should as soon think of covering the stainless marble of the Greek Slave with flesh tints as of converting the Moonlight sonata into an orchestral piece. Not merely the effects of the work, but the intention of the composer is destroyed, and that, above all things, should be held inviolate by those to whom immortal works are entrusted for translation.

THE CHORAL SOCIETIES.

These are all busy preparing for the campaign, but as they depend more on amateur than professional talent, they are later in getting to work, and their arrangements are not yet fully perfected. We shall only glance over them very briefly, and reserve a more detailed account of their intentions until a later date.

The Handel and Haydn Society held their annual meeting about a fortnight ago, and elected Mr. Henry G. Thunders as their leader. The active rehearsals have just begun, and we may look for important work from the society before the winter is over.

The West Philadelphia Choral Society will give two concerts during the season, under the direction of their leader, Mr. Pierson. The first of these will be miscellaneous; the other will consist of some important single work, probably an oratorio. The rehearsals will begin next week.

The Beethoven Society will give three concerts—in December, February and April. Their leader, Mr. Wolfsohn, being still abroad, the regular rehearsals will not begin until his return. The works to be given are likewise in abeyance until then. We have heard suggested "The Paradise and Peri," of Schumann, as probable.

The "Abt Society" will give its usual complement of three concerts. This, it will be remembered, is the only American male singing society in the city, and has been closely approaching, in its ambitious and successful strides, the great German societies from which it has been modeled. The attention to expression which these fine voices betray, produces all the more effect in the close harmonies which distinguish male part-singing. The "Abt" has been increased to thirty-five members, and will be as heretofore under the lead of Mr. M. H. Cross.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Rheinvine Sharley. 2. C to e. Sol. S. Russell. 30
Blue-Beard. 4. Various Keys. Parry. 60
O Nixey, that's too thin. 2. C to f. Huntley. 30
If ever I cease to love. 3. D to e. G. Leybourne. 30
Wide awake come songs, each serving to raise a laugh, and the second and longest about twenty laughs.
Mother comes in dreams to me. Song and Chorus. 3. F to f. M. Leach. 30
Never more to see thy smile. 3. Bb to f. E. Christie. 35
Willie Brown. Scotch Ballad. 2. Eb to f. J. W. Turner. 30
Mother, I can see the Angels. Song and Chorus. 3. F to f. Harry Percy. 30
Little Footsteps gone before. Song, or Duet and Chorus. 3. Ab to f. Agnes Ashton. 30
Beautiful Bessie. Song and Chorus. 2. C to e. W. T. Porter. 30

Beautiful Ballads, all! We have only space to mention, as out of the common course, Mr. Turner's pretty imitation of a Scotch song, the peculiar and pleasing Chorus of the "Angels" lay, and the sweet, but mournful ending of the last song, where "Bessie" is lost.

- The Day is cold and dark and dreary. Duet. 3. Eb to f. J. Blockley. 40
The King and I. 3. F to f. Henrik. 40
It is not always May. 4. Ab to f. Ch. Gounod. 50
If doughty Deeds my Lady please. 3. Eb to e. A. S. Sullivan. 40
I will stand by my Friend. 3. Eb to f. G. Bicknell. 30

Five songs of classic beauty, sung by Santley and others. The first is well-known as a solo, but not as a duet, the second is bluff, honest, musical and taking, the third is Gounod-like, the next hearty, as is the last. Not a bad piece among them.

Instrumental.

- Gems of the Season. Arr. for Guitar by W. L. Hayden. 25
Shepherd Boy. Convenient arrangement of a popular melody.
Blacksmith's Anvil. Polka. 4. Bb. H. Eilmeier. 75
Love's Favorite Polka. 2. C. J. W. Turner. 30
Three Blind Mice. " 3. D. A. W. Maflin. 40
Three pleasing Polkas. The "Mice" sport a handsome lithographic title.
Lour Derniere Valse Brilliant. 5. D. J. Blumenthal. 75

High-class brilliant waltz.

- Jolly Brothers' Galop. 4 hrs. 3. Bb. Ch. Wds. 50
Marche des Tambours. " 4. Db. " 1.00
Arrangements by Wals of two of Sidney Smith's pieces, of which the melody of the first has a strange fascination. The last is very powerful, and a good exhibition piece.
Summerfield March. 4. C. W. A. Smith. 30
Fall of Octaves. Easy for large hands.
First Improptu. 5. Db. Max Schrattholts. 35
A sort of salon study, graceful and gliding.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof, (about one cent for an ordinary piece of music). Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 797.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 21, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 15.

"Where did you come from, Baby Dear?"

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

Where did you come from, baby dear?
Out of the everywhere into here.

Where did you get your eyes so blue?
Out of the sky as I came through.

What makes the light in them sparkle and spin?
Some of the starry spikes left in.

Where did you get that little tear?
I found it waiting when I got here.

What makes your forehead so smooth and high?
A soft hand stroked it as I went by.

What makes your cheek like a warm white rose?
I saw something better than any one knows.

Whence that three-cornered smile of bliss?
Three angels gave me at once a kiss.

Where did you get this pearly ear?
God spoke, and it came out to hear.

Where did you get these arms and hands?
Love made itself into hooks and bands.

Feet, whence did you come, you darling things?
From the same box as the cherub's wings.

How did they all come just to be you?
God thought of me, and so I grew.

But how did you come to us, you dear?
God thought about you, and so I am here.

Carl Loewe's Story of his Early Life*

(Continued from page 106.)

While I was absorbed in my Art studies, zealously toiling, and with the best result, the storm of excitement and uprising throughout the whole German land in the year 1812 began to roar. Napoleon's mighty armies succumbed to the elements and to the well planned strategy of his powerful northern foe. Some of the wretched remnants of the scattered troops marched through Halle on their way back to France. These unfortunate French soldiers, who had with difficulty reached our borders, were sorry pictures of distress. I yet remember one of them. He sat on one of the corner stones which stood at the right and left of the door way of Türk's house. Holding his billet in his hand, he had not been able to drag himself any further. To all my questions he replied with a soft voice: "Oui, Monsieur!" More than that the frozen lips could not get out. And before he could reach his quarters, the unhappy man died with his "Oui Monsieur" before my eyes.

The throne held by the grace of Napoleon began now to totter, and the kingdom of Westphalia soon collapsed. Halle belonged once more to Germany. Among the ruins of the Westphalian throne were also buried all the golden blossoms which a transient star of fortune had thrown into my lap a little while before. Gone was the yearly subsidy, forever gone all prospect of a journey to Italy! Whether I should ever wield the Kapellmeister's baton in Cassel had become a matter of pure chance. Türk, in his lively interest for my talent, would gladly have continued to instruct me without pay; but for him too the year 1813 had become a fatal one. Already the premonitions of an incurable malady showed themselves in him. All this began to weigh heavily upon my soul. But instead of giving myself up to helpless inactivity during this most melancholy period (I may well say) of my life, I too was seized with the universal enthusiasm for my Fatherland. Shall I be charged with ingratitude because, owing so much to the rule of the foreigner, I felt the glowing wish within me to march into the field against him? Can one control the voice, which from the deepest soul speaks for the Fatherland?—There was then an officer named Wucherer in Halle, to enlist young men for the national cause and for Lützow's "schwarze wilde verwegene Jagd." I can still hear how this corps made the Tyrtæan songs of Körner ring through the liberated provinces of Germany. To this recruiting officer I went: my youthful breast swelled proudly; like many other youths at that time I imagined that my sixteen years, which I had barely put behind me, were fully sufficient for the greatest deeds of heroism that stood before the German people. Wucherer looked at my not exactly small, but very tender physique, and thought that I had better wait awhile. This decision of the recruiting officer came down upon me like a crushing thunderbolt. All my plans and hopes were destroyed. I seemed to myself so small that I felt ashamed to show myself upon the street. I was not to take part in the bloody campaigns of the three years that followed; only from the sheltering roof of Türk's house could I, quiet and inactive, observe such incidents as were brought near to us in Halle.

On the 28th of April Halle was beleaguered by the Viceroy of Italy, Eugene Beauharnais, the son-in-law of the emperor; but a small corps of Bülow's artillery hindered the passage of the French across the Saale. With the restoration of the German power the Russians also had come into the land. A Russian regiment had advanced into the city and halted on the market place. I was buried in silent meditation on these strange forms. As none of them had any determinate physiognomy, they all looked enough alike to be taken for one another. It was like looking at a flock of sheep, which possibly may be distinguished by the shepherd, but not by a stranger.—What a difference there was between these people and the glittering French regiments which had marched through Halle in the year before, and which were soon to come back broken, woe-begone and ruined! Napoleon's Guard during its days of splendor showed a great number of characteristic personalities, as it regarded the expression of the face and bearing of the body. Earnestness, a sense of inward calling to subdue the world, military pride, boldness, versatility and splendor distinguished not merely the officers, but even the privates of these troops; on the contrary, in the features of the Russians an expression only showed itself when they felt a fear of their superiors. While the French were particular about their nourishment, the quantity of food was all the Russians cared about. The sauerkraut, their favorite food, was set before them in great kettles. Those who had become satiated lay down on their backs and let others sit upon their belly to reduce the roundness of their figure. For the rest the Russian soldiers showed themselves in general quite harmless. I still recall with satisfaction their strange Asiatic tunes, of which the melody was kept in the character of the church modes. While a part of them sang these songs, others waved their hands as one of their officers beat time. Quite as peculiar as the song of these soldiers, was their veneration for their priests. Once a chaplain was brought to the front who had been stealing. A subaltern officer kissed his hand, and then with the greatest reverence removed his robe and gave him over to two other soldiers. Only after the priestly garb was taken from him was he treated as the Russians treat thieves; he was laid upon a bundle of straw and regularly flogged; but then again he was reclad and kissed with the same marks of reverence. Harsh as these single traits were, still the great good-naturedness of the Russian soldiers had very much that was attractive for us; they were confiding and grateful, especially when one gave them brandy to drink.

While these strange phenomena were passing in review before my absorbed imagination, suddenly a cannon ball struck in the market place, not far from me, and shattered a leg of one of the Russian soldiers. I ran home in terror, but the Russian regiment took shelter behind the red tower. On the same evening a suburb, called the Strohbof, was set on fire by French balls, but the inhabitants soon succeeded in putting out the flames. On the next morning Halle appeared to be freed from besiegers, but there was fear lest the French should try to force a passage over the Saale in another place. The fortifications of the city, particularly the palisades and the tête-de-pont were examined, and on the Prussian side all male persons in the neighborhood were set to work at short hand digging trenches. I too shared the satisfaction of having worked at it all day. The women brought refreshments to their husbands; but as naturally no one troubled herself about me, I had an opportunity to practice abstinence. My appetite grew seriously in consequence. Even my old master Türk plied the spade in a right lively manner. He came to the work with the remark: "It goes to the head."

After that day I had no longer any great desire to take an active part in warlike operations. That sort of participation in the war of liberation had not suited my taste. The harder and the more unaccustomed our toil had been, the more astonished were we when the Prussians, with ut being in the least pressed by the enemy, gave up our laborious defenses and retreated from the city. Not until the next day did the French with ringing music and victorious mein march in, and we were once more under their dominion. But they had by no means given us up on the Prussian side.

* Translated for DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC from DR. CARL LOEWE'S Selbst-biographie. Für die Öffentlichkeit bearbeitet von C. H. BERTHA. Berlin, 1870.

On the 2d of May, Sunday morning, the French division Lauriston, which lay in our town, was suddenly attacked by a portion of Bülow's corps and driven with great loss across the Saale. This onslaught began about six in the morning; unsuspected by the French, the Prussians stormed the gates. The enemy, awakened from their sleep, mustered in hurry and confusion. They tried to beat back the attack, but were driven out with the loss of their artillery.

For a long time I watched the conflict, sheltered by a window pillar; but when the window panes began to be shattered by the bullets, Türk bade me to go down with him and his daughter into the cellar. There, while the little girl, terrified by the roar of the near conflict, clung to my side, I was not a little astonished to remark that our party had become increased by two persons. These were the Herr Captain von Pastineller and his worthy Frau. The warlike action had awakened in the invalid hero all the sleeping recollections of the battle of Jena. I could distinctly hear his teeth chatter.

At last the evil guests were banished from the city. One of them had in a remarkable manner slept through the whole storm. When he rushed out of his back chamber into the street and comprehended what had been going on, he fired his musket at the Prussians crowding round him and then ended his life under blows from the butts of their guns. People looked on quietly and busied themselves with searching for the numerous dead bodies that lay about the streets. On such days, when the nerves are strained to the highest pitch of terrible excitement, one sees no look of horror nor of loathing.

After these occurrences no one could imagine that there could still be Frenchmen in the city; yet the bloody drama of the day was not to be without an afterpiece. A little squad of Frenchmen had concealed themselves upon the red tower. These from their height suddenly began to direct their fire upon the astonished Prussians. Of course this little troop had to succumb to the superior force. The greatest part of them were cut down, while the survivors were destined to be stripped and taken prisoners.

For me these warlike events were the occasion of idleness and of unprofitable fancies. My musical studies had come to an end for the time, and I would gladly have gone back to the school of the Orphan House. But the Orphan House had been turned into a hospital, and both the teachers and the scholars fared as I did; they had plenty of spare time and could, without neglect of duty, watch the variegated warlike life that was developing beneath their eyes. No wonder, then, if every other business almost wholly ceased.

This gave me opportunity to witness the review which Blücher held of the Silesian army. The old hero stationed himself at the Gevatterbude on the Halle marketplace, and let the troops march by before him. I felt as if that moment in itself were quite enough to have lived for. Enthusiastic jubilation rang towards him from all sides. No one at that moment thought of the French domination, from which Halle was by no means yet entirely free. The fruit women kissed the greybeard's feet and offered him the best they had. He took thereof and ate, whenever there was a little break in the enormous line of regiments. This march through Halle of the Silesian army was very soon followed by the days of the battle of Leipsic.

We heard the thunder of the artillery on the 16th of October; at first from Möckern only. Then I was allowed no rest; I was obliged to see the terrible sight close at hand. I persuaded a comrade, by the name of Reiche, to go with me upon the battle field. At first he looked at me with astonished eyes; but the thunder of cannon has a remarkably attractive power for German youth; Reiche too could not resist it, and so we set out on our way together on the 17th.

Behind Skenditz the first victims of the battle excited our attention; they were Cossacks, left behind there. Presently we reached that famous barn of Möckern, which was so obstinately defended by the French, but finally was set on fire, and the unfortunate defenders burnt to death. From here along we found Prussians and Frenchmen peaceably lying side by side in long rows. The grapeshot had stretched them out by companies; on almost every face a great repose had settled; the distortions of the death struggle were nowhere to be seen.—We approached the same army which we had seen march by the field marshal in Halle. The heights of Möckern were strongly occupied. The wounded were carried to Halle, where the Orphan House with its thousand chambers offered an excellent hospital. The Prussian soldiers enjoyed seeing us two youths among them, and not another mortal far and wide was to be seen. I was fortunate enough to find a friend among the officers of the Landwehr, who informed me of the progress of the fight at Möckern and of their expectations for the coming days.

Before us, in the plains of Leipsic, rolled a prodigious and incessant thunder from the battle which the peoples waged against each other. But the balls did not reach the station of the regiments encamped in our vicinity. They had already richly done their work. At times the wind scattered the endless clouds of smoke, which whirled off in the distance, and the assisted eye could then overlook the situation of the battle; but very quickly all was veiled again by smoke of powder.

The sun declined, when suddenly the drums beat the generale around us. The cavalry were obliged to mount, and the infantry were under arms. Here we had a picture of what was left after such a battle, of a company, a battalion or a regiment. Many a company counted not more than three or four men. The most of them had no more officers. The under-officers commanded.

Properly we should have gone back to Halle, but curiosity would still detain us. We could not separate ourselves from the exciting scenes that surrounded us. We saw cavalry approaching in the distance. The Saxons had again come over: the prudent Saxons put themselves under the Prussian colors. They had handkerchiefs upon their swords and with these they saluted their German brothers. These answered with a lively "Hurrah!"

Behind us stood 20,000 Swedes in the reserve; the host spread along the horizon like a cloud.

Prince Bernadotte commanded in person. This upstart king snuffed the mouldy smell that spread itself abroad from the throne of Napoleon.

My friend, the officer, gave me at parting, from the spoils that lay in heaps about us, a pair of beautifully adorned pocket pistols, and to my comrade Reiche a little dagger. The evening grew dark and we had at last to make up our minds to setting out upon our homeward way.

We could already see the towers of Halle, when a Cossack met us, took away our gifts, and even treated our watches and our money as his own property. When he had taken from us all he rode off slowly, whistling, as if he had done nothing but his duty. In speechless sorrow our eyes followed our watches and our purses. Of the pistols and the little dagger, we could say: "Soor won, soon lost!" A second encounter with Cossacks was destined to be still more calamitous for us.

Meanwhile we kept on toward Halle, where the woe that war brings with it met us in melancholy forms. Here typhus and the lazaretto fever raged. Many important men were snatched away by these diseases. I may name among them only Reil and Jacob, brother of Councillor von Jacob, besides the well-known Kapellmeister Reichardt. Reil had done much for Halle; especially he had brought the salt springs and the mineral springs of the place into repute. It was he that had induced the Weimar troupe of artists to come to Halle in the summer. Therefore the sympathy shown at his funeral was unexampled. He was buried in an old giant's grave that lay in his garden, which was a present from the king. This giant's grave (Hünengrab) is still called Reil's mound. Often since have I read with emotion the stanza of Horace designated for his tombstone by the deceased; it is engraved upon a simple small black tablet fastened without ornament upon the rock:

"Linquenda tellus et domus et placens
Uxor, neque harum quas colis arborum
Te, præter invisas cupressos,
Ulla brevem dominum sequetur."

As Türk's choir sang at all these funerals, so too we accompanied Johann Friedrich Reichardt to his last resting place. This solemnity was particularly affecting to me. For I had often had occasion to go into the house of the celebrated song composer. Türk corresponded with him, and I often had to take his letters to Giebichenstein to his friend. Reichardt knew my musical talents, and he took pleasure in laying before me his own and his daughter's works. With the daughter I sang duets. Goethe's Songs of the Müllerin, of Reichardt's composition, never pleased me at all on account of the text; on the contrary I have since won many friends with Reichardt's beautiful song of Türk: "Im Windesgeräusch," because I sang it well and liked to sing it.

In this unhappy year for Halle (1813), when sickness and the miseries of war in all shapes occupied all minds, it was impossible to devote oneself to any continuous studies. I was glad enough therefore to accept the invitation of a friend, named Müller, to make a journey on foot with him to his parents' residence at Heldrungen. Near Heldrungen lay the old Sachsenburg, which had occupied my youthful fancy in a lively manner; with careless hearts we had left Halle, and we already saw Heldrungen lying at our feet, as we emerged from the thicket of the woods. But we had not much time to enjoy the prospect, for besides the beauty of the landscape we also spied, not too far off, two Cossacks. I still had an uneasy recollection of those Cossacks who had relieved us of our watches and our money on the way home from Leipsic. It was a serious matter, any way, meeting these born highway robbers. We hurried back into the woods at once and hid ourselves in a dense thicket. But Cossacks have as sharp eyes as Indians; not one of our movements had escaped them, and to our dismay they turned their horses directly toward our hiding place. We stood as if we were petrified, for in these wild riders, with whom man and beast seem to have been cast together from one mould, and in whom the scent of the wild beast is added to the elyness of the savage man, there is no mercy. They began with pulling off our coats, then followed the waistcoats, the trousers, boots and stockings, with all the cash we had about us. They sought in vain for our watches, of which their comrade had already robbed us. And now that we were almost naked we hoped to be set free, but now the agony began. The rascals drew forth their knouts, thinking to extort from us the treasures which we might have concealed. They rode gloomily and slowly round us in a circle; but when they had at length arrived at the conviction that we had nothing more, one of the Cossacks gave me a heavy parting blow upon my breast with his fist, so that for several weeks I could not breathe without pain, and then they went their ways. We waited until it began to grow dark, and then wandered sad and freezing toward Helderungen. It seemed to me as if a bad dream tortured me, so strangely did I appear to myself thus wandering in my shirt. I thankfully received the garments which Müller's parents gave me.

[To be Continued.]

The (Boston) Musical Season.

The musical season in Boston may be said to open with the first performance of Italian operas at the Boston Theatre this evening. For although we have had a series of three miscellaneous concerts of a high order, in which the principal artists of the Parepa-Rosa opera troupe took part; although Miss Phillips's concert served to introduce two new and excellent musicians to Boston hearers, and although we are in the midst of a very enjoyable course of cheap and popular concerts, yet these are rather the heralds of the coming hosts than the advance guard of the army itself. A glance at the list of good things in store for us proves that we are at the beginning of a memorable season,—one unsurpassed in this country in many years, both in the amount and in the quality of the higher class of musical entertainment with which we are to be favored during the coming months.

The season of Italian opera, beginning to night and lasting two weeks, claims the first notice, but here we can add little to the full information that our advertising and reading columns have already given. We may, however, congratulate the Boston public on the honor of being the first to hear the great Swedish singer, Mlle. Nilsson, whose she has won her highest reputation abroad, on the operatic stage. We presume that the promise of a representative of Ambroise Thomas's grand opera of "Hamlet" will be kept; and in that case we shall witness the famous impersonation of Ophelia, a part which she is said to have "created," and which many critics declare has one sustained an opera that has not otherwise earned the right to live. The rest of the company has been selected with much care from the hosts of foreign singers who were ready to work in the American mine. We need not repeat the names of the gentlemen and ladies, unknown and well known, who are to fill the several parts. We have no doubt from the reputation they have already achieved here or elsewhere, that in a musical point of view at least the season of opera will be one in striking and agreeable contrast with the "scratch" performances with which we have been compelled to content ourselves of late years.

Not to follow a strictly chronological order in speaking of the several important events of the musical season, we may mention next the coming of the Parepa-Rosa English opera company in January for a season of three weeks. The efforts of this company, as constituted heretofore, caused a veritable revival of interest in English opera, and as it has now been strengthened by the addition of several excellent singers, and its repertory having been enlarged by many works, some of them wholly new to American audiences and others now for the first time clad in an English dress, there is every reason to believe that the honest attempt of its managers to please the public by presenting an entertainment worthy of patronage, will meet with the success it deserves. Among the new adaptations are Balfe's "Satanella," and Fioravanti's "Columella," both new to America; Donizetti's "Anna Bolena" and "Lucrezia Borgia," Wallace's "Lurline," Rossini's "Gazza Ladra" and Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera," besides Cherubini's "Water Carrier," the overture to which is familiar, but which is, as an opera, an entire novelty in this country.

While we are thus to be favored with representations of the lyric drama, the prospect for musical entertainment of another sort, but of the highest class, is more than usually favorable. Our two great associations, the first our chief source of supply for the best instrumental compositions, the other the admirable interpreter of the oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn, have laid plans that are not more tempting in the promise than they are likely to be in the fulfilment. The programmes for ten Symphony Concerts, on alternate Thursday afternoons, beginning on the 9th of November and ending on the 21st of March, have been substantially arranged. We are promised three symphonies by Beethoven, all familiar, two by Haydn, both wholly new to Boston, and one each by Mozart, Gade, Schubert, Raff and Schumann, of which only the last has ever been heard in Boston, some of them never before in this country. In the other numbers of the programmes, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Handel, Schubert, Schumann and other composers are to be represented by works that have never before been played in Boston. It will give an idea of the amount of new music in these concerts if we say that, of the forty-nine numbers on the ten programmes, three are new in these concerts, twelve others are new in Boston, and seven more have never been performed at all in America. In other words, almost one-half of the music will be now first performed in the Harvard concerts. The soloists will be much the same as in past years. Four of our resident musicians, Miss Mehlig and Mr. Richard Hoffman of New York, will play pianoforte concertos at six of the concerts: Mrs. Barry will sing in the first; we are to hear solos for the clarinet, oboe and violoncello in two others, and in the tenth a chorus of male voices will take the place of a soloist. As these concerts are invariably well patronized and give the highest delight to the cultivated ears they address, we only mention these particulars to show what is in store for them. The Handel and Haydn Society, too, is actively in the field, and although no announcements have been made by authority, we may say that the society was never in a more efficient and flourishing condition than now. It is strong enough to exercise a more rigid exclusiveness than heretofore toward applicants for membership, with a consequent gain in the unity and power of the chorus. This is a highly encouraging feature of the situation, since recent experience shows that the Boston public is becoming more appreciative of the work of the chorus. During the last week in November the oratorios of "Judas Maccabæus," and "Elijah" are to be given; on Christmas eve, "St. Paul;" on Christmas evening, the "Messiah," and on two evenings at least in January, two other oratorios not yet named. It is not unlikely that oratorios will also be given at Easter. During the season the society will attack with renewed energy the "St. Matthew Passion-Music" of Bach, so difficult to learn, but which the Boston public seem prepared to hear and appreciate, judging from the reception of the few tit-bits [?] already given.

For the six oratorio performances decided upon for the months of November, December and January the members of the Dolby ballad troupe are under engagement with the Handel and Haydn Society. The two ladies and three gentlemen who are the vocalists of this company have a reputation of the best kind in their native land, and one of them added greatly to the artistic completeness of the May festival of the Handel and Haydn. They are to give us a taste of their quality in the neglected field of English ballads, glees and madrigals, in a short course of ballad concerts next week. Our own London correspondent told us in his last letter how much these singers would be missed in England, and how earnestly all concert and oratorio goers hoped they would be sent back as speedily as possible. Add to these concerts the piano matinées which Miss Mehlig proposes to give, the classical trio matinées that are to alternate with the Harvard concerts, and other series of chamber-music which we have not even space to mention, and it will be acknowledged that the musical season promises to be of more than usual duration, of more than usual variety and excellence, and in point of quantity something almost unprecedented.—Daily Advertiser, Oct. 9.

The Five Festivals.

(From the Orchestra.)

This year for music has been a year of curious and singular events. We have had a swarm of clever professors from France, and although brief the sojourn of some, the influence of the great school of practical art emanating from the Paris Academy has been felt in our theatres and in the music teaching of the metropolis. Then there has followed the opening of the great Hall at Kensington, the Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace, the Rhine Festival at Cologne, the Beethoven Festival at Bonn, and the Annual Festival for the clerical charities by the three Western Cathedral choirs this year held at Gloucester. Nor should be forgotten the opening of Westminster Abbey to the great church music of Sebastian Bach, and the introduction once more of the orchestra—a full orchestra—as an important adjunct to divine worship, and of immense teaching results to the profession and the public at large.

The organ in the Albert Hall has brought out Bach; Sydenham put forth Handel; Cologne and Bonn promulgated Beethoven: the three prophets in song of clear sight, invariable truth, and of honest, upright artistic frame of mind. With these three men of might, the power of art was ever subservient to the distinct necessity occasioned by the emotion. They had fathomed the hidden connection between sound and soul, and made themselves familiar with phases, forms, and combinations of tones which to this hour strike the ear as strange, weird, and incomprehensible, although never lawless, irreverent, irrelevant, wild, or disconnected. Musical creation is identified with the personal character of the composer; hence the almost deification of Handel, the saint-worship of Bach, the glorious fame of Beethoven. Their music is the express revelation of their lives, the temper of their moral beings. Bach and Handel lived in the days of the first set of the French philosophers who prepared the way for the triumph of atheism, the downfall of Christianity, and the horrors of a great nation in the hands of the dogs of the people. Whilst Voltaire was doing all he could to undermine the historic marvels of the Evangelists, Bach was not only teaching himself but setting others to teach the great miracle of the Gospel—and his exposition of the wondrous history had its power in his own day; and that power is now expanding and strengthening, nor can we calculate the immense good likely to arise from the present attention paid to the commentary of Sebastian Bach upon the histories of St. Matthew and St. John. Song has not lost its mastery over man's heart; and if music be stronger than laws—for so it was limited to be in older days—we may find the Cantor of Leipzig a foremost reasoner in the controversies of Colenso, Darwin, and all the propounders of atomic and meteoric philosophies. No one can doubt that it is religious feeling which so keeps Handel's music to the fore. The oratorio of the "Messiah" carries sail and wafts with it the "Israel" and the secondary Biblical dramas of the great composer. The oratorio of the "Messiah" took the orchestra into Westminster Abbey more than eighty years ago, founded the Western Festivals, the Birmingham Festival, and has proved the chief attraction of all and every Festival from Handel's annual celebration at the Foundling Hospital to the present time. By means of the songs and choruses in this oratorio the people have been teaching one another the great truths of the Christian Church, requiring neither creed nor articles. Whilst High and Low Church, Prelacy and Congregationalism have had their smart tussles and more mischievous fights on a larger scale, the great vocalist, the fine orchestra, and the huge chorus have sounded the alarm, intoned the faith, settled the uproar, and done what bishops and archbishops could not do—brought peace and calm. And so it ever will be. Song is a long way ahead of logic, especially logic upon mysteries and the supernatural. The Pope may declare his infallibility, and councils reiterate the dogma, but "Ein feste Burg" and the other people's chorals have been sung throughout the length and breadth of France. Louis the Grand no doubt imagined he had for ever silenced the people's hymn in the Strasburg Cathedral, but the hymn and the tune have conquered, and the old choral has again been heard in the old Minister there, and the work of the great French Monarch undone and put right. With Luther's hymns in their knapsacks, the German soldiers were a great company of preachers—an improvised Church Missionary Society—with kings and princes, in place of bishops and merchants, as patrons. Each division contained so many Boanerges—sons of thunder—who failed not to drum hymn and tune into the ears of the astonished Celt. Such is the "influence of art united with the power of faith."

With Beethoven music was a means of light. He for some time held a fancy creed, but with it an assured conviction that he had his special mission, and was sent to teach through music. He was inclined to dispute the great creed of the Church, but when setting it to music in his last Grand Mass, although the internal struggle was beyond measure painful, the joy burst in, and the new-born light is heralded in triumphant tone and tremendous effect. Art occupied his whole being, and a continual contemplation of the spiritual and supernatural in order to weld it into his being and take hold of it in his art, ended in the bursting in of the clear light, and put everlasting life into the music. This Mass is in truth the personal struggle—the personal victory of the composer—"This is my creed and there is no other:" such is the defiant language of Beethoven's last Eucharistic service.

In all really grand Festivals—reunions for testifying to the power of doing in art—only that music is exhibited which manifests the concentration of the powers of the composer. In fact it comes to a personal worship. Now the supernatural—the revelation of God to man—has hitherto proved the favorite theme of all celebrated musicians—for love and gratitude are the best and highest incentives for the employ of our faculties when rightly used. Genius exercised in any other direction is shorn of half its light, denuded of more than half its potency. Thus the great musical festival, whether here or in Germany, is in some sense a religious reunion; it is an Ammergau drama without the terrible accompaniments for the eye. And it is a foreshadowing of the promise, "All the world shall sing of Thee." It has been a question whether or not the Western Cathedral meetings should be given up. Although "country conducting" had its mishaps and inevitable failures, and that odd notion of a cathedral organist, "I know all about it, and no one else knows anything," was proving a misery and a mischief to all parties—still the real point that endangered the existence of these festivals was the question of the propriety or impropriety of music as a teacher of religion independently of service. Is it the correct thing for vocalists and instrumentalists and chorus singers to come in to a cathedral and "teach one another in psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs?" and not only to "teach one another," but to teach a Dean and Chapter, a Bishop and his Chaplains, Archdeacons and Rural Deans, Rectors, Vicars, and Curates—nay, a whole diocese—lay and clerical? Well, the question has been fought over for just one hundred and thirty-seven years, when in steps the illustrious Bach with his Commentary on Saint Matthew. The people begin to sing; the solemn organizing surge of that opening rhythm is heard; all feel the act of worship—that the Cathedral is the only place for such music: and indifferent and mediocre as was the mere performance, through circumstances unnecessary to mention, Sebastian Bach triumphed over all, and the question as a religious one is for ever put at rest.

Had it been necessary to justify the use of an orchestra in a Cathedral, or to demonstrate that real devotional music could be presented there, independently of service, and yet operate largely and beneficially on the feelings, the production of the Bach Passione and its æsthetic results would go far to settle the dispute. But the Country Cathedral Festival rests not upon these grounds. The clerical corporation contents itself with a very moderate exhibition of artistic music, and once in three years becomes suddenly afflicted with the epidemic of a week's grand music in order that the country people may gather round the Mother Church and become more intimately acquainted with the residents in the Precinct. There are nightly private assemblies, and on the "Mess'ah" day the grand County Ball. Without these reunions there would be no Festival, no sermon on the use of music in churches, and no importation of musical talent from the Metropolis. No man can rise higher than the daily reiteration of his acts, and no cathedral organist can jump out of his skin, forget the one hundred and fifty weeks of chants, services, and routine anthems, and by miracle, or else mere act of conjuring, place himself on a par with the foremost London Conductor, and rival him in his duties. Until the orchestra gains a permanent footing in the Cathedral, and the organist is found dealing with high-class music, if there is to be a Festival in a Cathedral, let those manage it whose business it is to be daily and weekly concerned in such undertakings. Sebastian Bach composed the Passione music because he had an orchestra and large chorus constantly in his church, Sunday after Sunday, all the year round. He lived with and in his orchestra. A Cathedral organist lives with his boys, his six men, and his organ, and here is the entire length and breadth of his musical activities. The man with the baton always in his hand must have the advantage, and the garrison bandmaster, the conductor of the telling orchestra at the City Balls, would each make himself more at home with a large orchestra than the artist over ivories and pedals, small choirs and psalm chants. François Cramer settled this in St. Paul's Cathedral long ago. At the Festival for the Sons of the Clergy, Dr. Hayes from Oxford was accustomed to conduct, or rather to try to conduct, the London Band. On Dr. Hayes waving his baton there was no response. Another elevation of the wand, and no sound. Hereupon Cramer broke in: "When that gentleman sits down we will begin." So Dr. Hayes sat down and never again appeared. The country Cathedrals must make every Sunday more like a grand musical festival, and the Deans and Chapters must make it their foremost charge that high-class music be heard in these sanctuaries. Increase the choirs and make fine music the real offering in these churches, and then there may be some hope of success with the organist, conductor, and the triennial meeting. If cathedral music is to be the arme of art music for a round of three years, then cathedral music must be the pabulum of the Festival, and all parties will be injured to it, like it, and pay for it. Further, it would be in keeping with the object of the Festival—the charity—a kind of mild and patient requiem over the dead bodies of the Minor Canons, whose families are the beneficiaries on the occasion.

In Germany the art-point over-rides the devotional: everybody becomes critical, the youngest chorister æsthetic. A Tonten festival is a serious thing, and amateur artistic gatherings, high solemnities—Cologne goes to Düsseldorf, and Düsseldorf and Cologne meet again at Bonn. A new Empire is at stake, the Rhine is agitated. The Cathedral organists stick to their organs and depart not from their rôle. The right man is found in the right place; no miracles are sought for, no conjurings practised, and the result is the one aimed at and expected.

The real opening of the Albert Hall has yet to take place. The organ and the players have done some little for Bach, but the musical power of England has yet to be represented in this Hall. It is no place for mere sensual play of sounds; and unless used in a right and specific direction will fail in its mission. We do not ask for the Beethoven Mass, for a representation of this commonly costs the Sacred Harmonic Society from four to five hundred pounds, but there are great things yet in oratorio which cannot fail in filling the exchequer. The Albert Hall may be conservative, but it must not be bigoted. It may lead the way, it must not hinder or impede.

Carl Tausig.

BY HANS VON BUELOW.

(Translated for this Journal from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, Leipzig.)

It may be fifteen or sixteen years since, in Weimar, at the Academy, the boy Carl Tausig was introduced by his father to Dr. Franz Liszt, with the request that he might be pleased to give the boy instruction. The father was himself quite an intelligent gentleman, musician and teacher; in his day noted as one of the most elegant players of Thalberg, he did not belong to that abominable species of fathers, the fathers of wonder-children. We disciples, who were present at Liszt's home during this introduction, shall never forget the wondering astonishment, almost mixed with awe, which the play of the wonderful boy caused us, and which irresistibly won the master's heart and head. What thunders, what lightnings, what heat-lightnings!—what energetic rhythmic fire, what a variety of colors, not lacking in shades of wondrous tenderness, though the character of his play was preëminently stormy and passionate. We were all perfectly electrified, and Peter Cornelius, not at all in want of words ordinarily—he united the power of stating his impressions with finest faculty of receiving them—could merely stammer: "Why, that is a regular devil of a fellow!" To be sure; but it was not a devil escaped from the lower world, but one who had fallen down directly from heaven, an arch demon of talent, a demon whom the man, possessed by this talent, succeeded in taming, in subduing by restless work of self-culture, by force of his artistic tendency; whom he succeeded in making subservient to the most elevated tasks in art, in short, changed him into a veritable angel of light.

During the time of his studies in Weimar, Carl Tausig was by no means satisfied with the cultivation of his talent as a virtuoso, perfectly ready, even then, for concert playing; but diligently he studied all musical disciplines theoretically and practically. He was practically attracted to the study of the orchestra by the frequent theatrical productions and concerts under Liszt's spirited direction, which were truly splendid, and full of highest inspiration to the smallest detail. He diligently applied himself to the art of orchestration. His attempts at composition in this period, exhibit a blooming, original fancy and a remarkable certainty and skill in orchestration, besides divers "impossibilities" and labored extravaganzas. All these attempts were afterwards formally withdrawn; among them a Piano Concerto, a concert Polonaise, both with orchestral accompaniment, several "Symphonic Poems," for instance, one entitled "Manfred," and the ballad "The Spectral Ship." The latter became almost fatal to Tausig's fame as a musician, by an unfortunate piano arrangement, and by a still more unfortunate publication of the same. I shall not dwell on this side of Tausig's eminent talent, which is little known, because its manifestations will not be open to public criticism. Those who are able to judge of the mastery with which Tausig transcribed the most difficult orchestral music imaginable, for his instrument, will not be surprised at it. One not as much at home in the domain of the orchestra as Tausig was, could never have arranged so conscientiously and in a manner surpassing all possible praise, the piano score of Wagner's most complicated musical drama, "The Master-singers of Nürnberg," an arrangement surprising by the skill with which things seemingly untranscribable are joined together: the same may be said of his paraphrases of six fragments of various string-quartets by Beethoven. Speaking of this I must not omit to mention his partially new instrumentation of Chopin's E-minor Concerto, which he made during the last part of his life. I am uncertain which to place highest, his piety to Chopin, or the individual finesse and elegance with which he went to work; but I am sure that its publication will place Tausig as a musician still higher in the regard of many of his colleagues.

Besides these artistic studies, Tausig occupied himself with the acquisition of languages and the study of philosophy and mathematics; in fact the discipline of his mind was carried on as thoroughly as the practice of his fingers. Tausig long ago made a motto, which Richard Wagner had written on an album leaf, and which I had copied for him; it was his guiding principle in all the varying epochs of his life. It reads as follows: "It is knowledge that is destined to nourish and to chasten the holy flame of art in its disciples."

In the orchestral and chamber-concerts established at Berlin by the subscriber (January 1858, &c.,) the young man Tausig for the first time publicly played in that city, which afterwards he chose for his residence, and which still later was to be the resting place of his earthly frame. His playing caused great excitement, according to the different temperaments of the auditors (a fact which, in judging of musical parties so-called, ought to be taken into consideration more frequently than it is); he was admired without stint by some; by others, especially those who never can understand that "even the most turbid must may at last become a noble wine," he was condemned almost altogether. For several reasons, better here passed over in silence, partly also on account of his personal ambition—not having then formed in his mind the high ideal of the mission of a piano-player,—Tausig did not choose Berlin for the starting-point in his career of a virtuoso. The striving for, and attainment of, this high ideal was to secure for him afterwards his world-wide fame. So he went on his travels for his laurels. Seduced perhaps by my personal example in Berlin, he at once went to Berlin, to make similar attempts at propaganda in his quality of an apostle of the music of the future. His youthful and enthusiastic desire for activity found free play here in his occupation as director, more even than in that of pianist. If the proverb: "Many enemies, much honor," be really true, then he ought to have exchanged at least the double amount of glory for his propaganda in the interest of New Weimar, connected as it was with important sacrifices of every kind. But this was by no means the case. . . . What matters it, on which of the innumerable roads the individual arrives at the Rome of truth, according to the difference in his talents, and how long it takes him to get there? Whether we come to Wagner through Meyerbeer, whether to Beethoven through Berlioz and Liszt (the guides are indeed as worthy of the goal as Virgil was worthy of a Dante); whether to Bach and Cherubini through Mendelssohn, or to Mendelssohn and an understanding of his plastic art through the antiplastic though most interesting and beautiful labyrinths of Schumann, what matters it? Only he who is really come to maturity is able to recognize in Mendelssohn the greatest genius, as far as form is concerned, after Mozart. The principal point is that the goal be reached, which consists in the harmony arrived at by much struggle of the artist with himself, and in the harmony with his special calling, which though in a subordinate sphere, can never be imagined without a reference to the leaders in art, and to the principal demands of the latter. . . . Had Carl Tausig developed normally, in the usual straightforward model routine of a conservatory, he would probably never have been the man whose loss for the world of art to-day we have to regret so much. His confession as an artist, when he had fought his way to the harmony mentioned before, might be expressed in the same words which master Liszt once used to designate his own: that there really are only two parties in art, one consisting of those that know and can do, and another (to which no one was willing to confess that he belonged) of the dust-up-whirling ignoramuses and impotents.

(To be Continued.)

Music Abroad.

VIENNA. From Vienna we learn that the Abbe Liszt has finished his great oratorio "Christ," which will soon be performed in that city. The work is divided into three parts, comprising fourteen different heads, viz.:—1, The Introduction; 2, Pastoral and Vision of the Angels; 3, Stabat Mater Speciosa; 4, Song of the Shepherds in the Manger; 5, The Anointing of the Three Kings; 6, Hymn of Praise; 7, Pater Noster; 8, The Establishment or Foundation of the Christian Church; 9, The Storm on the Lake; 10, The Entry into Jerusalem; 11, Tristis est anima mea; 12, Stabat Mater dolorosa; 13, Easter Hymn; 14, Resurrection of Christ.

It is stated that a Wagner Association has just been formed at Vienna, and is only waiting to be legally sanctioned, previous to commencing active operations. Its object is to give a practical answer to the appeal addressed by Herr R. Wagner to his friends some time ago—to facilitate the performance of his "stage festival play," "Der Ring der Nibelungen," at Bayreuth, in the summer of 1873, and to assist Austrian Wagnerites in their laudable efforts to witness the "stage festival play" aforesaid. The first aim of the association will be to procure as large a number as possible of the patrons' tickets at 300 thalers each, of which 1,000 are to be issued by the patron's committee at Berlin, and to constitute the requisite capital of 300,000 thalers. Each patron's ticket of 300 dollars may be divided into three parts each, each part admitting the owner to a separate performance. The association propose establishing branches in the various towns and cities throughout the Austrian Empire. The funds are to be raised by private subscriptions on the part of the members of the association, as well as by concerts, theatrical performances, &c., the gross receipts going to purchase patrons' tickets for poor musicians and musical students.

The programme drawn up by Herr Anton Rubenstein, as conductor of the Gesellschafts-Concerts, will include many works, both of old and modern masters, never yet heard here. Such, for instance, are Bach's celebrated Psalm "Eine feste Burg," and various novelties by the Abbe Liszt, Herron Brahms, Goldmark, &c. Herr A. Rubinstein's own sacred opera: Das verlorene Paradies, and the whole of Robert Schumann's Faust music will be performed.

STRASSBURG. The Conservatory has been re-organized. It will re-open, under the title of the Town Conservatory, some time in October. Herr Franz Stockhausen, from the Conservatory, Leipzig, has been appointed director.

BRUSSELS. The operas recently given at the Théâtre de la Monnaie have been Les Mousquetaires, Le Barbier, La Dame Blanche, and Lucia. The business has been far from good. The same may be asserted of the artists newly engaged, of the chorus, and of the band.

PASTH. According to a letter recently received, the Abbe Franz Liszt will return in the beginning of November, and remain through the winter. In the same letter it is stated that he will produce his oratorio of Christus here before producing it elsewhere, just as he did with his Heilige Elisabeth.

SALZBURG. Herr Julius Epstein, professor at the Vienna Conservatory of Music, has been named an honorary member of the Cathedral Musical Union, and of the Mozarteum.—The Beethoven Centenary was duly celebrated by the latter institution on the 3d inst. The hall was festively decorated and lighted. Beethoven's bust, crowned with a laurel wreath, stood in a perfect bower of flowers. The proceedings opened with a prologue in verse, by Herr Carl Ziegler. Then came the Sinfonia Eroica, given with such spirit as to produce two recalls for the conductor, Dr. Bach. This was followed by the vocal chorus, "Ehre Gottes"; March and chorus, and Turkish March from Die Ruinen von Athen. The last piece had to be repeated. Professor Epstein, assisted by the chorus and orchestra, then played the Pianoforte Fantasia.

MUNICH. Travellers passing through Munich next week may feast themselves, if inclined, on Wagner's compositions, of which the principal are being given at the opera in that town. "Rheingold" and the "Walkyr" will be performed on the 18th and 20th of this month. It seems that Italy is to have its Wagner mania, like other continental countries, for "Lohengrin" is to be performed in grand style at the Teatro Comunale at Bologna. An Italian audience will thus have an opportunity of judging for themselves of the merits and demerits of the much despised and also much praised Musica dell'avvenire.—Standard, Sept. 16.

MILAN. As we have already announced, Signor Verdi's new opera, Aida, will be produced at the Scala this winter. About two years ago, the Viceroy entrusted a French author with the task of working an old episode of Egyptian history into a story. This story was put into the form of a libretto by Signor Ghislanzoni, and Verdi undertook to set it to music for the Vice-Regal Theatre, Cairo. His price was 150,000 francs. Verdi completed his score, and the scenery and dresses, which had been got up in Paris, were waiting to be transported to their destination, when Paris was besieged. Nothing was injured, however, and the dresses, scenery, &c., were duly forwarded at the conclusion of peace. Aida will be produced at Cairo in November. The Viceroy purchased with the 150,000 francs above mentioned only the right of producing the opera at his theatre before it was produced elsewhere. The firm of Ricordi has bought the right of performance at other theatres, and of publication, for 60,000 francs, so that the composer has already received the respectable sum of 210,000 francs for his work.

London.

PROMENADE CONCERTS. M. Rivière's programmes during the past week have been judiciously selected, to suit different musical tastes. On Friday last, Mozart's Twelfth Mass was given, with M^{me}. Radersdorff, Miss Helen d'Alton, Mr. Nordblom, and Mr. Whitney, as exponents. Tuesday was a "Meyerbeer night," when selections from L'Etoile du Nord, Robert le Diable, Le Prophète, and Les Huguenots, were heard with unqualified pleasure. On the same evening, Sir Julius Benedict's new march, "William and Olga" (composed for the Silver Wedding of the King and Queen of Wurtemberg) was produced, conducted by the composer, who was received, on his entrée, with warm applause, which at the conclusion of the march, was repeated with enthusiasm. This march—a decided success—gives further evidence of the remarkable ability of its distinguished composer, and has been repeated every evening with, if possible, increased effect. Beethoven was in the ascendant on Wednesday, when "The men of Prometheus" overture, the Pastoral Symphony, the pianoforte concerto in C minor (pianist, M^{me}. Julia Wolff), a violin romance (played capably by Mr. Viotti Collins), were the pièces de résistance, and Rossini's Stabat Mater was repeated last night with the same vocalists as on the previous occasion. The "classical music" lovers have had, therefore, little cause for complaint during the week, and the theatre has been fully and fashionably attended in consequence. Sir Julius Benedict held the bâton at each performance. The "miscellaneous" parts of the programme, under the bâton of M. Rivière, have also proved attractive, the late Jullien's "British Army Quadrille" coming in for its full share of applause; while the Princess of Trebizonde Quadrille by Arban, the Bridesmaid Waltz by Godfrey, and the galops, marches and waltzes by M. Rivière, have quite satisfied the admirers of dance music. During the week the Processional March from Mr. W. G. Cousins' Maid of Orleans has been heard with pleasure, and there is little doubt of M. Rivière bringing this, his first series of promenade concerts, to a successful termination.

The death is announced of Mr. Cipriani Potter, formerly Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, one of the most illustrious of Beethoven's pupils. He was born in 1792, and received his earliest instructions in music from Atwood, Calcott, Crotch, and Woelfl; and afterwards pursued his studies in Germany. At Vienna he enjoyed the friendship of Beethoven, who gave him advice and assistance. Mr. Potter held for many years an eminent place among our musicians, and was formerly one of the conductors of the Philharmonic concerts. He distinguished himself also as a composer and a pianist. When Principal of the Royal Academy of Music (in which office he succeeded Dr. Crotch), he greatly contributed to the usefulness of that institution.

Paris.

The French are still troubled by the foolish supposition, which has never yet been accepted as truth out of France itself, that singers and musicians, whatever their success may have been in other lands, cannot rest easy until their triumphs have received the "sanction" of a Parisian audience. On the strength of this delusion, M. Oscar Commettant proposes, in the Siècle, that immense subventions shall be given to the principal lyrical theatres of Paris, in default of which the prestige he attributes to these establishments will, he thinks, be endangered. The means he proposes for raising the subvention money are ingenious. He would tax the café concerts and other refreshment houses corresponding more or less closely to our music-halls, and with the proceeds form a subvention fund. Thus those who live by art, mingled with and corrupted by beer and coffee, would contribute to the resources of those who live by art alone. The tax on café-concerts ought, he estimates, counting their number at 250, to produce 840,000f., and he demands the contribution of an additional 860,000f., half from the State and half from the municipality of Paris. Of the 1,700,000f. thus obtained, he would give 300,000f. to the Opéra Comique, and the same sum to the Théâtre Lyrique. The Italian Opera would receive only 100,000f., while the subvention accorded to the French Opera (otherwise "Académie" or "Grand Opéra") would be raised to one million. According to a Paris correspondent of the Independance Belge the subvention question has already been decided. M. Jules Simon, Minister of Fine Arts, at an interview with the members of the Budget Commission, convinced them of the inadvisability of withdrawing the subventions altogether, and ultimately persuaded them to all: annually, the following sums:—To the Opéra, 600,000f.; to the Théâtre Française, 240,000f.; to the Théâtre Italien, 100,000f.; to the Opéra Comique, 100,000f.; to the Odéon, 60,000f.; to the Théâtre Lyrique, 60,000f.

The authors, musical and literary, whose works are performed at the subvention theatres, will, for the present, in lieu of percentage on the receipts, receive 500f. a night. This sum is declared by those chiefly interested in the matter to be insufficient; but as the subventions are being reduced, and may before long be entirely withdrawn, and as the salaries of the singers and musicians are at the same time being cut down, it is not unreasonable that the sums payable in authors' fees should also be diminished. At the Opera, artists in the receipt of less than 6,000 a year are to be paid their salaries in full. Those entitled to salaries above that figure will have 15 per cent. taken off, which for artists at 6,500f. will be trying.

The deaths of Auber, Fétis, and M. Gauthrot, have occasioned many vacancies in important musical posts. Replacing Auber, Ambroise Thomas has already entered upon his functions as director of the Conservatoire, where the classes were re-opened on the 2d of September. He may be expected to show more energy than the veteran composer whom he succeeds; and it is stated that his first object will be to direct the studies of the pupils to the music of the classical masters alleged, of late years, to have been neglected. The death of Fétis left vacant the directorship of the Brussels Conservatoire, to which M. Gevaert, hitherto chorus-master at the Grand Opera of Paris, has been appointed. M. Gevaert is succeeded at the Opera by M. Victor Massé, composer of Galathée, Lara, &c. It is expected that M. Gauthrot ("chef du chant") will be replaced by M. Bizet, son-in-law of Halévy, and composer of Les Pecheurs de Perles.

All engagements at the Opera with leading performers ("protagonists," as the Italians humorously call them) seem to be at an end. Le Méseurt expresses a confident hope that M^{me}. Sasse (formerly M^{me}. Saxe) and M. Faure may be re-engaged; but the director, M. Halanzier, being still uncertain as to the amount of subvention to be accorded to him, is naturally uncertain as to the terms he may be able to offer to his principal artists. The musical papers speak of a "singing bass" ("bass chantante"—an expression which has no special meaning now that every bass is expected to sing), M. Boutry by name, of whom great things are expected, and who will, in any case, make his debut at the Opera; also of a florid soprano ("soprano à roulades"—again an absurd expression, since the talent for executing roulades to perfection is accompanied by and includes other talents), M^{lle}. Thibault, whose engagement is already signed. M^{lle}. Thibault is the daughter of the late conductor of the musical band at the Opera, who was killed by a shell during the second siege of Paris.

As to new works, the Parisians are promised, in the first place, M. Reyer's "Erostratus," an opera in two acts, originally composed for Baden-Baden, and performed there in the ancient days, when it used to be said that Baden was a piece of France on the German side of the Rhine, Strasburg a piece of Germany on the French side. The latter observation still holds good in a very literal sense; but the former, now that Baden is deserted by the French, has lost its meaning. That highly national composer, M. Mermet, who, like Herr Wagner, writes his own librettos, has a "Jeanne d'Arc" ready, which, under existing circumstances, ought at least to obtain a "succès d'occasion." M. Eugène Diaz, son of the great painter of the "colorist" school, has reason to expect that his prize work, "La Coupe du Roi de Thulé" will be produced in the course of the winter. Finally, M. Ambroise Thomas's "Psyché," composed for the Opera Comique, is, with the indispensable recitatives added, to be brought out at the Grand Opera. Several pieces from "Psyché" have already been performed at the concerts of the Conservatoire. Psyché, Eros, and Mercury are the principal characters, and the part of Mercury has been rearranged by the composer with a view to its performance by M. Faure.

M. Gounod's "Polyeucte" (a subject already treated by Donizetti in "I Martiri") is not to be given for the first time, as some one, it seems, has reported, at the Royal Italian Opera, but at the Grand Opéra of Paris. At the performance which recently took place at this theatre, for the benefit of the victims of the war, the money paid for tickets amounted only to 5000 francs. An additional sum of 800 francs was collected in the house by the Duchess McMahon and Madame Jules Simon. Thus, calculating that the audience consisted of about 1,200 persons, each patriot must have given for the benefit of his distressed countrymen something like fifteen sous. The programme was attractive enough, consisting as it did, of the second act of Faust, the second act of La Muette de Portici, the fourth act of Les Huguenots, and the fifth act of L'Africaine. On the other hand, it was a hot night.

M^{me}. Miolan Carvalho has accepted an engagement at the Opéra Comique, where she is to make her first appearance in the thousandth representation of Herold's always fresh and charming work La Pre aux Clercs. M^{me}. Balbi-Verdier is singing at the Athénée, which has just reopened with Martha. Flotow's popular opera will be followed by M. Boisselot's Ne touchez pas à la Reine. M. Garcia, son of Signor Manuel Garcia, has made a very successful debut as a concert singer, and is about to be heard at the Athénée in the part of Figaro.—Lond. Mus. World.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 21, 1871.

The Vocal Works of Bach and Handel.—

Letter by Robert Franz.

(Continued.)

We resume the translation of Robert Franz's "Open Letter" to Edward Hancklick, giving the history of his experience in the important work of completing the accompaniments of various Cantatas, Masses, Oratorios, &c., of Bach and Handel, and an exposition of the principles by which he has been guided in the work. After telling how it happened that the scores of these works, as originally left, are in many parts mere sketches as regards the harmony,—namely, because the composer himself, presiding at the organ or the cembalo, was the central nerve of the whole performance, in whom all the threads of all the interwoven parts were united, he proceeds as follows:

The all-important matter was, then, to restore a setting, unconstrainedly in keeping with the composition as it lay before us, which should not disturb its fundamental mood of feeling, but rather heighten its expression. Of course it had to be kept in the style and spirit of the master—a task which presupposed sure mastery of the forms of that time. The arts of simple and double counterpoint, of Imitation, of Canon and of Fugue: these to the ancients were no limitations; and so the arranger, or restorer (Bearbeiter), now, must never feel himself constrained by them.

Having achieved a satisfactory setting in this sense, the next question was of the material with which it should be represented. In Bach's and Handel's time they had made use of the cembalo and the organ; at times indeed two cembali and two organs were brought into action. Apart from the fact that no one at the present time is competent to decide the very important preliminary question: when it was for this instrument, and when for that one to co-operate, there are still other grounds to warn us against a too extensive use of either of them. The cembalo has gone down in the stream of time, and with it a multitude of contrasting tone-tints, which, leaping out from the mixture of the 4, 8 and 16-foot tone, undoubtedly produced astonishing effects. Much as this loss is to be lamented, we must accommodate ourselves to it: our present piano forte is hardly a fit equivalent for the old cembalo. If, for example, the violins in the upper octaves have to execute an accompanying counterpoint to the Cantilena, supported only by the basso continuo so far apart from them, such tone relations are by no means smoothed out and adjusted by the intervention of the piano; on the contrary they gape asunder with a still rougher edge. Our ears, refined by the modern orchestra, will justly protest against such imperfections and demand a remedy.

"Now as to using the organ, this stands at our service when the performance is in a church, but far more seldom in a concert hall. So long as this obstacle is not removed, one is often enough obliged to renounce the use of it. But other, not less weighty reasons tell against a too extensive use of the mighty instrument: it seldom is in pure tune with the orchestra, because its temperament is equal, while that of the latter is unequal. Moreover its tone has a stiff, unyielding character, which does not speak out easily in all the registers and is produced by means of an extremely complicated mechanism.

"These considerations seemed to me of enough importance to warrant the assigning of a somewhat more limited activity to the cembalo and the organ in the accompaniment. The former, for which of course the piano had to be substituted, was especially adapted to the accompaniment of the secco recitative; the latter could serve as a means of reinforcement in the decisive passages, supplying the somewhat wanting brilliancy. But the real bond fide accompaniment, that is to say, the setting derived from the figured bass, was entrusted to the orchestra. This had gained remarkably since that time in versatility and in expressive faculty,—qualities which ensured it a vast superiority over the earlier material of accompaniment.—The clarinets and bassoons commended themselves, because their effects of tone corresponded so well to those of the organ; they furnished too an excellent means for the expression of four-part composition, which could be introduced everywhere in a manner altogether natural and unconstrained. In performances care had to be taken to place this reed quartet in the neighborhood of the first contrabasso, with which it stood in strictest intercourse. In this way the accompanying material clung elastically to the singing voice and made one almost forget that it did not lie in the hand of one person, the original accompanist. The mellow horns covered up the sharpness of the shrill high trumpets, oboes and flutes lent occasional finer lights and shadows, and so of all the instruments.

"Accordingly I made my arrangements, and I was joyfully astonished at the success they had. The orchestra soon found itself all right; the singers gained in confidence, because they were sympathetically sustained by that; and all that was desired for the obligato instruments was a support, which like a fine cement should gently bind together tone-relations that lay so widely apart. Besides, my labors saw themselves richly rewarded by the unmistakable sympathy of the public, who could hardly believe that they were listening to that old, odd music, which had cost them many a heavy hour already. In short, everything contributed to convince me of the truth of my principles and of its worth for practice.

"That my work was in general accordance with the principles which Mozart followed in the arrangements (Bearbeitungen) which he made, I could scarce surmise at that time, when it was very difficult to get a look into the originals. It was some time later that I first became aware of it, not without satisfaction. If in this fact I see no accident, but rather a necessity implied in the very nature of the tasks, I trust this will not be set down to presumption on my part.

"And now the wish came naturally, to make the results which had been gained in Halle available for wider circles. And soon the opportunity presented itself for publishing some scores, so that one by one the following arrangements (Bearbeitungen) appeared: Bach's Magnificat; his Cantatas: "Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss" (My heart was full of heaviness); "Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit" (God's own time is the very best of times); "O ewiges Feuer, O Ursprung der Liebe" (O eternal Fire, O Source of Love!); the "Trauerode" (Funeral Ode); and finally the "St. Matthew Passion." Also Handel's Jubilate, Astorga's Stabat Mater, and Durante's Magnificat.

"For all these publications I promised myself a rapid success,—but found myself unfortunately much deceived. The suspicion, that the majority of artists, while they are fond of bearing the name of Sebastian Bach upon their lips, have not the dissemination of his works seriously at heart, seemed painfully confirmed. Besides, some might not fancy being prescribed to by one of their contemporaries in things which every one would trust himself to execute as well or better.

"With this was coupled the uncertain, groping attitude of the criticism of the day. Instead of accepting the works in question as novelties—which for the present age they surely were—and bringing out at length the long reserved account of their extraordinary worth, they left them almost wholly considered, contenting themselves with all the more petty fault-finding with regard to my part of the work. It seems scarcely to have entered the heads of these critical gentlemen, that here possibly was a question at issue, in the good or bad decision of which the fate of these works, for some time to come, is closely involved. Such labors fell, according to their opinion, into the category of "arrangements," which might consider themselves fortunate to find themselves consigned to the "mere mention" column (kleine Schrift) of the musical journals.

"To render my position still worse, there came up at that time a tendency, which occupied itself paramountly with historical-archæological studies in relation to music, although it occasionally laid its hand upon what was purely artistic. The coryphæuses of this school came forward with a strong self-consciousness, but unfortunately with very moderate artistic qualifications; nevertheless, as they exercised no trifling influence with the pen upon the papers which made music their speciality, they knew how to make themselves quoted as authorities. Of course the question of the principles that should now govern in the arrangement (or elaboration) of old musical works, was at once drawn into the circle of their investigations: if it found no satisfactory solution, it was at least agitated. In regard to the material of accompaniment, as a matter of course, they went straight back to the means of representation employed by our ancestors, that is to the cenbalo and the organ. In this point they were all agreed; less so about the method to be followed in the labor of completion. While some set up the curious demand for the "greatest possible neutrality of filling out," and wished to have such work confined to the most modest limits, others showed themselves less scrupulous and thought that one only needed a clear insight into the A B C of this matter (the art of accompaniment), to help himself everywhere with ease; every clever musician forsooth, nay every dilettante conversant with music, is competent to enter upon the right way with certainty without any tedious studies. That "the greatest neutrality of filling out" must necessarily lead to characterlessness, and this "clear insight into the A B C of the matter" to obvious trivialities, was never thought of.

(To be Continued).

Italian Opera.—Nilsson.

Italian Opera, or Opera in Italian (a more precise term for it of late years) had almost lost its prestige and run itself into the ground here. It is long since we have had performances and troupes of singers to renew the glorious traditions, the golden days of Boio and Badiali, of Grisi and Mario, &c. Speculating managers had found a way of making money with a cheaper sort of thing, while the old enthusiasm for Italian Opera among real, cultivated music lovers had pretty much died out. But Mr. Strakosch, seeing his opportunity in the general desire to witness the rare gift of the young Swedish singer in that sphere of art where she has been said to be most at home and greatest, has really organized a company worthy of NILSSON, and worthy to be mentioned with the good old times. The "bright particular star" herself has shone with even greater lustre than in the concert room, and so far as we have read the feelings of those around us, as well as felt ourselves, has realized the highest expectations. Associated with her there have been: first, a new tenor, one of the freshest and chief ornaments during these last years of the French stage, M. CAPOUL; an excellent French basso, too, in M. JAMET, and a good baritone in M. BARRE. All these French Italians, like their queen the Swede, are artists of a refined, distinguée quality, not coarse natures, such as rely on a few loud bursts of tone and a mere physical vigor and intensity of soulless "passion" to bring down the house. Then for a prima donna of the "off nights," particularly in comic opera, French again, a florid and vivacious singer and actress, young and handsome, Mlle. DUVAL. Our own genial Contralto, too, Miss ANNIE CART, has been quite as acceptable upon the stage as she was in the concert room. Then there has been Sig. BRIGNOLI, redivivus, either under the quickening Nilsson magnetism, or under the spur of emulation in presence of a new and formidable rival; and Sig. RONCONI, still the chief of buffos, so far as acting goes, while traces of the artist and true singer are still frequent in the ruins of his song. The orchestra and chorus, held for the most part well in hand by MARETZKE, have been ample and effective.

The one thing which we have not thought fully worthy of Miss Nilsson and her audience has been the very hacknied repertoire of pieces. She has sung in Gounod's Faust three times, in Lucia and Martha twice each, and in the Traviata once;—Il Barbiere, La Fille du Regiment, La Sonnambula, and La Favorita, without Nilsson, have been interspersed to fill out the season of ten evenings and two matinées.

But it has been, upon the whole, a rich fortnight of refined enjoyment, bringing, amid the painful experiences of these days, the sweet refreshment of a pure and fine enthusiasm. The true ministry of Art, to make the soul within feel free and glad and full of faith and hope, however dark the world around, has for a brief time been exercised here in this temple of the Muses. And chiefly through the spell of genius which informs the voice and look and motion of this young Northern singer. With each successive rôle, all widely differing, the truth and vitality of her dramatic instinct, the genuineness and fine intensity of the feeling, and the power to translate it into beautiful and thrilling song and action, have been more and more apparent. She is the "born actress" suggested to us in her concert singing; and patient art, guided by a true intelligence, has greatly ennobled and refined the gift.

Most, but not all, were satisfied of all this on that first night, the night of great expectations, when that vast crowd, including the most cultivated and most critical, musically, or in some other way, assembled to witness her impersonation of Gretchen in Faust. Now Gounod's opera is not entirely a favorite with us. With much fine music in it, here and there subtle and profound, and of course full of dramatic interest and meaning (for that is Goethe's), brilliant too with modern instrumentation and with contrast of scene and character and passion, it is still a heavy and fatiguing opera. Faust was too great a task for any musician less than Beethoven, or possibly Schumann, to undertake to solve in music: and, any way, Goethe's part in it must still be ten times as great as the musician's. It is too great a story even for the spoken drama; of course too great for an opera, of which the matter must be simple to give music a fair chance. The result is, that, with all its fine scenes and passages, it seems confused and fragmentary, lacking the dramatic continuity which more common operas have. And this is the reason, we imagine, why some of the most intelligent listeners, admirers of the Nilsson's song, found something "cold" in her impersonation, otherwise so perfect, and were "not carried away" by it except in single moments. We must own, ourselves, too, that now and then, for instance in the scene where her brother dies, she did seem to us for some instants to stand outside of the drama, and to throw herself back into it by force of will, of which she manifestly has no lack. But then, again, in the terrible scene where the evil spirit will not let her pray, but prompts her to the direst desperation of remorse, she rises to a magnificent intensity of tragic pathos, and the abandon with which she swoons and falls in terror is complete. There is a rare power shown also in the final prison scene. But, to go back to the first entrance of the simple maiden, and to her heart's discovery of its new, mysterious secret at the spinning wheel, with the ballad of the "King of Thule," and then the beautiful and rapid growth of the great passion, the love scene in the garden, all that,—what could be more maiden-like, more natural, more beautifully touching! The voice, which is purity itself, so smooth and fine, pervading the whole space, and felt so near at every point,—the colorless, white voice, as we have called it, yet taking on the color of every changing mood of feeling; the voice, so exquisitely modulated, so even, almost effortless in its increase of power,—the voice and the song itself seem always subordinated to the feeling and the situation, as if the character, the drama sang itself. Her Margaret would probably make a greater impression the second than it did the first time; it was not our luck to see it twice. It were a wonder, could any artist forget herself entirely on such a night, when the shadow of a great calamity was over all,—the thought of the great city of the West in flames.

In Lucia her triumph was complete. Indeed she made this most hacknied of sentimental operas a fresh, new thing to us. For there is originality in all she does. Into each part she puts the charm of her own individuality, which however, being imaginative, creates and realizes each distinct ideal character assumed. Her Lucia was a beautiful, consistent, logically developed whole, from the fresh maiden tenderness and ecstasy of love, mingled with dread presentiment, in the first scene, to the trying requisitions of the mad scene, which she made altogether beautiful as well as unspeakably affecting. Scenes of acted craziness have commonly made us squirm, but here was the light of the ideal, the saving grace of true Art, resting on it all. The agonizing sacrifice in the betrothal scene, too, was portrayed, realized with thrilling power of action and of song. Musically, too, it was the same pure, poetic whole. Never has she sung more charmingly, whether in the tender cantabile, or in the brilliant, marvellous bravura of the bird-like passages with flute accompaniment. The impression of the whole impersonation was electrical, and spread abroad a great desire to hear and see the wonder, as the enormous crowd at the repetition last Wednesday evening proved.

Again, in Martha, an entirely new character. Here all the sunshine, grace, and beauty of her clear, simple, happy, northern nature had free play. She was the most bewitching, perfect Lady we have seen; in look, dress, action, voice and singing, irresistible. Equally so in the serious and tender parts. And one great secret of it is here, as in all her parts, that the singing seems spontaneous, flowing without effort from the character itself, its natural expression; the music and the motion mutually translate each other.—In that distressful opera, La Traviata,—the more depressing that it is so full of trivial music, she actually rises to a height of spiritual beauty in the last scene, so that you forget its painfulness.

In Faust, Martha, and the Traviata Mlle. Nilsson found one of the most earnest and refined, as well as delicately musical, lover-tenors in M. CAPOUL. His voice is light, and sweet and true, with an unobtrusiveness in its ordinary habit which distinguishes him from coarser, more "robustious" tenors. Its power is feebly felt at first, but it grows upon you, and the man grows upon you as the passion and the plot develops. Then to see the intensity of his feeling struggling for expression with his small and slender frame, you think for a time of the gesticulative and grotesque type of Frenchman; but you soon find that the passion is genuine, you feel its dignity, and that you are in presence of a superior artist, both dramatically and vocally. What if he does use the falsetto sometimes? Shall he not follow his music, the best way he can, where it transcends his range? Was it a mere physical sign and wonder, a do di petto, that we went out to see?

M. JAMET has a strong, resonant bass voice, of musical quality, evenly developed, telling in all parts, and shows refinement, taste, intelligence, and plenty of vitality in all he does. His Mephistopheles has less extravagance, but quite as much of subtle fiendish magnetism in it, as that of Hermanns. His former Plunkett was a very hearty, easy, capital performance.—M. BARRE, the baritone, is unexceptionable in singing, voice and action. His Ashton, in Lucia, is one of the best that we recall.

—So much for the nonce. Of Mlle. DUVAL and the other singers we have yet to speak.

THE DOLBY BALLAD CONCERTS. Crowded out! Next time.

The Beethoven Centenary.

Bonn, August, 1871.

Come with me to Bonn on the Rhine. Beethoven was born here one hundred and one years ago, and if it had not been for the recent war we should now be one year too late for something interesting. As it is, there is in progress a musical festival in honor of Beethoven. A chorus of three hundred, an orchestra of one hundred and ten, Dr. Ferdinand Hiller as conductor, Joachim for the violin concerto, Charles Halle for the pianoforte concertos, Madame Joachim, Madame Otto-Alvsleben, Herr Vogl and Herr Schulze as solo singers, all are giving heart, soul and voice to make the occasion worthy if possible of the memory of glorious old Beethoven.

On Friday evening, (Aug. 18), Saturday morning and Saturday evening there are full rehearsals, and on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday evenings grand concerts besides two additional rehearsals on the Monday and Tuesday mornings. On Wednesday, to finish, there is a concert of chamber music with Joachim and Grützmacher in the string quartet and Hiller at the pianoforte in a sonata for piano and violoncello.

A pleasant hall, holding at each rehearsal and concert say two thousand persons, has been erected for the occasion. The necessary accompaniment of a German gathering—i.e., restaurant for beer, etc.—is also quite at hand. The hotels are filled with strangers and the town wears a holiday dress. Late each night there is a pleasant gathering at the Leso-Gesellschaft of the artists engaged or interested in the Fest, where there is a deal of smoking, drinking, talking or eating. Are the musical performances good? Yes, magnificent! The orchestra plays with a precision and a quick perception of Dr. Hiller's intention that is something wonderful to see and hear. The Ninth Sinfonie, the Eroica, the Fifth, all go like the stern march of fate. There is never a hitch nor a blemish that ought to be counted in the grand and beautiful tout ensemble.

When Mr. Halle's performance of the choral fantasia comes on it is discovered that one public rehearsal of the piece is insufficient to produce a very satisfactory result; and again, when under a similar arrangement Mr. Halle plays the E flat concerto, the poor man is only sympathized with from all quarters on account of the bad accompaniment to his own most cultivated and beautiful play. Madame Joachim sings "Ah Perfido" in so beautiful and soulful a manner, that a large transposition of the song is entirely forgiven, and the house is in an uproar of applause for five minutes. Of course the whole of the violin concerto, as played by Joachim, is simply perfect, and will not bear writing or even talking about; for to convey the fact that he did play the piece is sufficient.

Let us look at two or three interesting faces in the audience. There is Sir Sterndale Bennett from London. What a pity that he should write so little and teach so much. He introduces you to his son and his son-in-law. Pough! what do we care about his sons? Why hasn't he more like the overture to the "Naiads," or the concerto in F? Who is that bright, cheery, red-faced man? Of course you would not know him; he stays too much at home in Copenhagen; but here he is, and thankful enough are we to see Niels Gade, who has given us such great pleasure through his C minor sinfonie, and the overtures to "Ossian," "Highlands," etc. There is Carl Reincke too. If there are jealousies between the musicians of Leipzig and the Rhine they are now forgotten for Beethoven's sake. There is Mr. Davison, who is the all-powerful musical critic of England. There is Mr. Stewart from Dublin, who composed a very effective cantata for the last Birmingham fest. Then there is Mr. Grove. There is hardly a man in England who has done so much for the cause of music as this same Mr. Grove of the Crystal Palace.

We try to look about the hall for others, but how can one keep his eyes from Joachim? Of so-called "musicians of the future" there seem to be few or none. Joachim Raff is here, but it is rather a miserable present that he represents, even if he was a protégé of Schumann. The fest is not quite over until we enjoy the excursion upon the Rhine. It is all right and charming, and everything does not hinge upon the purchase of a concert ticket and the definite performance of the concert programme. There is always "up" some kind of fraternal occasion. Let us go out to Schumann's grave. Many another has been before us, for see the wreaths and freshly placed flowers! Shall we go to the house where Beethoven was born? Don't laugh! We'll go to both and choose for ourselves, although it is a little perplexing to stand before a quaint old house in the Rhine-gasse and read a handsome inscription upon the same, to the effect that here Beethoven was born, and to go to the Bonngasse and there find a similar tablet and inscription upon a second house! Never mind Beethoven was born, thank God, and whether here or there makes little difference, so he gave us the "Missa Solemnis," and the whole world knows what else. Yes; it was droll that in 1845, when his statue here in the Münster Platz was first uncovered, the back of the old man should be found to be squarely turned towards Queen Victoria and other royal personages present. It certainly was characteristic if it was not polite, and who more than Beethoven ever had a better right? The Bonn Fest in honor of the hundredth anniversary of Beethoven's birth has been a genuine success throughout, many thanks to Ferdinand Hiller and his brave associates. Wasn't it pleasant to see a dozen Boston faces in the crowded audience! B. J. L.—Boston Transcript.

The Peace Jubilee.

Gilmore is in Europe, and has written to his coadjutors in Boston, concerning his success. His industrious friends telegraph to the daily press glowing descriptions of the conquests Gilmore has made, and the bright prospects of the forthcoming Jubilee. According to the reports of these interested friends, Gilmore has secured bands in nearly every European city, and several from Asiatic and African towns.

As to securing musicians in Germany there is no difficulty to be apprehended. With the thorough cultivation of the people in music, where every cross-roads boasts of its brass band, the master of collecting forty or fifty trumpeters and drummers requires just about as much business energy as the importation of as many drums and trumpets.

There is one thing that Gilmore undoubtedly succeeds in, and that is the business of advertising. Even Barnum, that great master of humbug, and our friends the circus agents, who periodically regale us with stories of frightful encounters with tigers, falls from giddy trapezes, and gory breakfasts by whole dens of lions on the bodies of some unlucky orchestral performers—even they must yield the palm to Gilmore.

First, we had the 'National Musical Congress,' either an outgrowth or the beginning of the 'peace jubilee.' Some little minor matters were discussed at the Congress, matters of no importance, and even if they were no one was the wiser for their being discussed. The members of the Congress soon became aware that the principal object of its being summoned was to puff and assist Gilmore in his projected money making project. A portion of the members of this musical Congress has no idea of playing into the hands of Gilmore, and yet another portion were cajoled into endorsing his project.

The ramifications of the "National Musical Congress" are widespread over the land. An endorsement by such a body carries some influence. Gilmore set diplomatically to work, and with able assistance secured an expression in his favor from the Congress before the Congress really knew what he was driving at.

Then hies him—our elated Gilmore—to Long Branch—not, however, until he has caused to be telegraphed all over the land a half column description of his proposed "colosseum," and has secured the good will of the musical and literary correspondents resident in Boston. To Long Branch to secure the endorsement of the President. The opinion of the President on some matters is worth heeding. There are several branches of human knowledge that he surpasses in—on these he may be taken as an authority. But he knows nothing whatever of music, and makes no pretensions. He gives to Gilmore a sort of an unmeaning introductory letter, as he might give to one desirous of having his name to a paper for the amelioration of the heathen Kamtschatkans, his signature. This secured, straightway Gilmore has the facts, with his construction of them, telegraphed all over the country. Another advertisement, of course, and a good one.

Then the energetic Gilmore takes ship and sails to Europe, and soon by cable we hear that his project has excited such wonder and envy in London, that the bold Britons, bound not to be outdone, are to get up a peace jubilee of their own. What an aggravating, stimulating advertisement is this. Shall Britannia dare compete with Boston in a "peace jubilee"? Shall our heroic Gilmore be beaten on his own chosen colosseum shrieking ground? Decidedly not; we must stand to Gilmore, and money and music must flow to Boston, and out-roar the combined boiler shops of the United Kingdom.

Then Gilmore to Belgium and to Germany, to converse with counts and band masters, and to write beseeching notes to kings and kaisers. Telegraphed of course, and added to the despatch the tale, as Gilmore tells, of African, and Indian, and Egyptian, and Turkish musicians to swell the throng of German and Yankee bands on the colosseum at Boston.

Gilmore, it must be conceded, is an adept at advertising. Under his skillful management the grossest humbug must succeed in drawing a crowd. First, local pride and pecuniary gain—Boston is enlisted.

Delicate attention and shrewd diplomacy—the National Musical Congress advocate the "jubilee."

Political influence and personal appeals—the President unwittingly endorses.

A cable dispatch from London, calculated to arouse national pride and emulation—the whole country interested.

Announcement of the securing of several thousand musicians from all parts of the Eastern Continent, (Turks, Arabs, Afghans, Persians, Hindoos, Cosacks, etc., clothed and instructed in London, these details not made public)—unparalleled curiosity awakened to see the "peace jubilee."

VIVE LA GILMORE! VIVE LA BAGATELLE!

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Spero Meliora. (I hope better things.) 3. Eb to c. Angier. 30 Extremely smooth and elegant. Successful already.
- The School-house in the Lane. Song and Cho. 2. C to d. Christie. 40
Out in the Storm. Song and Chorus. 2. D to d. Christie. 40
Have elegant Lithograph titles, and are fine Ballads.
- The Fountain mingles with the River. 4. E to c. Gounod. 35
Finely elaborated. Melody easy, but time difficult.
- Oh Vision Bright! (Il Sogno.) 4. A to g. Abt. 60
Italian and English words and German-Italian music. Very pretty too!
- Rock of Ages. Hymn for 4 Voices. 3. Bb to g. Thomas. 50
Guide me, O thou great Jehovah. Quartet. 3. F to f. Dornstein. 30
Two sacred pieces worth preserving.
- Swedish Song. 3. F-sharp minor to f. Berg. 30
Strange, quaint and sweet.
- Sorrowing, weeping. 4. A to f. Ruell. 30
Come with thy sweet voice again. 4. G to g. Eikmeier. 30
- Tell me my Heart. 5. Eb to c. Bishop. 40
First-class. Requires considerable execution, but well rewards faithful study.
- Yeoman's Wedding Song. Sung by Santley. 4. Bb to f. Poniatowski. 35
Manly and pleasing. "Chiming bell" accom't.
- When will you come back. Song and Chorus. 3. Bb to c. M'Neal. 30
Very attractive.
- I love her, I dream of her. Song and Chorus. 3. Bb to c. Fisk. 30 Sweet melody. An extra accom't inserted. It is very delicate, somewhat difficult, and may be omitted at will.
- Do they know it? 4. D to f. Sloper. 25
Exquisite Spring and Flower song.
- Across the Sea. 4. C to f. Gabriel. 35
Like a first-rate German song.

Instrumental.

- Kaiser March. 5. Bb. Wagner. 60
Don't touch it unless you can play powerfully. Then it is splendid practice.
- Invocation. Pensée poétique. 4. F. Kettner. 40
Light, "poetic," and in part brilliant.
- The Brook. 6. Ab. Pape. 80
The left hand plays Dolore's song "The Brook," and the right puts in arpeggios. Very attractive.
- Thousand and one Night Waltz. 3. A. Strauss. 75
Offenbach varied by Strauss, and very successfully.
- The Fantastics. Waltzes. 4. Zikoff. 75
Good kind of "fantastic." Wide awake.
- Shades of Hope. Nocturne. 4. Eb. De Janon. 40
Certain to please. Very graceful.
- Quadrille des Dames. 3. Gravier. 40
Pretty and original.
- Beautiful Flower. Nocturne. 2. Bb. Turner. 30
Good introduction to Nocturne practice.
- On the March. 3. Muller. 60
A spirited arrangement of a number of good French and German airs.
- La Harpe Eolienne. 4 hands. 5. Eb. Smith.
Well-known favorite.
- Welcome to Spring. Frühlingsgruss. 3. D. Jungman. 80
Full of fine taste.
- Gondolina. 3. G. Dorn. 40
Gondola music arranged in a charming manner.
- Strauss' Blue Danube Waltz. 5. D. Arr. by Kuhe. 75
"The Blue Danube" as a Song was good. As a Waltz probably better. But this will please more than either.
- Mackrodrumian Galop. 3. Eb. Howard. 30
Ten times as good as the title, which is a good one if you can only say it.
- New Shawl Dance. 2. C. Gravier. 30
Simple and pleasing.
- Golden Echoes. Mack. each 30
No. 20, Gaëtana. No. 21, Marche des Tambours. No. 22, Qui vive!
The whole set good for learners.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 798.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 4, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 16.

(From Every Saturday.)

Chicago.

(OCTOBER 10, 1871.)

Blackened and bleeding, helpless, panting, prone,
On the charred fragments of her shattered throne
Lies she who stood but yesterday alone.

Queen of the West! by some enchanter taught
To lift the glory of Aladdin's court,
Then lose the spell that all that wonder wrought.

Like her own prairies by some chance seed sown,
Like her own prairies in one brief day grown,
Like her own prairies in one fierce night mown.

She lifts her voice, and in her pleading call
We hear the cry of Macedon to Paul—
The cry for help that makes her kin to all.

But haply with wan fingers may she feel
The silver cup hid in the proffered meal—
The gifts her kinship and our loves reveal.

BRET HARTE.

The Vocal Works of Bach and Handel.—Letter by Robert Franz.

(Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.)

[Continued from page 119.]

In this condemnatory criticism of my labors, from the historico-archæological point of view, the editor of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung seems to have felt called upon to take the lead, and in a style of speech to lead one to believe that he was acting under a high and absolute authority. Particularly did he keep a sharp eye on the singing societies which gave public performances of Handel's vocal music. But his requirements were by no means limited to a faithful reproduction of the originals; with equal energy he would insist upon the historical material of accompaniment; and any one was sure to find especial favor who kept as close as possible to the scores as published by the "German Handel Society," of which the editorship is known to be identical with that of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.

The so-called "Bearbeitungen" (elaborations), on the contrary, never enjoyed the good will of the Allg. Mus. Zeitung at all. A direct attack on Mozart seemed indeed, for obvious reasons, inopportune, although the piano accompaniment in the "German Handel Society's" edition of the Alexander's Feast contains an indirect criticism at least, on Mozart's setting; Mendelssohn is less delicately handled, while the remaining obscure lights are thrown overboard without ceremony. Thus our reviewer, a short time ago, on the occasion of a performance of Handel's "L'Allegro" in the Vienna Singakademie, expressed himself as follows:

"It is to be hoped that the Society will stick hereafter to the original orchestral accompaniment, to the exclusion of the wretched modern Bearbeitungen, this being the only guaranty of the complete effect. What would it be but barbarous want of taste, to paint old pictures over new? And is it not precisely the same thing in music?"

*What may the word "modern" mean here? Are the arrangements by Mozart and Moel excluded under the same ban?

To the last question we answer No, decidedly. It is by no means the same thing to paint over a finished picture, and to fill out, according to the composer's hints, the blanks left open by him in a musical composition. Why waste another word upon it? Yet I feel bound to make a few remarks in answer to the pertinacious strictures above cited, since they probably are aimed also at my own Bearbeitungen (perhaps directly at my score of "L'Allegro," according to which it had just been performed at Berlin, against which misfortune Vienna was to be protected.) My remarks do not purport to be in any way an oratio pro domo; they only aim to establish the fact that, even were obedience paid to the paternal warnings of the Allgemeine Mus. Zeitung, the apparatus for performances of Handel's larger vocal works is not at hand in these days; to be sure, one might attempt to get along without the coöperation of the cembalo and of the organ, or run the risk of an improvisation, good or bad as the moment might bring.—If I might only succeed in justifying in some measure the "modern Bearbeitungen," which have been so contemptuously treated, and in protecting them against the attacks of the Allg. Mus. Zeitung, I should rejoice for the sake of the cause itself.

This might be effectually done, for example, by adducing proof, that the authors of the piano accompaniments and organ parts in the editions of the "Deutsche Händelgesellschaft" do nothing else themselves but "paint Handel over" (überpinseln) by their Bearbeitungen. But the justification can be best reached, perhaps, through a careful examination of the mode of setting which they generally use.

The first point requires but few words. The "German Handel Society" edits not only the originals, but also an accompaniment by a strange hand, throughout for the piano, partly for the organ, evidently designed and carried out for practical ends. Now such a proceeding, often necessitating a personal decision between this or that form of expression, falls under the same category with what is designated by the word "Bearbeitung"—at least so far as it conscientiously respects the originals and is not guilty of groundless alterations and perversions of the same. Therefore the natural consequence of the above assertions of the Zeitung would be this: Any working out of the accompaniment, when it requires the intervention of a second or third person drawing on his own resources, shows a "barbarous want of taste;" of course the piano accompaniments and organ parts of the "German Handel Society" are subject to the same condemnation; they too commit this "barbarous" offence against good taste, of "painting over" older works of art with their additions.

About the second point, about the artistic worth of those elaborated accompaniments, I must be very brief, and barely mention the most general considerations; were I to do as I wish, and enter into a positive as well as a negative criticism, my letter would easily swell to a folio volume.

As I have already said, the first thing to be considered in the restoration of the accompaniment is, to find a mode of setting which, always sparing the material handed down to us, shall correspond, in form and matter, to the intentions of the author—in this case of Handel. It cannot be often enough, nor emphatically enough said, that it is just as much within the power of such a setting to heighten and embellish the original, as it is to weaken and disfigure it. In the one case, by apt redintegrations, it will bring out the vital sense and force of that which is merely indicated; in the other, it effaces the most significant outlines, by misplacing them amid surroundings which stand in direct contradiction to their essential purport. Here, whatever does not sound as if it all came out of one mould, must be submitted to a series of experiments until that result is actually reached:—and this is always possible.—The instrumental material to be used for these what we have termed apt redintegrations, whether it be organ, pianoforte or orchestra, is of secondary consequence; the choice thereof may be fitly left to the taste and insight of the director.

(To be Continued.)

Nilsson in Opera.

(From "Every Saturday.")

Mlle. Christina Nilsson has made her operatic debut in Boston and has already appeared as Marguerite in "Faust," as Lucia in Donizetti's familiar opera, and as Lady Henrietta in "Martha." The high expectations which were grounded upon her performances in the concert-room last year have not been disappointed. Nilsson is a great singer, with a voice of wonderful sweetness and beauty, and the most thorough skill in vocalization; but she is first and foremost a dramatic artist of the finest intuitions, the most magnetic presence, and the rarest expressive power. And aside from these traits, there is a refinement, a completeness, and an imaginative quality in Nilsson's acting which is altogether unique.

Her Marguerite and her Lucia impress a sensitive mind like lovely poetic visions, so "moving, delicate and full of life" that no particle of common clay seem to have entered into their composition. Of the two the Lucia is the more conspicuously brilliant and easy of appreciation, but the Marguerite is the subtler and more exquisite. In the latter, conception and performance flow together with perfect accord and harmony; the character is conceived with absolute thoroughness, and there is neither hesitation, weakness, nor uncertainty in the carrying out of the artist's idea. This Marguerite is an absolute entity,—a dramatic creation, self-centred, self-consistent, and true to nature, yet in the highest sense ideal and imaginative. Its foremost claim to the admiration and appreciation of those who witness it is yet, however, the surest cause of its failing to impress the multitude. Perfect proportion in a work of art requires a higher form of cultivation for its just recognition than most of us can lay claim to. Caricature, therefore, pleases thousands where true and accurate drawing counts its lovers only by scores: witness the success attained by the satirical prints in the illustrated papers. Where every part is in its just relation to every other, where not a single tint is crude or obtrusive, and not a line deviates from its proper curve, the mind is wont to sympathize with the eyes and to depreciate the beauty which does not assert itself by contrast with what is weak and faulty. Nilsson's Marguerite is such a work of art as this, and bears about the same relation to ordinary impersonations that the Venus de Medicis bears to one of Mr. Nast's cartoons. In the first three acts it is quiet, simple, full of maidenly reserve and modesty, and intense with the intensity of a deep-natured young girl who is restrained from the full expression of her feelings by every instinct of her better nature and every rule of her daily life. In the love duets in the third act, therefore, there is none of that wild and sensual abandonment of manner which in other actresses has been wont to excite the spectators to the highest pitch, but instead of this, a delicacy and a purity which never succumb to the seductions of the situation, but through which can be discerned the terrible yearning and hunger of a love which fears, without understanding itself. And this very forbearance of style makes the final surrender a thousand times more impressive than is usual. The ruin of Marguerite—as would be inevitable, if it were to be at all, with such a true and beautiful soul—is accomplished in one wild, unlooked-for rush of sudden emotion caused by the unexpected return of her lover; and this Mlle. Nilsson makes us feel and perceive. In witnessing the other performances which have been given of the scene, it has always been impossible to perceive why Marguerite did not yield in the very beginning of the scene.

Lucia is, as we have said, a simpler character than the heroine of Goethe's great drama. A true impersonation of the character demands, however, the utmost refinement of style, with capacity for the intensest forms of dramatic expression. And the picture which Mlle. Nilsson gives of the tender, gentle girl in the pensive, anxious joy of her first love, and in the despair and misery of her darkened life, is one over which painters and poets might go wild with enthusiasm. It seemed in witnessing the performance as if the fair Bride of Lammermoor herself had stepped out from the pages of Scott's masterpiece in fiction and were speaking and breathing before us; and the fancy, charmed and enthralled, forgot for a moment the poor limitations of time and space, and lived and revelled in that enchanted land of romance which is illumined by a "light that never was on sea or land." For such pictures as these, and to the artist who can create or reproduce them, who can withhold the tribute of his high appreciation and gratitude?

Cipriani Potter.

Last week died a musician whose name and works few of the present generation are acquainted with, but who nevertheless has, through his connection with the Royal Academy of Music, exercised a considerable influence on the art in England. Mr. Cipriani Potter, whose death we chronicle, was born in London in 1792, and gave early indications of possessing singular musical ability. He was placed for tuition under Attwood, the organist at St. Paul's Cathedral, and afterwards he received instructions from Calcott and Crotch for the piano and harmony, and finally from the celebrated pianist Woelfl. He subsequently proceeded to Germany, where he studied for some time. At Vienna he enjoyed the advantage of Beethoven's friendship; the great Tone-poet gave him valuable advice and assistance, but not lessons, as has been erroneously stated. Beethoven had but one pupil, the well-known F. Ries. On returning to England he at once took a high position, and obtained plenty of teaching, occasionally publishing his compositions. In the concert-room, his clear, brilliant playing, founded on the model of his master, Woelfl, and improved by a keen observation and good taste, met with the success and approval it well deserved. For a long time Mr. Potter was a conductor of the old Philharmonic Society's concerts, where he distinguished himself for his thorough knowledge of the works and how to perform them. On the resignation of Dr. Crotch, he became Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and in this position, by the influence of his teaching and advice, he may be said to have moulded the ideas of many of our foremost musicians who were educated at that establishment. He was greatly beloved by his pupils for his universal kindness, and by his management of the Academy he greatly contributed to the success of our national institution. After presiding there for a period of twenty years he resigned the appointment, and almost retired from the profession. The late Mr. Charles Lucas, his pupil, succeeded his master as head of the Academy.

Mr. Potter's works consist of orchestral symphonies, overtures, quintets, quartets and trios; and also sonatas, rondos, and other pieces for his own special instrument, the piano. One of his best compositions is a Sextet for the piano and strings, dedicated to the Count of Brunswick; the Allegro Pastorale from this and the Andante (Theme with variations) are very fine. A Rondo in F, dedicated to Mlle. Kisting, is a brilliant composition, and well worthy of the pianist's attention. An Introduction and Rondo in E flat, for four hands, is also good; but perhaps his best known and most important work is Op. 22, viz.: "54 Preludes in all the major and minor keys." Among these studies will be found some admirable pieces; many of them contain enough material (if developed) to make a modern "Fantasia;" some are especially remarkable for their fine harmony and masterly preludial treatment. The death of Mr. Cipriani Potter is the breaking of another link which connects us with the great pianists who have gone—long may their classical, tasteful works keep their memory green! And though the modern firework element is perhaps wanting in their compositions, we venture to predict that Clementi, Dussek, Steibelt, Kalkbrenner, Woelfl, Cramer, and others of that school, will be esteemed when many popular writers of the present day are entirely forgotten.

The deceased musician was buried at Kensal Green on Monday last. Among those gentlemen who attended to pay this last mark of respect to the memory of their old friend, we noted Sir W. S. Bennett; Messrs. R. Barnett, J. S. Rowley, Lamborn Cock, Duncan Davison, F. Davison, J. W. Davison, W. Dorrell, H. R. Evers, G. Forbes, J. Gill, W. Goodwin, G. W. Hammond, T. Harper, Henry Holmes, F. B. Jewson, Arthur O'Leary, J. Lidel, Stanley Lucas, H. C. Lunn, G. A. Macfarren, W. C. Macfarren, T. M. Mudie, C. Oberthur, E. Pauer, H. Regaldi, A. Schlosser, Dr. Steggall, Messrs. C. E. Stephens, S. G. Stephens, J. Thomas, F. Westlake, &c., &c.—Lon. Mus. Standard, Oct. 7.

Rubini.

(From La Revue des Deux Mondes, 1854.)

Rubini, one of the most popular and admired Italian singers in Europe, died at a village near Bergamo, on the 2nd March, 1854. He had retired from the stage in 1845, and was reposing after his long fatigues in a sumptuous villa, which he had built with the sounds of his lyre—as Amphion, son of Jupiter, did Thebes—when death overtook him, just as he had attained his 61st year. Like all great artists who have excited public enthusiasm, in a high degree, Rubini was the subject of a vast number of stories and apocryphal anecdotes, from which it is very difficult to cull the truth, alone worthy to interest cultivated minds. We will, however, attempt to select a few genuine facts from the life of this celebrated virtuoso, who has left behind him an ineffaceable mark in the art of singing of the nineteenth century.

Giam-Battista Rubini was born in May, 1793, in the village of Romano, near Bergamo. The son of a poor commissionaire, burthened with a family, Rubini was at first destined to be a tailor. Having been apprenticed to the proprietor of a shop at Bergamo, he was squatted one day upon his board, singing away as merrily as possible, when a dilettante, passing by, stopped and listened with astonishment to the youthful voice which was already so full of quality and charm. The dilettante approached the young workman, interrogated him as to his family, proceeded to his father, and persuaded the latter to place his son under a master, with whom he stopped until the age of eighteen.

We pass over a multitude of episodes, more or less probable and exciting, and which appear to have allowed full scope for the fancy of biographers, and content ourselves by simply stating, that the admirable artist who astonished all Europe began his dramatic career in the choros. In an old bill of the theatre of La Scala, at Milan, dated 1812, and which Rubini preserved, splendidly framed, his name figures among the second tenors of the choros. His salary was then 12. 8d. a-night. How could he ever think he would one day leave behind him a fortune of more than 3,000,000 francs? Two years subsequent to this obscure employment at La Scala, Rubini was engaged in one of those companies of strolling vocalists so plentiful in Italy, and made his début as Argirio, in Rossini's Tancredi, which had just been represented at Venice with immense success. Rubini was then twenty-one, while the lady who sang the part of Amenaïda, daughter of Argirio, King of Syracuse, was, at least, fifty. As Fortune did not reward the efforts of the impresario, he conceived the strange idea of changing his company of singers into a company of dancers. He made them study, as well as they could, a ballet then very much in vogue: I Molinari (The Millers). The rehearsals were held in a meadow on the skirts of a wood. At the representation, which came off at some little town, the name of which is not preserved in history, the audience rose en masse against the wretched extemporized ballettini, who were under the necessity of passing the night in the theatre in order to escape being stoned. Rubini used to take a pleasure in relating this burlesque episode in his brilliant career.

After some other attempts, more or less successful, Rubini was engaged at Brescia for the Carnival of the year 1815. Owing to his success in this tolerably important city, he was summoned to the San-Moè Theatre at Venice, and, afterwards, to Naples, where he made his first appearance at the Teatro de' Fiorentini. It was in this great city that Rubini, under the direction of his compatriot Nossari, who gave him such good advice, attracted the attention of Italy, and saw the beginning of his great fame. Having been engaged by Barbaja for a great number of years, he was compelled to remain for a long time under the guardianship of that mercenary trader, who only lent him to the cities desirous of possessing him, for good hard cash paid down. It was thus that, after having been successively in Palermo, and Rome, where he created a furore in La Gazza Ladra, Rubini proceeded to Venice, in 1824. Beethoven, who heard him at that period, had Italian words written for him to his admirable elegy of Adelaide, which Rubini rendered popular throughout Europe.*

It was in 1825 that this great singer went to Paris for the first time. He made his début at the Théâtre-Italien, on the 6th of October, in the character of Ramiro in La Cenerentola, with immense success. On his return to Italy, whither Barbaja had recalled him, he was obliged to remain there until 1831, when he entirely recovered his independence. Upon this he returned to Paris, which he did not leave again before 1842, alternating between that capital and London, where he used to sing during the summer season. In 1842, Rubini, then at the summit of his glory, quitted Paris and London, and, as we should say at the present time, the western world, for the purpose of proceeding to St. Petersburg, where he remained until 1845. Being then fifty-seven years old, and loaded with honors and riches, he retired to the magnificent villa he had built on the spot where he was born, and it was there that he died, leaving behind him a fortune of more than 3,000,000 francs.

Rubini was a simple-minded, gentle, and good man, whose modest general education scarcely rose above the first elements; his musical education was not more advanced, for he required the assistance of an accompanist to read the most trifling cantata. Endowed with exquisite sensitiveness, a great memory, and that marvellous instinct which makes up for the want of acquired knowledge, but which acquired knowledge can never replace, Rubini was one of the most admirable singers of our time; a mixture of the improviser and the patient imitator, whose physiognomy it is very important that we should catch with accuracy.

The tenors who have acquired sufficient celebrity to leave behind them a name in history, are not very numerous. Before the birth of the lyric drama, and until the end of the seventeenth century, it was the "sopranos" and prime donne who exercised almost undisputed sway in Italian opera, as well as in the chapels of princes and religious communities. Composers did not begin to write for tenor voices until more recently; and the first person to signalize himself as a tenor of merit was an artist named Buzzonini, who was chamber-singer to the Duke of Mantua, about the end of the seventeenth century. In the following century, we find the tenors beginning to figure with advantage beside the most famous "sopranos," while composers assigned them pretty important parts, particularly in buffa operas. Among the celebrated tenors of the eighteenth century, we may mention Eutori, who was long in the service of the Prince-Palatine, and sang at Padua, in 1770, with great success; Balino, a pupil of Pastocchi, and who died at Lisbon, in 1760; Rauzzini, at the same period, a celebrated singer and composer, who died at Bath, in England, in 1810; Raff, born at Gelsdorff, in the Duchy of Juliers, a pupil of Pastocchi, and the greatest singer Germany produced in the eighteenth century; Davide senior, who possessed one of the most astonishing voices that ever existed, an admirable and powerful singer, who shared with his contemporary, Ansani, the admiration of Italy; Mandini, an exquisite singer, belonging to the Italian company which came to the Théâtre de Monsieur at Paris, in 1789; Viganoni, who created the part of Paolino, in Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto; Crivelli, who sang a long time at the Théâtre Italien, Paris, and in Paolino's Pirro and Nina produced an effect which veteran amateurs still remember; and, lastly, Babbini, one of the most delicious tenors of the old Italian school, and who had the honor of giving Rossini some hints on the art of singing. The appearance of this illustrious master produced a great revolution in the economy of dramatic music. The characterizing feature of this revolution was that the natural voices of soprano, mezzo-soprano, contralto, tenor, and bass, assumed in harmony the place they occupy in the scale of sound. Thanks to this happy reform, which, however, was more the result of necessity than a voluntary act of the master, and which, too, had been attempted before Rossini's time, first by Mozart, and then by Cimarosa and Paisiello, the tenors replaced the castratos in the mind of the composer, who assigned them the preponderating part in almost all his works.

*In 1824 poor Beethoven was stone deaf.

Among the remarkable tenors conjured up by the genius of Rossini, and forming a part of the escort of virtuosi who interpreted his works and will be handed down with them in History, we must first mention Garcia, who created the part of Count Almaviva in Il Barbiere di Siviglia—a consummate artist, whose powerful and supple voice knew no difficulty. Davide, the illegitimate son of the great tenor of the end of the eighteenth century, whom we have mentioned above, was a singer of genius, for whom Rossini composed a great many works. He appeared successively in Il Turco in Italia, Otello, Ricciardo e Zoraida, La Donna del Lago, Zelmira, etc. When Davide junior went to Paris in 1829, his voice, fatigued by excesses of every description, had become unequal and capricious in tone. In the midst of many traits in rather bad taste, and ridiculous mannerisms and vezzi, this great artist sometimes, however, manifested himself and transported the public with admiration, as, for instance, in the duet of the second act of La Gazza Ladra, which he used to sing with Mad. Malibran. Nozzari, an accomplished singer, of perfect good taste, was, in Rossini's operas, the inseparable companion of Davide, to whom he gave some excellent advice. Nor must we forget Membelli, the father of the prima donna whom we heard at Paris, in 1823, when she made so grand an effect in the first finale of La Cenerentola. Rossini met Membelli, at the commencement of his career, at Rome, in 1812, and wrote a character for him in his first opera, Nemtro e Polibio. We must likewise mention Bianchi, Bonaldi, and Serafino, for the last of whom was composed the tenor part in L'Italiana in Algeri; Donzelli, who possessed a powerful and sonorous but cumbersome voice, and, lastly, Rubini, for whom Rossini wrote only a single cantata, "La Riconoscenza," a sort of pastoral for four voices, performed at the Teatro San Carlo, at Naples, on the 27th December, 1821, for the benefit of the immortal maestro. Although, by the suppleness, brilliancy, and bravura style of his talent, Rubini evidently belongs to the school of singers formed by the author of Il Barbiere, Otello, and Semiramide, it is certain that the composer who understood best how to utilize and bring out his inmost qualities was Bellini.

As we have very often said, between the dramatic composer and the known interpreters of his thoughts, there exists a secret and reciprocal influence, which the critic ought to take into account. For one or two sublime musicians, who, like Mozart, and Rossini, in the best of his operas, know how to "create" chefs-d'œuvre without going beyond the limits of ordinary voices, there are a great number of composers eager to seize on the smallest natural idiosyncrasy, and mould their ideas to the requirements of exceptional voices. Nowhere has this pernicious system been practised more than in Italy. In France, too, half the répertoire of the Opéra-Comique owed a part of its success to Martin's extraordinary voice. Between the touching and melancholy genius of Bellini, and the penetrating organ and deep feeling of Rubini, the points of analogy were so numerous and so natural, that the two must have felt attracted to each other, like parts of one and the same being which meet again after having been separated, and bend together in some one conception of art. It was at Milan, in 1827, that the lucky meeting of the composer and the virtuoso took place, and the opera, Il Pirata, represented at the theatre of La Scala, was the first battle they gained together. This opera, which laid the foundations for the fame of the young maestro of Catania, increased, also, the reputation of his admirable interpreter. La Sonnambula was the second opera Bellini composed for his favorite singer. This was also represented at Milan, at the theatre De la Canobiana in 1831. Then came I Puritani, performed in 1834, at the Théâtre-Italien, Paris, where Bellini died six months after the production of his masterpiece, like Hérold after that of his Pré aux Clercs. Donizetti, too, composed for Rubini the part of Percy, in his opera of Anna Bolena, represented at Milan in 1831, a short time after La Sonnambula, and by the same virtuoso.

Rubini's voice was that of a high tenor, with a register of more than two octaves from the lower E to the F in alt, which he reached in certain passages by an heroic abalzo that always excited the admiration of the audience. The flexibility of his voice was prodigious, but its quality was not homogeneous. In fact, it was only in the upper part of the scale, beginning from the E between the fourth and fifth lines of the staff, that Rubini's voice warmed, vibrated, and threw out sounds that intoxicated the ear. He was able to go as high as B in alt, giving each sound that powerful and manly vibration, designated in the schools by the name of chest notes, because the notes appear actually to proceed from the seat of life. On reaching this extreme limit, his voice melted into a luminous falsetto, forming a magic contrast with the preceding chords. This abrupt opposition of shade and light, in which the opaque and sweet clearness of the head notes caused the vigorous sonority of the natural tones to stand out in bold relief, was one of the effects most frequently employed by Rubini. The astonished ear followed the singer, in his triumphal ascent, to the highest limit of the tenor register, without perceiving any interruption of continuity in this long spiral of notes, variously lighted up, and glittering upon an even and substantial melodic tissue.

To this almost inherent power of passing, without a break, from the register of the chest voice to that of the head notes, Rubini added another no less important—namely, a long respiration, the force of which he had learned to economize. Gifted with a broad chest, where his lungs could dilate at their ease, he took a high note, filled it successively with light and warmth, and, when it was completely expanded, threw it forward into the house, where it burst like a Bengal rocket in a thousand colors. This artifice, the effect of which was irresistible, was borrowed by Rubini from the old Italian school, where it was frequently employed, especially by the male soprani, who were particularly endowed with a long breath.

Rubini's voice, the delicious and penetrating tones of which had only to be heard to charm the hearer, was, as we have said, prodigiously flexible. Simple and double scales, arpeggios, trills taken upon the highest chords, grupetti, appoggiature, and the richest and most ingenious combinations of vocalization, were accomplished with a boldness and rapidity which scarcely gave the astonished ear time enough to appreciate their difficulty. The texture of these marvellous gorgheggi, or to adopt the term still used in the schools, the tessitura of this sparkling vocalization, was not always irreproachable in quality, and often wanted substance. The notes were poured forth too quickly, and crowded too much upon one another, so that the singer was not always able, like an intrepid cavalier who reins in his steed with an all-powerful hand, to moderate his flight or stop in his career. In addition to this, a faulty movement of the lips, which Rubini was never able to correct, showed a certain degree of effort, and proved pretty clearly that the virtuoso had been educated in rather a hap-hazard kind of manner. This defect, extremely common at the present day, and which M. Mario has eagerly exaggerated, like a scholar who at first imitates only the imperfections of his master, was strictly prohibited in the old Italian school. The singer's face was then not allowed to express anything but the sentiment he experienced, and the mysteries of vocalization and mechanism remained forever hidden from the eyes of the public; a grand rule for every branch of art, but one too much disregarded at the present day.

(Conclusion next time.)

Mrs. Moulton's First Concert.

(From the New York Tribune, Oct. 17.)

The reception of Mrs. Moulton last night at Steinway Hall was one of the brilliant events of the season. It was not a mere gathering of the connoisseurs and curious people to hear a singer with whose praises society has rung for three or four years, but an assemblage of our best known ladies and gentlemen to extend a friendly welcome to an admired countrywoman at the outset of her new career. Full dress prevailed and beauty sparkled all over the house. So profuse were the offerings of baskets and bouquets that before the end of the evening the stage looked like a bed of flowers. The enthusiasm with which Mrs. Moulton was courted in the gay and fashionable circles of imperial Paris is a matter of such fame that there can be no impertinence in alluding to it here, nor will it be deemed improper to remark that an equally unmistakable social success seems to have been prepared for her in America. Indeed if she were only an ordinary parlor singer, she has prestige enough to pass for a musical phenomenon in any city of the United States where people catch the gossip of the French capital, and know how highly this fair lady has been honored, not only in the court of the fallen empire, but by the great masters of art, whose praise is an artist's best reward. But Mrs. Moulton is by no means an ordinary singer. The extravagant encomiums which have been lavished upon her in advance are certainly overstrained; yet, after making a liberal deduction for the enthusiasm of her admirers, we can still accept a great deal of what has been said as simple truth. The quality of her voice, to begin with, has not been praised too highly. We have sometimes thought that we are beginning to develop in America a certain character of soprano as distinct from the voices of other nations as the rich and sensuous Italian is distinct from the graceful French, the earnest German, or the rare voice of the far North. Our women have the sweet tones of the most favored of their foreign sisters, with less warmth than one race and less force than another; but they have a beauty of song all their own, graceful, bird like, and most exquisitely tender. Mrs. Moulton's is an American voice, enriched with certain gifts that are entirely exceptional. It reminds one a little of Miss Kellogg's, though it is fuller than hers in the lower register—being not a soprano but a mezzo-soprano—and a trifle less clear in the upper; but it has a more remarkable vibratory character than any other organ of its class which we can now call to mind. This valuable quality gives it great power of expression, and makes it brilliant at the same time that it is rich and sweet. We can believe the story of Mrs. Moulton's anonymous and somewhat exalted biographer, that Rossini compared it to the voice which sang to him in imagination while he was composing; for under favorable circumstances the effect of such a voice is unrivaled. It is not remarkable for strength or compass, and hence anxious friends have doubted whether the lady who fascinated the salon would be able to satisfy the severer exactions of the concert room. She has vocal power enough, however, to be heard in any hall or theatre that we know of, and if her present venture do not succeed there will be some other reason for it than want of voice.

Mrs. Moulton's first song last night was the "Bel Raggio," from "Semiramide." It charmed everybody. Nothing could have been more thoroughly musical than her execution of the florid embellishments with which Rossini has loaded this aria. Almost all public performers go through it like an exercise. Mrs. Moulton knows how to give it as a song. She took the difficult runs with delightful ease, accuracy, and self-possession, and displayed a mezza voce of rare beauty and clearness. In the opening measures of the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria" she gave evidence of deep sentiment, but she missed the climax of passion to which the prayer ought to rise. Indeed it was plain before the close of the evening that either from lack of bodily strength or from lack of art she was unable to sustain herself in the high position she had taken at the beginning. The "Ave Maria" for instance, was rather tame; the duet afterwards with Ronconi from the "Elisir d'Amore" was weak and flimsy; and the cavatina from "Betty" can only be described as moderately effective. In the last two of these, and in the little songs which she gave as encores, there was a perceptible flagging which several times degenerated into blunders. Every allowance must be made, of course, for the nervousness of a first night; but we are inclined to believe that Mrs. Moulton so often loses command of her voice because her training has been nice rather than severe. She seems to be deficient also in the dramatic power which is necessary for an effective singer on the public stage.

(From the N. Y. Times, Oct. 17.)

 There is about Mrs. Moulton a strong fascination, which is felt before she opens her lips at all, and which afterward is hardly to be resisted.

Perhaps this implies that Mrs. Moulton owes more to personal magnetism and less to the mastery of her art than we mean to convey; and perhaps suspicion regarding the stress of the former might well at first warp the judgment of practical observers. We hasten, therefore, to say that without any such magnetism at all, Mrs. Moulton might be a fine, even if a much less sympathetic artist; and that we have never seen any first appearance whatever so curiously free from the characteristic blemishes of such occasions. The lady came upon the stage with that simple grace which commonly takes so long to acquire, and, with the faintest, evanescent sign of timidity, sang at once as if she had been used to face crowds in a vast hall for years. As the programme of this interesting occasion has appeared in none of the advertisements, we place it on record:

- PART I.
- Overture, "Semiramide".....Rossini
The Orchestra.
1. Largo al Factotum, "Barbier".....Rossini
Signor Ronconi.
2. Fantasia, "Martha".....Sarasate
Signor Sarasate.
3. Bel Raggio, "Semiramide".....Rossini
Mrs. Charles Moulton.
4. Romanza, "Faust".....Gounod
Signor Ronconi.
5. Ave Maria with violin obligato.....Gounod
Mrs. Charles Moulton.
- PART II.
- Overture, "Gazza Lutra".....Rossini
The Orchestra.
6. Connais-tu le Pays, "Nigoun".....Thomas
Miss Palmer.
7. Duo, "Elixir d'Amore".....Donizetti
Mrs. Charles Moulton and Signor Ronconi.
8. Andante and Finale, Concerto.....Mendelssohn
Signor Sarasate.
9. Cavatina, "Betty".....Donizetti
Mrs. Charles Moulton.
10. Duo, "Una Sera d'Amore".....Campana
Miss Palmer and Signor Ronconi.
Grand March.

Mrs. Moulton rendered "Bel Raggio" as we have not heard it before in the concert-room. Her purity and volume of tone, the surpassing finish of her execution, the amazing facility and unexceptionable elegance of her florid passages deserved and gained unmixed admiration. In response to the earnest demand of her auditors, Mrs. Moulton then sang a French chansonnette, with an archness and gaiety in admirable contrast with her opening effort. Signor Ronconi was heartily welcomed, and troiled forth the well-worn "Largo al Factotum" with much of his old voice and all of his old humor and fire. In the "Ave Maria," set to meet the best qualities of her voice, Mrs. Moulton again won the hearty suffrage of her public, and the first part ended in quite a blaze of enthusiasm. Signor Pablo Sarasate, of whom we should like to write more fully when more space is at command, proved himself an artist of high rank, and was heartily encouraged. The second part of the entertainment was, as regards plaudits and universal satisfaction, a repetition of the first; and the opinion was generally expressed at the close that Mrs. Moulton had made, in all respects, a great success.

Of all past singers, Mrs. Moulton undoubtedly most recalls the traditions of Malibran. The voice is a mezzo-soprano of exquisite melodiousness, sweet rather than strong, although of strength sufficient, even in an extended range, and producing, when first heard, the kind of strange thrill of admiring exultation wrought by the first glorious bloom of Spring flowers, or the first view of a sublime landscape. What is the secret of this? Simply the revelation of a capacity for passion; a revelation conveyed by the most perfect of musical instruments, whose natural beauty has been brought to the rarest perfection without being hardened and worn away by the educating attritions. It is nonsense to style Mrs. Moulton an amateur. She is already an artist in the fullest sense, since she can not only stand the test of rigid technical examination, but possesses the more splendid gifts that neither experience nor the most elaborate culture and labor can alone confer. Doubtless she may improve upon herself, and we greatly mistake her if she does not feel that she should try. But Mrs. Moulton, as she is, brings far more to delight and to teach into the concert-room than many a singer of long won repute and extensive following. There are singers in plenty who can "execute;" the rarity is to find a singer whose execution has a soul behind it; and between some of these artists and Mrs. Moulton, there is much the same difference that exists between a musical-box and a sky-lark.

(From the Nation, Oct. 26.)

The first thought that probably came into the minds of many of those who then heard Mrs. Moulton for the first time was in regard to the reposeful character of her art. Whoever looked for startling effects was disappointed. That is not the direction in which nature has endowed her. Her effects are quietly produced, and are the results of purity of voice and perfection of method, and not of any phenomenal range or power. Those who look to be astonished by either wealth of voice or intensity of method will look in vain. Mrs. Moulton's art must be enjoyed by giving one's self up in a quiet spirit to the appreciation of beautiful tones beautifully produced. Every phrase will then be found to be charmingly sung, and every passage, however intricate, perfectly vocalized. Work, however, of such fineness is not of the kind that commands most fully popular applause, and we doubt very much whether Mrs. Moulton will be found to possess the quality of talent that most surely excites the enthusiasm of the public. Her voice is neither large, nor powerful, nor vibratory, nor of great compass and extent, and her style is not dramatic. There is nothing electric in her singing, nothing vivid in the color that she gives to the music. Her own manner is calm and dispassionate, and she fails to quicken the pulse of her hearers, or to excite any other emotion than that of contentment at the perfection of the art.

We recognize in Mrs. Moulton a voice of delicious softness, rich and warm in its quality—though her singing is not warm—flexible, and under perfect training. She possesses, also, the capacity of singing with demi-voix more perfectly than any other person we have ever heard, together with true intonation and personal characteristics that are in her favor. But, on the other hand, her style, though a highly cultivated one, does not seem to us in the highest sense artistic. The art is only truly noble which subdues the personality of the singer to itself, and puts the sentiment of the music first in importance, the vocalism second, the artist last.

We also find Mrs. Moulton, as an artist, lacking in earnestness of purpose. Miss Wynne, a much inferior singer, so far as natural endowments were concerned, through the possession of this quality impresses herself far more strongly upon her audience. Hearing the two singers at the same hall, on consecutive evenings, the difference in effect upon their audiences of their ballad singing could not fail to be remarked. The latter seemed to forget herself, and to desire to impress only her musical thought upon the listeners, the latter to interpose herself between the song and the audience.

Mrs. Moulton is, undoubtedly, a very perfect parlour singer, but her capacities do not seem to have expanded themselves as yet to the limits of the concert-room, and, unless her art deepens and broadens itself, we greatly doubt whether she will meet with those triumphs that her friends have so confidently predicted for her.

Chicago, Pyro-Musically Considered.

(From our Chicago Correspondent.)

Desperate cases require desperate treatment, is the substance of an old adage; and I trust the present emergency may be sufficient to excuse the verbal new creation which heads this article.

The telegraph and the daily press have harped industriously enough on the terrible calamity which has befallen us; the unfortunate "Phoenix" has been compelled to rise from her ashes a vast number of times within the last three weeks, entirely irrespective of the thousand years grace provided for in the original contract. What I propose to do here is to give a slight glance at the extent of the destruction, correct a few of the more glaring errors of the illustrated papers, and then give a synopsis of the musical situation so far as the smoke allows me.

The extent of the calamity is absolutely inconceivable. A city of about one hundred thousand inhabitants is entirely blotted out. More property is burned than the entire city of Buffalo, and Buffalo is a large city. There are about eighteen miles of streets burned clean in the South Division. Of these, nearly six were built up with buildings that would average a cost of $1000 a foot, on each side of the street. This alone gives a loss of over $60,000,000. The other eight miles (for I allow about four miles of crossings) were built over at a cost, I should think, of about $250 a foot. Making about $17,000,000 more. This gives about $90,000,000 as the loss on the South side. On the North side there were burned over something like fifty miles of streets, improved at an average cost of about $200 a linear foot. Of course some parts were worth much more; but for the whole, taking the vacant lots and the poor districts, I think this is sufficiently high. Here we have a loss of about $60,000,000. The stocks of goods lost would not exceed $30,000,000, I think. Total, not over $200,000,000, or enough to have carried on the late war about three months. I doubt whether the same amount of property was ever before reduced to ashes in so short a time. This estimate of the loss is large enough to satisfy any prudent man who knows the character of the improvements destroyed. Upwards of 17,000 buildings were burned in the North Division. When I was over there Monday morning about nine o'clock, the fire had just reached Chicago Avenue, except east of Clark st., where it was already along to Division St. Here in a region of frame dwellings for a space of half a mile wide and a mile long, every family was doing the best it could to move out. Expressmen were charging $100 a load, and were transporting things but a short distance for that. With some difficulty we made our way around north of the fire to the park in front of Unity Church. This is the church with two towers in the same group with the New England church, in Every Saturday. The latter church had already burned. The residence between that and Unity was yet intact. The heat of the fire was great there, and presently Unity Church ignited in one of its towers, and soon went with the others. The park in front was stored full of household goods. Robert Collyer managed to save here some of his books. Good man! I saw him next day gathering the remnant of his household goods into a wagon and move them toward a shelter—hut where I know not. All that night we watched for the wind to change and sweep the West side. But a merciful Providence spared us that, and so we have left the domiciles of over 200,000 inhabitants.

The artists of Harper's Weekly have put it on rather strong in the picture called "The rush over Randolph St. Bridge." The building there represented as burning stands as good as ever; it never was on fire at all, and if it had been, the wind would have carried the flames exactly the opposite direction from that in the picture. So also of the large picture showing a bird's eye view of the fire. The wind blows exactly the wrong way. It came from the southwest, the night of the fire.

Then, too, the writer tells us of Lincoln Park and the prairie becoming a bog by reason of the rain, and of a rain that had fallen a few days before. The fact is, there was scarcely any rain that night, and had been none at all for three weeks before; if there had been, the fire would not have caught so easily. Another tells us of the fire being transported by block pavements. This also is nonsense. The blocks show exactly how that was. They are not burned on the edges, but only charred in the centre, where cinders fell on them. There are miles and miles which are entirely uninjured, and none at all was burned up. The fire did communicate by the plank side-walk. Of that there is no doubt; and to-day not a foot of it remains in all the burnt district to tell the tale.

Again, all the writers make great account of the robberies and pillaging. These I believe to be sheer fabrication. I was on patrol several nights, and I know of no instance of the sort, nor could I trace any one to a reliable source. The same is true of incendiarism. There is no evidence of an intentional fire, since that fatal day. The fifty people hung and shot were executed (if they died at all) by "men in buckram." The city has been in a terribly excited state, and any rumor speedily grew.

Of course, in such a time, all selfishness came to the surface. Many manifested a disposition to raise prices of ordinary necessities of which an unlimited supply was within three hours rail, and more than one hundred and fifty rail road trains a day anxious to bring it in. But the first day General Sheridan issued an order which stopped this for the moment, and in one day trade moved on again.

Some men, on the contrary, manifested great kindness. Mr. J. F. Fargo, the author of one or two singing books, had a suite of rooms in the heart of the city. He was interested in the fire some $20,000. But instead of spending the time in regrets, he turned his attention to assisting his poorer neighbors. Telling them to park their valuables into as small compass as they could, they soon had several trunks ready, and he set himself to help get them to a place of safety. Happening fortunately to have about two hundred dollars in his pocket-book, he paid out the last cent in procuring transportation for these trunks, of which only one was his. They were finally saved, thanks to his persistent effort.

Mr. T. N. Caulfield had lately come to the city from Washington. His room was in the business part of the town. He assisted others so much as to have his own clothes nearly burned off him. All his personal effects were lost.

Mr. A. J. Creswold, one of our best concert organists, saved not half a toilet, and his wife hardly more. He has gone to St. Louis, I hear.

Personally I was most affected by the losses of Mr. Dudley Buck. He had a very pleasant place, a large brick house with basement, in all some thirteen or fourteen rooms. Adjacent was his music-hall, about 20 ft. by 40, containing his beautiful three-manual organ of twenty-two sounding stops, seven composition pedals, and the usual couplers. The fire took this about four o'clock in the morning. Mr. Buck was in Albany that night. But friends were there and fought cinders on the roof until it became apparent that the family must leave. Mrs. Buck accordingly saved three or four trunks of things, and herself and family finally found a place of safety through the kindness of Geo. L. Dunlap, Esq., late of the Northwestern Rail Road. Mr. Buck was organist of St. James church, where he had a new organ (by Johnson) which in all its appointments was the most satisfactory of any instrument in the city. But not a vestige now remains. Mr. Buck lost his valuable house and organ, as well as all his furniture; but worse than that his uncommonly fine library, which was as good a "working library of music" as I ever saw. It embraced a very rich collection of Church Music (including all of the Bach scores published by the Bach and Handel Society of Leipzig) a great deal of organ music, the complete scores of Beethoven, orchestral, vocal, and chamber, a large assortment of the best German works on Theory, Töpfer's valuable work on organ-building, etc., etc. Besides this he had a fine miscellaneous library. So on Wednesday Mr. Buck reached Chicago to find himself without a local habitation, and a poorer man by some $20,000 than when he left home. But great as the money loss is, I have had experience enough to know that it is the books, and manuscripts, and the organ, that Mr. Buck will miss most. I do not wonder, therefore, that he turned his face toward Boston.

And it is for this that I am particular to mention all these things. During the three years that he has been in this city, he has done more to elevate the tone of the profession than any other man. All the best church organists of the city, except one or two, have taken lessons of him; and every man of them has a higher opinion of Dudley Buck's ability as an organist, than before he was brought close enough to admit of measurement. As a teacher of advanced Harmony, Counterpoint and Fugue, he had a monopoly in this locality, and in my opinion deserved it. This is the greatest musical loss that the fire brought us.

Our school powers have cut off music from the public schools. Messrs. Whittemore and Blackman have gone, one to St. Louis, the other to Andover, Mass. They are both very superior teachers.

The press fared hardly. To begin at home, the Musical Independent lost its mail lists and all its files. It will not be revived until January. The Song Messenger saved its books, but its editor, Mr. J. R. Murray, was burned out of his home and compelled to go east on account of sickness in his family. A temporary hand is bringing out the November number. The Advance, that noble religious paper, lost every thing but its prestige and mail lists. These were in the safe. So of the Christian Advocate and Standard. The Tribune thought itself secure, but the fire ate out the interior of the rooms. A part of the wall was blown away by the bursting of a Krupp shell, kept in a window as a curiosity. The Little Corporal lost with the others. Two new books by Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller were destroyed just as the plates were ready for the press.

The music houses lost heavily. Lyon & Healy had a heavy stock. They lost eighty pianos, and all their music and books. Root & Cady estimate a loss of about $200,000. In it are the plates of three books, the Charm, The Song King, and the Curriculum. Lyon & Healy lost the plates and the first edition of Baumbach's new collection of Sacred Music, as well as all their other plates. Another heavy loser in this line was Mr. J. Butterfield, whose new cantata "Belshazzar" was destroyed.

Mr. W. K. Nixon did a handsome thing. Although a heavy loser by the fire, he owned the only building left intact in the burnt district, a fire-proof building for offices and banks. His schedule of prices was fixed before the fire. But he reduced it ten per cent., and filled his building with tenants who had been burned out, refusing offers of twice and thrice what he asked. It is better to be a gentleman, than rich.

The prospect for music this winter is poor indeed. The Oratorio Society lost their books, including sets of the Messiah, Creation, etc., Hymn of Praise, etc. There is talk of reviving the organization for this winter in two divisions. Who would be director I cannot say, for Mr. Balatka has removed to Milwaukee. About the only man left competent to the place is Mr. J. A. Butterfield.

Signor Dama came here, but the smoke was too strong, and he went back to Boston.

It really seemed sad to lose the beautiful Crosby Opera House. It had been renovated and wonderfully improved at an expense of about $80,000. I was present at a "private view" a few days before the fire, and all agreed that it was the most beautiful interior of any theatre in the country. The gold rep used to relieve the crimson upholstery of the proscenium boxes, cost $20 a yard in gold. The decorations had been carried on under the eye of Mr. Crosby himself, by Mr. Garrison, the gentlemanly and able manager. McVicker's theatre was also newly fitted up this year, at great expense. Farwell Hall was given over to lectures. Theodore Thomas left rather abruptly. He was to have opened the Opera House Monday night. About $100,000 worth of organs were destroyed by the fire, including three of Hook's, worth $18,000, three of Johnson's worth $23,000.—And this is a part of "What I know about Fire."

DER FREYSCHUETZ.

Carl Tausig.*

(Continued from page 117).

Public opinion had condemned his experiments severely; more severely he himself condemned his doings when he had come to calmly judge of his musical aspirations so far. He forged the arrows of a vile criticism into a critical file, which all through life he kept and conscientiously applied. What enigmas his art enthusiasm might be unable yet to solve, his studies in speculative philosophy, to which he had been long devoted, and in practical (not theoretical) art-aesthetics, gradually cleared up for him. For many years fame was entirely silent about him. He withdrew to his solitary study, living in different cities at different times. Thus he was kept in some contact with the world and its influences. For some time he would thus live in retirement at Geneva, London, Brussels and other cities; at times he would return to Vienna. Here he formed a warm attachment to Johannes Brahms, whom he most highly esteemed as an eminent composer and as one of the most interesting virtuosi. These intimate relations to Brahms did not change his devotion to Wagner and Liszt. Cruel fate was yet kind enough to him to give him an opportunity of showing his gratitude shortly before his death to the two masters, who had exerted the most lasting influence on his artistic development. In Berlin he met Wagner during the festivities instituted in honor of the latter, and Liszt he visited at Leipzig.

(*Translated for this Journal from the Leipzig Signale)

During the last months of 1865 Carl Tausig, after an absence of seven years, returned to Berlin, to resume the practical activity for which he had so well prepared himself. At first probably intent only on a short visit, the admiration—enthusiasm it may be called—of his hearers, increasing with every concert, caused him to take up his residence in Berlin, to make it his head-quarters for his concert excursions. Undertaken at longer or shorter intervals, far and wide, these became real triumphs. Anton Rubinstein alone was named together with him as a worthy rival. It need not be stated that the "rivals" were connected by mutual regard and hearty admiration of each other's excellent points. The Prussian court, in consequence of his growing fame at home and abroad (in Russia, Holland, &c.), nominated him royal court-pianist; Austria, still more unexpectedly, decorated him with a high order. These temporary concert excursions, carried out with a feverish restlessness that may gradually have undermined his constitution, never too robust, he looked upon as extra work, to secure a livelihood. The greater part of the year was devoted by him with self-sacrificing love to his conservatory for the piano at Berlin, for which he engaged as assistants the best artists, such as C. F. Weitzmann, Adolf Jensen, Louis Ehlert, and others. Two days in the week, from morning till night, he devoted himself to these pupils completely, who clung to him with enthusiastic love. Many of them, by their musical excellence, will do credit to their teacher. His artist nature, nervously intent on the most serious cultivation of his art, and utterly averse to all superficiality, would not allow him to give lessons to dilettanti. That seemed to him too much like trade, and would have worn out his sensitive nerves the sooner. The remaining five days of the week he devoted with unremitting zeal to enlarging his repertoire, to further improvement of his playing, though acknowledged by every one as perfect; his ear, growing every moment more refined, guiding him surely to improvements, patent only to him. His ideal, with every degree of improvement, rose one degree higher; and this "Faust"-like trait of character stamps him one of the most imposing artist natures. In the immediate interest of his Conservatory he applied his mind and the sum of practical experiences made during the time of his assiduous studies to editing classical, instructive studies. His edition of Clementi's Gradus ad Parnassum and of selections from J. Sebastian Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord," his concert editions of various works of Scarlatti, Schubert, C. M. von Weber, have been a common property of cultivated pianists, justly taking the place of older and contemporaneous arrangements and editions. They are incontestable proofs of the merits of their author, for the future of the art of piano-playing for all, artists, teachers and students. His ingenious fantasias, full of originality, on Hungarian Gipsy melodies, and the two beautiful Etudes marked opus 1, show that he intended to devote himself to composition again. Sad fate! The longing for original creation, gratified for the first time in this composition, marked opus 1, is the last smile, the last sigh of an artist, whose glowing, poetic fancy never had grown cold, but was restrained in each and every manifestation by the severe self-criticism of his philosophic mind, whenever the final decision of his head was not perfectly harmonious with the inspiration of his soul. This "opus 1" is at the same time a self-condemnation and a proof of the renouncing of former "youthful indiscretions" so called; it promised a rich harvest of golden fruits to the musical world. He little thought that death would so soon arrest him with his brutal halt! on the new path he had struck into; the blade did not feel that its scabbard was used up, consumed. The saying: "la lame a usé le fourreau," if applicable to any artist's death, is applicable to that of Tausig.

(Conclusion next time.)

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 4, 1871.

The English Ballad Concerts.

Mr. George Dolby's admirable group of English singers,—being each and all of the very best representatives of what there is best in the English school of song,—have more than met the highest expectations of our best Boston audiences. In three concerts (Saturday, Sunday and Monday evenings, Oct. 14, 15 and 16) they gave such fresh and rare delight to the most musical persons, as well as to the many, that a like triplet of the same sort of entertainments was ventured a week later; and that it was equally successful shows that the charm was real and will wear. This charm, for the most part, lies in the manner, far more than in the matter of the performances. For nothing short of such a group of artists, good in every point, could reconcile a cultivated music-lover to sitting through anything so tedious and so empty as a whole evening of what are commonly called English Ballads. Indeed the term "ballad" has acquired of late years a new sense, being applied to all sorts of modern sentimental, namby-pamby, imitative, hot-house products of the Balfes, the Wallaces, the Claribels, &c., far oftener than to the real ballads, songs (mostly rhymed narratives) that sprung fresh out of the heart of a simpler age, and have a native flavor, a charm of unaffected quaintness and sincerity, which the concert shop-songs of to-day entirely lack. England is the great manufactory and mart of this kind of song, the peculiar home of the common-place in sentimental melody; and English publics thrive upon such lengths of this dull sort of appetite as would make any other people live in present nightmare and in fear of palsy. In length and in monotony a London ballad programme is "fearfully and wonderfully made;" its interminable string of would-be tender and pathetic songs all have the same cloying family resemblance that we find in the timbre of the various Sax instruments that render all our brass bands so expressive of satiety, especially when they sentimentalize, as trumpets emasculated into cornets are so much inclined to do; and, worse yet, all such songs are calculated for encores, so that the sifter-through must swallow one "square meal" upon the top of another; and singers think they must oblige the spoiled public, which, by insane applause, has first spoiled them, or the like of them, in whose footsteps they follow.

The only real fault we have heard found with the Dolby Concerts has been with the programmes. But there has been enough of what is good and classical in them to give the noble singers worthy opportunity, each more than once; and all of them have done their part so well, that this complaint gives way to wonder how it is possible for such intelligent, refined, true artists to spend their art on so much most indifferent music; it is wasting the "precious ointment" upon common heads. Of course some of these six programmes were better than others; the two on Sunday evenings, particularly the second one, contained music that was worth the while and worthy of such interpreters. The poorest programme was the last, where Bishop, Wallace, Balfe, Arditi, &c., followed in close succession, and each song was supplemented by an encore piece of the same description, even to "The heart bowed down,"—strange theme for the grand voice and style of Mr. Santley!

—But now to a more pleasant theme for us—the artists themselves. More perfect elements, whether for quartet or for solo singing, we have seldom if ever known to be brought together. In all the concerted pieces the unity was complete; the voices blended as from inmost sympathy and a fine common understanding, each losing itself in the whole, while its individuality was all the more palpably felt and as it were consecrated by the harmony, without which it would be imperfectly itself. Fine intelligence and the most conscientious, patient preparation and rehearsal were evident in every smallest effort of this kind. Such thoroughness should be a lesson to our singers. The perfect concert manners, or deportment of the whole troupe, too, was refreshing, and should do good here as a model. Quiet, dignified, respectful to their task and to their audience they all were, indulging in no tricks of vanity and no undue familiarity. The Quartets were mostly sung by Miss EDITH WYNNE, Madame PATEY, Mr. W. H. CUMMINGS, and Mr. J. G. PATEY,—the latter gentleman doing more effective service as a solid, well-trained basso in the quartets, than in the few solos which he sang, though his rendering of Handel's "Tears, such as tender fathers shed," and "Shall I in Mamre's fertile plains," was unexceptionable. Mr. SANTLEY took part in two Quintets: the Sanctus from Rossini's Messe Solennelle, which was most exquisitely sang, and a Madrigal by Festa: "Down in a flowery vale," a quaint and interesting specimen of the Italian madrigal composers of the 16th century; also in a Trio: "When the wind blows," by Bishop. Other Quartets, more or less interesting themselves, all gem-like in the purity of execution, were "The Shepherd's Sabbath-day," by Hatton; "God is a Spirit," from The Woman of Samaria (Bennett); "Honor and Glory," from Costa's Naaman; Mendelssohn's part-song: "Resting place;" the Glee: "Here in cool Grot" (Lord Mornington); "Sleep, gentle Lady" (Bishop); "There is beauty on the mountain" (Goss); "See the Chariot" (Horsley); "Where the bee sucks" (Dr. Arne and Jackson), and Hatton's "When evening's twilight."

The Soprano of the troupe, Miss EDITH WYNNE, though less demonstrative and sharing less public notice than others of the party, did win our admiration more and more, not only by her sweet, true, even voice,—of a veiled quality, but charming,—her facile, free and finished execution, her thoroughly artistic style and faultless, genuine expression, but by the self-forgetting, conscientious way in which she made the true expression of the music the one aim and motive of her whole performance. There was no prima donna egotism to be seen about it; her song is a sincere service, a devotion, it would seem, to the Ideal, and like a "still, small voice" it steals directly to the heart. She is one of the sweetest, purest, most refined, most musical interpreters both of the simple ballad and of more artistic forms of composition. In the part-singing nothing could add a finer grace, or gild the whole with softer, light, than her most flexible, sweet voice, thridding the mazy passages so deftly and with such instinct of proportion in the florid passages. Nor do you feel any inadequacy of power where majesty or pathos are required, although the voice is one of slender volume, nor any lack of brilliancy or sweetness in the upper tones. Her rendering of Cherubini's Ave Maria, of a Recitative and Air from Arthur Sullivan's "Prodigal Son," of Schubert's Ave Maria, was exquisitely chaste and finished, but in no sense overdone. This artist seems to have kept herself unstained of the world, i.e., above the influence of applauding publics. The joy and rapture of Bach's "My heart ever faithful" lost something by the too slow time in which she took it; the steadfast, fervent, serious faith was there, but not the almost merri-ness of healthy piety which Bach gives vent to in that sunshiny song. Of the modern "ballad" kind Miss Wynne sang, (always to a charm so far as the composition would allow) "Oh! bid your faithful Ariel fly" (T. Linley); "Marjorie's Almanack" (Mme. Sainton Dolby); "Tell me, my heart" (Bishop); "Will he come?" (Sullivan); "Should he upbraid?" (Bishop); "The old Cottage Clock" (Molloy)—they had struck the "old clock" and "old arm-chair" vein in that last programme, and worked it liberally in the encores,—and others in response to recalls. Among the most delightful of the old English favorites of thirty years ago were the Duets: "As it fell upon a day," and "I know a bank," as here sung with consummate grace by Miss Wynne and Mme. Patey. For once, at least, one can find pleasure in such old songs so sung.

Madame PATEY unites with a fine presence, and face full of generous, sometimes inspired expression, one of the richest, largest and most evenly developed contralto voices we have ever heard. She, too, is an artist, with a deal of simple pathos in her song. Of homely ballads she is one of the very best interpreters. If she have any fault, it is that of occasionally—not very often—overdoing in the matter of expression. But this we charge not so much to the singer, as to the ballad style itself; for ballads brought before a public audience put the singer in a somewhat false position; ballads belong to home and quiet twilight hours; they inevitably become overdone before great publics; the very traits in the delivery which are the least true and simple are the most applauded, and singers (all but the greatest) follow where applause leads. A ballad hardly seems itself in a great concert room; in braving the exposure it is pretty sure to take on false airs. Nor was the fine ballad singing of Mme. Patey always an exception to the rule. Tom Moore's "Meeting of the Waters," for instance, was all simple and perfect till the last phrase, when the concert trick came,—the voice descended into three or four astonishingly strong deep tones; this was encored, and repeated in the same way, only "more so." But the false conventionalisms of the English concert-room affect the simple, noble, large and heartfelt singing of this lady in a slight degree compared with most. Her's is whole-souled singing, and she is mistress of her art in a high sense. In "Auld Robin Gray," "Little Nell" (Linley), "Lillie's Good Night" (Philp), "Sweet and Low" (Wallace), and the old English ditty: "Come lasses and lads," &c., &c., she seized whatever life and individuality there might be in each song. Of her sacred selections, that in which we enjoyed her most was Handel's "What though I trace," from Solomon. Gounod's song: "There is a green hill far away" seemed "sacred" rather in the sentimental-feeble sense; but both that and Costa's "I dreamt I was in heaven" were beautifully sung. In Rossini's "O salutaris hostia" and in the "Quis est Homo," with Miss Wynne, there was a wealth of feeling and of beauty in her tones.

Mr. W. H. CUMMINGS, who won the sympathies of the most musical part of Boston in the last Oratorio Festival, has renewed the charm of his sweet, delicate, artistically managed tenor voice, and of his highly intellectual, refined and sympathetic rendering of whatever music he may undertake. His delivery of "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her angels" was even more exquisitely pure and touching than before, and was really the gem of the first of the two sacred concerts. "Cujus animam" rather tried his power, yet it was finely given. His own setting of Longfellow's "When the hours of day are numbered," was, in his chaste, sincere delivery, a faithful, realizing recitation of the poem, true to its spirit and its every thought,—genuine, if unpretending as a composition. It seemed odd to see and hear the thoughtful looking Cummings in the "old chair" business (song by Balfe). And why, if "Come into the garden, Maud" must be sung, select so flat and commonplace a setting of it as the one by Balfe? Mr. Dresel's is a thousand times more worthy of the poem. Mr. Cummings for an old ballad sang "Draw the sword, Scotland," and also divers songs by Brahms, Bishop, &c.

And now of the world-famous basso, Mr. SANTLEY. Nothing more satisfactory, in voice, or method, or artistic rendering, has been vouchsafed us here by bass or baritone. The solid, yeoman look and bearing of the man,—frank, simple, quiet, dignified, impressive,—gave assurance which was more than fully confirmed. His organ is indeed a rare and glorious one. In quality (or timbre) it is baritone, but its great range includes deep, ponderous bass tones, and it ascends with ease and scarcely any diminution of volume, and without break anywhere, into warm, golden heights of tenor. The whole is of a rich, full diapason quality, rolling forth in free, generous organ tones as from an exhaustless source. The proper bass tones are, to be sure, a little harder than the rest, suggestive of the deep reed stops of an organ. His method is so perfect, or so natural, that you perceive no method: the ars celare artem, if it be art at all, is here consummate. The stamp of artistic honesty and thoroughness is on all he does. It is direct, manly, simple singing, without any ad captandum nonsense (beyond that invariable conventionalism of English singers, the holding out of a strong high note upon the final cadence, as if to notify the public that the job is done and you go off with flying colors). A fine intelligence pervades his singing; with a sure instinct he seizes and conveys the point and all the meaning of the song. To hear Santley sing the love song of the Cyclops: "O ruddier than the cherry" in Handel's Acis and Galatea, or from the Alexander's Feast: "Revenge, Timotheus cries," were worth an evening's time alone. Have we ever heard the Handelian roulades sung with such a happy ease and certainty, all moving on so smoothly and composedly, with never any faltering or giving out of breath, and musical and graceful and alive, as in his rendering of the former? Or any serious cantabile more large, or more expressive and imaginative than he gave us in the second (minor) portion of the latter: "These are Grecian ghosts." His "Pro Peccatis" was the grandest, truest we have ever heard; for even Badioli, glorious baritone as he was too, was not unspoiled by audience like most Italian opera heroes.

The opening of Pergolesi's "Sanctum et terrible" was given by Mr. Santley with impressive dignity and grandeur; the Allegro of the piece which follows is hardly worthy of so imposing a beginning. Neukomm's "Confirma hoc Deus" is not a great composition, but it gave opportunity for Santley's grand and stirring declamation. The Offertorium by Dr. Chard (the Oxford professor in 1518?)—"The Mass was sung," effective in the solo, was doubly so through the responses as of a cathedral quartet choir within; we never knew such "voices from within" to blend so truly with the principal. Gounod's "Nazareth," and Hatton's descriptive ballad, "The Wreck of the Hesperus," each in its way a striking composition, showed something of the graphic and dramatic power of Santley, which must be more than ordinary. It was a sorry joke to hear such noble powers engaged in the stale ditty of "The heart bowed down;" but his entirely simple, serious, whole-hearted and full-breasted singing of the Dibdin sea-song, "Tom Bowline," was ballad singing of the truest and most touching kind.

Will it not be a grand thing when we hear him and all these singers with the Handel and Haydn Society in Oratorio, as we are promised at Thanksgiving in "Elijah" and in "Judas Maccabæus?"

We must not forget to speak of a very important, indeed central member of the Dolby party, the admirable piano accompanist, Mr. LINDSEY SLOPER. He is a thoroughbred musician, and no accompaniment could be more precise, more sympathetic, than his. There is a charm of disinterestedness in his coöperation; his whole heart is in the music, and he forgets himself. As a classical solo pianist, too, he gave good proof of his artistic quality. Movements from Beethoven Sonatas, Songs without Words by Mendelssohn, &c., were very clearly, finely rendered. Best of all Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith" variations; for Chopin his tempo seemed too rigid and inflexible.

MRS. CHARLES MOULTON, on coming out of the tropical fervors of New York enthusiasm (witness the ecstatic superlatives of the Press, from which we copy the more moderate portions in preceding columns) into what artists have been taught to imagine the cold, critical, east wind atmosphere of Boston, must have been greatly reassured by her reception in the Music Hall on Monday evening. She was in the presence of admiring personal friends, a crowd of them, all eager to admire her more; and there were many more of the most cultivated friends of music, ready, hoping, to admire. The beauty of person and the easy, quiet grace of manner, made an immediate impression, and her entrée was the signal for a most cheering demonstration.

We do not undertake, from a first hearing, to settle her position among vocal artists. Artist she is, most certainly;—"mere amateur" on social grounds alone. We find our first impressions in the main agreeing with the general sense of what we have quoted, particularly from the Nation. Her singing is "reposeful," never thrilling. Music seems to be a placid and voluptuous atmosphere with her, where all is elegant and fragrant and delightful; no great roused passions, no deep stirrings of the soul, no yearnings for the Infinite, all more akin to Rosini than to Beethoven; for brilliancy and sparkle withal are not wanting, nor witching espiguerie. It is the luxury of art, in which a healthy sensuousness, an elasticity of vital spirits is implied.

We could have wished a better programme, for there was little in it from which one could infer a serious direction in her art love and life. Yet doubtless her selections were of the kind suited to her peculiar powers; and we are always grateful for Rosini and need but the smallest Aria of Mozart to make us happy.

What positive qualities were noted? First, undeniably, a most lovely voice; a mezzo soprano of large compass, rich and warm and sympathetic throughout, sometimes suggesting in the downward range the tone-tint of the clarinet, clear and sweet and liquid in the high tones, every note distinctly rounded, with a most even, limpid flow in rapid passages. Not a great voice in power or volume, but one whose music is pervading, satisfying, quite at home in largest concert room as well as the saloon.—Secondly (for good method is implied), consummate execution. This was proved in the florid Semiramide music: "Bell raggio," which seemed to sing itself through her; and indeed, as has been said, her execution in mezzo voce is a marvel of perfection. Blumenthal's "La Capricieuse" afforded further exhibition of rare vocal virtuosity.

Again, of sweet and beautiful cantabile she showed herself the mistress by her fine rendering of "Vol che sapete," vague love song of that "budding Don Giovanni," the boy Cherubino. What she might do in large, lofty sacred song, there has been nothing yet to show. The tone with "the tear in it" did sometimes surprise you even amid the flowers of Semiramide.

In playful music, as in the duet with Dr. Pulcamara Ferranti, and the "talking" encore ballads, she shows a freedom, and an archness which might ensure success in Comic Opera. So far we dissent from some of the criticisms, and think her much more than a parlor singer; but there is no need to fancy her a Donna Anna or Fidelity.—One of her songs: "Beware, he's fooling thee," was overdone, and seemed to overstep the boundary of true reserve. It showed us how she could prolong a trill, but there was a certain not entirely pleasant suggestion of the Bacchante in the look and action. She must be something of a witch. Is that the meaning of the song? Then it were best unsung. This was the strongest instance of certain points of manner,—the air of familiarity, the ready acceptance of applause, the too evident triumphant consciousness of a magnetic power, which more than once disturbed the pure impression of her art. But that this fascinating lady of society is a singer, of rare voice and talent, and an artist in the use thereof, no one can doubt who heard her. Cambridge and Boston may be proud of her.

Of the rest of the concert we can only add, that there was a fair orchestra: that Sig. SARAGATZ confirmed the first impression of his admirable violin-playing; that Mr. WELLS's fingers played an infinite deal of nothing with the usual faultless grace; that Sig. FERRANTI, happy, hearty, jovial Italian, always a child, interested in others quite as much as in himself, sang "Largo al flautum" and his comical "Femmine! femmine!" with all his volubility and rich power of voice, but, in his ready sympathies, led on by laughter and applause, much overdid the drollery thereof.

There will be further opportunity to hear Mrs. Moulton this evening and several times next week.

NEXT. After the long, dreary waste of miscellaneous "popular" programmes, the poverty whereof is not redeemed by even the best of singers, it is refreshing to see right before us concerts in which the musical matter is made of quite as much and even more importance than the manner. The classical programmes will now take their turn. Two series claim attention first:

1. The SYMPHONY CONCERTS begin on Thursday next at three o'clock, P.M. (instead of half-past three as formerly). The Orchestra, conducted by Mr. ZERBAHN, with Mr. EICHBERG as leader of the violins, will play the "Wasserträger" overture, by Cherubini; Schubert's overture (first time in this country) to "Alfonso and Estrella"; the short little gem of an Entr'acte from Schumann's "Manfred" music, which was first introduced last winter; and the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. Mrs. C. A. BARRY will sing a very noble Concert Aria by Mozart, never before sung here, with accompaniment of orchestra and piano obligato (HUGO LEONHARD); also an Aria from one of Handel's operas: "Contrauco mormorio," and one of the latest songs by Franz, called "Aprilläunen" (April Humors), both doubtless for the first time in this country—Public Rehearsal on Tuesday, at 2 P.M.

2. The six Trio Matinées of Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG will begin on the following Thursday (16th), at the beautiful Hall of the Mechanics' Charitable Association, corner of Chauncy and Bedford Streets. The programmes are of the very choicest and most happily combined. The first one offers: a Beethoven Trio, Op. 70, No. 1 (LEONHARD, EICHBERG and HARTDEGEN); three Schumann Songs by Mr. KREISSMANN: Bach's great Chaconne for Violin (Eichberg), with Schumann's accompaniment; two Songs of Franz; and Schumann's Sonata, Op. 121, for piano and violin.—Beyond, the prospect opens rich as an October sunset, thus:

Nov. 30. Trio by Haydn, No. 7, in A; two of Schumann's three Romanzen for Oboe and Piano, Op. 94 (Messrs. Kutzleb and Leonhard); Beethoven Sonata, piano and violin, Op. 96; Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 1, and Allegro vivace, Op. 51, by Chopin; Quartet for piano, violin, &c., Op. 47, Schumann, (Leonhard, Eichberg, H. Suck and Hartdegen).

Dec. 14. GADE; Sonata, violin and piano, Op. 21;—SCHUBERT: Songs ("Die liebe Farbe" and "Die böse Farbe"), by Carl Gloggnier Castelli;—BACH: Concerto, D minor, for two violins (Eichberg and H. Suck);—CHOPIN: Ballade, in F;—SCHUMANN: Trio, Op. 63, D minor, (and a magnificent work it is!)

Dec. 21. BEETHOVEN: Trio, C minor, Op. 1, No. 3;—SCHUMANN: "Waldescenen" (9 little piano pieces);—GEMINIANI: Violin Sonata, comp. 1748, (Eichberg);—SCHUMANN: Quintet, Op. 44, for piano, violin, &c.

Jan. 11. BEETHOVEN: Sonata, piano and 'cello, Op. 69, (Leonhard and Hartdegen);—SCHUMANN: Songs from the Liederkreis: "Dichterliebe" (Kreissmann);—SCHUBERT: Andante and Allegro for violin and piano, Op. 137, (Eichberg and Leonhard);—HANDEL: Sonata in G minor, and BACH: Siciliano, —both for Oboe and Piano (Kutzleb and Leonhard);—SCHUBERT: Trio, Op. 99, in B flat.

Jan. 25. SCHUMANN: Sonata for piano and violin, Op. 105, A minor;—BACH: Song from Christmas Oratorio, with violin obligato (Gloggnier Castelli);—CHOPIN: Nocturne, Op. 37, No. 2, and Scherzo, Op. 20;—BEETHOVEN: Trio, Op. 70, No. 2, in E flat (Leonhard, Eichberg and A. Suck).

OMISSION AND ERRATA. The article, in our last, on Gilmore's next "Peace" speculation should have been credited to The Song Journal, of Detroit.

Hans von Bülow's tribute to the memory of Tausig, in the translation begun in our last number, was carelessly ascribed to the Neve Zeitschrift, instead of the Signale. It also contained the following errors: 2d line, for "Academy" read Altenburg; 2d column, 20th line from bottom, omit "it was"; 3d column, 9th line, for "Berlin" read Vienna.

THE CHICAGO FIRE, by which Music and musicians were not spared, has restored to us, at least for a time, a valued Correspondent, of late the editor of the Musical Independent,—a paper that was like a true mushroom among the scores of toadstools that have kept starting up out of the rank soil of music-trade all over the West and South,—not to speak of nearer home. His letter from the ruins will be read with interest. And we commend particularly to the hospitality of musical Boston the gentleman of whom he speaks so feelingly, perhaps the most accomplished, useful and successful of all American musicians settled in the West, Mr. DUDLEY BUCK, who, having lost his all (house, organ, splendid musical library, &c.,) has come to us. Any church here may be glad of such an organist. His reputation also as a teacher and composer has not to be made.

A few last notes of the Nilsson Opera are crowded out.

NEW YORK, OCT. 25. The month now drawing to a close has furnished a great deal of music, much bad and much good. I will begin at the beginning.

The Parepa-Rosa English Opera Company opened at the Academy of Music on the 2d, when the "Daughter of the Regiment" was performed. Mme. Rosa has received so much praise, during the past few years, that it is unnecessary to say any thing about her, except that her voice has lost none of its former splendor. The following operas were given during the season, some of them twice: "Don Juan," "Martha," "Maritana," "Bohemian Girl," and "Satanella." The season closed with the best performance of "Trovatore" ever given in New York, Mme. Gazzaniga as Azucena, and Herr Wachtel as Manrico. The audience was the largest ever assembled in a theatre in New York, and the receipts amounted to nearly nine thousand dollars.

Mme. Charles Moulton's debut occurred on the 16th. It caused much comment among the critics, but almost all agreed that her talents had been exaggerated in the newspapers. Her selections at the first concert were Rossini's "Bel Raggio" and Gounod's "Ave Maria." She was assisted by Miss Agnes Palmer, an orchestra under the direction of Signor Bosoni, and Signors Ronconi and Sarasat, a violinist, who played Mendelssohn's Concerto very well.

Mr. Geo. Dolby's Ballad Concerts at Steinway Hall, were very successful, all of them drawing large, but not crowded audiences.

Mlle. Nilsson made her New York debut in opera on Monday evening. It is needless to say that her success was immense. The opera was "Lucia." "Faust" will be sung to-night, when M. Victor Capoul will make his debut.

There was a large number of concerts given for the benefit of the Chicago sufferers. The best was that of the "Liederkrans Society" on Saturday.

Most of the musical societies have announced their campaigns. The Mendelssohn Union was first in the field. They gave the "Messiah" last night with Mme. Parepa-Rosa.

Next comes the Harmonic, which will open its season on the 31st, with a performance of "Elijah."

The services of the Dolby quartet have been secured, for the entire season. Dr. Pech has worked hard with the chorus, (numbering some three hundred), a rehearsal having been held every week since last June, and much may be expected.

The Church Music Association commenced the rehearsals for the third season last Thursday evening at Trinity Chapel. The date for the first concert is not yet settled, but it will take place in December. The Mass is a simple one by Haydn, (No. 2.) and besides this Beethoven's Mass in D [?] and a new Mass by Schubert will be given.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society give their first rehearsal for the 14th season, this afternoon. The pieces to be played are Beethoven's B flat symphony, Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture and Wagner's introduction to "Lohengrin." Miss Kellogg is to be the soloist for the first concert. The orchestra will consist, as usual, of sixty performers, under the direction of Carl Bergmann.

The New York Philharmonic Society (30th season) will commence with the first rehearsal on Nov. 17th. The first concert is Dec. 2d. No announcements have yet been made as to the programmes or soloists.

The society seems to be in as great favor as ever. The sale of reserved seats commenced on the 17th, and every thing was taken in an hour, and many people disappointed. The concerts will take place as usual, in the Academy, the worst building for a concert in New York.

Dr. Damroch is to give a series of Sunday concerts at Steinway Hall during the winter. There will be one every Sunday, commencing Nov. 5th.

They will be mostly orchestral. He promises that "the programmes will be selected with care, and represent the classical as well as popular works of the great masters." The orchestra will number fifty well trained performers. W.

Orpheon Free Vocal School as an Antidote to Rowdiness.

AN EXTRAORDINARY OFFER TO THE CLERGY.

To the Editors of the Evening Post:

Many and various have been the means proposed for the amelioration of the middle classes. Free reading-rooms, free evening grammar-schools, free churches, and free libraries have all been tried, together with numerous side-shows like the Cooper Institute free lectures, Young Men's Christian Association's (almost) free concerts, their social gatherings; also free baths and free Sunday-school excursions from time to time, gotten up by Christian professors to bring young people of both sexes together, with a hope of their subsequent "conversion" to piety, mysteriously super-induced by ice-cream, lemonade and the round dances. In fact, if I am not mistaken, every possible religious and non religious agent has been called upon, and exercised by organized forces to effect the desired "moral elevation" of the said classes, excepting only the agent of music. I do not mean listening to music, but the exercise of producing it.

It has long been a matter of surprise to me that in view of the almost universal susceptibility of the working classes to vocal instruction, the enjoyability and exhilaration of this simple exercise—choral singing—and the extreme economy of choral schools when compared with other schools of whatever kind, none of our many philanthropists have yet been known to suggest such a thing as the foundation of rudimentary vocal schools, to occupy our working population from supper time to bed time, and to keep them out of the haunts of dissipation during the hours which would otherwise be devoted to preparation for the Tombs or the Penitentiary.

Our upper classes visit Europe, and on returning can go into ecstasies over the singing festivals at Cologne and Düsseldorf, or at London, Manchester and Birmingham; but the possibility of such grand performances in their own country never seems to enter their heads. Our ecclesiastical enthusiasts uniformly confess their delight at hearing the colossal chorus of eight thousand charity children under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, the boy choirs of English churches, and the alla capella choirs of St. Petersburg; but when asked why church influence should not be exerted to the same end here, these "liberal" worthies shake their incredulous heads and generally give the very sensible (?) reason that "what never has been done (in America) never can be done!"

I beg to enter an earnest protest against an inactivity relating to music wholly inconsistent with the spirit of the age, and unworthy of our enterprising community. Nor have I yet heard of one solitary good reason why the same refining art should not be made subservient to the same noble services in our own country as it is abroad. On suggesting such a possibility to influential persons here, I have usually been met with the reply that "merely to start the training-schools would require vast amounts of money."

As a rejoinder to this, I can testify to the fact that the Orpheon Free Schools which I founded ten years ago have not cost over $2,000 per annum, while, with my very limited resources, over six thousand persons have since then received vocal rudimentary notation instruction in them.

I, therefore, beg to call the attention, especially of the Christian public, to these facts, and if there be any clergyman, evangelical or otherwise, who is open to conviction on this point, and will place his Sunday school rooms at the disposal of myself and colleagues (rent free), once a week, I will open and maintain free singing schools for the masses in all such rooms, and shall ask no money from church or city for the expenses. I make this offer in no idle or vainglorious spirit. Any true reformer would gladly sink "self" if his object could thereby be attained; but in a time like the present, and in a city like ours, individuality cannot be lost sight of, and some one must take the lead.

I adjure all true thinkers among the more advanced in civilization of our reverend fathers to consider this offer, as it is certainly the first of the kind they have ever had, and may be the last they will receive. I shall be most happy to accept enlightenment on this subject from any documents addressed 711 Broadway.

Respectfully,

JEROME HOPKINS.

NEW YORK, Sept. 29, 1871.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Father of Life and Light. Quartet. 3. E♭ to G. 50
Benedictus. Blessed be the Lord. Quartet. 3. F to G. A. M. P. 33
There's a Green Hill far away. 4. A♭ to G. Gounod. 40

Two fine sacred quartets, and a sacred song, all pretty and effective.

Mignon's Song. "Hast thou e'er seen the Land." From Hamlet. 5. D♭ to F. Thomas. 40
Drinking Song. "Hamlet." 5. B♭ to G. 40
Two favorites from the new opera, rendered famous by the perfect rendering of Mlle. Nilsson.

Mandolinata. 3. F to F. Paladilhe. 40
Delicate, dance-like and very pleasing.

Happy as a Clam. Song and Cho. 2. G to G. Smith. 30
Capital. Audacious Clam-croons with laughter over it.

Come sing to me, Addie, again. Song and Cho. 3. B♭ to F. Huntley. 30

Kitty my Darling. Song and Cho. 3. B♭ to E. Ashton. 30

Jessy was a Pretty Girl. Song and Polka. 3. A to E. Alden. 30

Nell the Village Pride. Guitar, Song and Cho. 3. A to F. Morris. 30

Naught so Bright on Earth. Song and Cho. 2. B♭ to E. Turner. 30

Neath the Apple Boughs. 2. A to F. 30
Six Popular Ballads. Not a poor one among them!

O, Ruddier than the Cherry. 5. A♭ to F. Handel. 40
From "Aida and Gladiators," and now made prominent by Mr. Santley's fine rendering
"O, ruddier than the Cherry,
O, sweeter than the berry."

Long white Seam. 4. A. to F. Ward. 30

The Snow lies white. 3. F to F. Sullivan. 40
Two charming poems by Jean Ingelow, set to very appropriate music, charmingly interpreting the delicate sentiment.

In Childhood with Crown and with Sceptre. 3. E♭ to F. Larting. 30

A new edition of the gem song of "Csar und Zim-merman," which has a beauty that does not grow old.

The Anchor's weighed. 3. G to E. Braham. 30
Admirably fits a smooth, manly voice.

Lillie's Good-night. 3. F to D. Philp. 35
"One kiss, dear Mother, for the love
My heart keeps warm for thee."
A sweet child's song, with nothing wishy-washy in it.

Instrumental.

Heart's Delight Schottische. 3. F. Bisell. 35
Heartily commended. It is very delicate and musical, and also quite spirited, so as to merit its other title: "Pas de deux."

Agnetha Waltz. 3. F. Knight. 30
Shows marked talent in the composer. Is bold, bright, brilliant, varied and powerful.

Oofty Gooft Galop. 3. G. Quencher. 30
Has a quaint melody, as it ought to have with such a title, but is wide awake, and includes the novelty of a Cornet obligato movement.

Good Morning Galop. 3. F. Barrett. 30
Spirited.

Remembrance of Paris. Waltzes. 4. Parlow. 75
Remembrance by a German, of course. The waltzes have a character of fullness and richness.

Mignon Waltz. 3. Godfrey. 40
Arrangement of Airs from Thomas's opera, "Mignon," and are quite pleasing.

Books.

NATIONAL CHORUS BOOK. Price $1.50
This is a worthy successor to the "Chorus Wreath," whose choruses have been used very extensively in Conventions, Societies, and "Jubilees." There are both sacred and secular pieces.

THE ORPHEAN. By W. O. Perkins, and A. R. Hallet. Price $1.00

A new School Song Book, meant by the authors for Boys' Schools and Colleges, but fits exceedingly well in the Upper Classes of Grammar Schools. Much of the music is in three parts, 1st, 2d and 3d, and is very well chosen, and the whole forms a most pleasing collection.

Abbreviations.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, E flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 799.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 18, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 17.

Carl Tausig.*

(Concluded from page 125).

It has been observed before that this perfect artist, by the grace of God, called as few are, by the strength of his own will chosen as still fewer are, was a rare worker on many fields. May I be permitted here to mention the admirable artistic principles that guided his restless activity—for the benefit perhaps of many a young artist-student. He was filled above all with the highest respect for the work of art, whose interpretation he undertook. In common we shared the conviction that, in order to play artistically it was necessary, first to play correctly, in an objective point of view, on the basis of the most minute analysis, combined with a careful observation of the marks of expression, seemingly less important, which the author may have omitted, but which are to be discovered by analogy; secondly, to produce objective beauty, by paying attention to acoustic conditions of the instrument and to general beauty of tone, possible in many instances only by combining dynamic shading of the single parts, even in the simplest consonances; to play polyphonically and polychromatically whatever is played. Fortunately the progress our modern grand piano-makers have achieved, especially Carl Bechstein in Berlin, whose instruments I use, as he did, not only permits, but often inspires such playing. Thirdly, to play in an interesting manner, subjectively; of course most conscientiously observing postulates one and two; to reproduce with freedom, to give to the recital the character of momentary improvisation, the charm of an oration delivered without notes.—All these qualities, blended most harmoniously, were characteristic of Tausig's playing.

Besides this regard for the work of art to be interpreted, Tausig had the virtue of a still more estimable, more difficult respect: that for the public, before which he was to play the work of art for edification or improvement. He fully adopted my theory—begging pardon for the unavoidable abuse of the first personal pronoun which I make in this letter—that, although we daily see that nothing is too bad to be swallowed by the crowd, we never must forget that nothing is too good, too costly for the public to which we appeal. An earnest artist therefore has to treat this mass of auditors, however equivocally composed, in an earnest, conscientious manner. In this point also Tausig was a model. Only one other fellow-artist may in this respect be compared with him, Alexander Dreychock, who preceded him in death by one year. The wondrous, harmonious technique of this master was by no means mechanical, as many supposed, who had not, like myself, the privilege of an intimate acquaintance with the excellent, kind-hearted artist; his unceasing labor of improving himself being entitled to a respect still higher, since his original talent for music was comparatively small,—a fact which he most readily acknowledged, but which his earnest endeavors completely hid from all but the initiated.

(* Translated for this Journal from the Leipzig Signal.)

After this short sketch of Tausig's unremitting artistic labors, of his thorough studies in the most various departments of knowledge (during the last years of his life he devoted every leisure moment to the study of the latest developments of physiology and other matters of natural science), who does not see the injustice of the reproach that was heaped upon Tausig as "man," as if he withdrew himself, self-satisfied, from others, as if he were unsociable and unkindly? Who would blame him for preferring deep books, from which he drew materials for new thought and feeling, to be worked up and to aid in fruitifying new blossoms on the field of his art—for preferring them to the intercourse with idlers belonging to all classes of society, more or less indifferent, impelled mostly by the curiosity to examine a celebrity? And yet, where it was necessary, he could move with elegance in the highest circles of society. The most intelligent and brilliant ladies of the highest rank were his enthusiastic admirers. Whenever he met intelligent, sympathetic men among writers, painters, physicians, &c., who were well-bred enough not to persecute him as a celebrity with their inquisitiveness, he would unfold social talents of the highest grace. He was an excellent story-teller, full of a caustic wit, who played with the same ease, as his fingers did, the giant scale from Aristophanes's plasticism to Heine's four-scored irony; he could compose sparkling counterpoints over the canto fermo of the world-embracing humor of Berlin. As a matter of course he preferred the company of such prominent representatives of this humor, as Messrs. Dohm and Scholz (editor and designer of the comic paper Kladderatsack. Tr.), who ever show a moral, ideal tendency behind their bacchantic mask of word and picture.

When I had to visit Berlin last year I went to see Tausig, who was kind enough to play many things for me, though the season was over and he complained of being entirely worn out and "not in practice at all." Among them the Toccata by Schumann, of incredible difficulty for him who studies it; Bach's E-flat major Suite, lately discovered by Peters, several mazurkas and Etudes by Chopin, &c. The real enchantment I felt was expressed about as follows: "You have become surpassingly great, my dear friend. In spite of my old, unchanged admiration for your gigantic talent, I never would have believed that I might look up to you as I did to Joseph Joachim, after he had played the Beethoven Concerto. Every note you played is gold, is the exponent of the most concentrated feeling. You have a right to say, after playing or rather creating anew a short prelude, a mazurka of Chopin: Here is the whole history of piano-playing from the beginning to this day. Just as Horace Vernet told a person, who had asked him for an album leaf, and who was disposed to grumble at the ten minutes which it took Vernet to paint it in his presence: "Why, think you it was ten minutes it took me to draw this picture in your album? It is fully thirty years that it cost me." In former days you were a volcano, now you have become a beneficent sun, warming and spreading light. Hail, young Apollo! I am delighted that my eyes are clear enough to see your excellence and that I may bring you my heart-felt tribute, which you must not refuse."

Ponte a Sagallo, near Lucca, August, 1871.

HANS VON BUELLOW.

What is Required of Song Writers.

Many write poetry for music, and poets generally love to see their writings entwined in a wreath of melody. It is, however, given to but few to write poetry fit to be used with music. Poetry may be very good, but totally unfit for the musician's use. Many of our greatest writers are almost destitute of songs. This may be attributed to their love for more elaborate works, and the carelessness with which we may imagine them to treat these trifles of songs. But we think the true reason lies more in the fact that they lacked the ability of writing songs.

Writing poetry for music requires more than the mere art of constructing a few decent rhymes expressing some clever ideas. Many, however, think that a few sentimental sentences, dished up in well-sounding rhymes, ought to be good enough a meal for any musician to partake of; and should the musician be unable to use such machine productions, he is in danger of being denounced as entirely void of taste and poetic sentiment.

The song writer should never lose sight of the fact that his words are to be united with music. Then the question may very properly be asked, where lies the dividing line between poetry and music? Is music the frame and poetry the picture, or is poetry the sketch, the design, while music supplies the colors? Space will not allow us to enter into the discussion of the subject, neither is it our object to do so here.

As above stated, our greatest writers have given us but few songs, while many stars of lesser magnitude abound with them. We need but speak of Burns, who is a true song writer, expressing not only the tenderest but also the loftiest sentiments—lofty enough for a Shakespeare. Thomas Moore, the Irish bard, is another who has excelled in this genre, and has given us songs in his Irish melodies which are probably in their line unsurpassed by any published in any language. There are others in our own country as well as in England who have given us songs, but they are few in number. Germany has many beautiful songs; so has France, but the literature of these nations is not overriden with them.

That poetry, which is now so extensively used by composers, and which attracts the fickle public for a season, can not be recognized as poetry, as coming under our head. These songs catch at any and every excitement or event, sing of every public calamity or rejoicing, sing the name of mother and home until it becomes sickening, sing of household furniture, appeal to mawkish sentimentality, weep over the grassy mound, tell us of all manner of meetings, on the beach, at the garden gate, under the gas light, etc., until they take us up in a balloon, where we wish they would remain. We hope the subjects may be exhausted soon, and that these writers may become wise, like owls, and as silent as they.

What, then, should poets observe when writing for music? We would say, by all means avoid long words, such as are difficult to pronounce, and contain many consonants. Yes, we would go a step farther, and say that our poets should know as much of music, and what is easiest to sing, as our musicians should be good judges as to what is suitable to be set to music. As music and poetry make one whole, when properly united, so should the composer and the poet be one in sentiment and aim. Our language presents not a few difficulties to the song writer. English is not as easily sung as Italian. As composers should know upon which tones to double, and which tones not to use in that manner, how high or how low to go for certain voices, so should the poet avoid everything difficult to pronounce, avoid all words which would be a hindrance to the free effusion of sound. In metres he should be plain and simple, as well as regular to a fault almost. If beginning a verse with a heavy or light foot, let the others be constructed likewise. Irregularities of that sort are very annoying to the musician, and often cause him to make other selections.

It is the privilege of poetry to describe actions as well as to express sentiment. Music does the latter, but should never attempt the former. In the opera, music is the companion of action, and is used to portray feelings in accordance with action, but no musician would attempt to describe the plot of an opera. (When saying this we are not forgetting Berlioz and his music.)

Poetry should express some definite sentiment. Long descriptions, many worded expressions, are utterly out of place. The number of verses should not be great, nor is it best that each verse contain many lines. Some of the best songs contain but few verses and each verse consists of but a few short lines. Some composers contend that it is wrong to sing more than one verse to a given melody, insisting upon giving each verse its own melody. Poets should vary as little as possible in sentiment in the various verses, in which case we cannot see any impropriety of repeating several verses to one melody. When the subject in hand requires a change in sentiment, we would of course expect a change in melody also.

Philosophical and abstract ideas are of course not suited for songs. Poets who wish to write songs for music, should have the power of saying much in the fewest possible words.

Many of our songs are mere empty sentimentalism, arising from undefined feelings, lack of knowledge of the human passion; while all good songs come from noble hearts, beating high for all which is humane, pure and good, idealizing even our faults and weaknesses, touching the strings which vibrate in every human heart, and as a natural consequence are dear to us. It requires not only a peculiar talent to write good songs, but we truly believe also that the spring time in life is the best, if not the only time, when poets write songs successfully. When years with their ripper judgments come, poets often change in their thoughts and feelings also. There have, however, been exceptions to this rule, and some of our song writers sang of love to their dying day.

Before closing we would say that, words exercising a powerful influence in connection with music, the selection of them should be judicious. Especially would we draw the attention of our ministers to the fact that our Sunday School poetry is by no means what it should be. If it is difficult to make a good address before children, it is still more difficult to write hymns for Sunday Schools. As there is a class of persons who would lower religion by the introduction of all sorts of silly stories, cultivating ideas and sentiments unbecoming the idea of a God and Savior, and as many of our Sunday School books are calculated to create false ideas of religion and our relations to God, so does our Sunday School poetry fall far short of what it may be designed to be, and surely of what it ought to be. The earliest impressions last longest and go deepest; the words of children's songs make a deeper impression upon their minds and feelings than many are aware of. Hence we cannot be too careful in looking at the words of our Sunday School hymns, as well as examining the melodies.—Brainard's Mus. World, Cleveland, O.

Individualism in Art.—Rembrandt.

M. ATHANASE COQUEREL'S LECTURE BEFORE THE NEW ENGLAND WOMAN'S CLUB.

[Correspondence of the Tribune.]

Boston, Nov. 1.—The New England Woman's

Club held its first evening's reception last night in honor of M. Athanase Coquerel, fils, who gave us a lecture not previously delivered in Boston, and not, I believe in this country. His subject was Rembrandt, as an illustration of individualism in art. The Club parlors were beautifully arranged and decorated. Flowers, profuse and dainty enough to have done honor to a bride, were blossoming in vases and trailing from hanging baskets. The French and American flags were festooned together for drapery, and the walls were hung with choice pictures, a few of them the property of the Club, the rest loaned for the occasion. Numerous guests of distinction were present, but with regard to their names the Club's principle is not to kiss and tell. There were bright eyes, and bright diamonds, and point lace; men of pictures and men of poems; and to this brilliant audience Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, our President, introduced, in fitting phrase, Monsieur Coquerel, the distinguished representative of Christian culture. She bade him welcome in the name of liberty, of equality, of fraternity; and said that while last year taught us to pity France, she had now sent a messenger to teach us to envy her.

Monsieur responded to this welcome with true French grace. It made him want, he said, to do a great deal better than he could. He had already spoken of art in Boston, and of those who seemed to him to illustrate individualism in art; but he had paused before the great name of Rembrandt, because it deserved in this relation so much more than a mere mention. Rembrandt was, first of all, and above all, an individualist in politics, in religion, in art, though not the greatest of artists. Admiring Rembrandt much, Monsieur confessed to admiring Michael Angelo, Raphael, and Leonardo da Vinci more, finding their works more beautiful. But Rembrandt was in some respects a more astonishing man. He labored under great disadvantages, but he made of his obstacles stepping-stones, of his impediments opportunities. He was the last of the great painters, and the first great either; and this last was no mean or unimportant distinction. He lived from 1609 to 1669, the greater part of the time in Leyden and Amsterdam, in which last place he died. He never visited Italy, but he was by no means ignorant of Italian art. He had a most inquiring mind. In company with a friend, he bought a painting by Giorgione, which used to hang in his studio. He was a great purchaser of engravings at great prices. He procured busts of the Emperors, and everything else he could get to make himself familiar with the art history of Italy. But while he studied Italy he was not conquered by her; he was a neighbor, not a subject. An early drawing of his exists in which he made an accurate copy of the Last Supper, till he came to the three little windows under the rafters. These three little windows he did not like. He made one big window, instead, and changed the rafters to rays of light; sunshine and shade were his own dominion.

The Dutch painters, before Rembrandt, had been imitating Italy and borrowing their inspiration from her. So servile were they that they even changed their names, and gave Italian forms to them. Rembrandt imitated no one. He could not bear to see people copying what their own eyes had not seen. A great many people know how to paint or draw who do not know how to see. Rembrandt believed that an artist's first lesson is to learn how to use his eyes. He labored under what would have been to a lesser man great disadvantages of climate, sky and light. Colors and outlines are very distinct in Italy. The sky is blue and clear to a proverb. The great Italians painted what they saw; but Rembrandt did not see the same. He lived in a damp country, a country of mists, where are few clearly defined outlines, and one sees objects as they break forth from surrounding fog. Colors are indistinct there, also, all taking somewhat the hue of mist. Moreover the country is flat; no mountains, no great hills, even. Rembrandt painted it as he saw it. In this damp country people require more food than in the clearer south; and so their own outlines grow less defined, less shapely. You do not find the lithe symmetry of the Italian peasant in the full-fed Dutch burgher, and Rembrandt painted the people, too, as he saw them. His genius was truth, personal feeling, seeing with his own eyes. He was as much a reformer in art as Luther was in religion; a rebel against tradition; against the rules established by Italian painters. So, in his pictures, he never painted distinct outlines, because he did not see them. But he had great power. Whether you will or no, you must look first, in his works, at the precise spot which he desires you first to behold. Light and shade were his great secret. Color and outline are the whole of painting, thought the Italian painters; but Rembrandt said no, light and shade should be the essential thing; and in his own pictures he made them so. Everything which he could not put into full light he threw into almost complete darkness. He wanted his paintings regarded from satisfactory distance, and one day told a visitor who came too near, that oil painting was very unwholesome for the nose.

Rembrandt delighted in fine toilets, fine jewelry, heavy silks; he liked also flowing hair and streaming gray beards. He loved to paint a beautiful woman in beautiful clothes, and he never was economical of his jewels. He was willing to buy jewels, too, as well as to paint them; and the good elders of the church to which he belonged were much exercised in their minds because Madame Rembrandt wore so many. They labored with him in vain on the subject. The great painter was very much in love with his wife, and he liked to clothe her finely, and then to paint her into his pictures for the world to admire. He painted portraits of noble knights and dames, which were princely, magnificent, full of the pride of life, brave with jewels where the sun struck them, heavy with gold and velvet. But if he was the first painter of princes, he was also first painter of paupers; no one could paint rags as he could, and he loved to paint them almost as much as jewels.

One of his celebrated pictures, the "Night Watch," in the museum at Amsterdam, represents a shooting club going out to fire at a mark. As it is broad daylight, the name is somewhat of a misnomer, but the picture is well known. A cock, which has already been shot, is in the hands of a girl of ten or eleven. The child is, as usual, superb with jewels. A ray of light falls on her figure. In this ray of light, of what color are her clothes? You look a little while, and see that her petticoat is blue, and her spencer yellow, but the colors are indistinct, as colors are in that land of dampness. They are all drowned in light, and they melt into each other. The mist through which you see her is the most poetical mist in the world, and the girl looks as if she were walking out of a fairy tale. Rembrandt is at once the most material and the most ideal of painters. He painted a butcher's stall so utterly true that it is repulsive; and a strong angel rising into the ether with such glory and majesty that you forget the laws of gravitation, and believe only in the spiritual attraction which makes it impossible that a being so noble should do anything but rise. His nude figures, of bathers and the like, are so ugly and so real that you cry out in despair to have them clothed; and he makes a child, being carried away by an eagle, no dainty darling, but a real and awfully frightful young-one, its clothes slipped up to its waist, and its lips parted with the shrieks of terror which you can almost hear.

But no one is so ideal as he is in his pictures on sacred subjects. It does not need the presence of the Lord in the "Supper of Emmaus" to make the picture shine with His glory. From the chair whence He has risen streams a flood of light which irradiates the room, and His absence suggests yet more than would His presence. Rembrandt was a Protestant in art, and his finest etchings were illustrative of Bible themes. These he treated never according to the traditions of the elders, but in accordance with his own ideas of the true and the possible. His method of teaching was different from that of any other master. The first thing he did when he had a house was to turn the garret of it into a study, or rather into numerous little studies. In each one of these he shut up a pupil, never letting one student see what another one was doing. This was his device for securing originality. Often he would give to all the same subject, but he insisted that they should ask each other no questions. He would have each one's conception thoroughly his own. By this method his school became the most valuable of schools—superior to all others by virtue of freedom of treatment and variety of subject. "See what you can, and paint only what you see," was his motto. He left this Protestant conception of painting as one of his most valuable legacies to all who should succeed him in the royal domain of art. It is the true secret of individualism in art. Look into the world, each one, with his own eyes, and paint, not what other people say exists, but what your eyes see; whether it be the blue sky or clear outlines of Italy, or the golden, transfiguring mists of Holland. This was the lesson of Rembrandt.

A pleasant season of social intercourse followed the essay. The guests talked art over chocolate and ice-cream. The Club ladies smiled and listened. The brilliant speaker bore any number of introductions with a placid patience, a kindly interest, which warmed a little into gallantry when the women were pretty and vivacious, but which was cordial to all, and won all suffrages. He will speak in French on Mendelssohn, at the Lowell Institute, Thursday evening, and no matter how fast he talks we shall all profess to understand him, and declare that we are charmed.

L. C. M.

Mendelssohn and the "Reformation Symphony."

M. COQUEREL AT THE LOWELL INSTITUTE.

M. Athanasie Coquerel filz, the distinguished and eloquent Protestant clergyman of Paris, will be gratefully remembered by the Bostonians for many a day, for having inaugurated at the Lowell Institute, last evening, that thus far essentially Parisian institution, the causerie. Now the causerie is a cross between a lecture and essay; a conversational, familiar and eminently modest address, suggestive rather than dictatorial; pungent, picturesque, photographic. M. Coquerel brought to it all the grace of manner and charm of language for which he is so justly noted, and was eagerly listened to and heartily applauded by a very brilliant audience. His theme, "Mendelssohn and the Reformation Symphony," had been announced as to be treated in the French language, and this added a fresh excellence to the occasion. The crisp and sparkling idioms of the great city, the glow and fitness of the varied adjectives, which in themselves painted a little sketch of character with lightning-like rapidity, kept the audience in a continual, pleasurable fever of excitement.

M. Coquerel began by saying that he did not intend to undertake a musical criticism, but rather to indulge in a simple causerie about a man. In this early part of November there were always celebrated in Europe, with careful solemnity, two days—the day of All Saints, which had just passed, and the present, the day of the dead—le jour des morts. These days would at once recall to the Protestant mind the beginning of the Reformation. It was the custom in Germany to assemble together vast numbers of pilgrims on these days, and it was because of the chance for discussion on such occasions that Luther nailed upon the famous church doors, on the 31st of October, 1517, his ninety-five theses—attacking all that substituted the exterior, mere form for faith; everything which dispensed with the repentance which Christ demanded of man; all that admitted the intervention of any human agency between the soul and its God. This was not to separate himself from the Pontifical church, but to attack its rottenness and dead formulas. When on the customary anniversary day the pilgrims arrived at the church, they read with astonishment these theses, and discussed them in many different senses, and then and there began the Reformation. Those theses remained still upon the old church doors. A Prussian King had had them cast in bronze, and inside the church, and under simple stones, slept Luther and Melancthon. All Germany had the habit of celebrating the first week of November as the anniversary of the Reformation's birth; so did the Scandinavian States, and throughout Protestant France the week was held in reverence. A society had even been founded in Paris for the purpose of keeping the November week's observance green; and one of M. Coquerel's friends had issued a circular to the Protestant French churches advising them to regularly celebrate the anniversary. Speaking of Luther's magnificent choral, "Ein feste Burg," M. Coquerel complimented in the highest terms Dr. Hedge's translation thereof.

One year ago, he said, he and his friends were besieged, and the Protestant pastors and their congregations in Paris modestly celebrated the anniversary. During the first week of November he received a visit from M. Pasdeloup, the great artist, who had done so much to popularize German music in France; who represented that his artists were dying of hunger—that something must be done to relieve them. Music was completely dethroned in Paris; what could be done? He came to ask M. Coquerel to give a conference in the Cirque Napoleon, to let him associate his music with it, and thus make some money for his starving musicians. M. Coquerel refused twice, but the third time Pasdeloup came and offered a subject for the concert, and it was "Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony." M. Coquerel then told the audience, in sparkling, racy French, how he informed M. Pasdeloup that the Sunday on which he proposed the concert was November sixth, the anniversary of the reformation's birth; was he aware that he would be inviting Catholics to celebrate the Reformation, and that Mendelssohn's Symphony was written to celebrate it? Pasdeloup still insisted, however, on the concert, and M. Coquerel determined to accept. Then, returning from besieged Paris to last week in Boston, he explained to the audience how Rev. Mr. Foote of King's Chapel had invited him to speak in French, and how they had decided on this subject without reflecting that November second was the jour des morts, and that he was about to celebrate a reformation anniversary in Boston. He then reviewed the concert conference at the Cirque Napoleon last year. He graphically described the condition of the Parisians—who had just been refused an armistice by the Prussians—an armistice which they had hoped might have led to peace. It was a grave and solemn occasion, and people had need of all their courage. On that troublous day he addressed the thousands assembled in the circus. He admitted that the occasion which united them was strange. They were agonized with a siege which was maintained by three German circles of fire and iron, and while these Germans surrounded them, they gathered in a concert to listen to German music. Was this unpatriotic? No. And then he explained that for them Beethoven and Weber and Mendelssohn were not Germans; that all the treasures of the human mind were in common and had no nationality. Then he told them frankly how he—Protestant—had trembled with emotion in listening to Mendelssohn's glorious symphony and Luther's choral, and praised the tolerance of the Catholics in coming together to worship at the shrine of a musician who had celebrated the Reformation.

M. Coquerel's analysis of the symphony was admirable. Mendelssohn, said he, wrote it at twenty-one. He never published it, but sometimes had it performed; he was not satisfied with it, and ordered his son not to publish it until twenty years after his death. The introduction was majestic, sonorous, virile, and was followed by a scherzo unapproachably pure and spiritual, but full of good and brave joy. The andante which succeeded was pious—tender—filled with infinite sweetness, and redolent of confession. It was not the confession of a Catholic to his priest, but of a Protestant to his God. Then came the tremendous, overwhelmingly glorious chords of Luther's choral, and the symphony finally ended with a fugue, in which Protestant faith in the reformation triumphed in the noblest harmonies. Mendelssohn had found, nevertheless, that there was not grandeur enough in his work. M. Coquerel thought there was something infinitely admirable in Mendelssohn's method of criticizing other less fortunate composers' productions, and told the story of an opera called "Hero and Leander," in which Mendelssohn, to soothe the unsuccessful author's feelings, said he found the same faults that pervaded his own "Reformation Symphony!" The severity and intense fidelity of Mendelssohn's method of composition were clearly pointed out. All that was not perfectly pure and of exquisite elegance was unsupportable to him. M. Coquerel said he "had penetrated himself" with the clear precision of this style, and found it admirable. He then selected extracts from Mendelssohn's letters when he was in Rome (where, strangely enough, the grand symphony was written and translated,) the composer's portrait of himself, and his ideas of piety. At Rome he saw many Protestants and Catholics, and found that numbers of them misunderstood their religion. After reading some dull and narrow religious books, he said he preferred Voltaire's broom and French audacity to such bounded religion. He was profoundly religious; as a politician, liberal, confident. When Jacobi in 1841 published a violent pamphlet, which created a liberal movement throughout Germany, Mendelssohn wrote that there had not been such a birth of generous ideas since the old war time. Mendelssohn, however, hated and despised war. When Becker wrote his Sie sollen nicht ihn haben, and the insolent glorification of Germany over France overran the country, Mendelssohn said it was not right, and scoffed at the sentiment which prompted the song. He found something gross and vulgar in these excesses of patriotism, and wrote a stern refusal to furnish any music for Becker's words. Mendelssohn's disgust for titles was ably illustrated in a series of pleasant anecdotes. He detested Berlin, found it too aristocratic, military, official. He could only live there four years. Humboldt, in a letter to M. Coquerel, once described Berlin as "a little town, intellectually a desert, and hollow." Henrich Heine used to speak of himself as the "liberated Berliner." The solemn, crushing life of the capital annoyed Mendelssohn. M. Coquerel pleasantly narrated the dispute between Friedrich Wilhelm Fourth and the composer, which hastened Mendelssohn's retreat from Berlin. In family life he was infinitely tender and loving. In his letters there were charming things. One to his brother Paul was a poem, full of tenderness, soul, fire. These great artists, like Michael Angelo and Mendelssohn, had a profundity of affection which the common could hardly understand.

"You have all," said M. Coquerel, "heard those little songs, full of spring-time, fruit, flowers, the breath and perfection of nature, songs where the soul can be heard appealing directly to God. I know of no music that so gives one the odor of wood and hay and briar, none where nature looks in so directly, as in these songs without words—these little poems that Mendelssohn so unconsciously let fall." And he then related quaintly Mendelssohn's explanation to the man who asked why the songs without words were written.

Mendelssohn could not support music which said nothing. He was also very difficult about librettos. Music was for him something strong, significant, and he would not have the words falter beside it. He would not have supported the insipidity of the librettos of "William Tell" and the "Zauberflöte." M. Coquerel closed his appreciation of Mendelssohn by enlarging upon the oratorios written in the composer's declining years, and related the manner in which, on that memorable November sixth in Paris, last year, he had electrified his audience by the simple picturing of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The anniversary in besieged Paris had netted a handsome sum for the wounded; he trusted that on this present occasion—the 354th anniversary of the reformation, he had succeeded in interesting the audience for a passing hour. —Boston Journal, Nov. 8.

Rubini.

(Concluded from page 122.)

To the physical qualities—which may be considered as the implements of a singer's mind—and intelligence, Rubini added a profound sensitiveness and great aptitude in making himself master of the different styles of music. He sang Beethoven's "Ade-laide," the character of which is so eminently lyrical, as well as the music in Mozart's Don Juan, and Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto. Certainly, no artist of modern times imparted to the air, "Il mio tesoro," in Mozart's chef d'œuvre, so much finish, ease, and perfect intonation combined, and we recollect with what daring Rubini, instead of executing the rather old trait in the twenty-sixth bar of the andante, took the part of the first violin, and executed upon A and B flat a vigorous trill, which hastened the cadence, and ensured the enthusiastic applause of the audience. Since the time of Viganoni, who created the part of Paolino in Il Matrimonio Segreto, no tenor ever sang so well as Rubini the air: "Pria che spunti." What suavity and what delicacy of accent! How well the singer had seized the meaning of this hymn of youth and chaste love, gushing forth without an effort, like a perfume of the soul, and presenting us with a real picture of domestic happiness and peace. What has become of this style di mezzo carattere, so fine and so difficult, which is to music and the art of singing what, to ancient statuary and poetry, was the serene and restrained emotion which constituted their principal characteristics? Read an eclogue of Virgil, or an idyl of André Chénier, and compare them, for instance, with a piece of poetry by M. Victor Hugo; you will immediately perceive what distinguishes the beautiful from the picturesque—that is to say, Raphael from Rubens.

Although Rubini likewise sang with great effect in the operas of Rossini—a little of whose brio and passionate fervor he himself possessed—and though he was admirable in certain parts of the character of Count Almaviva in Il Barbiere di Siviglia, as well as that of Otello, and executed in a most extraordinary manner the tenor part of the famous duet in Mosè, "Parlar, spiegar," in which he disputed the palm for bravura and vocal dexterity with Tamburini; it was emphatically in the works of Bellini that he proved himself the grand master of song. It is necessary to have heard him sing the first air in Il Pirata, "Nel furor delle tempeste," and especially the second motive, "Come un'angelo celeste"—in which we already find the germ of that short and touching melopasia, constituting the prominent feature of Bellini's genius—to form an idea of the power of emotion possessed by this incomparable artist. He was no less remarkable in the duet in the second act of the same opera, and I can still hear the phrase, "Vieni, cerchiam pe'mare," still re-echoing in the inmost recesses of my heart. It was only surpassed by that which follows, and which was the complement of it:

"Per noi tranquillo un porto L'immenso mar avrà . . ."

There was, in Rubini's voice, when he sang this charming and expressive cantilena, a kind of melancholy which gradually evaporated into a magic horizon, and impressed you with the sentiment of immensity.

In the part of Elvino, in La Sonnambula, Rubini's talent rose with the genius of his favorite composer. Every one at Paris remembers how he gave the phrase, "Prendi, l'anel ti dono," in the duet of the first act, and with what a mixture of grace and native emotion he sang the pleasing madrigal which forms the subject of the second duet, "Son geloso." In the quartet of the finale in the first act, Rubini displayed the most sublime pathos when singing the phrase so well known and so touching:

"Ah! lei mostri a'io t'amai Questo piano del mio cor!"

Who, too, would not give ten five-act operas, as they are performed every day, to hear Rubini sing, only once a week, that cry of despairing love, in the duet in the second act of La Sonnambula—

"Pace! il guardo, e appaga l'anima
Dell' eccesso del' miei mali;
Il più tristo dei mortali
Sono, cruda, e il non per te!"

In the character of Arturo in I Puritani, which was his last creation, Rubini has left us such recollections of emotion and enchantment, that we can only recall them to the mind of those who heard them, without pretending to transmit an idea of them to the generations who were not so fortunate. Let us first quote the phrase of the quartet in the first act—

"A te, o cara, amor talora Mi guidò furtivo e in pianto,"

In which the artist's voice burst forth into bloom like a rose beneath the first beams of a morning in spring; while, to this phrase, serene and spianata, he vigorously opposed that accompanying the words, "Tra la gioia e l'esultar," by sending forth from his chest a magnificent la, which re-echoed to the clouds, and then bounded back again from the depths of harmony. In the finale of the first act he gave with prodigious power the passage, "Non parlar di Lei ch' adoro," where he made a most bold point d'orgue. Lastly, we may mention the romance of the second act, "A una fonte afflitta e solo," which Rubini only murmured, and allowed to escape from his lips like a sigh. In the duet following this romance, the phrase, full of brilliancy, "Nel mirarti un solo istante," and, finally, the duet between Elvira and Arturo, where Rubini rose to great energy of expression in the memorable passage—

"Non mi sarai rapita Fin che ti stringerò."

In the Anna Boleno and Lucia of Donizetti, Rubini was not less admirable than in the operas of Bellini. In the first of these works, in which he created the part of Percy, he sang, with profound emotion, the well known air, "Vivi tu, te ne scongiuro," where Donizetti has evidently imitated the melodious manner of his young rival. As for the scene of the malediction, which forms the dramatic climax of the second finale of Lucia, no singer has ever been able to imitate the cry of anguish which escaped from Rubini's quivering lips.

Like a great number of Italian singers—of whom Garcia, Lablache, Tamburini, Pasta, Malibran, and Grief, are remarkable exceptions—Rubini was not a finished actor. He did not trouble himself much about anything but the scena or morceau, the interpretation of which placed him in the foreground. When this was past, he voluntarily disappeared, and retired, like Achilles in his tent, without caring much for the story of the drama or the conduct of the other personages. In the air, the duet, or the finale, in which he had an active or preponderating part, Rubini would suddenly rouse himself and display all the energy and charm of his incomparable talent. His abrupt but earnest gestures, his expressive and picturesque pantomime, satisfactorily seconded and carried out his internal emotions, and appeared rather to assist the expansion of his lungs than to be the plastic manifestation of the personage he was representing. It was in the tone and sonority of his organ, in the artistic management and accents of his voice, that all Rubini's dramatic power consisted. When he had to sing a quick air, like the "Pria che spunti," in Il Matrimonio Segreto, or a phrase palpitating with feeling like that of the quartet in I Puritani, he advanced to the front of the stage, and, standing perfectly motionless, with his hand naïvely placed upon his heart, exhaled his suoi dolci lamenti, which, like an electric shock, ran from one person to another, and spread sympathy and delight throughout the house. This was the method pursued by Rubini, who, nevertheless, when he pleased, proved himself no mean actor; and we have likewise seen Pasta, whose dramatic intelligence was never questioned, completely absorbed, like some chaste muse, while singing the air, "Di tanti palpiti," in which even Malibran, with all her voice and more acting, was never able to produce the same impression.

It was not only in vocal combinations, in the variety of accent, color, and melodious arabesques or ricami, that Rubini displayed a great fertility of imagination. His most usual ornaments were the double scale, ascending and descending, the shake perfectly and vigorously sustained upon the high notes of the chest register; a certain pathetic vibration which he imparted to one note, causing it to glitter as if progressively; a broad and powerful emission of his chest voice, from which he dashed, by means of a daring portamento, into the high regions of the head voice; and, lastly, that grand stratagem of chiarezza, the abrupt transition from the full voice to the most imperceptible smorzato sound, a sort of dim twilight, in which it was sometimes difficult for the ear to find its way. By this method, which he constantly employed, and appears to have borrowed from Davide junior, as well as a great number of boldly conceived inflexions and gorgheggi, Rubini clearly proved himself to be a modern singer, sprung from the new school of dramatic music, which Rossini inaugurated in History. Were we required to characterize, in a few words, the tendencies of modern art, in music as well as in painting and literature, we should say that the prominent feature distinguishing the productions of the present age is a noisiness of colors, a tumultuous heaping-up of effects, violent peripetie and an abrupt juxtaposition of the lights and shades, rendering superfluous that supreme good taste which knows how to prepare and gradually lead up to emotion—in the same manner as rich fruit ripens slowly on the branch where God has placed it. In life, as well as in the works of the mind, nothing is more uncommon at the present day than a distant horizon, over which light distributes its tints equally, conducting the eye slowly towards a desired point. This ascending progression of sonority, increasing by movement, and suddenly bursting into a mass of electric light—in a word, the crecendo which Rossini has so much abused—is found everywhere; in political events and moral life, quite as much as in matters of imagination. By his good qualities, as by his defects, Rubini belonged to his time and to the school of music which has expressed the tendencies of it.

Queen Marie Antoinette is reported to have one day asked Sacchini, whether Garat, the famous singer, was a good musician. "No," replied the maestro, he is not a musician; but he is music itself." This happy remark of the author of Edipus in Colonus might have been applied to Rubini also. His instinct was so perfect and so sure; his ear so quick and so delicately susceptible of seizing the most fugitive tints as they swept past, that, in order to perceive the defects of his musical education, a person must have lived on terms of the most intimate friendship with him. Before the public, or in the most difficult concerted piece—such, for instance, as the sextet in Don Giovanni, Rubini never betrayed the slightest hesitation. He even manifested the docility of a child in following the movements any one was kind enough to point out to him; and would frequently say to his comrades and the conductor of the orchestra, if they appeared to consult him upon the propriety or suitability of a rhythm: "Never mind me; go on, I will follow you." Such instances of artists of eminence scarcely able to decipher a few notes of music, but divining by instinct the most profound combinations of genius, are a phenomenon which has often been witnessed in Italy. Ansani, M. Lablache's master, at the Conservatory of Naples, did not literally understand a single note. His pupils were obliged to sing and teach him by heart the piece of music on which they wanted his advice. Davide junior, Mad. Pasta, and a great many other celebrated singers, were almost in as bad a position. We could cite far more remarkable instances of the power of intuition in the arts of Genius, as Voltaire terms them; and it would be an easy task to prove that the greatest things in this world are the result of instinctive perception. This is why poetry is the essence of all that is beautiful and durable.

Rubini was a man of simple and reserved manners, fond of living in the privacy of his home. In 1819, he married at Milan a French singer, Mlle. Chomel, who was educated at the Conservatory in Paris, where she received lessons from Garat. This marriage, which appears to have been a happy one, so absorbed the affections of Rubini, that one of his greatest causes for fear was the dread of awaking his wife's jealousy. After singing one of his favorite airs, and exciting the transports of the public, he would, on going off at the wings, where all present crowded around him to express their admiration, quickly escape into his dressing room, in order, as he used to say, laughingly, to avoid a family quarrel. The most rigid mother could not have given her own son better advice than that Rubini gave to the young tenors who meant to embrace the profession of the stage. And it is true that, in order to sing well and long, we must not forget the hidden sense of the verse in which Juvenal, speaking of a Greek singer, Thyragonus, who had lost his voice, says:

"—sunt quas
Thyragonus cantare videtur."

Rubini took great care of himself. Temperate and easily satisfied, he avoided all excess. The days on which he performed, he used to dine at two o'clock, and then proceeding to the theatre, sleep till six, at which hour his servant woke him; he then dressed, and appeared fresh and in admirable condition before the public, and this was the means of his preserving the freshness and power of his voice up to the day of his death. We have been assured that, during the ten years he spent in St. Petersburg, having no longer any care for the future, Rubini created effects unknown to his admirers in Paris, London, and Milan.

*So in the original.

Rubini was of middling size, and rather stoutly built. His broad shoulders supported a head whose characteristic was not precisely nobleness; but when his face, seamed with the small pox, once lighted up by the power of song, the somewhat vulgar man was suddenly changed into the sublime artist, whose affections the most beautiful woman in Europe would have been glad to possess. Such is the marvellous force of inspiration and sentiment—

"Du moment qu'on aime
On devient si doux."

Rubini had two brothers, one of whom obscurely pursued the same career as himself, while the other remained a singer in a church. As he has left no children, his immense fortune will, no doubt, go to enrich his nephews.

The part of the country where Rubini was born has produced, at different times, the most celebrated tenors of Italy. It was from this province of the ancient Venetian Republic, in which Bergamo is situated, that Viganoni, Davide, father and son, Nozzari, Bianchi, Donzelli, and Bordogni sprang. The worthy successors of these great artists, Rubini, raised himself to the rank of the first dramatic singer of his day. Gifted with an admirable voice and superior instinct, he quickly guessed the secrets of his art, and astonished Europe by the splendor and fluidity of his vocalization, and the charm, perfect intonation and great force of his tones. Understanding every style and every master, as familiar with the music of Mozart and Cimarosa as with that of Rossini and Donizetti, he was fortunate enough to meet, at the outset of his career, a young composer, whose melodic genius was eminently suited to the nature of his own talent and sensitive disposition. The author of Il Pirata and La Sonnambula, as inexperienced in the art of composing as Rubini in the faculty of reading music, found in his heart the new and touching melodies which established his own fame and that of his interpreter.

Bellini and Rubini, names so soft and charming to the ear, you will go down to future ages united by an indissoluble bond, as a double instance of the superiority of poetry and sentiment over the artifices of mere art and intention. Both were children of gracefulness and nature. Bellini, a pupil of genius, discovered by instinct harmonies as delicate and penetrating as his melodies, while Rubini, like an inspired singer, when rendering the music of his favorite composer, appeared to be expressing the nave emotions of his own heart.—Revue des Deux Mondes, 1854.

Mrs. Charles Moulton.

Mrs. JULIA WARD HOWE, in the Woman's Journal, has the following womanly, wise word of greeting for the singer:

A woman with a beautiful voice and a beautiful person, coming to us with legends of a court which we cannot approve, and whose sanction of her merit we consider superfluous. Art, however, is at once sovereign and democratic. Louis Napoleon could add nothing to Mrs. Moulton's true value as an artist, but he could take nothing away from it.

We remember her as a young girl, delighting parlor audiences with her amateur performances, which were felt to have a real artistic quality in them. The friends of art then, equally with her own, desired that she should adopt music as a profession. For the time, however, her life was otherwise ordered. She married and remained abroad, and it is now as a wife and mother that she comes before us, with the honorable intention of earning pecuniary independence for herself and those dependent upon her, by placing her remarkable gifts within the scope of the public service. Still young, handsome, and with her fine voice improved by careful culture, Mrs. Moulton stands before us, inspiring a tender interest and sympathy which may come nearer to her than can the louder verdict of the crowd. She has been in kings' palaces, where genius and beauty such as hers are cherished and flattered. Her smile tells us of the easy victories of that brilliant society, and its occasions. But she has now a crabbed and severe master to please, the public, that takes up where it laid not down, and gathers where it has not strewed. Some lessons this hard task-master has to give, costly but invaluable. Mrs. Moulton must encounter these with courage and with patience, and learn to attain a larger and more comprehensive sweep of art than the most clever dilettante can command. We shall hope to see her attach herself to her profession with the seal of a strong and a long love. With her natural advantages, with her feminine grace and tact, she should be able to interpret for us the great music, the music into whose penetrating rare artists alone can enter. We shall be glad to see her tread the lyric stage in the mantle of "Semiramide," or in the disguise of "Fidelio." We shall also hope to hear her in the Handel and Bach music, which tasks the whole nature and power of an artist so severely. Great art is great interpretation. We shall require this from our American song-bird, and shall be satisfied with none other. No ordinary achievement will be a success for Mrs. Moulton, and she must remember this in all that she gives the public, and in all that she promises.

Her voice is of the purest and most flexible quality, her intonation is happy, and her vocalization at once easy and accurate. Her singing of the ballad, "Tender and true," on Saturday evening last, evinced a true power of simple tragic expression, while in the song, "Beware, beware," and in the duo from "Don Pasquale," she gave us glimpses of a brilliant comic vein.

So our word to her, independent of the flatteries and fault-findings of the press at large, must be this: "Choose great things, sister. With the power of a gifted woman and the spirit of a little child, you can achieve them, not otherwise." J. W. H.

The Worcester Palladium says of Mrs Moulton:

This gifted singer came to us, in concert, on Friday evening, with a voice surpassingly beautiful; one that lingers in the memory like the sudden outburst of the lark or nightingale, and often comes to one in recollection, like the fragrance of a rare exotic. The press has been wild over her success, and well it might be, for she has few equals, either in voice or method. Her voice, not a great one, is sweet, full, sympathetic, and wonderfully clear. Her low tones, unusually rich and resonant, her high notes clear, melodious and limpid. Her execution perfect; used as a means of expressing her song, and not to evince her perfect vocalization, she has a soul behind it, which makes one forget the execution in the sentiment of her song. Her "Bel Raggio" was an instance: making one note the matter instead of the manner. Blumenthal's "La Capricciose" afforded exhibition of her rare vocal capacities; her rare delicacy of expression, and refinement of delivery making it a triumph. And the little ballad, "Tender and true," showed the voice with a "tear in it," and much depth of feeling. With the "Nation" we think her singing reposeful, never thrilling; which is her great charm; as in Mozart one admires the wonderful placidity and perfection of his art. There seems but one thing to detract from pure enjoyment: at times too strong a personality forcing itself between the audience and the song. Could she throw herself wholly into the background, the enjoyment would be perfect.

A WANT OF THE SOUL. The New York Tribune asks:

Have we or not, ever noticed the Flower Mission in Boston? If we have, a second mention will do no harm. The work of the ladies carrying on this Mission is to distribute fruit and flowers among the sick in the poorer homes and in hospitals. Never was a more fragrant Annual Report. The ladies during the year have carried to the ill and suffering 11,671 nosegays and 673 parcels of fruit. There was a particular distribution of 2,075 pond lilies. Outside the city, 34 towns sent contributions. There is a branch of the Mission in Chelsea and another in Cambridge. And why should not alms-giving have its poetical side? As in everything else, it is true that the prose of charity is of the first importance—it is of small use (if we may use Goldsmith's illustration) to send ruffles to those who have no shirts. The blankets, the flannels, the bread, the beef-tea, the coals, must have precedence; but when we find ladies bearing flowers to the stricken objects of their compassion, we may be sure that the weightier matters of relief will not be neglected. Delicate attentions and graceful ministrations show that those who promote them have fully comprehended the wants both of the body and the soul.

Leipzig Fairs and Music.

(Correspondence of the Springfield Republican).

LEIPZIG, October 9, 1871.

Two cities could scarcely be more unlike each other than Leipzig during the fair is unlike Leipzig at any other time. When the fair is not here, this is as pleasant and quiet a city as one could easily find; of about 90,000 inhabitants, whose citizens are, as a rule, well dressed, well behaved, and walk the streets quietly and soberly, minding their own affairs, and allowing other people the same privilege. There are large open squares in the newer part of the city, ornamented with statues, shrubbery and fountains, and the wide streets and promenades are, some of them, very handsome—but during the fairs everything is quite changed. All the beautiful open squares, the spacious Roes-platz, Augustus-platz, and the market-place are filled with rough wooden buildings and booths, which spring up as if by magic on every available spot of unoccupied ground in the city. All the streets, which are wide enough to admit of it, have a row of booths each side of them, leaving only space enough for carriages to pass in the centre; and even the resident merchants and shopkeepers, a large number of them, leave their shops and rent them to the stranger—merchants and traders who come by thousands from all parts of Germany to buy and sell, and barter and bargain for all sorts of things.

There are three of these gigantic fairs each year; one at Easter, one at Michaelmas and one at New Year's. The Easter and Michaelmas fairs have taken place annually for nearly 700 years, and are much larger than the one at New Year's, which was established later, in the 15th century. Each fair lasts four weeks, and during that time the number of strangers here often equals the entire number of the population. As might well be supposed, all the houses in the city where Mess-freunden are taken, are crowded to the very last degree. Theatres and all places of public amusement are filled to overflowing, though the price of seats is double what it is at other times. The streets are thronged, and in threading one's way through the busy crowd one gets rudely jostled by all sorts of strange-looking people, and sees such queer, quaint-looking faces and figures and costumes; peasants from Altsburg and various provinces near here, each of which has a costume quite peculiar to itself; old Jewish men with long white beards and dark, sinister looking faces, and one of whom would make a perfect picture of a "Shylock" or a "Fagin"; Hungarians, Turks and now and then a Greek. The booths and shops are filled with everything that one can think of, that it is possible to bring here. All kinds of clothing, ready-made garments, and all the materials from which clothing is made; furs from Russia and America, laces and all kinds of fine needle-work, silks, velvets, bonnets and hats, boots and shoes, and such quantities of German slippers,—if you know what those comfortable, niggainy things are,—glass-ware, china-ware and the most beautiful painted porcelain from Dresden, and such wonderful carving in wood, done by the Swiss peasants; books, pictures, both for sale and on exhibition—everything, everything is to be seen here for sale during the fair. Notwithstanding all the sights to be seen and all the bustle and activity which the fair brings, every one is glad when it is over, and Leipzig subsides into its own natural size, and the streets are once more cleared of the ugly black booths—the boards of which they are made look as if they had been used for the same purpose for at least 700 years—and everything seems so refreshingly quiet and orderly after all the noise and confusion.

After having enjoyed the beautiful rendering of the "Magic Flute," "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Juan," which were respectively the sixth, seventh and eighth of the Mozart operas given here in the early autumn, it seemed very odd to read in a September number of "Dwight's Journal of Music" that "the projected 'model performances' of Mozart's operas at Leipzig, which were to have been given during the present month, have all ended in smoke." The stars who were to sing at these performances have forwarded medical certificates to the effect that the state of their health imperiously demands their abstention from all professional exertion and their immediate presence at some watering-place. In all except the last two operas, Peschka-Leutner, the Leipzig favorite, was the prima-donna, and in the "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Juan" Pauline Lucca sang, in the first part of "Cherubino," and in the other that of "Zerlina." The musical critics here seem to owe Lucca a grudge because she will take liberties with the music, in order to make it conform to her acting, and they are hardly fair in their judgment of her powers, some of them even placing Peschka-Leutner above her, which is certainly a great injustice. In the parts of Cherubino and Zerlina, Lucca is charming and bewitching; her singing and acting are both so perfectly natural, that seeing her in one of those characters, the simple peasant girl Zerlina, or the piquant little page Cherubino, one would not believe her capable of interpreting a great tragic role. In person she is small and most exquisitely formed; her face is small and oval, the eyes large and deep in color, the mouth wonderfully mobile, and the whole face quite child-like and wearing an almost infantile sweetness of expression.

Her voice being more remarkable for its sweetness and flexibility and freshness of tone than for strength or quantity, one would say that it was impossible for her to do justice to a tragic role, but it is in reality only in such an one that her powers fully show themselves. In the part of Selika, in Meyerbeer's opera of "L'Africaine," she is superb and fully justifies the assertion of the critics—elsewhere than in Leipzig—that she is the greatest actress in the world. The music and the acting seem with her to go hand in hand, and neither one to be secondary to the other, but each the complement of the other, and so perfectly united and blended that one cannot tell in which she is the greater artist; and when such an artist as Lucca finds that it better suits her interpretation of certain passages to vary the tempo slightly, or make one note a little longer and another a little shorter than it is written, she has a right to take this liberty with the music, which a lesser artist would not have.

The concert season is just beginning, and on last Thursday came the first of the annual series of concerts in the Gewand-haus. In the very heart of the city there stands an old, dilapidated-looking stone building, black with the rust and mould of centuries, with small, deep-set windows, heavily barred on the outside with iron, and in the centre of this building there is a small hall, capable of seating about one thousand people. Here it is that the rare music of the Gewand-haus concerts has swelled into such perfect harmony that the echoes of it have reached the whole civilized world. The hall is not nearly large enough to accommodate the number of people who wish to attend these concerts, and it is impossible for a stranger or a new-comer in the city to obtain any place in the "large hall."

These seats are handed down from one generation to another, as heir-looms in the families here, and the only place one can get is in the "small hall" leading from the large one, where it is not possible to see the musicians, but where one can hear the music perfectly well; and, if going for the music's sake alone, not being able to see the orchestra takes little from the enjoyment of the concert. It seems strange that in so musical a city as Leipzig there should be no music hall combining the wonderful acoustic properties of the Gewand-haus with a size more adequate to the numbers of the audience. The programme of Thursday's concert was, in the first part, "Suite in D," by Bach, aria from "Mitrane," by Rossi, sung by Miss Cora Fehrmann, from Richmond, Va., concerto for piano by Litolff, played by Mr. Theodore Lescheltzki, (pronounce that name if you can!) from St. Petersburg; second part, Beethoven's C minor symphony.

One more little jotting about Leipzig, before closing. The University in this city, which was founded in the early part of the fifteenth century, and is one of the oldest and largest in Germany—it has at present about 1500 students—has just opened its doors to women, and, this year, three young Russian women have passed examination and entered, one as a student of political economy, one of the natural sciences, and the other of chemistry. It will certainly soon be proved to the world, if it has not already been done, whether it is a wise plan or not, for men and women to study together in colleges and all institutions of learning; and let us hope that if the answer is in the affirmative, our American colleges will no longer hesitate to open their doors to all, irrespective of sex or race, and with only one standard, that of intelligence. M. A. T.

JULLIEN II. The following from the Evening Gazette, a few weeks since, is good enough to be kept.

On Wednesday night, Jullien's Orchestra gave a concert at Music Hall under the patronage of the "Boston Lyceum." What claim Mr. Louis George Jullien had to call the orchestra his, we are at a loss to imagine, seeing that a large proportion of the performers were resident musicians. But that is a mere trifle. There were some forty executants, but had there been one hundred and forty they would have been equally blotted out in the dazzling glare of the great sun in their midst. Nothing but Jullien was seen. There was nothing but Jullien. It was dangerous to look at so brilliant a meteor with the naked eye, but as smoked glass could not be procured, we risked everything in our desire to look at the great luminary of the musical world. Mr. Louis George J. is a worthy successor to his father in his capacity to extract the largest amount of capital from the smallest amount of individual talent. But the son excels the father; for, while the latter gained a high repute upon nothing, the former enjoys one upon less. The contrast between Jullien père and Jullien fils is similar to that between Napoleon I. and Napoleon III.

The latter puts on the jack-boots and cocked-hat of his uncle, and fancies the world will mistake him for the great man. Jullien, fin, exhibits a gorgeous desert of shirt-bosom, continued almost to infinity through the agency of an enormous coat-lapel covered with white silk, and fancies he will be taken for his father's peer, while he is only a faint reminiscence. To a certain extent the resemblance is perfect: the one was, the other is, a musical charlatan. The airy conceit with which Mr. Louis George J. faced the audience, with a languid look of misanthropy, intended to do service for an expression of the vanity and hollowness of all mundane joys, was imitatively touching. As he sank into his chair at the conclusion of each morceau, his royal shirt-bosom beaming with undimmed splendor upon the audience, a buzz of admiration sped on zephyr wings through the hall. We were impressed to rush wildly to Parker's to procure a dish of stewed canary-birds, a flask of the choicest milk and water he had in his well-stocked cellar, and a silver-mounted pap spoon, with which to refresh the prostrated child of genius. With what a feeling of pride he must have looked at the statue of Beethoven, and paraphrased the words attributed to Correggio: "And I too am a musician!" With what grace Mr. L. G. J. wielded the baton! When waving it about in the air, he appeared to be spreading a pat of invisible butter upon a slice of invisible bread. The orchestra, evidently bent upon rendering the music properly, paid no heed to him, but kept their eyes riveted on their books. The result was that the music was played with a tolerable degree of nicety, but not such a degree as to create very wild enthusiasm on the part of the listeners. What did Shakespeare mean by asking, "What's in a name?" There is everything in a name when that name is Jullien, even when there is nothing in the possessor of it but "cheek" of right royal magnitude. Soft breezes waft thee back to New York again, L. G. J., and hurricanes spout to keep thee evermore from Boston!

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 18, 1871.

First Symphony Concert.

The Harvard Musical Association, true to its College origin and culture, and persevering in its effort to establish concerts of the highest music, of which the programmes and the whole arrangement shall be governed by a pure artistic motive, that so they may truly elevate and educate the listening community, still reaps its rich reward (now for the seventh year) in seeing its great hall filled with the most intelligent, refined, attentive, sympathetic audience that any Art occasion ever draws together in this city of free schools. And the beauty of it is, that all this interest has been kept up, from the first, without any compromise with ignorant false taste, or any catering to cheap applause. The success of the original design and motive has been in this respect most signal; from year to year it gains significance and power. Thus far these concerts stand, and may they ever stand, in imperturbable, calm opposition to the musical speculations, in which not art, not music, but money and applause and personal renown are the chief ends. The travelling virtuoses and their lords the "agents," the musical adventurers and showmen know it; so do the disturbers of the peace with "monster" jubilees uncalled for; and some of them no doubt regard the presence of any such school in the midst of a coveted field for their own operations with as little favor, and as uncomfortable a feeling, as our late slave-holding brethren regarded all attempts to educate the people. For the effect of all true culture, through good examples kept long in the foreground, is to create a quiet, wholesome, steady interest in music, a never failing, never feverish, satisfaction (economical withal, materially and morally) in the best things, and an habitual aversion to great excitements and parade occasions, made so frequent by these schemes that the exceptional becomes the every-day experience.

A concert in which a serene, harmonious, happy sphere of art and music reigns is something very different from those we get from artists in the hot pursuit of fame and fortune. The latter give you a miscellaneous succession of brilliant separate things, each a triumph in itself (we will suppose), each encoored and repeated without the least regard to the remainder of the programme, or to any unity of impression from an artistic evening as a whole; so that the sphere is continually disturbed and broken; you have had so many little several excitements, but no pure hour of beauty and of heaven. In the former, the ideal reigns; music, and not a person, claims attention; the atmosphere is all harmonious and tranquil, not disturbed by personal appeals; the artist is willing to be forgotten in the art; the programme (subject-matter of the concert) is the first consideration, the execution second, the performer last, who, losing himself in his ideal task, wins all the more esteem in the long run. Such a concert is an hour or two of sweet, ideal life, enjoyed in quiet sympathy by many sitting in a charmed sphere, the cares and discords of the world shut out. The concert that produces this effect, even without brilliant stars or meteors, is a good one. And such a concert, so far as we could read the general impression, was, to a considerable degree, the first of the ten Symphony Concerts in the Music Hall on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 9. The audience, in spite of the unprecedented number and high claims of concert-givers, was about as numerous and as fine as ever; possibly a hundred fewer seats were filled than there were last year, but the difference was inappreciable. A deeper interest in the music was never shown, and it held out to the last note of the programme, which was this:

1. Overture to "The Water Carrier".....Oberubini.
2. Concert Aria, No. 6.—Recit: "Oh! to me accord!" Andante and Rondo: "Non tacer, amato bene," With Piano and Orchestra accompaniment.....Mozart.
Mrs. C. A. Barry.
3. Entr'acte from "Manfred".....Schumann.
4. Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella".....Schubert.
1. Songs with Pianoforte:
a. "Con rucio mormorio," from "Rodelinda." Arranged by Robert Franz.
Handel.
b. "Aprilmauen." April Humors. Op. 44, No. 2.....Franz.
Mrs. C. A. Barry.
2. Pastoral Symphony, No. 6.....Beethoven.

The orchestra (slightly reduced, as well as changed by substitutes, owing to a distant engagement of some of its members, of which the management were not apprised in season) numbered on this occasion just fifty musicians. All its departments were complete, however, though now and then perhaps a want of the old weight and fullness in the basses might be felt; two of the violoncellos and one of the contrabasses being absent. But it proved itself in excellent working condition for so early in the season; practice will make more perfect. And it is gratifying to find that, in spite of the removal from Boston of such artists as Mr. Listemann, Mr. Elitz, the fagottist, and a few more, the composition of our orchestra is on the whole more nearly perfect than it ever was before. The presence of Mr. EICHENBERG at the head of the violins,—a veritable Concertmeister, of the right spirit, with plenty of knowledge, experience and influence, as well as weight of character both as a musician and a man—is in itself a power; a solid gain indeed, for the peculiar power of his predecessor lay in his remarkable virtuosity as a solo playing violinist, for which he will find sphere in the Thomas concerts everywhere. The first violins (this time 9) were all good and moved in admirable unison. The middle strings, though purposely reduced in number, have gained in positive precision, without loss of power and volume. The cellos were but four, both Fries and Heindl being absent, who, however, will return; but with the important acquisition of Mr. HARTDGEN, and with Mr. SUCK still at his post, they made their presence palpable throughout. The flutes, the clarinets especially, with Mr. WEBER for the first, were never better, while in the new first oboist, Herr KUTZLER we have not only the true pastoral hantboy tone and under delicate control, but a right artist feeling for the true in music. The brass was never in so good condition, particularly the trombones, whose native boisterousness is now properly subdued. Even in the tympani we witness an improvement.

Now, with the absent ones returned, and with a few weeks more of practice, the prospect is of nicer, more effective orchestral performance than our city ever yet has realized in trusting to its own resources. As it was, the rendering of the several orchestral numbers, though not entirely without flaws, was on the whole very satisfactory, and Mr. ZERRAHN, considering the absences and the short period of rehearsal, had his musicians well in hand. We are not sure that we ever before in Boston have so fully realized the perfect art and poetry and beauty of the Pastoral Symphony. The delicate light and shade of the first movement, which is the very breath of Summer in the fields, was carefully and happily preserved; the musing reverie by the "brookside" (Andante) has seldom sung itself more feelingly and to more sympathetic, flowing, rich accompaniment, or woke out of its dream to the quaint realism of the bird notes more literally and nicely imitated. Nor was there ever more contagious jollity in the magnetic rhythm of the Scherzo, more sense of moisture in the rainy air, more startling grandeur in the rumbling thunder and the lightnings of the "Storm." The little obligato passages of flute, clarinet, oboe, fagotto, horn especially, were noticeable for their certainty and delicacy of outline; and we yet feel the throb of those pizzicatos of the 'cellos in the homeward thronging movement of the final Allegretto. The audience at these concerts has always been noted for its close attention, but scarcely ever have we seen all so keep their seats, listening as if transported, to the last note of a long Symphony when it came last upon the programme. Indeed the Pastorale was as grateful as so much return of all that there is best in Summer,—the soul of Summer, so to speak, after November chills and winter warnings.

If the Symphony Concerts had done no other service, it would be something to have kept the sterling, never hacknied Overtures of Cherubini so much before the public;—not three of them (as a critic in the Gazette states, counting the "Wasserträger" twice by different names), but actually six, and most of them repeatedly; to wit: the "Water Carrier", (5 or 6 times), "Anacreon" (do.), "Medea" (3 times) "Les Abencerrages," "Faniaka," and (yet to come this winter) "Lodoiskas." All but the first of these were introduced here for the first time in these Concerts. The "Water Carrier" overture is one of the noblest, most genial and inspiring compositions of its kind, and fit to "inaugurate" a season of great instrumental music. For the first year or two it was deeply enjoyed by the "select few," but now, (thanks to the "perseverance of the saints") no overture, except by Beethoven, is more sure of a general welcome. This time the basses perhaps were not strong enough for all the solemn grandeur of their unisons in the introduction, while more vigor of the vanishing accent might have added to the clearness of the short nervous phrases; but the production as a whole was telling, and the climax of the tutti near the end of the quick movement was superb.

The Zwischenact from the "Manfred" music, of which we had too brief a single taste last season, was this time played twice over, making itself felt as a most exquisite little gem of purely imaginative composition. It was one of Schumann's inspired moments. Shall we not some day hear the "Manfred" music a whole, with Byron's poem read? Surely our two specimens (the overture and this pearl of an entr'acte) justify the hope.

Schubert's Overture to one of his two grand serious operas, "Alfonso and Estrella," given for the first time in this country, opens majestically, and is for the most part grandiose and brilliant, piling chord on chord in most exciting crescendo, relieved by a bit of quaint, sunshiny melody on which another fondly waits. But the prevailing tone is earnest and heroic; what could the critic have been thinking of who called it "humorous, sly and rollicking!" It was splendidly played and commonly accepted as quite worthy of its author; only it is more concise and quickly over than is Schubert's wont.

The vocal pieces, also, were all heard here for the first time. The Concert Aria by Mozart (No. 6 of the twelve published by Breitkopf and Härtel) is one of the noblest of them all and full of the Mozartean charm, rising at times to a like purity and grandeur with the great passages of Donna Anna. It is peculiar in having an independent piano forte part which stands out before the beautiful orchestral accompaniment. Mozart in his own catalogue says: "Written for Mlle. Storace and me;" he evidently liked the singer and wanted to play to her song in a sense somewhat nearer than the other instruments. The music is ornate and trying for the voice. Mrs. BARRY showed a full appreciation of its sense and beauty, singing it with soul and feeling, but with so much effort for her comparatively light voice that many thought her singing cold. Sometimes, however, a tone or two came out in warm, rich color and with telling power, particularly in the noble recitative. The air by Handel was precisely suited to her, being Handelian in the simplest, largest sense, and it was sung with beautiful effect, enhanced by the apt accompaniment which Robert Franz knows so well how to read between the lines of the original score which is but Handel's sketch. This was followed in fine playful contrast by the Franz song: "Apriltaunen," in which the lover likens the caprices of his mistress to the shifting moods of April weather; and into the fine humor, as well as the subtle music of it, the singer entered heartily and charmingly. The piano accompaniment in all these pieces was always near and true and clearly felt in Mr. LEONHARD's intelligent and genial rendering.

The second concert, for next Thursday, will begin with the Leonore Overture commonly called "No. 1," but which was written later than the others, and will end with the great Leonore, No. 3. Two movements of a Concerto for the Violoncello, by Goltermann, played (for the first time) by Mr. HARTDOORN, and a fine Mozart Symphony (No. 6, in C), better known here to four hand players than through an orchestra, will fill out the first part. In Part Second, preceding the great Overture, will come the fascinating Aria and Gavotte from Bach's Orchestral Suite in D; and, for a unique, quaint novelty, a short Concerto for the oboe (hautboy) by Handel, played by Mr. KUTZLER.

N.B.—The Public Rehearsal is unavoidably changed (for once) to MONDAY, instead of Tuesday next, at 2 P.M.

Of the first LEONHARD and EICHBERG Matinée next time. We go to press while it is taking place.

Mrs. CHARLES MOULTON continued to attract and charm a large and cultivated, if to some extent a partial, audience to the end of her five concerts. This in itself was rare success for one whose triumphs hitherto had only been in private. Surely there can be no question of the remarkable beauty of her voice; nor of its sufficiency for any vocal task that is not quite exceptional; nor of her artistic, finished execution. She sings like one who is by nature musical; sings with freedom and with joy, and revels bird-like in the mazes of luxurious florid melody. Not one of the deep souled singers, who give expression to great passion or devotion, the highest aspiration of her art is but to please, and she is happy in applause. But she can sing a sober, sweet air simply, purely, whether it come from a deep inward feeling or not; for example the song by Pease: "Tender and true, adieu." In Schumann's impassioned "Du meine Seele," though there was no lack of warmth and color in the tones, the sacred fire was hardly present. We still like her best in the luxurious Rossini music. Her singing of "Di piacer" was admirable, as well as of "Bell'raggio," which she has repeated. And in the light comic opera scenes with Sig. FERRANTI (from "L'Elisir," "Crispino," &c.) she is perfectly at home and sings with a bewitching grace and humor. We are inclined to qualify our exception to her rendering of the arch little song: "Beware"; on repetition it did not seem to us so much overdone after all.

What we chiefly fail to find in Mrs. Moulton's public effort thus far is, as we have said before, the evidence of any serious, whole souled surrender of herself to Art,—high, earnest and ideal Art, which whether technically secular or sacred, is none the less religious. So far she seems not drawn to the great classical creations of the master spirits. Nor are the programmes of her concerts worthy of a really musical and cultivated audience. She has, for instance, an admirable violinist, masterly in execution, in purity and breadth of tone, in the power of re-producing melodies of marked, contrasted character upon the strings; witness the wild song of Mephistopheles, and "The last Rose of Summer," which he does to perfection;—but why must he always play such an amount of trash and senseless tricks of virtuosity? Why, after Mr. WEHLI has disciplined "Sweet Home" for a quarter of an hour with his left hand, must Signor SARASATE, on the same evening, torture the poor tune again through all sorts of fantastic, even grotesque variations, making it squeal in alissimo or whine like a puppy, precisely as he does the Carnival of Venice? He is an artist capable of better things, and to a not vulgar audience he owes his best. Mr. BROOKHOUSE BOWLER's ballads, too, are not particularly interesting, though he has a tenor voice both powerful and sweet, and sings such songs as "Macgregor's Gathering" and the "Bay of Biscay" with a ringing tone and great abandon, and can sentimentalize with delicacy in a love song; but he is given to mouthing, and has some of the worst faults of the conventional English school. He was happiest in the duet from "L'Elisir" with Sig. FERRANTI. The extravagances of this funny buffo we can forgive, at least endure, because he is so genuine; he only acts his nature out, and he is full of humor, as of music and of good boy-like, ready sympathies.

Could Mrs. Moulton heed and take seriously to heart the sisterly and sound suggestions which we have copied from the Woman's Journal, there were a future for her to which we all might look forward with interest. Meanwhile she has our best wishes for her true success.

The new "APOLLO CLUB OF BOSTON" treated their associate members and a few invited friends to a taste of their part-singing quality at Horticultural Hall, on the evening of Nov. 7. There were about forty voices, the finest in their separate quality, and the most musical, sonorous, rich and full in their ensemble, that we remember hardly ever to have heard. They sang a dozen part-songs, including the "Cheerful Wanderer," "Serenade," "The Voyage" and the "Rhine Wine Song," by Mendelssohn, and others by Fischer, Härtel, Maurer, Kücken, Eisenhofer, &c. Mr. LANG, with whom they had had as yet but few opportunities of practice, conducted, and their singing of each and every piece was a model of blended sweetness, refined purity of tone, good light and shade, well tempered power and right expression. We only hope that the assemblage of such excellent material will not content itself with always singing four-part songs, which in the end must grow monotonous even to those who sing them,—perhaps the more monotonous the more exact and polished the performance. The possibilities of composition for male voices only, crowded so closely in a narrow compass, are limited. At the least we trust, and we have little doubt, that this fine body of singers, who all seem to have not only voices, but intelligence and taste, have also aspirations in the future towards larger forms of music, such as the "Antigone" choruses, the "Ode to the Artists," &c., of Mendelssohn, the choruses with horn accompaniment, by Schubert, &c., &c. And if this movement might only prove the first step toward another, more complete and true, and opening a far wider field for art, the coupling with their own of female voices of like excellence, what fine task is there in the range of choral composition that would not lie within their reach!

Mr. J. A. HILLS's first "Piano-forte Recital of Ancient Music," in which he played Trios, Suites, Variations, &c., by Pixis, D. Scarlatti, Handel, Emanuel Bach and Beethoven, deserves more recognition, if only for the respect shown for good music and the entire avoidance of clap-trap, than we have room for now. We hope to see the remaining concert well attended.

NEXT. Mr. PECK began another triplet of his Popular Concerts last evening, to be continued this afternoon and Monday evening. He has a fine array of artists.

The second PUBLIC REHEARSAL of the SYMPHONY CONCERTS will take place at 2 o'clock on Monday next, instead of the usual day, which will still be Tuesday.

The next great event in order will be a glorious performance of Elijah on Saturday, the 25th, by the Handel and Haydn Society, with all the solos sung by Santley, Cummings, Miss Edith Wynne and Madame and Mr. Patey; to be followed the next evening by Judas Maccabaeus.

THEODORE THOMAS, with his admirable orchestra, enlarged somewhat, and programmes of the usual variety of past, present and "future," of lively and severe, will begin a series of eight concerts in the Music Hall on Friday evening Dec. 1, continuing through the following week.

NEW YORK, Nov. 1. After having expiated her sins, in a kind of musical purgatory. New York seems to be coming into the regions of light and sound. Last year the opera-loving public had to choose between the discomfort of the Stadt Theatre, not to be reached from any civilized quarter except by a long and tedious journey, where the sublime harmony mingles with bad smells, and where one has the pleasing consciousness that he is at any moment liable to share the fate of "La Juive," and artful James's palace, where the entertainments, though invaluable to the student of Anatomy, could hardly be considered as musically pleasing or instructive.

We have already had a short, but very successful, season of English Opera, at the Academy, and four nights of Italian opera, such as was never known in New York; and we are promised much for the future. The Philharmonic Concerts will soon begin, and later, it is said, Theodore Thomas will be here with his admirable orchestra. Nor are the Dolby Ballad Concerts to be lightly esteemed or soon forgotten. Of Oratorio there will be enough for those who are fond of it, although we have nothing like your Handel and Haydn Society.

The season of Italian Opera opened with Lucia. For the second night Faust was announced, but Miss Nilsson, having taken cold, was unable to sing, and Rossini's "Barber" was substituted, with Mlle. Leon Duval—from the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris—as Rosina. This lady could hardly have appeared under more unfavorable circumstances—as there had been no time for rehearsal, and the audience—cold enough at all times—was rendered morose by the non-appearance of Nilsson.

With all these disadvantages I have to record, for Mlle. Duval, a success which, were it not for some minor defects in her acting, would be unqualified. Her voice is a rich, clear mezzo soprano, perfectly trained, and of such quality that it is a luxury to listen to her. In saying this I merely repeat the judgment that has been already pronounced in London and Paris. That of our own daily press is less favorable—but that must be taken for what it is worth. Capoul, as Almaviva, was the same insouciant gallant whom I remember at the Opera Comique in Paris. The same light, thin voice—and the same detestable trick (?) of running into falsetto. His light love-making is admirable: but in high tragedy he makes an unpleasant impression by seeming (as has been aptly said) to think more of his hair than anything else.* However, as there is no high tragedy in the "Barber," he did very well. Sig. Ronconi acted the part of Figaro with an irresistible comicality which is rarely equalled. On the third opera night Martha was given with Miss Nilsson as Martha. But it was only on the fourth night, in La Traviata, that she appeared in a role which afforded anything like full scope for her magnificent voice and power. Her Violetta is one of her own creation, divested of the traditional naughtiness and adorned with something of the singer's own purity, and the song was grand and grander, until it culminated in the death scene, which only a genius like her's can make endurable. Her Violetta is broken-hearted: it seems natural and fitting that she should die—and her spirit is borne out upon the sweetness of a song. But there is none of that terrible realism, seen too often upon the stage, which is like a mockery of the one event we are the farthest from understanding.

Much has been said and written of Nilsson's Violetta, and in Paris it is ranked higher than her Marguerite. This estimate, however, is good only for the latitude and longitude of Paris. Faust is announced for this evening, and our people may judge differently. A. A. C.

*We beg leave to dissent from this judgment of Capoul. —Ed.

Nilsson in "Don Giovanni!"

The following is from the Tribune of Nov. 4.

It was a matter of managerial courtesy to allow Mlle. Corani a night for her formal debut in New York, and nominally the performance last evening is to be considered with special reference to this lady's Donna Anna. But in reality the Zerlina of Miss Nilsson was the only attraction, and the Donna Anna and Donna Elvira were listened to with scant patience. Nobody who has seen Miss Nilsson on the stage will need to be told how she filled the charming role assigned to her. There is a depth in the music of which she seems scarcely conscious, (1) for the strains which Mozart has given to Zerlina are not merely pretty and playful, but most beautifully tender, and it is only the superficial characteristics of the part which Miss Nilsson has caught. Still she has caught those characteristics perfectly, such as they are. She is the sweet, graceful, coquettish peasant girl, a little giddy, a little vain, but loving her block-head Masetto very truly, and easily moved by his sorrows and mishaps. Her play with the rustic swain (Ronconi), in the "Batti, batti," was delightful, and the duet with the Don, "La ci darem," was equally good, the changes of expression in her face when the gay cavalier surprises her by a declaration of his love being a really remarkable study. Both these numbers were also very sweetly and gracefully sung; but the "Vedrai carino" lacked simplicity and smoothness. Few, however, seemed disposed to be critical, and a better satisfied audience, whenever Miss Nilsson was on the stage, we have rarely seen. The coolness with which Donna Anna was received was chilling. Mlle. Corani in truth is not a singer to rouse much enthusiasm, for her voice is neither sweet nor fresh, nor true, and her art is of the crude, explosive variety which never seems so defective as when it is applied to the delicate works of Mozart. Mlle. Duval's Elvira was but moderately successful. The music is rather high for her, as the upper register of her voice is sharp and thin, and when over-fatigued it is not always true. M. Barré was an active and pains-taking Don Giovanni, but the part is somewhat beyond his abilities. He is good in his way, but his way is a small one. Brignoli was the Don Ottavio, having little to do except to sing the "Il mio tesoro," which he did very sweetly. The best of all, after Zerlina, was undoubtedly Leporello. M. Jamet did justice to this role, not making the farce quite as broad as some others to whom we are accustomed, but acting with unflinching vivacity and some humor, and singing the music admirably. Mr. Hermanns was a sufficiently dignified and sepulchral Commendatore. We cannot praise the orchestra very warmly, nor the dresses, nor the stage management. Mr. Strakosch, in his day of prosperity, ought to put away the shabby make-shifts of the past, and when there is to be a masquerade ball on the stage, as there should be in Don Giovanni's palace, it would be well to let the guests dress themselves for the occasion. The company at the Don's festival last night consisted entirely of peasants in their ordinary working clothes, and it is a curious illustration of the manners of good society at Seville in old times that they all wore straw hats in the ball room throughout the evening. Ottavio, Elvira and Donna Anna were the only maskers out of the whole seventy who had masks.

The production of "Mignon" is now officially announced as close at hand. "Faust" and "La Traviata" are to be repeated next week, and "Martha" will be given at the matinée to-day.

Santley in "Elijah."

Last evening the Harmonic Society performed the work under Dr. Pech's direction, and with the assistance of the members of Mr. Dolby's ballad company. It is almost needless to say that the solo parts were admirably rendered. They were in the hands of the 2 who have made themselves famous in this line of their profession. The part of Elijah certainly has never before in this country been sung so well as by Mr. Santley. It is a long and an arduous part, and the voice of many a good singer has given out before the end; but Mr. Santley's last notes were as firm, resonant, and clear as the first. Miss Wynne and Madame Patey have also shown themselves to be accomplished in oratorio as in ballad music.

The Harmonic Society has not yet entirely mastered the oratorio. Certain of the choruses were very well given, but others were faulty. The voices did not take up the points sharply. The notes were attacked too cautiously, and too little attention was paid to the shading and expression. In the parts where the choruses have responsive passages to the solo voice—as for example in that with Madame Patey, "We have heard it with our ears"—The responses were out of time and uncertain. The orchestra was throughout too loud. The effect of many of the best solos was greatly marred by this. Even Mr. Santley, whose voice is as clear as a trumpet, had difficulty sometimes in making himself heard above the accompaniment.

The concerted portions were generally well sung. The choral, "Cast thy burden on the Lord," was repeated, as was also the terzetto, "Lift thine eyes." This latter was very expressively sung by Miss Wynne, Miss Sara Brannen, and Madame Patey. If there was anything amiss in this it was that Madame Patey sang too loud. Beautiful as her voice is, there are times when one may hear too much of it. It also seemed quite needless, not to say a little absurd, for Dr. Pech to beat time for an instrumented trio sung by three persons who so perfectly understood what they were about—especially needless, inasmuch as he must necessarily take his time from them, and not they from him.

Despite the few drawbacks, the performance was, as we have said, a very interesting one. The Society has increased in numbers, manifests an excellent spirit, and is apparently prepared to do what is necessary to make itself a thoroughly efficient body.

The "Elijah" is to be repeated this evening in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music by the same performers.—Sun, Nov. 1.

PHILADELPHIA. Mr. Charles H. Jarvis gives this evening, in the Chickering Piano Ware-rooms, the first Soirée of his tenth season, assisted by Mr. Wenzel Kopta, violinist, and Mr. Rudolph Hennig, violoncellist, with this programme:

Piano Solo—Oran prelude and Fugue. Bach.
transcribed by.....Lieht.
Violoncello—Concerto, two movements.....Haydn.
Violoncello—Concerto. 3 minor.....Lindner.
Piano and Cello—Concert Duo.....Raff.
Piano Solo—"Soirée de Vienne," No. 2. In C major.
Tausig.

Trio—Piano, Violin and Cello, No. 2, B flat.
Rabenstein.

The announcements are ready for the three grand Symphony concerts which Mr. Charles H. Jarvis and Mr. H. Cross propose to give at the Musical Fund Hall. For the first one, to take place December 9th, the following is the programme:

Overture—"Maggio Flute".....Mozart.
Concerto—Piano, "C minor, op. 37".....Beethoven.
Mr. Charles H. Jarvis.
Concerto—Violin, "B minor, op. 64".....Mendelssohn.
Mr. Wenzel Kopta.

Symphony in C.....Schubert.

The second concert will take place February 3d, and the third April 13th. Beethoven's Fourth Symphony will be played at the second, and Schumann's Symphony No 1 at the third.

Mr. Carl Wolfsohn has given the first of his Orchestral Matinées with an orchestra which he has organized and trained. The Evening Bulletin (Nov. 10) says:

Except in the rare cases of Jullien's or Theodore Thomas's orchestra, there has never been so good a concert of its kind given here. A band of between forty and fifty thoroughly experienced players, with string, reed, brass and wood instruments, properly balanced, and all practised under the leadership of an enthusiastic and conscientious artist like Mr. Wolfsohn, could not fail to do well. But they did as well, on their first trial before the public, that we feel that the success was worthy of much more than ordinary commendation. This was the programme:

Symphony No. 5, C minor.....Beethoven.
Le Réveil du Lion—"Awakening of the Lion."
Morceau Caractéristique. First time.....Kontsky.
Tema e Variazioni, for oboe. First time.....Hummel.
Mr. George Meinberg.
Waltz—"Stories from the Vienna Woods." First time.....Strauss.
Nocturne, from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn.
Imperial March. First time.....Wiesprecht.

Of the performance of the Beethoven Symphony we can only speak in high praise. Each movement was given, not only with technical correctness, but with thorough understanding on the part of the players as well as the director. The C minor symphony is a perfect work in its kind, and the progression, from the brilliant allegro to the majestic and triumphal finale, was never more faithfully represented here than it was by Mr. Wolfsohn's orchestra. The piece succeeding the glorious symphony—Kontsky's Réveil du Lion—is in strong contrast; but we know of scarcely any orchestral piece of popular style that is so abounding in picturesque descriptive effects.

The new oboist, Mr. George Meinberg, whom Mr. Wolfsohn brought with him from Berlin last summer, is an artist of rare skill. His instrument is one requiring great delicacy of feeling as well as of execution, and he fulfills these and all other requirements most satisfactorily. Hummel's familiar, old-fashioned air, with variations, has never sounded so pleasantly as it does when played on the oboe by such a perfect master of that instrument. The new Strauss waltz, in which there is a quaint, pretty passage for the sither, delighted every one. The selection from the Midsummer Night's Dream was only slightly marred by a want of smoothness in the first horn. The new "Imperial March," by Wiesprecht, is a most stirring composition, which might have been inspired by a victory like Sedan. Played by such a magnificent band as that which Mr. Wolfsohn has brought together, its effect is most inspiring.

The large number of cultivated men and women who have encouraged Mr. Wolfsohn in his ambition to get up a first-class grand orchestra in Philadelphia must feel fully rewarded and thoroughly gratified with the success of his first concert.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Sweet Heather Bell. Song and Cho. 3. G to 9. Loesch 30

Popular and pleasing ballad.

Love's Caresses. 2. Eb to c. Conolly. 30

Good and effective for a voice of low compass.

Gracious Father, hear thy Children. Duet, Soprano and Tenor. 4. A to a. Warren. 60

Well-wrought and effective, and has an accompaniment for Piano or Organ, with changes of stops plainly marked.

Cleansing Fire. 3. Eb and C to e. Gabriel. 35

"Let thy Gold be cast in the Furnace, Thy red Gold precious and bright."

Good advice, beautifully expressed.

Moonlight Waltz. 2. Bb to e. Davies. 30

Comic. Spirited, and good melody.

'Twas like a Spirit's sigh. Song and Chorus. 3. Bb to e. Taylor. 35

"So soft, 'Twas like a Spirit's sigh, Borne on the evening breeze."

In popular style, and with very pretty and varied chorus.

Down by the Brook. 3. G to e. Pabst. 35

"A youth and a maiden, both in their teens, Talking Love-nonsense, down by the Brook."

Uncommonly sweet and taking.

The Knott Family. 2. Eb to e. Poole. 80

A quiet comic song about a family at whose fortunes you can laugh;—why Knott?

I'm a Paddy Whack. 3. F to f. Fuller. 35

Song of a frisky Paddy, and more natural and Irish-like than the average.

Never trouble Trouble till Trouble troubles you. 2. F to f. Wellman. 30

Pretty melody, and may be sung easily, all but the last line, which is full of "trouble."

The Old Man of the Mountain. 3. Eb to e. McNeal. 30

"Unmoved I've stood on this old rock
Mide't lightning flash and thunder shock."

Effective for bass or baritone voice.

Ma Mere était Bohémienne. (My Mother was a Gypsy.) 6. Ab to a. Masse. 50

Mis mère fu zingarella, is the Italian title of this fine piece, which furnishes the material for one of Mrs. Moulton's triumphs. Mellow, bright, "floating" melody, and not alarmingly difficult, except in the cadence.

Instrumental.

Morning in the Woods. (Matinée dans le Bois.) Caprice Improvisé. 5. Bb. Kettner. 60

Allegro. Allegro-Scherzando. 5. D. " 40

Mandolinata Fantasia Quasi Capriccio. 5. F. Kettner. 60

Three pieces by this skilful composer. When well played they must be charming. The first introduces a few wild wood-land sounds, and the last two are very light and graceful.

Blue Danube. Waltz. 6. D. Trans. by Welk. 1.00

Neck and Neck. Galop. 6. Eb. " 75

Polka Bohémienne. 6. Eb. " 1.00

Marche des Vivandiers. Morceau descriptif. 6. Db. Welk. 1.00

Floating on the Breeze. Romance. 7. G: " 75

Five brilliant concert pieces. Those who can play well enough will need no urging to try them, as music of that grade, so new and so good, does not often appear.

Up to Time. Galop. 3. F. Hart. 30

If played "up to time" will receive your "hart" approval.

Life let us Cherish. Waltz. 3. Strauss. 75

Strauss's style seems to change nightly, and includes more to popular melodies, but does not lose its resonant brilliancy.

Minne-haha Mazourka. 3. Eb. Auerbach. 30

A graceful and tasteful morceau.

Books.

SECOND MOTETTE COLLECTION. By Dudley Buck. Price, in Cloth, $2.75; Boards, $2.50

Those who have examined it praise it highly, and it is, without doubt, one of the most satisfactory collections that has appeared. Mr. Buck escaped (with the loss of his goods) from the Chicago fire, but fortunately preserved his genius intact. This compilation will add to a well deserved reputation, and, we hope, a considerable sum to his income.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 800.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 2, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 18.

The Vocal Works of Bach and Handel.— Letter by Robert Franz.*

[Continued from page 121.]

Let us now apply this most important test to the forms of accompaniment which the "German Handel Society" offers us in the 32nd volume of its collective edition. This volume contains a portion of the Italian Duets and Trios, and is therefore particularly well suited to our purpose, because here the voice parts are supported only by a figured bass, which involves a more independent accompaniment, hence allows us to cast a fuller glance into the workshop of this reconstructive industry.

It is to be hoped everybody will agree with me in nothing: that Handel's style is chargeable with no school faults; no fifths, octaves, or whatever other names there may be for this class of repudiated things; only when the movement of the parts involves it, under mitigating circumstances, or when they can be justified on higher grounds, do they appear as an excusable necessity. Unfortunately the setting of this 32nd volume can hardly be acquitted of the charge of introducing such unjustifiable school faults by wholesale. [Franz here proceeds to give a dozen examples (in notes) of fifths and octaves in the piano accompaniment which Brahms (he does not name him) has put to the Italian Duets, &c.]

This contingent of grave violations of the rules of pure composition I have extracted hastily; it might be doubled and tripled without difficulty, if one chose to make a hunt for passing or hidden fifths and octaves, which also are objectionable. Yet I lay no great weight on occurrences of this sort, since every one can easily help himself by intelligent corrections; but that will be more difficult with regard to the other properties of composition.

What shall we make of such contrapuntal progression as we find—to cite only a few examples—on page 8, line 3 and 4, or page 37, line 2, 3, and 4? Here the piano setting does not develop itself from any inner life, but follows at the most a mechanical order of rhythm. Therefore the tones stand so listless and indifferent by the side of one another,—the quickening impulse, which urges on as with a fatal necessity towards a determinate goal, is wanting. This impelling force, which, as we shall see later, rests upon the mutualism of melodic, harmonic and rhythmical elements, is one of the most important features of the polyphonic style—and it must also play a conspicuous part in the working out of the accompaniment.

And, not to pass it over in silence, how strangely such insignificant and empty passages contrast with the splendid forms of Handel's original parts! Here it overflows with bubbling vital force;—there it is just the contrary.

What shall we say, too, of the emptiness of the conduct of the parts, of which every page, every line, nay every measure furnishes eloquent proof?

*(Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.)

Even if the execution of the accompaniment be not subjected to painful requirements, yet at least traces of the laws by which real parts move together in artistic freedom should be visible: the accompaniment of the Chamber Duets almost never shows them. Now the piano setting reproduces the voice parts without any addition; presently it damps their flow by mere dead sounds; in this measure it goes on in two parts, in the next it is in three parts, then suddenly in four or even five parts. On page 76, line 1, measure 8, the middle part actually moves below the continuo! In vain one seeks for grounds which could occasion such phenomena: the entrance and the disappearance of the different parts is purely arbitrary.

Moreover, little attention seems to have been bestowed upon the fact, that the tone-quality of the pianoforte demands a decided rounding off and closeness of the harmony: eye and ear are incessantly tormented by maimed chord forms, which can find only a cold completion in the voice parts.

We meet too, in the first half of the volume, a piano setting which supposes for the fingers really antediluvian tasks. Thus on page 42, lines 3 and 4, the player has to execute the following tone spectre:

The entrance of the rolling voice part will only serve to make the threadbare character of the above passage more apparent. The counterpart to this, however, may be found upon page 36, where the piano setting drags itself along uninterruptedly in knotted overgrowth.

Furthermore the remark, trivial as it may sound, ought not to be quite superfluous here, that a good piece of music must always develop satisfactorily in respect to euphony. But it is in the want of this that the elaboration of the accompaniment of the chamber duets particularly shines. Motiveless breaking off of the leading tone, even in the highest part; pungent doublings of altered and of climbing tones, unlovely chord positions, and all such offensive traits press to the light on all sides, most strikingly again in the first half of the volume. Possibly there may be some piano pieces of Bach and Handel, in which not much regard is paid to outward beauty of tone; but there are also other works by the same masters—and fortunately these form the vast majority—which leave nothing to be wished in this respect. These, and not those, should have been taken for a model in the restoration of the pianoforte accompaniment. But now to show what precedents were leaned upon in this accompaniment to the Italian Duets, I cite a single example. On page 12, line 2, measures 2, 3 and 4, we read:

After such specimens as this, one hardly can expect to find any vital participation of the accompaniment in the subject matter of the original, which shimmers through it all in finest shades of color. Such a setting puts even the most perfect performance of the singer in a questionable light. Besides, it contributes very greatly to the perpetuation of these massive views about the expression and the rendering of older compositions, which drive a cultivated ear to desperation.

Finally it is to be regretted also, that the 32nd volume of the "German Handel Society" has put no thorough bass to the Duets. Two old manuscripts at my disposal, for the genuineness of which I cannot vouch, to be sure, show a carefully and richly figured bass. Can it be that the manuscript copy, repeatedly mentioned in the preface to the volume, contains no signatures? If it does, it would be an irresponsible proceeding to take away such valuable material, without producing further reasons, from the chamber duets, since this alone makes any conscientious control of the composition possible, and since moreover it belongs to Handel's works.—

Now I am far from assuming that they, who charged themselves with the elaboration of the accompaniment to the Italian Duets and Trios, were not competent to write a more grateful arrangement. If such an one has not been furnished us, we can hardly err if we attach the responsibility partly to the principles which the editors of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung have from time to time set forth about the A B C of the art of accompaniment, and partly to certain views about the art maxims of past ages. My own convictions in regard to this important matter have already found expression in the preface to the Handel Opera Arias edited by me: as these, so far, have been passed over in dead silence, but have never been refuted, you, with me, will find it altogether reasonable to see them repeated here. I have said there: "In fine the whole thing must depend entirely upon solving a given problem artistically, that is to say with an artistic sense of form, with artistic freedom, if possible with artistic effect,—consequently by the restoration of a consistent, organically developed whole. Only so, however critics and historians may think about these questions, can those forgotten works be reinstated in their right. They who have summoned up the spirits of Bach and Handel against such an undertaking, have not been able to unseal those masters' lips, and have only put their own wisdom into their mouth."

Perhaps it will be objected: "The 32nd volume represents only a small part of the great undertaking of the German Handel Society;—the execution of the accompaniment of that volume may, we confess, have its weaknesses; but on the other hand there still remains to us a long series of other issues, of which the piano accompaniments, we hope, may lay claim to more artistic worth."

As it is not in my present purpose to enter into any searching investigations upon this point, I reserve my judgment. The extraordinary services which the editors of the Society in question (of which I esteem it a great honor to myself to be a member) have otherwise done for Handel, and for the correct restoration of his immortal works, are so beyond all doubt, that they cannot be estimated highly enough. But this conviction must not withhold me from opposing principles, which concern not the edition itself, but only its accidents, and which seem to me calculated to render questionable the unalloyed enjoyment of the master's creations.

The editor of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, instead of taking every opportunity to disparage the occasional arrangements (Bearbeitungen) of others, whose only aim has been the promulgation of the Handelian art, would have done better to labor energetically for the banishment of obvious defects in the piano accompaniments of a monumental edition, which should fulfil the highest claims on every side.

Besides, this spiteful grudge against "pitiful elaborations" is wrong for another reason: because we chiefly owe it to their mediation that a number of Handel's Oratorios have become domesticated in Germany: I need only mention the Messiah. Even Mosel's labors, little as I am disposed to defend their regardlessness in some respects, have, resist it as you will, been only beneficial. That the still unarranged Oratorios of Handel—I adduce only such masterworks as Hercules, Semele, Susanna and Theodora—have been so far but little known, is unfortunately a fact that cannot be denied. Nor will it probably be otherwise until arrangements (Bearbeitungen) in the spirit of Mozart and of Mendelssohn become available. If I have deceived myself in this, surely a recantation will not weigh heavily upon my heart.

After these digressions, which in the interest of the cause could not be avoided, I return to my own affairs.

The haughty and averted attitude of my companions in art, the petty opposition of the daily critics, in fine the exasperating suspicions of the historians—all contributed in a short time to the circulation of a variety of unfavorable opinions about my labors, estranging the public from me, and standing badly in the way of an activity but scarce begun.

Then, by a lucky accident, the already mentioned Arias from Handel's Operas fell into my hands, and gave new impulse to my favorite employment. They stood in an old English collection: "Apollo's Feast," which contained the scores of some 400 numbers thereof. With small expectations—for Handel's Operas were in very bad repute—I cast a glance upon the yellowed leaves, but started back as if I were dazzled, when I suddenly found myself in presence of a lyrico dramatic music, for the like of which I had longed in vain for years. Here showed themselves no traces of those externalities, which seem to be inseparably bound in with an energetically progressive action; but the centre of gravity was transferred to the psychological characteristic of the personalities upon the stage. Under such circumstances the music could unfold its whole power unimpeded, and it did honestly its best to give an expression hardly dreamed of to those internal processes. In spite of the homely forms in which most of the Arias presented themselves, there pulsed in every note a rich, individual life, which seemed only waiting for a fit completion (Ausführung) to raise it to still fuller plasticity.

Without a moment's hesitation, I again found myself at work, at first with the restoration of a setting for the piano, which could afterwards, if occasion should require, be worked out without difficulty for the orchestra.

Thus in quick succession 12 Soprano and 12 Alto Arias were ready, to which 12 Duets were soon added. These three collections have already, as you know, appeared in print.

About the musical importance of these works I cannot here enlarge, as this would lie quite outside of the task which I have set myself; suffice it to say that with these, too, the object is to present Handel's high art truly. This art, however, always knows how to penetrate to the very centre of things; therefore in the particular it gives at the same time the universal, in the individual the general. But on achievements of this sort rests the consecration of poetry; in them the holy goddess gains as it were corporeal form.

(To be Continued.)

The Late Mr. Cipriani Potter.

The career of the musician who for so many years was the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, has been but briefly referred to in the obituaries published by our contemporaries, daily and weekly. Born in London in 1792, Mr. Potter died on the 28th ult., in his metropolitan home, at an advanced age, preserving almost to the last his memory, which was well stocked with interesting reminiscences of the age of giants in the musical world. There is now only one professor surviving who can go back to the period of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.—Mr. Charles Neate, who is in his eighty-seventh year, and lives at Brighton. Mr. Cipriani Potter's ancestors were in the profession: one grandfather invented the patent German flute, another grandfather was a celebrated bassoon-player, the teacher of Holmes, who was the Baumann of his epoch. Mr. Potter's father taught him the pianoforte, and Cipriani Potter was a pianist at five years of age. His first master in counterpoint was Thomas Attwood (a pupil of Mozart), organist of St. Paul's, and a composer. Dr. Callcott, the glee writer, and Dr. Crotch, the composer of the oratorio Palestine, also gave lessons to Mr. C. Potter; but he probably owed his skill in pianoforte playing more to the tuition he received for five years from Joseph Woelfl, a pupil of Haydn and Mozart. Woelfl imagined he had reached the climax of digital difficulty when he composed his Non Plus Ultra, for he had not fallen on the fantasia days of Thalberg and his successors and imitators. At fourteen Cipriani Potter was a composer of chamber compositions and of symphonies; he was as early in the field, therefore, as Mendelssohn. Mr. Potter's early leanings towards Beethoven were confirmed by his visit to Vienna, where he studied under Emanuel Forster, the Austrian Kapellmeister. Mr. Potter was not a pupil of Beethoven, as has been erroneously stated, but Beethoven kindly corrected exercises of the young Englishman. Mr. Potter did not forget the great master's attentions to him. In the Musical World, in 1836, then edited by the Novellos, he published an interesting notice of Beethoven and his style, defending him, at the same time, with perhaps more generosity than justice from the charges of moroseness and ill-temper. This critical analysis of Beethoven's specialities, appearing at the same time as a series of admirably written essays on the "Characteristics of Beethoven," by Dr. Gaunlett, materially influenced public opinion. Mr. Potter travelled also in Italy after his sojourn in Vienna. In his early compositions he met with kinder critics in Germany than he did in his own country; but form in Fatherland always goes a long way, whereas here idea is more thought of. Mr. Potter was a master of technicality, but he was not gifted with invention. Although he was not one of the original Masters or Associates of the Philharmonic Society (1813), Mr. Potter soon made his début at its concerts in his own Sestet, and appeared often in subsequent years, being appointed one of the conductors at the time when the direction of the schemes was changed at every concert. Mr. Potter had the credit of introducing many pianoforte concertos of Mozart and Beethoven for the first time in this country. Mr. Potter produced at the Philharmonic Concerts an overture (1816), adagio and rondo (1830), a symphony (1835), a symphony in D (1836), another in the same key (1850), an overture, Cymbeline (1837), another overture (1851), and his Antony and Cleopatra overture (1856). Mr. Potter's last appearance in public was on the 5th of June, 1871, at the sixth Philharmonic Concert, when his Cymbeline overture was performed, and the venerable composer was called for to receive a round of cheering from an auditory in which were comprised many of his old pupils. Dr. Crotch was the first Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, founded in 1823, chiefly through the influence of the late Earl of Westmoreland. Dr. Crotch having resigned in 1832, Mr. Cipriani Potter was selected as his successor, Mr. Lucas being appointed director of the orchestra. Mr. Potter retired from his office in 1859, and was succeeded by the late Mr. Lucas, on whose retirement, in 1866, Sir W. Sterndale Bennett became Principal of the Royal Academy. That Mr. Potter, during the twenty-seven years he was in power, exercised a very powerful influence as a teacher, there can be no doubt; but that he might have accomplished much greater results is equally certain. The fact is, he was no disciplinarian, and his good nature was such that he had not the moral courage to resist the amateur management, which was too long in the ascendant at the Academy. Mr. Potter was born and lived in the days when the power of patronage was greater than it is now. It is quite true that but for the aid and tact of the aristocratic dilettanti the school would have been long since extinct. It was sustained, indeed, for a long period by royalty, rank, and fashion; but the state of music in this country has so advanced that it can only maintain its position by being a great educational establishment for the people. Mr. Potter himself was cognizant of the changes in the times, but his advanced age demanded repose. He had done his work bravely as a musician, if not as an administrator. No man was more loved and esteemed; by his pupils he was idolized. He was generous and considerate towards rising talent; he was no perverse bigot, attaching himself to one school and one name; he was ready and willing and able to recognize ability in every form in which it presented itself. Attached as he was to the old masters, he was the first to admit the claims for consideration of the writers of the modern school; he was not even dismayed at "the music of the future;" his motto was to try all new-comers fairly and dispassionately. To mention that among his pupils were Sir W. Sterndale Bennett, Mr. G. Macfarren, Mr. Brinley Richards, Mr. Madie, Mr. W. Macfarren, Mr. W. H. Holmes, Mr. W. Dorrell, Mr. John Thomas, Mr. C. E. Stephens, Mr. H. C. Banister, Mr. Cousins, Mr. Jewson, Mr. Robert Barnett, C. Pinsuti, Miss Kate Loder (Lady Thompson), Miss Woolf, Mrs. Tom Taylor, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, &c., will suffice to show the results achieved by Mr. Cipriani Potter as a teacher; but the Academy students who in composition and in pianoforte playing derived advantage from his talent and experience form a wide circle at home and abroad.—Athenæum.

Musical Matters in Spain

(From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.)

Spain, with its bright, sunny sky, has produced great poets, but has not been so fruitful in the domain of music. The little it has done in this way does not extend beyond the confines of the country. It is, however, sufficiently remarkable to merit more extensive publicity, were it only on account of its nationally characteristic stamp. It is an undeniable fact that there exists in the Spanish people a great natural aptitude for the Beautiful in art, and, if this aptitude has not been developed as much as could be desired, the fault is attributable partly to the indolence peculiar to the nations of the South, and partly to the want of a more serious artistic impulse. Recently, however, things have taken a highly satisfactory turn in the latter respect. German classic compositions, which, down to 1850, were entirely unknown over the country, and never performed even in the Spanish capital, have opened out a path for themselves, thanks to Quartet Unions, and Grand Concert Associations. A taste for good music has been excited among a certain part of the public, and its increasing success cannot possibly fail to react upon native composers. It is astonishing what a number of amateurs there are in the country; nearly every mechanic knows some instrument or other, and turns his proficiency to account by playing in the theatres, circuses, and military bands. For this reason, the number of professional musicians, properly so-called, is exceedingly limited, because there are so many amateurs, who perform at a very low price. The larger art-institutions at Madrid, such as the Opera Real, the Sociedad de Conciertos, the Summer-Concert Society, in the Buen Retiro Gardens, establishments which, on account of the privileges they enjoy, shirk no expense, are the only ones that can pay the professional musician more remunerative terms. Thus, the lowest salary of violinists at the Opera-house, Madrid, is 150 francs a month; first-class players receive 300 pesetas, while the Grand Paris Opera pays scarcely 120 francs. The active members of the Madrid Sociedad de Conciertos for Classical Music receive from each concert an average price of sixty francs, while Paderloup, in Paris, thinks that sixteen francs is plenty for each "concert and three rehearsals." During the Carnival Season, a small band of seven or eight musicians obtain some 200 to 300 pesetas an evening, while the Parisian purveyors of hall-music, MM. Waldenfel, Strauss, etc., settled the "prix de Paris" for "the whole night" at from 10 to 12 francs a head. To gain such wretched remuneration, there is no need of going to Paris; one may as well stop quietly in Germany. The reason that the professional musicians of Madrid are not victimized by managers is because they form associations among themselves, and conduct their own financial and artistic concerns. Thus the Madrid Sociedad de Conciertos gives its present conductor, Monasterio, only twice as much as a simple member of the band, having discharged its founder and former conductor, the composer, Barbieri, for the purely material reason that he claimed a fifth share. A large place in the Calle Mayor serves the Madrid musicians as a rendezvous every day between one and three in the afternoon. They there form a sort of Musical Exchange, where every one in need of their assistance can find and engage them. If musicians in other capitals were equally practical, and would club together a little more, instead of splitting up into factions, and if, in their enthusiasm for the Ideal, they would not forget quite so much the Material, in art—their state would be the more gracious. The following are the principal associations of this kind in Madrid: the Musical-Artistic Association for Mutual Assistance, with a present annual income of 60,000 reals; and El Fomento de las Artes, founded in the year 1859. The latter called into life the various Madrid choral societies, headed by the Orfeon Artístico-Madrileño, which gets up sacred concerts every year, and the Society of Pianoforte Tuners (I). Pianists, and Musical Professors of both sexes, called La Sin-Par, which tunes pianos for 10 reals (2½ francs), and gives music lessons at proportionately moderate prices. Every musician who takes an active part at concerts or theatrical performances, enjoys in Spain the title of Professor; and Monasterio's grand concert band of 95 professors—probably because many among them exercise at the same time some other "profession." This reminds one of the abuse of the doctor's title in other countries.

Since the year 1831, Madrid has possessed a "Royal Conservatory of Music and Declamation." The first director was Francisco Piernarini, an Italian singing master; Carnicer conducted the classes of composition, and Alheniz those of the piano. Subsequent teachers of composition were the well known Spanish composers, Helarion Eslava, and Emilio Arrieta, the latter having, for the last three years, been director of the institution. Instruction in the violin is entrusted to the skilful hands of Monasterio, founder of the Quartet Society for Classical Chamber Music—which has existed ever since 1862—and the present conductor of the Grand Orchestral Concerts. The vocal department, which formerly turned out some thorough female singers, now constitutes the partie faible of the whole. The magnificent large hall of the Conservatory, where the examinations and the concerts were held, was situated at the back of the Royal Operahouse. On the 20th April, 1867, it fell a prey to the flames, and is still a mass of ruins at the present day. Thanks, however, to the impulse given by the new king, Amadeo, who is fond of music, the hall is shortly to be restored to its former splendor; the preparations have already commenced. The Quartet Concerts take place during the autumn season, in the small hall of the Conservatory, and the grand Spring Orchestral Concerts in the large and elegant Teatro e Circo de Madrid, belonging to Count Rivas, and situate in the promenade of the Prado, always thronged and sparkling with light. The Summer Concerts, conducted this year with the most extraordinary success by the celebrated double-bass player and composer, Bottesini, are like the concerts in the Champs Elysées, Paris, and attract the most fashionable audiences.

The most distinguished art-institution in Spain is the National Operahouse, with a season from October to Easter. It is devoted more especially to the cultivation of Italian music, all the singers being Italians, so that, so far as regards its Italian Stagione, Madrid can enter the lists against the great capitals of Paris, London, and St. Petersburg. The Teatro Nacional del Opra is one of the largest and most magnificent in Europe: it can accommodate about 3000 persons, and the stage is as large as that of the Grand Opera, Paris, if, indeed, it is not wider and higher. The artistic ensemble frequently suffers from the immense proportions of the building. The latter was inaugurated on the 19th November, 1850, with Donizetti's Favorita, the principal artists being Alboni, the celebrated contralto; the tenor, Gardoni; the barytone, Barroilhet; and the bassist, Formes. Among other well-known artists who have appeared there I may mention Mesdames Rosina Penco, Borghi Mamo, Lotti Marchisio, Ortolani Tiberini, Ferni, Carozzi, Sonneri; Signori Rubini, Fraschini, Tamberlick, Graziani, Naudin, Palermo, tenors; Signori Bonnehée, Agnesi, baritones; and Signori Silva, Medini, and Scalone, basses. To these was added last year a young Italianized German tenor from Berlin, Signor Perotti, (Protti), who was eminently successful. For next year, 1871-72, the following artists have been engaged: sopranos, Ortolani Tiberini, Urban, Wizack, Fiando; contraltos, Caracciolo, Bernardoni; tenors, Pozzo, Piccoli, Tamberlick (who will return in February from Mexico and the Havannas), Tiberini, Fabbri; baritones, Quintelli, Squarzia, Galassi; basses, Petit, Capponi, and Becerra. The conductor is the same as last year, namely, M. Skoczodopole, from the Italian Opera, Paris, now temporarily closed. The orchestra will number 90 "professors," and the chorus ninety singers, male and female, while there will be thirty fair members of the corps de ballet. For the month of March, the management promise Nilsson and Adeline Patti—if nothing happens to prevent it. The operas to be produced are: Il Conte Ory; Dinorah; L'Ombre (Flotow's new opera); Jone; Il Bravo; Marino Faliero, as novelties; L'Ebreu; Roberto il Diavolo; Mathilde di Saba; Il Nuovo Mosè; Don Giovanni; Gli Ugonotti; Un Ballo in Maschera; Saffo; Il Profeta; Marin di Rohan; Faust; La Favorita; L'Africaine. Meyerbeer is satisfactorily represented in this list by his principal works; what is wanted at the Spanish National Opera is—Spanish National Opera.

We may state that the three principal music-sellers in Madrid are Messrs. Romero, Eslava, and Martin, who live on the wholesale piracy of foreign works and arrangements, Spanish Zarzuelas, and Offenbach's operas. A few years ago a Gazeta Musical de Madrid was published, but it soon died for want of support. The only art-paper now existing is the Entre-Act, published by a theatrical Agent of the name of Aranjó. The more eminent Spanish composers of the present day are Messrs. Eslava, Arrieta, Barbieri, Budrid, and Gastambeda. Eslava, as director of the old Chapel Royal, wrote many sacred works considered in Spain masterpieces of their kind. It is true that the Spanish have not had an opportunity of hearing the works of Beethoven, Cherubini, Mozart, and Bach in their churches. But they have had all the more Italian operatic music.

A. V. CZESKE.

Opera in Paris.

PARIS, FRIDAY, OCT. 27, 1871.

A short time since Paris was excited over the welcome announcement that the Grand Opera was open for a brief Autumn season, and with a new work which had been completed since the siege, by a well-known and popular author.

It is not easy to describe all that such an announcement means in the French capital, where not only the musical world is on the lookout for something new, but where a score or more of critics and a round dozen of "Mondayists" are constantly searching for some topic upon which they can display their versatile talents, and give the world a specimen of ce que c'est que de l'opéra.

For some time there had been rumors of something to come—something out of the common order of things, and which was to take the wind out of the sails of Messrs. Offenbach, Meilhac, Halévy & Co., and it was with a flutter of pleasure, therefore, that the world saw the blank walls of Paris ornamented with the vast placards announcing the speedy appearance of "Erostrate," by M. Ernest Reyer. The author was well known, indeed. Already he had given to the public one or two successful pieces, and upon the strength of this had set himself up as a musical critic, able to hold his head as high as "any other man," whether he wrote every day in the week, or drew a magnificent salary for giving his opinion upon music and the drama in a Monday feuilleton. M. Reyer felt himself of the first force in his speciality, and equal to any Jules Janin quelconque. From there he was promoted to the political columns, and wrote leaders which Les Débats took the trouble to notice.

In a word, M. Reyer became a journalist of Parisian merit and was greatly respected by his confreres. Like every man who is anything, he had dealt sledge-hammer blows upon the head of Wagner, had pointed out Mozart's fault in Melody, crushed poor Verdi for his fondness for noise, praised Auber and Rossini, of course, and found something to admire in the music of Gluck. Best of all, skeptic impresarios had a wholesome fear of M. Reyer's displeasure, and dared spare no expense for the mise en scène. Under such circumstances, could there be a doubt about the success of "Erostrate?"

The Lundi-ists were said to have written favorable articles in advance, and all ready for the finishing touches after the opening night. The very name attracted the curious and, on getting an explanation of it, the crowd pictured a grand stage incendiary, grander than that of the "Last Days of Pompeii," or of "Les Huguenots." At this point permit me to speak of another case similar in most of the details, and a work which came before the public under parallel auspices. When Wm. Henry Fry brought out his "Leonora," every one supposed that the critics were all right in advance, and that there could be no doubt of success.

There are many points of similarity between M. Reyer and Mr. Fry—between "Erostrate" and "Leonora." Both men were writers of great ability and musicians of talent; both men, without intending to do so, borrowed largely from standard works. Both operas have bits of delicious music, and both, as a whole, give us repeated suspicions that, somehow or somewhere, we have heard all that before. We are often puzzled to know the exact source of the inspiration, but the suspicion is always there. A few hours' study over the score brings up the gems of several composers. In short, both operas met the same fate, for the work of M. Reyer was received with frigid silence.

Like Wm. Henry Fry, Ernest Reyer found that he had counted too much upon the good-will of his fellow journalists. The opera was applauded in a sort of half-way wondering manner, and as if in anticipation of the fine thing to come, but which did not come. When the curtain fell, everybody rose to ask if that was all, and with a puzzled air to demand what it was all about. The next day only the notices which were in type "before the fact" appeared in the journals. The next there were some words of doubt. The next some one spoke out his mind, and then the whole pack came down upon poor Reyer in the most unmerciful manner. Meantime the manager had withdrawn the piece, saying that it did not draw sufficiently well, and had not come up to his expectations.

Now, we may ask, why did "Erostrate" fail? When I say it failed I use the right word, for the opera is dead beyond all hope of resurrection. The reason given by the cashier of the opera is that after two representations it did not draw well enough to guarantee a third. That is forcible; but there must be some reasons behind that. In the first place the actors did badly. The prima donna went through her role as if bored to death by it and only anxious to get out for a supper at Brebant's. The house was filled with dead heads, who refused to applaud like dead heads. And the critics say that the music is not original though extremely diavres, and that it is a cross between Offenbach and Gluck. Other critics give other authors. All say that it is a potpourri of plagiarism in which the author has tried to break away from established forms and to produce effect by startling surprises rather than by classic method, taste or melody. But even in these surprises there was monotony, and that is a quality a Parisian audience will never pardon. My own opinion is that, like "Leonora," "Erostrate" has not had a "fair showing," but at the same time neither, probably, could be brought out successfully, under the best of circumstances, beside the works they now have to rival.—ASHBY.—N. Y. Tribune.

Tausien-ism.

(Translated for this Journal from the New York Musik-Zeitung, by R. St. L.)

"The grave of the great Mongolian artist Tausien is overshadowed by a great tree; the natives chew the leaves of this tree, to make their voices strong and melodious." Thus, if I am not mistaken, Ambros reports in the first volume of his history of music. Since no further mention is made of the leaves,—their containing sugar for instance, or any medicinal properties,—it is plain that we have here but one of those innumerable forms in which superstition manifests itself. For superstition is inextinguishable, it will go with the last mortal to his grave. The leaves of the Mongolian tree, and those who believe in their virtues, flourish among us too, flourish everywhere! Amulet, talisman, ribbons and leaves, chips from the Luther-bench, a clipping from the coat of a great or even only celebrated man, a blade from the turf of his grave, and a thousand other similar things, bear witness that superstition has taken root in the mind of man for all coming time. We are all of us superstitious, there is only a difference of form. It is not my intention, however, to write a philosophical treatise; I only desire to examine as kindly and as cheerfully as possible, whether, and to what extent musicians suffer from "Tausienism." Let me remark first, that unless particular circumstances favor an epidemic spread of the disease, composers; tone-poets chiefly, are afflicted with "Tausienism." And with what force does it seize upon them!—Yet let me first go back a step, by asking, what is creation?—The definition from the catechism,—The bringing forth of something from nothing, is evidently not applicable where human action is concerned; here we must say, according to the proverb, nothing can come of nothing. The artist creates his work in accordance with some inner image,—which, however, if we look very close, is again woven of threads indissolubly connected with the outer world,—clothing it in words, in marble, in tones, colors, etc. There is needful for this, beside the natural bent, (talent, genius), without which nothing will be produced, the also indispensable technical skill, and finally a third, certainly no less important matter, the disposition!—When that is wanting, even the master finds but slowly what he requires,—he chews his pen-holder, studies the clouds, or the pattern of his wall-paper,—Schiller, it is said, used to draw little horses, and other nonsense,—and at length gives up the useless attempt. And an hour later, perhaps, the "spring of invention,"—this is the term, I believe,—bubbles up so plentifully, that it is scarcely possible to shut in the rich blessing between the staves. (Let me here remark, that there is no lack of those either, whose "spring" resembles an aqueduct,—a slight pressure, and for days, weeks and months, an even stream flows forth,—nothing but happy reminiscence, self-satisfied plagiarism, theft,—and whatever else the "annexation-music" may be called. Those fortunate beings are always "disposed," and therefore completely proof against "Tausienism." How now is this disposition to be brought about? If we believe people of the stamp of Ravi, Polka, their numerous imitators, and the innumerable credulous readers of moon-shiny fables, composers must suffer the flowerets to shed their perfume round about them, the starlets to shine upon them, the brooklets to murmur, and the evening breezes to whisper around them,—in order then to drop the most magnificent and immortal works "from their sleeves,"—as the Germans have it,—and their pens. A few may perhaps have succeeded thus, and still succeed; many have tried the experiment, and,—caught severe colds!—If we muster the lists of celebrated composers, and ask of each singly what means he adopted in a long continued draught, we shall receive most varied answers, and to imitators,—always the class most numerously represented in the school of life,—there opens a refreshing prospect of every manner of possibilities. Handel went for needful inspiration to graveyards, to the silent corners of solitary churches. Of Gluck it is said that, occupied with the composition of an opera, and requiring fresh air and sunshine, he had his piano carried out upon a field. Air, light, and verdure did not suffice; however, and it is recorded that two bottles of Champagne lent their assistance. Thus,—I shall not vouch for the truth of the story,—Gluck wrote his reformatory works. Lully labored like a feeble amateur. He sat down at the piano with his snuff-box, and sang and played, till by means of trying here and there, up and down, he fancied he had discovered the most suitable melody; this discovery he then communicated to some subordinate, who wrote down the dictation, and that was the end of it. Sarti required a large, dark room, even at night but feebly lit up,—his musical ideas came to him only in the stillness of night. Of Spontini too, I somewhere read, that he was able to compose only in the dark. Cimarosa wanted noise about him, he liked best to work in merry company. Salieri, to excite his fancy, strolled about in the most frequented streets, eating bon-bons, with lead-pencil and paper in his hand, to be ready when the occasion offered. Paër composed, chatted, scolded, disputed, all in one. Saschini felt himself incapable of getting a melody, unless he was with his lady-love, and had his little kittens about him. Alex. Fesca, if one may lend faith to eyewitnesses, resorted to similar means,—the bottle served him in place of a lady-love, and for kittens he tried to procure a little dog! Paisiello remained in bed, when he intended composing,—a cheap, practical means, as trustworthy contemporaries have assured me,—it saves clothing, fuel, etc. Zingarelli, before sitting down at the piano to compose, read a few pages of a Latin poet; then, however, he worked so easily that he was able to write in four hours,—four hours, I say!—a whole act of "Romeo and Juliet!" When Father Haydn could not get along, he would take his rosary, and say a few Aves, and generally inspiration returned. In another place I read,—probably of his later years,—Haydn sat quietly down in a chair, but he must have upon his finger the ring Frederick the Great had once given him! In London, however, even this expedient seems to have proved unavailing, for we have a report that once the master had no inspiration left at all; for two weeks he vainly tortured himself to get an appropriate continuation to the first eight bars of an Andante. It is well known that it has been thought some connection existed between Mozart's fondness for billiards and ten pins, and his musical disposition! Beethoven went out into the open air, into the magnificence and solitude of nature. Méhul was a lover of flowers, and liked to sojourn in pretty gardens. Mendelssohn, it is said, always had bouquets on his desk. Halévy required the sound of boiling water, to become "disposed." Auber, a good rider, mounted his horse in order to gain the romantic country, where the artist finds everything he needs,—formerly, perhaps!—in later years, when the celebrated composer was an old, a very old gentleman, he probably composed his operas on foot. François Hünten felt most inspired for composition in autumn. He walked up and down in his room, catching flies,—no very difficult task at that season of the year,—and thus were produced more than two hundred compositions, the greater part of which might at one time be found on every piano,—long enough ago, it is true!

It were an endless task, were we to attempt to record all the various means and expedients resorted to by "indisposed" composers. Yet "Tausienism" has victims in other departments of art, too. It is reported of Schiller that he was obliged to have the smell of half decayed apples near him, in order to be able to work, and that strong, black coffee was indispensable to him. At times even dilettantism succumbs to the disease. When Liszt, nearly thirty years ago, made his journeys of conquest through the musical world, enthusiastic ladies carefully collected the remnants of the piano strings that had given up their melodious ghost under the hands of the virtuoso. The ends and pieces of these unfortunates were set in rings, and the ladies fancied it could not but be very advantageous to play études, schools of velocity, Gradius ad Par-nassum, etc., with such a ring on. Whether this ingenious means proved effective, whether it made the touch firm, the wrist pliant, or perhaps even influenced the "understanding," is not on record. To-day we smile at those amiable follies, the world has grown calmer since then, dilettantism no longer aspires to climb the higher and highest grades of perfection,—why, far down below it is very pleasant too! And young artists of to-day, hold the sound view that "stiff," daily, six-hour practicing, is the only effective means of progress. They no longer believe in magic and sympathy,—but composers!—what might not be told of them!—but enough for this time.

W. TAPPERT.

A. W. Thayer's Life of Beethoven.

The second volume of the long promised work, which will probably extend to four volumes, has just appeared in Berlin,—in the German language, like the first. When the work is complete it will appear also in English. We translate from the Neue Freie Presse, of Vienna, Oct. 31, the following appreciative notice of the volume by one of the very foremost musical critics of Germany, Dr. EDWARD HANSLICK.

The second volume of THAYER's Beethoven biography has just made its appearance,—six years after the publication of the first. In conscientiousness of research the continuation is equal to the beginning; in richness of matter it surpasses it. Thayer has got command of an astonishing amount of material for his labor; he has examined every note and slip of paper, has searched through every newspaper, and traced back every tradition. The minuteness with which he explains single, often rather unimportant points, fortunately is always limited to matters of fact; to mere phrase he does not grant a single line.

The second volume treats of the period from 1796 to 1806,—only ten years. That the author has discovered much of importance that is new about this period from the 26th to the 36th year of Beethoven's life, cannot be maintained. The principal matters are thoroughly familiar, and about many parts, for instance, Beethoven's love experiences, the reader who is eager for new information must content himself with meagre results. But even here, where Thayer's research has yielded little that was tangible, the method of his search remains of great worth. With an exactness which reminds one of the inquiries in natural science and philology, but which was first introduced into musical history by Jahn, Thayer completely separates accredited fact from what is merely probable or possible. Where any residue remains to baffle search or proof, Thayer does not seek to save himself in fantastical combinations, but says roundly: That is not known. If the light of this inquirer had achieved nothing else, but to scatter the mists which credulous tradition or romantic book-making had piled up about certain experiences of Beethoven, we should be obliged to rate its merit very high. But a little over 40 years have passed since Beethoven's death; there are still living not a few men who have known the master; and yet already myths have formed themselves about him, fables have fastened on him, which it grows every day more difficult to put aside. To these belongs particularly Beethoven's attachment to the young countess Julia Guicciardi (afterwards married as the Countess Gallenberg.) All the biographers, blindly following the lead of Schindler, have attached an extraordinary consequence to this tender relation and, by romantic additions, have gradually swelled it into a complete tragedy. An unimpeachable piece of evidence of this "unhappy passion" has been until now a letter found after his death in Beethoven's writing desk, with two postscripts, written with a lead pencil on two pieces of letter paper, which do not name the place, or year, or person to whom they are addressed. This was the original of the famous "three letters of Beethoven from a Hungarian watering place to his beloved Julia von Guicciardi," published by Schind-ler. Although there was no ground at all for the assumption that these letters were intended for the Countess Guicciardi, yet on the mere giving out of Schindler it has been considered now for more than thirty years as an incontestable truth. Thayer now brings convincing proofs to show, that the "three letters" could not have been addressed to Julia at all! "So all those who with tears of sympathy have seen these Sorrows of Werther, occasioned by this Charlotte, may now dry their tears. They can quiet themselves with the assurance, that the catastrophe was by no means so unfortunate as it has been represented." When Julia, two years after becoming acquainted with Beethoven, married Count Gallenberg (1803) the despised lover, true to the principle which he expressed to Zmeskill: "One cannot quarrel with what is not to be changed," put a good face on his misfortune and went to work to finish the Heroic Symphony.—Also the anecdote that Beethoven, from grief at Julia's inconstancy, tried to die of hunger in the garden of the Erdödy palace, is continually repeated on mere hearsay, without the remotest ground for connecting that (in itself very improbable) suicidal attempt with the Guicciardi affair. Thayer, on the strength of pains-taking, conscientious investigations, is able to characterize the whole mass of fustian eloquence that has been wasted on this love story "with one word as silly talk."

Of course the sentimental Beethoven critics, who hear the grass of their interpretation growing out of every note, do not like to be deprived of the idea, that the opera "Leonora" ("Fidelio") stands in close connection with that story of Beethoven's love, and that the most beautiful passages in it are direct effusions of his feeling for Julia. But Beethoven's complete sketch book for "Leonora" shows, that every number, from the first to the last, was the slow result of persevering labor and unwearied study. "Had this opera," Thayer adds, "been the single grand exception in a long series of mediocre dramatic compositions, then one could suspect that it was the product of a sudden, isolated inspiration, the effect of love. But in reality Beethoven's genius and his creative talent stood too high, to make it necessary for us to refer the origin of the beautiful music in any of his works to any supposed special causes." This sentence is the best proof of the correct feeling which guides the author even in his judgment upon matters purely musical.

The impartiality of judgment which Thayer maintains, with all his veneration for his hero, shows itself also in his frank and striking description of Beethoven's character. A faithful and exhaustive portrait of Beethoven as a man would, according to Thayer's statements, form an almost laughable contrast to that which is commonly regarded as the right one. Our present age must be content to find in Beethoven, with all his greatness, an altogether human nature, which, if it was endowed with uncommon powers, compels us at the same time on the other side to recognize uncommon weaknesses. It was the great misfortune of Beethoven's youth, seeing that his good and bad tendencies by nature were extremely strong and lively, that he did not grow up under the influence of a wise and strict parental discipline, and that he was not early led into that habit of self-control, which, when once established, reforms and purifies the character. In all relations the consequences of a defective early moral training accompanied Beethoven through his whole life, and are visible in the frequent conflict between his worse and better nature and in his constant tendency to extremes. To-day he falls into immoderate rage about perhaps some very trifling matter; tomorrow his remorse by far exceeds the measure of his fault. To-day he is proud, self-willed, offensive, careless as it regards the claims which society admits in persons of high rank; tomorrow his submissiveness is even greater than the circumstances demand. With these remarks the author is disposed to represent Beethoven's faults as nothing else but disagreeable and sad episodes in the general course of his life. In view of the efforts of other biographers, who glorify Beethoven into a perfect ideal of humanity, it was a necessity also to name and to explain his faults. For the same reason we respect the honest statement of the author, that, after the study of some 800 of Beethoven's letters, "the utter insignificance" of by far the greatest part of them surprised him. To be sure it is not Beethoven's fault that later biographers have thought it their duty to immortalize every one of these mere notes.

A pleasant impression is made also by Thayer's impartiality in judging of the two brothers of Beethoven, who in all preceding biographies have figured as a pair of devils. By no means can or will the author excite in us a very high conception of their character. "But, as little as Beethoven was a pattern of goodness, so little were his brothers horrible examples of injustice." Thayer shows that Ries as well as Schindler wrote under the influence of strong personal aversion to these brothers, and that Carl particularly, whom they reproach with presumptuous interference in Beethoven's affairs, had done him valuable service as a competent and trusted business manager. It may also be maintained with confidence, that Beethoven from the year 1800 was freed from every care for the support of Carl or Johann.

Thoroughly interesting are Thayer's researches about the first performances of "Fidelio" in the Theater an der Wien, and new among them are the communications of the tenor Röckel, the Florestan of the year 1806, who died a short time since at an advanced age. That the public should have been at first more surprised than delighted by this opera, Thayer finds no difficulty in understanding. "The Overture in the first place," he says, "was too new in its form, too powerful in its ideas, to be immediately understood; and in the year 1806 there was perhaps no public in all Europe in a condition to find in the fire and deep expression of the principal vocal numbers any compensation for the superficial grace and the melodious charm of the favorite operas of the day—qualities which to most people would seem wanting in Fidelio." Even Cherubini declared of the Overture, that, on account of its variety of modulations, he was unable to discover the principal key. Moreover Thayer, in vindication of the honor of the much maligned Vienna public, adduces many facts which fully support my own efforts in the same behalf in my "History of Concerts in Vienna." Thayer establishes the fact, "that in Vienna the works of no other composer of the younger generation found such rapid and extensive sale as those of Beethoven." Very early had their wide spread popularity become recognized in a way without example in the German periodical press, particularly through a complete classified catalogue of the "Works of Herr Ludwig van Beethoven," published in the Wiener Zeitung of June 30, 1805. Then already Beethoven was everywhere placed in the same rank only with Mozart and Haydn; "the unknown pupil,—who came to Vienna in 1792, was in the year 1804 a universally acknowledged member of the great triumvirate."

Nilsson in "Mignon."

[From the New York Tribune.]

The opera of "Mignon" may be said to be founded indeed upon the favorite character of Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister," yet the librettists, M.M. Carré and Barbier, have taken little from the original story except the names of a few principal characters and a faint outline of one or two leading incidents. The work of the great German poet and philosopher would seem to offer no particular attractions to the maker of an opera book. Neither its plot nor any of its episodes can be called dramatic; the poetical beauty of Mignon is too fine for stage representation, and the sentiment of the story is too deep to be expressed in theatrical action. Yet M.M. Carré and Barbier have made an effective and graceful story, whose resemblance to the original, though not strong, is at least recognizable. It was Ary Scheffer, who showed them how to do it, just as he showed the same writers how to create a new Margaret for M. Gounod's "Faust." It is Scheffer's, not Goethe's Margaret whom we saw in the opera last Monday. It was Scheffer's, not Goethe's Mignon, who was presented to us last night. Everybody knows the three scenes in which the artist has depicted the child-heroine; the pensive little figure of the bare-foot street-dancer, thinking of her native country, singing perchance those exquisite verses, "Kennst Du das Land?" the group wherein Mignon stands at the knees of the old harper; and the tableau in which the girl with clasped hands and attitude of aspiration looks upward while the light of another life falls upon her face. It is upon these three pictures that the opera has been constructed. They do not show us, of course, the true Mignon, "daughter of enthusiasm, rapture, passion and despair;" but a wayward, yet graceful, sentimental, prematurely old child, developing into a tender woman. Goethe's Mignon, so spiritual and yet so very human, so perverse and yet so loving, dies through the very intensity of her affection, and when she passes out of the pages of the book she leaves a void in the reader's heart which none of the other personages can fill. The pathos of this ending is all missed in the opera, which finishes with the union of Mignon and Guglielmo, and the Harper's recognition of his daughter; and though the exquisite art of the actress conveyed last night the idea that the hand of death had fallen upon the girl in her hour of happiness, this interpretation was not indicated—if indeed it was even justified—by the text. It is not worth while, however, to vex ourselves over the ruin of a poem which would not have suited Ambroise Thomas, nor perhaps any other writer for the lyric stage. Though the Mignon whom we have is not the mysterious ideal of the novelist, she is still a charming and loveable creation. Though the story is marred in some of its finest aspects, the plot is not a bad one, and at least may remind us of its poetical origin. The character of the old Harper, upon whom the librettists have bestowed the name of Lothario, given by Goethe to a very different personage in the novel, is much better preserved than that of Mignon, and serves as an admirable foil to the delicacy of the young girl. The fascinating, lively, and heartless Philina is hardly at all changed; and Wilhelm Meister, under the name of Guglielmo, loves and wavers, and succumbs to the blandishments of the sex in the opera as he does in the story. The page, Frederick, and the actor, Larles, appear in subordinate capacities, but display no individuality.

The work was first presented at the Opera Comique, in Paris, in November, 1866. It was given, of course, in French, with spoken dialogue. The Italian translation by Zaffra was afterward arranged by M. Thomas for Drury Lane, where Nilsson, Faure, Bettini, Volpini, and Trebelli-Bettini took the principal roles. Recitatives were substituted by the composer for the spoken portions. A second stanza was added for M. Faure to Lothario's andante in the first scene; an air was introduced for Filina (Mme. Volpini); and a rondo-gavotte for Federigo (Mme. Trebelli-Bettini) was borrowed from the familiar intermezzo preceding the Second Act. This Italian version was the one presented by Mr. Strakosch last night. The additional airs were omitted, except Federigo's, which was given in an abridged form. The rest of the opera was very little cut. M. Thomas has followed his book-makers rather than Goethe. His music never suggests the depth of Goethe, or the strong passion of the real Mignon. It is labored without being profound, and delicate without being highly emotional. Much of the same sort of grace which distinguishes Gounod is observable in Ambroise Thomas; but we miss in "Mignon" the tenderness and spontaneous feeling which were admired so justly in "Faust," and for the want of which the freshness and elegance of the present work cannot wholly make amends. The score abounds in delicious phrases, but most of them are only fragments, for there is little flow of melody. The orchestration is not rich, but it is surprisingly refined. Of the separate numbers, the best known is the popular Polonaise, given to Filina, and recurring in snatches and suggestions all through the work. There is a hint of it in the exquisite Duet of the swallows, between Mignon and Lothario near the end of the First Act—one of the earliest glimpses afforded us of that rare sense of the lighter beauties of art which is the principal charm of Ambroise Thomas's music. Much better and more characteristic, however, than the Polonaise is Mignon's song, "Non conosco il bel suol?"—the famous Kennst Du das Land.

This is true poetry; not indeed an adequate interpretation in music of the thought which Goethe here expressed in words, but a genuine heartfelt song, for having which the world is richer. There is pathos likewise in Mignon's duet with Lothario, "Sofferto hai tu?" and in Guglielmo's "Addio Mignon!" while almost the whole of the last Act is at once sentimental and dramatic in the highest degree. The long trio between Mignon, Guglielmo, Lothario, which brings the opera to a close, is a superb specimen of dramatic music.

Miss Nilsson's Mignon is unquestionably one of the most striking of her personations, even if it is not one of the best. Every scene gives her an admirable opportunity for the display of her best characteristics. She is willful, impulsive, not very passionate—but affectionate and tender. With it all there is about her the same soft atmosphere of melancholy that is diffused around the pictures of Ary Scheffer, and in her voice there is the plaintive and pensive tone which we instinctively associate with the Mignon best known to the multitude. Add to this that the part abounds in variety of situations, and presents the prima donna in the most picturesque aspects, and it will readily be understood that Miss Nilsson makes this part extraordinarily attractive. Mlle. Leon Duval was well cast in the role of Filina—and it is the first time she has been heard to advantage since she came to this country. She made an excellent impression both by her singing and her personal appearance. M. Jamet's Lothario was admirable, nobly acted, and well sung. The Guglielmo of M. Capoul offers no excuse for extended criticism. Indeed, the composer has made the role singularly uninteresting, and such as it is M. Capoul does not exactly fit it. Miss Ronconi was the Federigo and Mr. Lyall the Laerte, both being weak but well meaning. The opera is well mounted. There is some new scenery, and there are new dresses, and the stage is more carefully set than we have ever seen it before under Mr. Strakosch's management. The conflagration scene, however, was shabby, and a great deal of irreverent laughter was excited by the behavior of a corps of supernumeraries who ran three times into the burning building, and out again by the back way, coming up fresh from the opposite side, with a faint pretext of being three different gangs. They carried into the midst of the flames a step ladder, a coil of rope, a number of tomahawks, and a barrel apparently containing gunpowder; and at last stood patiently and roasted to death in full sight of the audience.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 2, 1871.

The Oratorios.

SATURDAY EVENING, NOV. 26.—ELIJAH.

Never was seen a finer audience, in character or numbers, in the Boston Music Hall, confronted by a nobler, more complete array of musical forces, than that evening. The promise of the occasion was unprecedented, and the fulfilment likewise. To hear Elijah sung by such sterling, honest artists as Mr. Dolby has brought over to us from England, supported in the choruses by our Handel and Haydn Society at its best, was something to raise expectation to a high pitch indeed. Everybody knew that the old Society, of late grown young in spirit and in large part replenished with young voices, could sing Elijah well; it was famed for that even before its greatest triumph in the triennial Festival last May. It is a little strange therefore, and shows how great exceptional occasions, by their manifold distractions and excitement, may disturb the sphere of sure habitual performance, that the chorus work that night, never before, began badly. After Mr. SANTLEY's grand announcement of the Prophet's message, and after the stubborn music of the overture had spent itself in a manner quite suggestive of the spirit of the Jews, it was ominous to find the great chorus wavering particularly so in the choral recitative: "The deeps afford no water." The nervousness however was but momentary, and nearly all went worthily and grandly after that. Every member of the chorus, —five or six hundred in number at the least—seemed inspired by the presence of the distinguished solo artists. Several of the most difficult and greatest choruses never were sung here quite so well before. Even of the Society's famous cheval de bataille, the "Rain" Chorus, we may say that; in massive energy and volume, in precision, spirit and expression, it was transporting and sublime. And never before, here or anywhere, have we heard "Behold! God the Lord passed by" rendered with such graphic light and shade and certainty of outline. So too the "Baal" choruses, and all the short dramatic answering passages, as well as those great broad, even surfaces of rich, deep religious harmony. It grew better and better as the work—say rather the spontaneous outflow of feeling, and of music from within—went on. The orchestra, too, with Mr. EICHBERG heading the violins, brought out the meaning and the beauty of the full fraught instrumentation with more sympathetic verve and delicacy than we remember here before. Some of the obbligato solo bits, as of Mr. HART-DEGEN's cello in "It is enough," Mr. KUTZLER's oboe here and there, were noticeably fine. The great organ, also, under Mr. LANG's hands, supplied a grand uplifting base to the whole musical pyramid of tone. Mr. ZERRAHN's commanding power as a Conductor never was more unmistakably apparent; all moved as one, obedient to his intention.

—And now to the chief singers. We risk no contradiction when we say that so satisfactory a quartet was never heard here in an Oratorio. These artists, one and all, more than confirmed the good impression they had made here in their "Ballad Concerts." Their thoroughly artistic demeanor, simple, dignified and earnest, showing a sincere respect for their task and for their audience, bespeaking attention for the music more than for themselves; their conscientious, honest treatment of the music; their unaffected fervor, chastened by true intelligence and faithful study; their truth to every shade and contrast of expression, added to ripe and finished style and the possession of voices of rare power and beauty admirably trained, make them a model for our singers. Such examples are worth whole courses of instruction,—far more instructive really than most such courses, because not misleading, vague, bewildering. At any rate our singers may here learn, if not technical art and method, at least artistic spirit and behavior; they may bear away an ideal in their minds and hearts to warn them henceforth against any violation of the simple piety of Art.

To begin with the Soprano, a truer, sweeter exponent of Oratorio music than Miss EDITH WYNNE we cannot wish to hear. There are greater voices, of more power and volume, more brilliancy, more queen-like majesty, but few that are so sweet, so pure, so womanly human, and trained withal to such easy, even flexibility, such exquisite expression. All that we have said before of her artistic purity, "unstained of the world," her earnest dedication of herself to the expression of the music, her unerring sense of fitness and proportion and her uniformly right conception, and of the charm with which honest intention and exertion on her part are always blessed, must now be clear to all who heard her in Elijah, whether in the scene of the afflicted mother with the Prophet, which she made so touching and ideal (more so perhaps than any one we ever heard except Mme. Goldschmidt); or in the crystal-clear high recitative of the boy sent out to look for sign of rain; or in the great air "Hear ye, Israel;" or in the Angel Trio and the Quartets, and particularly in the sublime "Holy, holy" of the Seraphim, where, as indeed wherever it was really required, the sweet and slender voice found for the nonce a searching, thrilling power of tone that seemed to be inspired by the singer's soul creating for itself an organ.

Mme. PATEY, with less experience, perhaps less genius, also gave herself, her whole generous nature, and rich, generous voice, with genuine fervor to the expression of the contralto music. "Woe unto them" and still more "O rest in the Lord" (which had to be repeated), were nobly, beautifully rendered. This singer has from the first taken a deep hold upon the sympathies of our musical public.

Mr. CUMMINGS was in excellent voice, and delivered all the tenor recitatives and airs with that refinement, that intelligence and conscientious earnestness, which always characterize his efforts. "If with all your hearts" and "Then shall the righteous shine," were rarely sung more musically, with more true style and feeling.

Mr. SANTLEY's rendering of the great part of Elijah was all, and more than all, that was anticipated; and that is saying a great deal. The wealth and beauty and endurance of his magnificent voice, which gives itself out so freely, yet always has power in reserve; his frank and manly presence and whole way of doing things; his thoroughly self-poised and easy manner of approaching and of carrying through whatever vocal task; the perfect union in him of natural gift, artistic training, clear intelligence and healthy genuine feeling, make him the noblest interpreter that one could wish for such exacting music. He was equal to every variety of expression called for by the part. In the dialogues and recitatives nothing could be more dignified and full of unctious than his delivery. His rendering of the almost impossible, the iron air: "Is not his word like a fire" was a new revelation of unflagging vocal valor and endurance. Every note was surely taken; every accent truly marked, magnetic; every phrase precisely chiselled out; no faltering or nervous hurry in the even progress of the whole, and yet there was power left for a magnificent blaze of splendor at the end. We have heard the original Elijah, Mr. Weiss, sing this in London; but Santley verily is greater. In the profoundly touching air "It is enough," and in "For the mountains shall depart," the feeling of the music was brought out as we never heard before in Mr. Santley's rich and sympathetic tones.

We have only to add that all the concerted pieces, the quartets, the double quartet (Mr. PATEY supplying all of voice or style that is required in the bass part), the Angel Trio (in which the middle part, sung by a lady of the Society, well sustained its share), and the Duet: "Zion spreadeth her hands" (most sweetly sung by Miss Wynne and Mme. Patey), were uncommonly successful. The choral: "Cast thy burden on the Lord" was simply perfect and had to be repeated.—Such a performance of Elijah is an experience not to be forgotten in our lives.

SUNDAY EVENING.—JUDAS MACCABEUS.

Handel's heroic Oratorio is a very different matter from Elijah; less well known here and less popular, partly because of its quaint antique cut and want of the modern sensuous instrumentation, partly because of its many difficulties, which, familiar as it has been in some sense for many years, have never fairly been surmounted until now. Had such a performance as that of Sunday evening been anticipated, there hardly would have been so great a falling off of audience. The work is full of beauties, particularly in its great variety of solos, which only needed these interpreters to make their beauty felt. The choruses, too, are full of fresh life and power, each characteristic and unlike the others, and some of them (like "Hear us, O Lord," and "Tune your harps") rare models of expressive counterpoint. The chorus singing this time was more uniformly excellent than in Elijah. Of the solos, both air and recitative, several most beautiful ones were given which seldom or never had been heard here before. The burden principally falls on the soprano and the tenor. For the tenor especially few oratorios can be more trying; and Mr. CUMMINGS, though his delicate voice showed symptoms of fatigue at times, achieved the task with spirit and expression. "Sound an alarm" was done even better than at the Festival, and the way in which he grappled with that most difficult air: "How vain is man," which we think no one has attempted here before, proved him a thorough artist. In "Call forth thy powers," too, he was masterly.

To Miss EDITH WYNNE belong, however, the finer triumphs of the evening; so fully did she reproduce the spirit of each melody, and each so individual, that she won all hearts to Handel and herself. She gave new charm and quaintness to "Pious orgies." The lovely air "O Liberty!" with violoncello, (commonly omitted) could not have been more lovingly and exquisitely sung; and the words: "Bless him, Jehovah, bless him" in the preceding recitative were touched with tenderest and truest feeling. "From mighty kings" was splendidly delivered. The long roulades of "So shall the lute" were evenly and smoothly executed, although she has not the ong breath of certain singers. But throughout all she sang there was the same devotion, the same artistic finish and integrity, which we have learned always to associate with her.

Mme. PATEY's part was small, mostly confined to the melodious duets with the Soprano, which were never more enjoyed. Nor had Mr. SANTLEY by any means a great part, but of what there was he made the most. The recitative: "I feel the Deity within" and air: "Arm, arm, ye brave," were most inspiring; and in "The Lord worketh wonders" we had an instance of that self-possessed and steady movement through long stretches of most difficult roulades, which we have hardly found in any other singer in the same degree. And how he shades the tone to every meaning, as in the words: "And still as He thunders, is fearful in praise!" We might object, in all these artists, conscientious toward their music as they are, even once or twice to the Soprano, that they cannot end an air as it is written, but must "make effect" with a high tone or some form of cadenza. But this is English usage, and, indulged in so sparingly, hardly a fair ground for charging artists of this stamp with vanity.—We have no room to say the half of what we would of the beautiful impression made on us by this performance of Judas Maccabæus; let us feel happy that more Oratorios, under the same auspices, await us in the near future:—in Christmas week St. Paul and The Messiah!

Harvard Musical Association.

The second Symphony Concert (Nov. 23) drew the same large, attentive audience as the first. This audience always listened well; but this year, so far, it has been a comfort to observe that almost no one leaves the hall before the last note of the last piece is over. It shows a more general interest in the programmes, and an appreciation of the unity, of the organic wholeness of a good programme in itself, with an unwillingness to mar or lose any part of its fair proportions. It is another refreshing sign of progress, to see the criticism of the Press becoming so much more alive to the spirit and intention of these concerts, regardless of programmes as well as of instruments and persons. That musical atmosphere, of which we spoke as the condition of a true concert, seemed to be even more fully realized than it was the fortnight before; it was a genial short two hours. The matter of the feast was this:

Overture, "No. 1," to "Leonore," in C, op. 138. [Now proved to be No. 3, comp. in 1807]. Beethoven.
Concerto in A minor, for the Violoncello. [Two movements]. Golttermann.

Adolph Hartdegen.
Symphony in G, No. 6, (Bretkopf & Härtel). Mozart.

Aria and Gavotte, from the Orchestral Suite in D. Bach.
Concerto for the Oboe, in G minor. Handel.
Augustus Kutzleb.

Overture, No. 3, to "Leonore," in C, op. 72. (Comp. 1806). Beethoven.

The Symphony by Mozart may have been performed here many years ago, but not within the memory of any concert-goers we have met, and if at all, most likely by some small orchestra of amateurs in the days when such things were in Boston. Much of it sounded quite familiar, and doubtless it was well known to players of four hand arrangements. In its complete form, with its rich and perfect, although sparing—that is to say not ambitious—instrumentation, it was as good as new to everybody; and one of the most delightful, joyful, genial creations of pure music; to hear it, feel it and enjoy it is to live the better life of Mozart for awhile. The orchestra, now nearly up to its full number (10 first violins, 8 second, 6 violas, 5 cellos and 6 or 7 double basses) is really more effective than ever before when it has numbered six or eight more, particularly in the middle strings. The wind instruments are decidedly better than ever before, the brass more subdued, the whole proportion better; and the drill, as well as the pervading style and spirit of performance showed marked improvement on past years. The Symphony went well; the two "Leonore" overtures were even given with poetic feeling, the great No. 3 with a triumphant fire and power. The "No. 1" of those Overtures (as it is commonly called) was heard here for the first time last winter, when the four Fidelio Overtures were given in successive concerts. We remarked at the time how wholly different it is in character from the others; not like No. 2, a first sketch only realized in No. 3, but composed (with the exception of the brief allusion to the tenor aria) of different ideas, and in its general tone more gentle, tender, full of musing recollection. It seemed to us as if the tone poet, in some hour of quiet reverie, long after the exciting tragedy and triumph were past, recalled it to his mind and reproduced it in these less fiery strains. This is "Fidelio" remembered; whereas in No. 3, we have it present, we are in the midst of all its thrilling tragedy and splendor. Since this comparison was made, convincing evidence has been produced (by Mr. Grove, the Secretary of the Crystal Palace Company in London), to show that this "No. 1" was actually written for a special occasion at least one year later than the Nos. 2 and 3, which preceded the first two performances of the opera in 1806. Certainly it is one of the most beautiful, poetic of all overtures, and to contrast its beauty with the grandeur of the third was interesting. The rendering this time was delicate and careful, although a reed instrument or two at the beginning was not quite warmed to pitch.—But we will not go through the concert in detail, since we prefer to copy the appreciative notice of the Evening Gazette, which, (to our thinking) speaks the truth and nothing but the truth, as follows:

The second concert was quite equal to the first in point of selections, and superior to it in many points of execution. The overtures to "Leonore" were superbly given, their spirit being interpreted with great purity of feeling and correctness of sentiment. We doubt if number three (op. 72) ever before received such thorough treatment in this city as was given to it Thursday afternoon. The violins—and it is a very trying and exacting overture for these instruments—were well drilled, and executed the fiery and difficult passages with perfect unity and precision. The stretto, which is nearly always bungled, came out with distinctness and correctness, and, notwithstanding the rapid time in which it was taken, as though performed by one player. The brasses were subordinated with rare discrimination, and for a wonder did not drown the other instruments. The rendering of both of the Leonore overtures reflects the highest credit on conductor and orchestra, and has given a fine standard of comparison for future performances of these works. The two movements from Golttermann's Concerto for violoncello were fairly played by Mr. Adolph Hartdegen. The Concerto is not a work of the highest merit from an æsthetic point of view, and was written more to test the powers of the performer than to produce a work of pure artistic worth. The Adagio is very pleasing, and flows naturally, and was played with expression and sentiment by Mr. Hartdegen, who has a chaste style, a full tone, and a graceful felicity in the performance of controllable movements. His bowing is free, and, as a rule, his intonation is good. In the Allegro we do not think he was as happy as in the previous movement. He was so occupied with the difficulties he had to overcome that the movement lacked unity, and appeared to be only a series of trying passages the performer was struggling to overcome. Towards the conclusion his intonation was far from perfect, especially in the upper positions where it is necessary to cross the strings. We admit the extreme difficulty of this portion of the work, but, at the same time, we are entitled to expect perfection in the artist who voluntarily comes forward to perform it. Mr. Hartdegen is a capital violoncellist, but at present his powers are not fully developed, and therefore he should not attempt to go too far beyond them.

Mozart's delightful Symphony in C was played for the first time in Boston. This is somewhat remarkable, as it is one of the best of its composer's symphonies, and one of the most pleasing. The slow movement is delicious, and the Finale contains some of the most earnest and most vigorous work that Mozart ever did. We can only account for the neglect that has hitherto attended it here, by the fact that it was written without clarinets or trombones, and in consequence not considered full enough to suit modern ears accustomed to the noisy demonstrations of later works. Notwithstanding the absence of the clarinets and the trombones, and the fact that instead of the customary four horns, this work has only two, there is no lack of fullness in the orchestration, so beautifully is everything balanced. The use that Mozart makes of the oboes and the bassoons in this work is fascinating in the extreme. In fact, as is usual with him, every instrument has its proper note in the proper place, and the peculiar quality of each is never lost sight of. And this is as it should be. Every instrument has its orchestral value and effect, and to make one perform the office of another as the majority of our modern composers do—is about the same thing as for an artist to use one color where another is demanded. This peculiarity in Mozart has defeated every effort of those who have tried to fit his symphonies to the fancied requirements of the modern orchestra. Clarinet, trombone and extra horn parts have been added to the works wherein they are absent, but have met with no recognition from musicians, who insist upon performing this master's works as he has left them to us. They are perfect as they stand, and his designs admit of no alteration, least of all of improvement. The symphony under notice was excellently interpreted by Mr. Zerrahn and the orchestra. That naïveté and delicacy peculiar to Mozart were never lost sight of, and the spirit of the work was finely preserved. The Adagio and the Minuet were charmingly played, and the lights and shades throughout not only faithfully produced but tempered to the character and sentiment of the composition.

Bach's Aria and Gavotte from the orchestral Suite in D began the second part. The Aria is entirely for strings, and is so fresh that one not knowing better might be justified in believing it a work of our own day, were it not for the quaint final cadences. The source from which Schumann drank his inspirations is apparent on hearing this and similar works of Bach, who is generally credited to belong to the stiff and mathematical school of the long past, but wrongly so, for, though he wrote in the style that was the fashion of his day, he was so far an innovator that he undoubtedly became the progenitor of the romantic school. Bach is permeating the serious music of our day more completely than any composer of the past, and he has not yet exerted all the influence he is destined to exert on the music of the future. The work in question was played with charming effect, the Aria being rendered deliciously; and be it said to the credit of the audience, it was warmly applauded. We think the Gavotte would have realized the composer's intentions better had it been taken a trifle slower. It would have lost in spirit, but would have gained in style.

Handel's Concerto for the oboe, in G minor, consisting of four short movements, was executed by Mr. August Kutzleb, with great intelligence and a fine appreciation of the composer's sentiment. He has a noble tone upon the oboe, and in his hands the true pastoral character of the instrument is preserved. The work is exceedingly interesting as an example of the great musician's orchestral music, but is not the best of the many concertos he wrote for the oboe. It is quite trying to the performer, and speaks highly for the powers of the oboe players of Handel's time, whose instruments were quite primitive affairs compared to the elaborately improved and thickly keyed affairs of our own day.

We have only words of praise for the manner in which Mr. Zerrahn and the orchestra performed the task of Thursday afternoon, and the high tone that pervaded the entire concert. We marvel at the coldness of the audience, which was chary of applause to a degree perfectly unaccountable. They who visit these concerts are not of that class which is pleased with the meretricious music that meets with ignorant approval; and yet they manifest no outward show of satisfaction at the superb interpretation of the fine works that are produced. We trust we shall see a change in this respect, as it is a satisfaction to the artist who tries to please, and who justly feels that he has deserved approval, to know that his efforts have not been in vain.

MESSRS. LEONHARD AND RICHBERG'S first Matinée was one of the most delightful and artistically perfect chamber concerts we have had for years. Every piece was music of the first order, and all interpreted with fine intelligence and feeling, and with finished technique. The wonderful Trio (op. 70, No. 1) of Beethoven, with its mysterious Largo movement, which has given it the name of the "Götter" Trio, began, and an almost equally interesting Sonata for piano and violin (op. 121) by Schumann closed the concert. Mr. RICHBERG played Bach's Chaconne—that richest, noblest of all compositions for the violin alone, to which Schumann has put a piano accompaniment more close to Bach than Mendelssohn's. Mr. KREUSMANN sang three of the choicest songs by Schumann and two by Franz in his best voice and style. The audience, in spite of rain, was very large and of course select.—We are only mortified that the space we had allotted to the record of this concert is already used up. Next time we shall give fuller notice of the first and of the second concert (yesterday's). The third will occur Dec. 14, presenting a Sonata Duo by Gade, a Bach Concerto for two violins, a superb Trio by Schumann in D minor, a Ballade by Chopin, and two Schubert Songs by Mr. Glogner-Castelli.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT (next week, Thursday) offers Cherubini's Overture to "Faniska"; the "Oxford Symphony" by Haydn (first time); the Scherzo from the Reformation Symphony; Piano Concerto by Burgmüller (PARABO), and Rietz's Fest Overture.—Miss MESLIE will play in the fourth concert, her return from Europe having been delayed.

Opera Abroad.

(Correspondence of Dwight's Journal of Music.)

LONDON, Nov. 11th 1871.

The fall operatic season in London is proceeding favorably, if not with great éclat. The company is the same as in the spring season, with the exception of Patti, Lucca, and a few lesser lights, leaving Titiens and Marimon as the leading stars. The latter artiste is scarcely justifying the elaborate critical eulogies which greeted her first appearance, and there is no fear that she will (as predicted), ever create the sensation which Jenny Lind did. She sings sweetly and gracefully, however, and has just added to her limited repertoire the Rosina of "Il Barbiere," warbling the music in a delightful manner, and affording much gratification to an audience which is determined to be pleased with everything she does. Her other operas are "La Sonnambula" and "La Figlia;" and it is with these three works of Rossini, Bellini and Donizetti that she has made her London successes.

Titiens is singing in magnificent style, but her voice often betrays her, and the frequent huskiness of the upper notes shows that her vocal powers are not what they were; and yet with all this she is incomparably the first operatic artiste now in England. She sang the other night in "Anna Bolena," an opera which has been revived at her request, and in which she makes some splendid points, especially in the last act. She is well supported by Mlle. Colombo, a very promising young singer, as Jane Seymour; by the new tenor, Prudenza, as Percy; and by Agnesi as Henry VIII. The tenor sings the most difficult passages in his music, which was written for the exceptional powers of Rubini. Agnesi is just as fine as ever. Tamburini could have been in the part of the bluff king. The opera is moulded after the Rossinian style, and is such a successful imitation that the hearer not otherwise informed would be almost certain to attribute the composition to the Swan of Pesaro. The overture is precisely like Rossini's, with its two crescendo movements, and with its recurrence of the air in different keys; while the orchestration throughout and the treatment of the concerted music show how thoroughly Donizetti, at the period when he wrote this opera, was under the influence of Rossini. "Anna Bolena" is not a felicitous work in all points. There is a lack of contrast, the choruses being but few, the concerted pieces fewer; so that the opera seems like a series of solos and duets, which in time become monotonous. Yet, withal, the melodies are very beautiful. Donizetti could not help being always graceful and melodious. The tenor scene "Vivi tu" is a delightful composition, and the final scene for Anna is a noble bit of dramatic writing: while among the melodies is that which has since become so popular as "Home, sweet home," not one out of a thousand of the admirers of this time-honored ballad knowing that their favorite tune is simply an extract from one of Donizetti's operas.

Among other operas of the season in London is the "Semiramide," in which Titiens, Trebelli, and Agnesi are all superlatively fine. I wish you knew what a delightful contralto Trebelli is. She is a French lady, has a fine presence, a rich, flexible voice, and admirable execution. She is wonderfully popular all over England, and well deserves her popularity. In fact, she is the undoubted successor of Alboni in the affections of the British public.

Alboni is still a glorious singer, though she but seldom appears in public. Yet to me, hearing her the other day, the charm of her voice and the inimitable fluency of her execution seemed unimpaired. Critics say that her upper notes are lost; but in the selections she made, when I heard her, there was nothing to prove this charge. Alboni is to-day, as she has been for nearly twenty years, the finest contralto in the world.

To the opera season again. The elaborate announcements of the management have by no means been fulfilled. Among the promised novelties were Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and Flotow's "L'Ombra;" but neither of them has been produced. "L'Ombra" in the meanwhile is received with favor, but not with enthusiasm, at the Opera Comique in Paris. It is a graceful, pretty work, with some melodies which will have a wide circulation, but it will not particularly increase the reputation of the composer. At the Comique, Herold's "Pré aux Clercs" has just passed its one thousandth representation. With the exception of Miolan Carvalho, the singers at this house are just now very poor.

Having drifted insensibly from London to Paris, we do know, having heard her a whole winter in Berlin. —Ed.

let me give a few notes on the Grand Opera. The old house in Rue De Pelotier is open now with a fair company, of which Faure, the baritone, is the principal celebrity. "Don Giovanni" and "Hamlet" are both to be revived for him. "The Huguenots" and "Robert le Diable" have lately been given in good style with Madame Gueymard as the prima donna. The "Trovatore" the other night drew an immense house. The French version of this work (under the title "Le Trouvère") is different in several points from the Italian version with which American opera-goers are familiar; and the finale of the last act, in which the monks' chorus from the "Miserere" is again introduced, and the voice of the tenor is heard at the close, is in every way more effective than the abrupt ending of the opera as the Italian companies give it to us.

Reverting to a recent agreeable musical trip in Italy. I recall some pleasant experiences at Turin, where at one of the principal theatres Marchetti's opera of "Ruy Blas" has been enjoying a successful run. It is in every respect an admirable work, suggesting the style of Gounod more than that of any other prominent composer of the day. The last act is especially rich both in dramatic music and melody.

At Florence the musical tourist may this year choose between a distracting variety of musical attractions. At five theatres opera is given in good style and with greater or less pretention. The programme at La Pergola includes Gomes's opera, "Il Guarany" as the principal novelty, and the work has been received with moderate applause,—not, however, with as much as the excitable musical journals of Italy would lead one to suppose,—but with sufficient favor to ensure its success. The principal numbers in the work are an Ave Maria, a very charming ballad and scena for soprano, an Indian march and chorus, and the concerted piece which closes the third act. The last act of the opera is an anti climax, and even the warmest admirers of the young composer confess that this portion of an otherwise creditable work is a decided failure. The "Gnarany," which has for a subject love and war among certain tribes of Paraguay, is in rehearsal at the Apollo theatre in Rome, and is probably the leading musical novelty of the year in Italy.

At the Pagliano I have heard an excellent representation of "Favorita," with Naudin, the French tenor, in the principal part. He was announced as the star of the evening, but his success—though undoubted—was not as marked as that of the prima donna Galetti, who is one of the most splendid dramatic artists of the Italian stage. At the Pagliano a great variety of operas is announced for the season, including a revival of Donizetti's "Parisina," a work which has not been heard for many years. At the Loggia theatre—a very pretty little house—an indifferent troupe of voices in lyric art are performing "Sonnambula" and "Linda"—this latter opera seeming to be a great favorite in Italy this year.

Rome, so far, can boast of but little in the musical way. The Apollo theatre is open, but as the performances have been confined to alternate representations of "Traviata" and "Masaniello," there has been much dissatisfaction on the part of the public, especially as the theatre is in receipt of a handsome subscription from the government: but it is expected that the coming production of "Il Guarany" will quiet the grumblers. The Apollo theatre, by the way, is in a narrow, dark, dismal street near the Bridge of St. Angelo, far away from the best residences, and surrounded by a population which prefers the antics of Pulcinello to the enchanting operatic strains.

Bologna is this season the musical centre of Italy—at least it attracts more attention than any other Italian town. This is probably owing to the excitement attendant on the production of "Lohengrin" and the prospect of a consequent irruption of Wagner's music into Italy. Lecoq, a pretty but insignificant town on one of the lower branches of Lake Como, has loomed up into musical prominence through the success of "Reginella," an opera by a native composer, which is soon to be heard in the larger Italian towns. From Naples there is no musical intelligence of the slightest interest.

But all Italy is waiting for the coming man! Verdi's later works are by no means his best, and Petrella, of whom so much was expected, does not respond to popular expectation. Pacini and Mercadante seem to be put upon the shelf, and in want of something better the long neglected operas of Donizetti are revived. Rossini is only heard through his "Barbiere," while Bellini's two operas "Norma" and "Sonnambula" serve to keep his name still before the public. A new composer is imperatively demanded. Wagner's disciples think that he is the coming man, though there is really nothing more widely opposed than Italian musical taste and the music of "Tannhäuser." But this is such an age of revolutions that it is impossible to tell what may or may not happen.

Trovatore.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Tired. 3. D♭ to f. Lindsay. 30

"Tired! Oh yes, so tired, dear
The day has been very long."
Full of pathos, but not over sad.

Departed Days. 3. D♭. F. H. H. 30

"Then sing again that mournful song
That song of other times."

Unspoken Love. 3. C to d. Sainton-Dolby. 35

Very effective for concerts.

The Bells. 3. E♭ to f. Hatton. 40

"I heard the bells on Christmas day
Their old familiar carols play,"
One of Santley's songs. Words by Longfellow. A very pretty "ohime" accompaniment.

Benedictus. In E♭. 4 Voices. 4 B♭ to a. Hodges. 50

Add this fine Anthem to your Choir Library.

Theme for Voice, with four variations. For Tenor, Mezzo Soprano, or Contralto Voice.

5. B♭. Concone. 35

For daily practice, is quite pleasing, and admirably calculated to remove the "kinks" from a musician's throat, and render it agile and flexible.

I am happy, mother-darling. Song and Chorus.

3. G to e. Porter. 30

"I am happy, mother, darling,
With your kiss upon my brow,
With my hand clasped in your dear one,
I can sleep so sweetly now."
A good kind, and one of the prettiest of its class.

Ah! Nevermore those laughing eyes. 3. C to e. Scott. 35

Ah! nevermore those laughing eyes
That beamed on me in sweet surprise,— Capital.

Instrumental.

West Wind Galop. 3. F. Vandewater. 30

Has more substance than average galops. Plenty of octaves.

Accent du Coeur. Valse brillante. 4. A♭. Boscovitz. 75

A "large-hand" piece, with chords and octaves. Powerful, brilliant and sweet.

Patty-Cake Waltz. 3. F. R. C. W. 40

Charming piece to play to children, who will be delighted with the Patty-Cake picture.

If ever I cease to love. 3. B♭. Knight. 30

This absurd song with the beautiful melody, makes a capital instrumental piece, and will stir the "pat-tering feet" of the waiters to still livelier motion.

Valse d'Amour. 4. A. Sanderson. 40

Composed Sept. 18th by Harry Sanderson, and is the last work of the gifted and now lamented player.
It is full of life. The octave passages make it difficult for small hands, but otherwise it is not particularly "hard."

Look Alive Galop. 3. F. Arctic. 30

Lively music.

Nina's Musings. Waltz. 3. G. Harrington. 35

Nothing sad about the musings. She was evidently thinking of the last ball, or of the next one, where this new piece will at once attract attention.

Poet and Peasant. No. 24 of Golden Echoes.

2. D. Mack. 30

One of the 25 excellent instructive pieces previously noticed

Rudolfsklinge Waltzes. 3. Strauss. 75

Strauss does better and better, and was very good before. An uncommonly rich silver-bell clang to these waltzes.

Books.

THE MUSICAL TREASURY. A Collection of Vocal and Instrumental Music, for Voice, Pianoforte and Reed Organ. Price,

Boards, $2.50; Cloth, $3.00; Full Gilt, $4.00

Uniform with the "Home Circle Series" and has a very attractive table of contents. Perhaps the best of the whole set.

CLARK'S DOLLAR INSTRUCTOR FOR REED OR-

GANS.

By Wm. H. Clark, who has, with his accustomed tact and success, provided for the wants of players who cannot afford the time to go through his larger work, the very popular "New Method."

LIFE OF SCHUMANN. By Wiedersheim.

Translated by Miss A. L. Alger. $1.75

A fine gift book, and valuable for all music lovers.

A Collection of CHRISTMAS CAROLS.

A. P. Howard. 50

"While Shepherds watched," and a number of others. A timely appearance of Christmas music. Commence at once to practice it!

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to
7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c., a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff,
an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 801.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 16, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 19.

The Vocal Works of Bach and Handel.— Letter by Robert Franz.*

[Concluded from page 128.]

Having brought the history of my labors with regard to Bach's and Handel's works down to the present time, my letter might here close. Yet I allow myself a few remarks, which relate in the first place to the material that must be used in the presentation of the settings thus drawn from the figured bass, but which perhaps may be considered also as completing what has already been explained.

The editor of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung expresses himself with regard to that material as follows: "Those 'gaps' are to be filled by the piano-forte and organ, and, in the spirit of Handel, only by the piano-forte and organ; all experiments with substituted instruments (and no one has made such experiments oftener and more freely than the author of the arrangements under review) have taught us nothing, except that no other satisfactory solution here is possible."

Now by such an assertion nothing at all is proved; it is only calculated to make the views about this question even more confused than they were before. In Halle I have indeed instituted frequent and free experiments, in order to come to a clear conclusion about the fittest material of accompaniment. In my opinion the forms which worked the most satisfactorily, are those of which I have spoken above, in explanation of the arrangement of my scores. But this conviction I would urge upon no one, and I shall be very careful not to ascribe to it an absolute validity. Now should the not impossible case occur, that in those "free and frequent experiments" the orchestra should be burdened with such a setting as the one hit upon and used throughout in the piano accompaniments of the "German Handel Society," we verily should hear remarkable effects of sound. A style of that sort may perhaps be hidden by the colorless pianoforte, but not by a choir of instruments which lay claim to individuality. When the latter is not used for polyphonic forms, it operates as a mere pot of colors,—a very bad thing to employ on Bach's and Handel's pregnant music.

Such reflexions naturally bring up the old question: When are tones filled with meaning, and when are they not? I willingly confess to not feeling myself equal to the solution of the problem, yet I cannot forbear to insert here a few characteristic signs, which commonly can be observed in any strict progression of parts. Perhaps it will contribute to shed some light on that dark problem. Moreover, the musical production of the present period demands to have attention turned once more toward creations whose value is as little to be questioned, as they threaten more and more to sink into oblivion.

Every well conducted part, in polyphonic composition, will have to distinguish itself by certain peculiarities of melody, harmony and rhythm.

(Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.)

Peculiarities of melody, in so far that its interval progressions must be natural and pleasing;—of harmony, in so far that those interval progressions shall not only indicate the chord successions which lie at the foundation, but shall develop themselves therefrom clearly and intelligibly:—finally of rhythm, in so far that the movement of those melodic-harmonic forms shall be full of character and if possible, symmetrically divided and articulated. Such fundamental traits are very plainly perceptible in what are called the principal voices in fugue themes, or in the motives of larger compositions—I have in mind especially the Symphonies, Quartets, &c., of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. The latter works stand nearer to our time, and therefore are particularly qualified for our proposed examination. Let us test these properties in the first best leading motive we can think of, for example in this theme of the second Symphony of Beethoven:

Who does not see at once the excellence of this subject-matter in these three respects? As melody, it enchains us by the natural and agreeable progression of its intervals, whose plastic quality impresses itself instantly and irresistibly;—as harmony, unfolded, it presents the trichord of the Tonic;—as rhythm, finally, it leaves nothing to be wished in point of symmetry and character. Accordingly it unites in itself the quintessence of the collective elements by which music lifts itself to intelligible expression, and its effect therefore, without any further addition, is perfectly satisfying. But its significance is essentially enhanced by the fact, that it exerts the greatest influence upon the melodic, harmonic and rhythmical development of the musical piece that is based upon it. As the "sketch books" prove, Beethoven had worked this motive over and over before it became so pregnant; it was clear enough to him how much the construction of motives has to do with these three properties.—

Quite similar appearances may also be perceived and pointed out in most of the ground themes of Haydn's and Mozart's instrumental works.

What has just been remarked about such characteristic properties of a "ground motive," is true in a still higher degree, perhaps, of every good fugue theme: Bach's organ fugues and the fugues of the "Well-tempered Clavichord" offer a rich abundance of examples. I will cite but one, the beautiful theme of an organ fugue in G minor, and leave it to each one to examine it more closely with regard to the points above designated:

It is self-evident that they sought particularly to clothe the principal parts in all the splendor of melodic, harmonic and rhythmical excellencies; in like manner also, at least in the strict style, the accessory parts must be worked out according to these laws. Apart from the heightened expression, which the ingenious working together of individual parts so constituted lent to a piece of music, this was commanded also upon technical grounds: as it is well known, the transposition of the parts in polyphonic writing plays a very important rôle—so what is called upon to take under certain circumstances the most distinguished place, must know how to satisfy the higher claims on all sides.

At the same time we must not pass over in silence the fact, that even the greatest conscientiousness in the fulfilment of these prescriptions is not by itself alone sufficient to secure artistic success: many a piece of music looks very good indeed, but nevertheless sounds positively bad. If the details as well as the whole be not supported by a fullness of inspired life, the perfection of form will put the listener out of tune, instead of affecting him agreeably. Now wherein consists the kernel of this spiritual fullness of life, is one of the mysterious questions, which, like all ultimate reasons, elude all investigation; such things can only be felt, but never comprehended.

No one will for a moment doubt, that the majority of the compositions of Bach and Handel are based upon a technique like that whose outward signs I have endeavored to describe. This holds, however, not alone of the compositions actually worked out by them, but it extends also to the passages which they have left to the accompaniment. Such a treatment requires in the first place a unity of style too sensitive to be compatible with any disturbing interruptions; particularly is this the case with the whole plan of the sketches. Here all unfolds itself in interval progressions which really overflow with melodic and harmonic elements; for this reason a constant reference to principles in separable from the very nature of polyphony is indispensable.

This explains too, why homophonous formations can only be unfitly introduced to cross those polyphonic forms of expression; only exceptionally, at the most, are they in the right place there.

Whoever is in some degree familiar with the technique of the strict style of writing, perceives already, from the movement of the fundamental bass, of what character the completing additions must be; these signs will seldom prove deceptive.

So much stands established anyhow, that the mere knowledge of the rules of thorough bass, as they have been oracularly announced to the world by the compendiums of the more modern systems of Harmony, will hardly take one through the task of working out the accompaniment to older musical productions. Here one must adhere as closely as possible to the usages of the time when they originated, in order to obtain agreeable results. According to those usages, chords were regarded not so much as strictly separated, self-related bodies, brought into connection with each other by certain positive prescribable rules,—but far more as the free product of an artistic movement of the individual parts: that is to say, the contrapuntal parts, each moving in its own melodic way, and coming into momentary contact with each other, begat series of harmonies, whose fluctuating beauty exercised a magical charm quite inexpressible.

To be sure, the management of such a mode of setting is involved in many sorts of difficulties; whoever feels himself unequal to these, will honor the old Art works most, if he will leave them unilluminated by his new arrangements (Bearbeitungen). My own pen, for example, with regard to very many of Bach's compositions, might long ago have been consigned thus to repose.—

Now Mozart and Mendelssohn (I do not refer here to his organ part to Israel in Egypt, but to his arrangement of that oratorio for o ches'ra) saw clearly enough what style was mainly to be used in the working out of the accompaniment; one must needs follow their example unconditionally, not because they must be authorities for us, but because experience teaches us how deeply they looked through to the bottom of these things.* Especially do Bach's wonderfully outlined sketches demand almost always a polyphonic carriage of the parts, which seems to have been a natural necessity of his extraordinary faculty of combination; so too do Handel's more plastic forms require it, although with limitations suited to their nature.

But if such labors are to have some prospect of success, it is altogether necessary that this reconstructive industry shall rest upon some actual productive power, however limited. Moreover it must be in some sort of affinity with the spirit that reigns in the original works, since otherwise there can hardly fail to be a questionable want of uniformity of style. But if we presuppose such qualities, then the arrangement (Bearbeitung) will constantly assume a distinct physiognomy, the necessary consequence of every individual conception. In the degree that this occurs, will the "arrangement" have its good justification, or turn out a failure. This so-called "historical reproduction" in Art is bound to prove itself a mere empty cobweb of the brain, to which the best part is wanting: flesh and blood.

In most of the arrangements with which I have become acquainted—of course I do not speak here of those of Mozart and of Mendelssohn—one misses very much the gift for such work in the sense just explained. Therefore they are for the most part dry and jejune: the authors seem to have cared very little whether their additions were congruous or not with the moods and spirit of the originals before them. Everywhere the filling up of the blank spaces stands out to disadvantage from the rest of the composition; while this is radiant with blooming life, the other offers only a mechanical piling up of chords, which stand side by side unsympathetic and inert, refusing to be brought into any pliable connection either with the voice part or the bass. These arrangers may have been animated by the best good will to serve their originals: but good will, even were it supported by the most ideal views, can never come up to the requirements of such tasks as these.

When we consider, finally, that Bach and Handel are always to be taken as tone-poets, and in the most eminent sense of the word, then certainly the difficulties of any suitable arrangement become still much more serious. He only will do justice to their works, who will approach them with the distinct presupposition, that they are in every part pervaded by the mysterious power of a poetic tone-life. To wish to comprehend either of these masters from any other point of view would surely lead into danger of getting more and more away from their intentions.

* * * * *

These long spun communications may easily awaken in you the suspicion, that I cherish a secret rash conviction, that I am the man, whose labors best fulfil the requirements above stated, and that only in them is true salvation to be found. But thereby you would do me decided injustice. The feeling of one's own inadequacy for tasks so difficult could scarcely come over any one with more strength and distinctness, than it has been often enough the case with me. The many errors—to be sure I had for the most part to detect them for myself, without any help of any sort from our professional critics—could only tend to aggravate that feeling. Thus in my earlier arrangements for Piano, when I was utterly at a loss what else to do, I had sinned through easy deviations from the originals; later, when the orchestra came in, I no longer had occasion to persist in those fatal make-shifts of a faulty view. It costs me not the slightest self-abasement to confess this in all frankness here; I hope I may always be in the condition to honor more mature experiences by granting them the right of an impartial criticism, and most of all in the case of my own doings: only in this way can a man remain in tolerable equilibrium with himself.—But the fact that I gradually became conscious of the defects, and learned in the course of time to avoid them, gave me constantly new courage to keep on unbewildered in my labors;—every correction, which I accomplished in myself, promised to be of good service to the works, for which no sacrifice seemed great or hard enough for me.

I have already given expression to a similar feeling in the preface to my arrangement of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music; permit me to close this letter with the words I have used there:

"I am far from believing that I have satisfied all claims, which will be raised from wholly different points of view; but I do hope to see the required solution of the given problem furthered by my labor, and not unessentially. In this sense I shall always be ready not to refuse my joyful sympathy to like attempts which may succeed in coming nearer to the goal for which we strive; and I shall willingly submit to every criticism, which knows how to substantiate itself in such positive manner."

ROBERT FRANZ.

Halle, July 1, 1871.

The Ancient Miracle-Plays.—The Passion Play at Oberammergau.

BY L. MARIA CHILD.

The past centuries have a peculiar interest for me. I look upon this world as a child in the great family of the universe, and I like to inquire into the schooling it has had, from its fumbling infancy, through its thoughtless and trusting childhood, up to its present state of anxious inquiry and tireless activity.

Concerning one curious stage of its education I am moved to write to you now. Before the invention of printing, and for a long time afterward, such education as the people had, beyond the limited and ill-understood experience of each individual, was received through pictures and living representations. These, of course, embodied the superstitions of their time; but superstitions are sometimes the dark shadows of truths, which are luminous on the other side.

In bygone centuries, nearly all the spiritual instruction of the people was conveyed through the medium of Religious Dramas. One class of these, called "Mysteries," or "Miracle Plays," represented stories from the Bible, or from the Apocryphal Gospels, (then much in vogue) strictly according to the letter of the Scriptures they sought to embody. In another class, called "The Moralities," writers took Bible characters, allegorical personages, and Saints in Catholic Legends, wove them into a plot of their own, and invented dialogues for them. Bishops, and I believe one of the Popes, composed these dramas, and the priesthood universally encouraged them, as an efficacious mode of imparting religious instruction to the populace. They were favorite entertainments all over Europe; being performed not only at universities, and in great cities, but by players who made it their business to go about from village to village, on an ambulatory stage, provided with scenery and dresses. They were not uncommon in England during the reign of James I; but they gradually disappeared there and elsewhere; though still occasionally resuscitated in remote provinces of Catholic countries. An English traveller describes a "Mystery" called the "Creation," which he saw performed at Bamberg, in Germany, in 1783. According to his account, it was a most grotesque affair. Young priests had the wings of geese tied on their shoulders to personate angels. Adam appeared on the scene in a big curled wig and a brocade morning gown. Among the animals that passed before him, to receive their names, was a well shod horse, pigs with rings in their noses, and a mastiff with a brass collar. A cow's rib-bone had been provided for the formation of Eve; but the mastiff spied it out, grabbed it, and carried it off. The angels tried to whistle him back, but not succeeding, they chased him, gave him a kicking, and recovered the bone, which they placed under a trap door, by the side of the sleeping Adam; whence there soon emerged a lanky priest in a loose robe, to personate Eve.

So late as 1822, one of the old "Moralities" entitled "The Doubts of Joseph about the Virgin Mary, his Wife," was performed at Dieppe, in France. M. Micheler, who happened to witness it, published an account of it in Le Miroir, which he edited. He was indicted for blasphemy; but was acquitted by the Parisian tribunal, on his proving that it was a true description of a dramatic performance. I have read this ancient "Morality," and the language in which Joseph expresses his disbelief in Mary's story about her child will not bear repetition to modern ears.

At the present time there remains but one interesting relic of these entertainments, which were once so universal. It is called "The Passion Play," and is performed at Ober-Ammergau, a village situated in a highly picturesque region, where the first clump of Alps lift their heads above the undulating plains of Bavaria. A large proportion of the inhabitants are wood carvers; and, being like other Bavarians, devout Catholics, they supply the numerous travellers who flock thither with quantities of Crucifixes and images of the Virgin and Saints. In the year 1633, a terrible pestilence raged in this village, and the monks of a neighboring convent advised the people to avert divine displeasure by a solemn vow to represent publicly every ten years, "The Passion of Jesus, the Saviour of the World." The vow was made with many religious ceremonies, and the pestilence immediately abated. Every ten years since that, the performance has been repeated on a grand scale, and has become a permanent institution, consecrated to the imaginations and hearts of the people. This custom has had considerable educational influence on the inhabitants of Ober-Ammergau. They all take part in the Play, and as they enter into it with great seriousness of purpose and earnestness of soul, it imparts to them a certain degree of dignity. It requires study and thought to conceive distinctly the characters they wish to represent; it is necessary to observe pictures closely, in order to be correct in costume; the musical parts must be diligently rehearsed; having a large audience, they are bound to speak pure German, which differs much from the common language of the peasantry; and they are brought into contact with crowds of travellers, in whom they excite great interest. All these circumstances conspire to raise them above the common level of their class, so that they retain their simplicity without coarseness, and are more than usually courteous, without servility.

*Who is there, to whom Mozart's splendid arrangement of the bass air in The Messiah: "The people that walked in darkness," does not occur here? To attain to a clear consciousness of the value of a good arrangement (Bearbeitung), it may be advisable to point occasionally to such achievements, even at the risk of not agreeing with the opinion of the celebrated author of the treatise "Ueber Reinheit der Tonkunst" (Thibaut "On Purity in Musical Art").

The pamphlet which explains this famous Play to the assembled spectators has the following title page: "The Great Sacrifice at Golgotha; or the Sufferings and Death of Jesus, according to the Four Evangelists; with Tableaux from the Old Testament, for contemplation and edification. The scenes represented are Christ's Entry into Jerusalem and his cleansing of the Temple; Pharisees plotting against Jesus; Jesus leaving the Home at Bethany; Dinner at Simon's House, and the anointing by Mary Magdalene; The Lament over Jerusalem; Peter and John seeking a Room for the Passover; Judas caught by the Pharisees; The Last Supper; The Bargain of Judas with the Sanhedrim; The Agony in the Garden; The Betrayal; Jesus before Annas, and before Caiaphas; The Denial by Peter; The Remorse of Judas and his Death; Jesus before Pilate, and before Herod; Jesus crowned with Thorns and scourged; Jesus before the Judgment-Seat of Pilate; The Choice of Barrabas; The Road to Calvary; The Crucifixion; The Resurrection; His Appearances after the Resurrection; Final Scene of Glory. Interspersed with these are Tableaux representing scenes and characters from the Old Testament, bearing on the history of Jesus. The Play is performed in the open air; benches for six thousand spectators being arranged in ascending series, like an amphitheatre. In front of them is a large space for the stage, with scenery representing the streets and houses of Jerusalem. Tableaux Vivantes (Living Pictures) Dialogues and Choruses are introduced. Some of the Tableaux form very picture-que groups, and the actors remain so perfectly still, that one can hardly believe them to be alive. What the Chorus sing is explanatory of the scenes about to be represented, and of the moral to be conveyed. The Dialogues adhere very closely to the text of Scripture, the very words of Jesus being used throughout. The performers are dressed in appropriate Asiatic costumes; long robes of many colors, girdles and mantles, turbans and sandals. All the men preserve their hair long, in readiness for this grand occasion. Joseph Mair, who personates Jesus, was summoned to join the army raised to repel the attempted invasion of Germany by France; but the King of Bavaria gave special orders that he should not be required to conform to military rules concerning short hair, and that he should be employed only in barrack-duty, that he might be kept unharmed to perform in the "Passion Play."

A friend, who witnessed this performance last autumn, wrote to me thus: "Ober-Ammergau is an out-of-the-way place, but on this occasion it is thronged with travellers from all quarters; people of every condition, and in every imaginable style of dress. There was the King of Bavaria and his nobles, crowds of bare footed peasants in all manner of extraordinary mountain-costumes, mixed with stylishly dressed travellers from all parts of Europe and America. The day before the representation, the numerous performers were flitting about the streets in dresses of strangely mingled style, half Judean, half Ammergau. The little children had their heads covered with knobs of twisted paper, preparatory to flowing curls. When we asked to have our shoes cleaned, we were told it could not be done, because the housemaid was dressing to be an angel. At four o'clock in the morning of the great day, cannon were fired, bells rung, and a band of music marched through the streets playing tunes more suggestive of our "training days," than of any religious celebration. We hired boys to go at five o'clock in the morning and keep our seats till eight, when the performance commenced. The great concourse of people assembled, in all manner of primitive, picturesque, and fashionable costumes, was of itself a curious and interesting sight. As for the far-famed Play, it was deeply impressive in many parts, and some of the tableaux were beautiful; but if looked at critically, as you would at any other dramatic performance, I should say its merit had been overrated by some enthusiastic travellers. The stage was often too much crowded for effect; most of the acting was wanting in vivacity; the music seemed commonplace and inexpressive; some portions of the performance were very tedious, and some so exceedingly native as to border upon the ridiculous. But such a thing should not be looked at from a critical point of view. When I reflected that we were in the Bavarian Highlands, among uncultured peasants, going through a performance which had, for generations, been considered a religious duty, I could not but regard it as one of the wonders of the world, to be marvelled at and revered. Every one, even the smallest child, enters into it with heart and soul; and this earnest conviction, this seriousness of purpose, invest it with a peculiar interest, which cannot possibly be inspired by even the best of mere theatrical acting. Joseph Mair, a simple wood carver from a primitive mountain town, personated Jesus. He has a noble figure, and a pale face, with a pensive dignity of expression. His long dark hair flowing over his shoulders and parted in the middle, after the manner of the Nazirines, strongly reminded one of the pictures of Jesus seen in the churches. It was a wonderful impersonation. All the while that they were reviling him, dragging him about, and spitting upon him, he maintained the beauty of mockness, the grandeur of patient endurance. There was not a look or a movement to shock the most reverent feeling, or offend the most fastidious taste. His first appearance, riding on an ass, followed by hundreds of people waving palm-branches and shouting Hosanna, was peculiarly impressive. On the cross, he was sublime. But the scene of the crucifixion, though reverently and tenderly managed, was fearfully painful. Such a scene cannot be represented in the nineteenth century without giving a great shock to the feelings. I shall never forget that spear thrust into the side and the blood gushing out.

"The day was beautiful. Alternate clouds and sunshine seemed to sympathize with the incidents represented. Toward the end, in the scenes on the Mount of Olives and Calvary, the heavy dark clouds, and the rain, which formed a light veil between the spectators and the stage, imparted additional beauty and solemnity to the awe-inspiring scene."—National Standard.

Herr Pauer's Pianoforte Recitals.

On the 6th inst., at Glasgow, Herr Pauer gave the first of three pianoforte recitals in the Queen's Rooms, illustrative of the works of Bach, Handel, and Scarlatti, &c. The hall was well filled.

Herr Pauer, who was cordially received on coming forward, said the three lectures which he intended to deliver formed extracts of a course of six which he gave last winter in the South Kensington Museum. It was found to be impracticable to deliver the same number here, and accordingly he had compressed some and omitted other portions of the original lectures. On that evening he would confine himself to those illustrious men, Scarlatti, Handel, and Bach, who were the first to break the fetters which chained, so to say, the harpsichord to the organ. Herr Pauer went on to give a brief sketch of the life of Domenico Scarlatti, who was born at Naples in 1683. His pieces, the lecturer remarked, were all original, full of life, replete with technical difficulties, but in purity of writing and in charm of harmonious changes they were sadly deficient. There was a continuous tinkling sound about them which sometimes reminded one of the hurdy gurdy. This might arise partly from the frequent use of the pedal. Herr Pauer then played three lessons by Scarlatti for the Clavichord, as exhibiting these characteristics. Georg Friederich Handel, his life, character, and writings, next came under review. When in Hamburg, in 1703, Handel had a great many pupils. Earnest as he was in everything, and having but small choice of educational music, he composed the greater part of his Suites for his scholars. Herr Pauer noticed the scarcity of musical publishers at this time, and the rather unscrupulous dealing of Publisher Walsh, more especially in connection with Handel's writings. The music of Handel, he went on to say, was much grander than anything that Scarlatti or any French or German composer before had written. There was great power in his preludes, and excellent clearness in his fugues, a characteristic force in his gignees, and a wonderful vigor in his sarabands. In short, he hit the nail on the head everywhere. The lecturer briefly sketched the character of Handel, remarking that his life was a thoroughly heroic one. Herr Pauer next adverted to the characteristics of Handel's Suite No. 6, in F sharp minor, and his air in variations in D minor, from the 3d Suite. In playing the air and variations, the performer first went over the melody, with the harmonies taken from the variations, and then played it a second time as written by Handel. It might have been expected, he remarked, that he would have selected as an illustration the more popular "Harmonious Blacksmith," but he had chosen the air and variations in D minor, as being, he conceived, a greater work of art. Passing on to notice Sebastian Bach, Herr Pauer remarked that Bach for the harpsichord and Beethoven for the pianoforte were the greatest composers. It was no exaggeration to assert that the germ of everything we had attained to in the nineteenth century, even up to Mendelssohn and Schumann, might be traced to Bach. There was scarcely a single chord which could not be dug out of the riches of Bach's mine. As to fugues, there had scarcely been a single one written which could compete with any of his. Bach was the first who tuned the instrument so that all the major and minor keys might be used—the number of keys in which compositions had previously been written having been very limited. He also invented the present mode of fingering. Artists had been accustomed to hold the thumb against the board, under the keys; Bach used the thumb as the starting and resting point of the whole fingering. His English suites were equally distinguished for the striking originality of their harmony and for the charm and richness of their melodies. They possessed great value as works of art, and were well suited for public performance. The English suites (Herr Pauer played No. 3) revealed all the mystery of Bach's art, and knowing them well one might rightly interpret his 48 preludes and fugues. These fugues seemed to the lecturer to resemble a breastwork of solid stone, the waters of time striking but rolling back without leaving the slightest impression. Never was a work written which had remained so fresh, or so completely uninfluenced by lapse of time. Herr Pauer drew a parallel between the lives and characters of Handel and Bach. Handel's life had something heroic, Bach's something patriarchal in it. If the two lives were somewhat different, the men had many affinities in common. Both were born in the same year, in the same country, and both died at an advanced age. They evinced, in common, cordial sympathy with all pure forms of art, and worked for the universe. Both took the deepest interest in all that was lofty and dignified, and both dedicated the purest inspirations of their genius to the Almighty. Both were stricken with blindness in their last years, without losing either the faculty or the love of cultivating their art. It was seldom that two men of the same country, of the same age, and fulfilling the same mission, were in many respects so similar. They shone like two bright stars in the firmament of art. In conclusion, Herr Pauer played Bach's Concerto in the Italian style. This was, he said, one of Bach's least complicated pieces, and he commended it especially to lady amateurs, because it was full of life and melody.

We have had so many opportunities, says the Glasgow Herald, of expressing our admiration of Herr Pauer's talents as a pianist, that it is only necessary to add that on no occasion has he played with greater poetry and feeling than he did on the 6th. Few artists living could have so ably interpreted a class of music which in our time is seldom heard properly played. This distinguished artist is not only master of every intricacy of manipulation, but he possesses the yet rarer gift of rendering his music in such style as to show that he is imbued with its true sentiment. The lecture was in every way delightful, and the audience from time to time expressed their enjoyment of it and its numerous illustrations by repeatedly applauding Herr Pauer.

"The Successor of Liszt."

The London Choir gives the following sketch and possibly too glowing estimate of the composer and pianist, ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

When pianists are spoken of now-a-days, we occasionally hear older lovers of music remark, "What can they all expect to do after him, after Liszt? None of them has more than ten fingers, and whatever can possibly be accomplished with ten fingers, that Titan has accomplished. Anything new, anything higher, is absolutely not to be found; at best, only the same may again be seen. But the same thing re-appearing in art is no longer the same in its effect."

Fortunately, such thoughts can rise only in the heads of old and surfeited musical gourmands, and would have sense only if the artist and his contemporaries were both to live forever. The former, however, as well as the latter, come and go. New generations are ever appearing to enjoy, and new artists to labor. Assuming, as may well be done, that Liszt has reached the highest point in the technique of piano playing, it is equally certain that, since that artist's retirement, Anton Rubinstein is the greatest among all pianists of the present day. To this must be added his high and peculiar excellence as a composer. A short biographical sketch of one who has been honored with such extraordinary triumphs wherever he has hitherto appeared, cannot be unwelcome to our readers.

Anton Gregory Rubinstein was born on the 18th of November, 1829, at Wechnotymetz, a village near Jassy, on the Russian frontier. His grandfather was an Israelite, but his father was brought up in the Independent Greek religion, which our artist professes also. Anton's parents were in good circumstances, but afterwards became involved in litigation respecting their property, resulting in a sensible diminution of their fortune. In his early childhood, Anton already manifested those two principal qualities which shaped his career—a marked love for music, and a consistent, energetic striving to reach a clearly defined goal.

His mother, a highly educated woman, who is still an active teacher at the Imperial Seminary at Moscow, directed the children's first instruction, and particularly taught her two youngest sons the piano, of which she was mistress. Nicholas, also, the elder brother, evidenced a great predilection as well as talent for music. Circumstances in part, but principally the wish to provide for the more thorough education of their children, led the parents to remove to Moscow. Here the boys received regular instruction in music. With Anton it began when he was six years old, and not more than two years and a half later he gave his first public concert at Moscow. The sensation which the prodigy caused on this occasion was immense, and, solicited on every side, his parents consented to let him travel to Paris in August, 1839, accompanied by his teacher, Villion. But, although the ten-year old child excited great sensation in that city also, the reflecting father was still undecided whether he should dedicate his son wholly to music, well knowing that only extraordinary talent can attract notice in a field where so much has already been done. Then it happened that Liszt was present at Hera's. The gifted boy's play filled him with such enthusiasm that, after he had finished, he lifted the child up in his arms and kissed him, exclaiming, "He will be my successor!" The assembly burst forth into shouts of joy, and for a whole week Paris talked of little else than this scene. For a year and a half Anton now earnestly applied himself to study at Paris, Liszt himself assisting with his advice. At the expiration of that time, his first great artistic tour was undertaken through England, Holland, Sweden, and Germany, which brought him renown, and was peculiarly successful. Returning then to his native country, Anton spent a year at home. In the year 1844, the sons, accompanied by their mother (the father's feeble health compelling him to remain behind), arrived at Berlin, in order to finish their studies in the theory of music with Dehn, and their scientific studies at the High School.

Nicholas, the elder brother, subsequently devoted himself to instruction, and now directs the Conservatorium at Moscow and its concerts. Anton's progress in the course of his studies with Dehn, extending over a period of nearly two years, was more and more decided; with the greatest enthusiasm he studied composition, and the works of the masters. Of a most beneficial influence was his acquaintance with Mendelssohn Bartholdy, who showed warm sympathy for the youth of fifteen. Amid this period of activity, Anton's father died. His mother being obliged to return, on account of her other children, Anton thus saw himself deprived of her further assistance, and dependent upon his own exertions. He went, in 1845, to Vienna, where he made a bare living by teaching, devoting all his leisure time, however, to composition. Here, and afterward in Hungary, through which he travelled with the flautist Heindl (who met with so melancholy a death),* he wrote the majority of those compositions, in part nothing more than draughts, which were not published till much later, and under quite different circumstances. Meantime, his wishes not being realized quickly enough, he became gloomy and despondent, and thought of emigrating to America. But it was only a touch of hypochondria, which he soon conquered. The political storms of 1848 drove him from Vienna; he returned to Berlin, and soon to his native land.

From that time forward the young artist's affairs took a more favorable turn. His talents obtained for him the favor of the Grand Princess Helen of Russia, who took him into her service as chamber musician. To this position, that of player and concert-master to the Empress was afterwards joined. A singular accident compelled him to recompose all his works, which in part had before been merely sketched, in part finished. While on his way to St. Petersburg, he had been obliged to leave at the frontier the trunk which contained all his manuscripts, it being suspected that the notes were some secret revolutionary cipher, such secret correspondences, it is said, having at that time actually been discovered. He was taken for an emissary, and came near being transported to Siberia. He was thus obliged to keep himself concealed for a length of time in St. Petersburg, until he succeeded in making known to the Grand Princess, through his patron, Count Wietorsky, his critical situation, whereupon further proceedings against him were stopped. Notwithstanding the most careful search, however, his manuscripts could not again be found, and he has never seen them since. Rubinstein was, therefore, under the necessity of reproducing what was lost, in which task, by the aid of his superior memory, he was for the most part successful. This, together with new compositions, which now gushed forth in uninterrupted succession, kept him in St. Petersburg until the year 1851.

Rubinstein now thought that the time had arrived for him to step before the world with his works. Generously furnished by his two patrons with the means (the Count alone made him a travelling present of two thousand silver roubles), he three years later entered on his first tour through Germany, France and England, as performer and composer. In the former capacity he everywhere achieved triumphs, while, especially at first, criticism showed itself, with rare exceptions, antagonistic, not to say bitterly hostile, to his compositions. The Leipzig publishers, however, had a better opinion; they published his works, and paid him handsomely for them. Rubinstein's compositions of every kind appeared in large numbers in the music market, which from many sides drew upon him the reproach of being a scribbler. If it be taken into consideration, however, that these works originated during a long series of years, and that only circumstances brought about their publication at one time, this reproach appears to be without a cause.

The space to which we are limited does not permit us to follow minutely his various tours. We shall merely touch upon some principal points in his life. In 1856 he had been called back to the Emperor's coronation ceremonies. Here he composed his Jubilee overture, for the dedication of which he was paid by the Emperor with a valuable jewel. In the suite of the Grand Princess he went to Nizza, and then made a long artistic tour, composing all the time mostly larger works, among which were an oratorio, Paradise Lost, and a grand opera, The Children of the Heath, the latter for Vienna.

Meantime, Rubinstein's position in St. Petersburg, as well as other circumstances there, had assumed such a shape that he was enabled to undertake the carrying out of a long cherished design with prospects of success. Aided by powerful patrons, there came into existence, within the course of a year, "The Russian Musical Association," an institution rich in artists and pecuniary resources; and a year thereafter the Conservatorium, embracing every branch of the musical art, was also in operation. In behalf of both institutions Rubinstein has displayed a sacrificing activity, attended with salutary effects. As leader of the Conservatorium, for example, not only did its entire management fall to him, but he also organized and superintended the instruction, directed the exercises of the pupils, and finally taught the laws of composition.

In addition to performing so many and oppressive duties, he gave private lessons, and found time to compose. During this epoch of his life were written the lyric opera, Feramors (performed at Dresden), two concertos for piano, a grand piano fantasia, another for four hands, chamber music, choruses, songs, pieces for the piano, the Symphonies in A and C major (Ocean), etc. So injurious an activity could only be the result of the most devoted love to the institutions which he had called into being and brought to such a high state of perfection, and at the same time it explains that the fear of other influences, opposed to his own views, determined him to take these creations under his personal care in the beginning.

There only remains to give a condensed picture of the composer Rubinstein, as he appears before us to-day.

His works are full of originality, soaring, not "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought," manly, healthy, deep and warm, grand and powerful. He easily commands every form and means; his taste is exquisitely refined, his conceptions truly noble. Viewing the general character of Rubinstein's music, his style of thinking and feeling in sounds, we cannot fail to perceive that it is in perfect conformity with the development of modern ideas, nay, that in some degree it gives expression to this development. The diffuseness of his melody, the richness and refinement of his harmony, stamp him a modern artist in the noblest sense of the term, standing par excellence upon absolutely musical ground.

In his composition for the voice he does not seek what is styled the melody of language, but the melody of feeling. Either unable or unwilling to raise himself to the height of expressing philosophical ideas in his instrumental compositions, he, on the other hand analogizes all the various states of mind by pregnant melodies. Most nearly he follows the school of Mendelssohn and Schumann, if indeed one endowed with so much original talent can be said to follow any school. As a melodist, Rubinstein is less elegiac and sentimental than Mendelssohn, less gloomy than Schumann, more powerful than either. His music is in the main good-humored; sometimes it becomes fretful, but the anguish that waits over life and the world is foreign to it. A certain strongly marked, forcible, sharply-cut relief in his themes, and their highly fanciful, ever-novel changes, recall Beethoven's genius and art, while the natural charm of his songs reminds one of Schubert's deep, gushing fountain of melody.

That Rubinstein possesses a large share of high literary, scientific, and social culture, that in society he shows himself a man of the best breeding and of extensive reading, every one knows who has occasion to enter into intimate intercourse with him. As a man, Rubinstein is open and straight forward; in his intercourse he is distinguished by a winning amiability, being modest without derogating from his own worth; in conversation he is intellectual, occasionally witty, kind in judging, communicative toward his friends—on the whole rather grave than gay. Some four years ago he was united in marriage to a young Russian lady of noble birth.

Rubinstein's merits as a pianist have been so often discussed that all we could say here would only be repetition. Ever since Liszt withdrew from the world in that capacity he is without a rival, which judgment will be confirmed by every one who has had an opportunity to hear him.

*Riding past a place where they were firing at a target, he was struck by a glancing ball and killed.

Music Abroad.

PARIS. M. Pasdeloup's Popular Classical Concerts were resumed in the Cirque National on Sunday, November 19, with a crowded audience. Le Ménestrel says: "The success of the concert was the éclatante C-minor symphony of Beethoven; nevertheless we had behind us a lady whom it did not satisfy, and who much preferred to it the sweet Haydn Symphony which had preceded, which proves that there must be something for all tastes."—The second concert offered: Overture to "Loreley," by Wallace; Symphony in A minor by Ed. Millault; Allegro agitato, op. 52, Mendelssohn; Overture to "Manfred," Schumann; Beethoven's Septet. The author of the symphony (now first produced) took the "prix de Rome" in 1890, and is now seventy years old. "Un joli chiffre pour un débutant!" The work is pronounced "recommandable," but wanting in originality and color.—The third programme, at the Winter Circus, contained: Schumann's B flat Symphony; Larghetto from Mozart's Quintet (op. 108), executed by M. Grisea (clarinet) and all the strings; Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; "Menuet des Folets" and "Valse des Sylphes" from La Damnation de Faust, by Berlioz; Overture to Oberon, Weber.—Fourth programme: Overture to Semiramide, Rossini; Symphony in E flat, Mozart; Adagio from the 10th and fugue from the 9th Quartet of Beethoven (by all the strings); Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music.

The third concert at the Conservatoire, November 12, was directed by M. George Hainl and offered the following selections: Symphony in B flat, Beethoven; double chorus (unaccompanied): "Adieu aux jeunes mariés," Meyerbeer; Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture; Hunters' chorus from Weber's Euryanthe; Haydn's 51st Symphony, in D.

The Choir says: It is no uncommon thing in Paris for an entire concert programme to be repeated at a second performance when it meets with public favor. Thus at the second Conservatoire Concert the whole of the music given at the opening of the season was performed again, a proceeding which is decidedly preferable to the English practice of encoring several items in a programme, thus prolonging the performance to an extent which is as unpleasant to the exponents as it is to the real lovers of art among the audience.

LEIPZIG. At the second Gewandhaus Concert, the programme included the overture to La Muette; two Marches, by Joachim; and Mozart's Symphony in E flat major. Herr Demunck, from Weimar, played a Concerto, by Haydn, for the violoncello, as well as a piece by Pjatti and another by Vieuxtemps. Madame Peschka-Leutner sang the air "Abentheuerlicher," from Fidelio, a song by Herr R. Wagner, and another by Schumann.

Mdmes. Clara Schumann and Joachim gave a concert a short time since.—The first Euterpe Concert commenced with Spohr's overture to Faust, and concluded with Beethoven's Symphony in A major. Mdle. Franziska Friese performed Herr Bruch's Violin Concerto, and the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Concerto. Mdle. Rose sang an air from Idomenao and the Cavatina from Euryanthe.

BRESLAU. The Orchestral Association has a new conductor: Herr Bernard Scholz. The first concert under his guidance proved highly satisfactory. The programme included Beethoven's overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses"; Herr R. Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin; Mendelssohn's Scherzo to the Midsummer Night's Dream, and Beethoven's A major Symphony. The vocalist was Herr Stägemann, from the Theatre Royal, Hanover. He sang Lysiart's air from Euryanthe, a song, by Herr Scholz, "Die Höhle des Prochonus"; and three songs by Schumann. The programme of the second concert included Quartet in C major, (Op. 59), Beethoven; Barcarole, No. 4, Rubinstein; Nocturne, (Op. 55), No. 2, Chopin; and Ouet in F major, Schubert.

FRANKFORT-ON-THAINE. The Museum Concerts, under the direction of Herr C. Müller, have recommenced for the season. The principal orchestral pieces at the first concert were Beethoven's fourth Symphony, in B flat major, and Mendelssohn's Fingalehde overture. Mdlle. Mehlig was the pianist. She played Schumann's A minor Concerto, and Weber's Polonaise in E major (as arranged by the Abbate Franz Liszt). The vocalist was Mdlle. von Hasselt-Barth, who sang Mendelssohn's "Concert-Aria"; "Des Fischer's Liebesglück," Schubert; "Waldfahrt," Robert Frans; and the "Veilchen," Mozart.

BAYREUTH. Herr R. Wagner's project of waking this place up from its sleep of now nearly one hundred years, by his producing his "festival stage-play" Der Ring der Nibelungen, has made no inconsiderable progress. One of the summer months of 1873 is fixed on for the performance. The first series of performances will occupy four successive evenings; the second and third series, the next two evenings, respectively. Herr Semper has made clever drawings and plans of the theatre that will have to be erected, while the famous Herr Brandt, of Darmstadt, has undertaken the machinery and decorations. The theatre and stage arrangements are to be ready by the spring of 1873; the erection of the theatre is to be commenced at once. As soon as the stage is completed, the singers and musicians selected by Herr Wagner will meet here to study and rehearse the separate parts of the "festival stage-play" for the space of two months. The number of patrons' tickets, at 300 thalers a ticket, is a thousand; they have been so eagerly bought up that there is no apprehension of any want of funds to carry out the project. First and foremost among the patrons are the Emperor of Germany, the King of Bavaria, and the Grand Duke of Saxony.

BOLOGNA. The King of Bavaria has been invited to honor with his presence the performance of Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin at the Teatro Comunale. One would have imagined that King Ludwig had had enough of Herr Wagner's music at Munich. Nothing of the sort! His Majesty has telegraphed to intimate that he accepts with pleasure the invitation. Herr Wagner's detractors assert that the young King has been asked to attend for the purpose of putting a pressure upon public opinion, and obtaining a crowded house on the first night. Herr Wagner's admirers, on the other hand, stigmatize this assertion as a vile calumny devoid of the slightest approach to truth or logic, inasmuch as his Bavarian Majesty may arrive only in time for the second or the third performance, when the opponents of Herr Wagner will be able to him as lustily as on the first night itself. According to report—as promulgated by Herr Wagner's friends—the artists are enchanted with the music, and delighted at devoting six hours a day to rehearsals, while Signior Mariani, the conductor, has openly declared he shall joyfully do his very utmost to secure the triumph of so "grand a work."—The season will be inaugurated by an Italian version of Auber's Enfant Prodigue.

VIENNA. Twelve subscription concerts will be given during the approaching winter by the orchestra of the Imperial Operahouse, with Herr Otto Dessoff as conductor. The dates are the 12th of November; the 3d and the 17th December; the 28th January, 1872; the 23d February; the 10th and the 24th March. Among the more important works which will be performed, we may mention: Bargiel, "Drei Deutsche Tänze" (new); Beethoven Symphonies, 3, 6, 7, and overture to Egmont; Berlioz, "Symphonie fantastique"; Cherubini, overture to Anacreon; Esser, "Second Suite"; Rob. Fuchs, Symphony in C minor (new); Grimm, Two Canons in D (new); Liszt, "Tasso"; Mendelssohn, "The Hebrides overture," Violin Concerto; Mozart, Symphony in E flat major; Raff, "Wald Symphonie" (new); Schubert, Funeral March (scored by Franz Liszt—new); Overture, Interludes, and Ballet-Music to Rosa- munde; Schumann, Symphony, No. 2, Pianoforte Concerto in A minor; Spohr, Violin Concerto, No. 9; Volkmann, Overture to Richard III; Wagner, "Huldigungsmarsch" (new).

MUNICH. The first series of Ullmann's "Artists' Concerts" was brilliantly concluded yesterday (November 15th). It was the 21st concert given since they began in Breslau on the 23rd of October. The lively interest of the German public for these concerts has throughout been always the same, which was testified by crowded rooms and the disappointment of many who were unable to gain admission. The large room of the Odéon was filled to excess last evening, and Madame Monbelli's charming talent was most enthusiastically appreciated. She was obliged to repeat the aria from the Barbier. Fräulein Anna Mehlig, who, in connection with the Florentine Quartet, played Schumann's quintet, and solos by Chopin and Liszt, received the most flattering ovations. Signor Sivori, who has been heard here before, created an immense sensation. Mr. Oberthür and Mr. Grützmaier were also honored with recalls after their respective solos. Mr. Ullmann proceeds from here to Vienna, on a second series of concerts, with a somewhat reduced "personal," inasmuch as the engagement of Fräulein A. Mehlig, Mr. Carl Hill, Messrs. Grützmaier and Oberthür, were concluded at Munich. Fräulein Mehlig will be replaced by Fräulein Emma Brandes, and the other artists remaining will be Madame Monbelli, Mdlle. Bernardine Hamakers, Signor Sivori, Signor Carlo Nicolini, and the Florentine Quartet (Messrs. Jean Becker, E. Mast, L. Chiostrì, and F. Hilpert), with Capellmeister Richard Metzendorf as conductor.

COLOGNE. The first Gürzenich Concert this year, under the direction of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, fell upon Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's sixtieth birthday. The opening piece in the programme was the conductor's own—"Demetrius Overture." Dr. Hiller gave the accustomed signal, but immediately dropped his upraised arm in mute amazement. Instead of the expected light roll upon the kettle drums, a tremendous flourish of trumpets greeted his ear. Then, armed with magnificent nosegays, the ladies of the chorus advanced, and reminded Dr. Hiller that it was his birthday. The audience, at first as much taken back as the "Geburtsstagskind" (birth-day child), namely, F. Hiller himself, now began to understand the joke, and contributed their quota to the proceedings in the form of very hearty applause. The other orchestral composition in Part I. was Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. Herr Von Königsloewe played a Violin Concerto by Lafont, a Parisian virtuoso, contemporary of Habeneck, Baillot, and the two Kreutzers. Herr Julius Stockhausen sang the recitative and air, "Tyrannic Love," from Handel's Susannah, and a ballad, "Mein Elsass deutsch, Mein Elsass frei," music by himself, words by Herr Hackenschmidt. The second part of the Concert was taken up by the second part of Schumann's Serenade and "Faust." The solos were confided to Mdlle. Löwe, soprano, from Stuttgart; Mdlle. Kneiss, contralto; Herr J. Stockhausen and Herr Otto Wagner, tenors; and Herr Ad. Peltzer, bass. The work was not very successful, there being no applause, except a little at the conclusion.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 16, 1871.

A Life of Schumann.—His Literary Works.

In the correspondence of the London Choir (Nov. 18), we find the following:

Sir,—In reply to the correspondent who writes to know whether a Life of Schumann has appeared, let me refer him to the excellent one by Herr von Wasielewski, of Bonn—one of the directors of the recent Beethoven Festival. A review of this work by an unknown, and not very appreciative, critic (who claims himself to have written some studies on Schumann), appeared in the last number of the Academy. The work, itself, can be purchased at Kolkman's, in Princes' street, Hanover-square. If your correspondent understands German, and can write English, he would do well to translate Wasielewski's "Life of Schumann," which has been through two editions in Germany, and, in an English dress, would certainly find numbers of readers. Besides being an able writer and a profound musician, Wasielewski is an admirable performer on the violin; and the reputation of his latest work, "A History of the Violin," is as great in Germany as that of the "Life of Schumann." More than that, the merit of the "History" has attracted the attention of the Prussian Government; and a grant has been made to the author by the Fine Arts Department to enable him to continue the inquiries he had already commenced with success, as to the existence of unpublished violin music by masters of the 17th and 18th centuries in the great Italian libraries, especially that of Bologna. To return to the Life of Schumann, let me warn your correspondent beforehand, that he will not find the author of that work a fanatical worshipper, but only a candid, competent appreciator of Schumann's music.

Yours respectfully, S. E.

The writer of the above doubtless will be glad to learn that Wasielewski's "Life of Schumann" stands no longer in need of an English translator, inasmuch as the labor is already done, both carefully and skillfully, by a young lady of our own New England Boston, Miss Alger. The result is a handsome little volume, which has just appeared from the press of our well-known music publishers, Oliver Ditson & Co., and will no doubt be widely read.

At the same time we hail with pleasure, and so too will all admirers of Schumann's genius, the following announcement of another equally if not more important labor, also by an American lady, who has undertaken to translate collectively those admirable critical and æsthetic writings of Schumann about music and musicians, of which our columns have for years past presented single specimens. As to the matter of Madame Schumann's dislike to the existing biographies of her husband, that may be natural enough and honorable to the woman and the wife, while at the same time the work of Wasielewski may be worth preserving for its intrinsic merits; at all events it is a work full of information and of interest. We copy from the New York Weekly Review:

We learn that Madame Raymond Ritter is engaged on a translation of the literary works of Robert Schumann, and that the book will shortly be placed before the public in an attractive form. Mme. Ritter undertook this translation at the especial request of Mme. Clara Schumann, who will lend her aid towards a short biography of the composer, a complete and correct catalogue of his works and other addenda, which will much enhance the value of the translation. This will also be embellished by photographs from original portraits of Robert and Clara, presented by Mme. Schumann to Mme. Ritter, and considered by the former lady to be the best existing likenesses of herself and husband.

It is well known that Mme. Schumann never gave assistance or approval to the biographies of Schumann by Wasielewski or Reissmann; these works, though they may have filled an immediate want, years ago, have been left behind by the views now generally held regarding Schumann and his work, and are often incorrect in their statement of facts. Mme. Schumann has informed Mme. Ritter of her long established habit of collecting letters and materials to serve for a complete biography, in order, as this great artist and devoted wife writes, in a recent letter from which we are permitted to quote,—"to bring my husband nearer to the public as a man; since, as a musician, his writings sufficiently attest the breadth of his mind, and the depth of his penetrating spirit. But the elevated nature of his every day thoughts, the purity and kindness of his disposition, the noble warmth of his heart—and all these more especially in the intimate relations of family life—have never yet had justice done to them by any pen."

No one can doubt the pleasure with which a readable, interesting, as well as trustworthy life of Schumann would be received, for such a life has not yet been written; but until Mme. Schumann considers the time ripe for giving her memoranda to the world, the lovers of Schumann's exquisite music will welcome with gladness, and may study with advantage, this first complete translation of his unique, critical and miscellaneous essays on his own beautiful art. These writings, when first published in Germany, marked an epoch in modern musical art, and created a profound sensation by their enthusiastic advocacy of progress, and their earnest protest against philistinism and one-sidedness in art.

Matinees of Messrs. Leonhard and Eichberg.

We could only briefly allude (in our last) to the delightful quality of the first of these purely artistic feasts, which took place in the beautiful Hall of the Mechanics' Charitable Association on the 16th ult.

Here is the programme in full :

Trio for Piano, Violin, and 'Cello, op. 70, No. 1. Beethoven.
 Songs: a. Ich hab' im Traum geweinet. } Schumann.
 b. Allsechtlich im Traume. }
 c. Frühlingsnacht. }
 Chaconne (with Schumann's Accompaniment). Bach.
 Songs: a. Serenade, Op. 17, No. 2, }
 b. Frühlingslied, Op. 3, No. 4, } Franz.
 Sonata for Piano and Violin, Op. 121. Schumann.
 In Four Movements.

In the well-known "Geister" (Spirit) Trio of Beethoven, the concert-givers had the assistance of a very able and finished violoncellist in Mr. HARTDEGEN, and there was nothing wanting either of effective, clear ensemble throughout, or of vigor and decision in the spirited Allegro vivace, of subtle and mysterious fascination in the slow movement, of genial, graceful continuity and fire in the Finale Presto. Mr. LEONHARD gave the fine tremulous pianissimo divisions of the "Spirit" movement with exquisitely sensitive gradation of accent.

—We well remember how Mr. EICHBERG made his first appearance before a Boston audience some thirteen years ago, in a Sacred Concert of the "Orpheus," when he first introduced us to the beauty and the grandeur of Bach's Chaconne for the Violin. Mr. Dresel playing to it Mendelssohn's piano accompaniment. Indeed it was our first experience of the wonderfully rich and vital, in the best sense modern, violin solo music of the great old master of all music. At that time we wrote :

Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, a grave and thoughtful looking young man, from New York, recently from Germany, who took the first violin prize at Brussels, proved himself a solid classical musician, by the selection of such a piece, and by his firm, pure, expressive rendering. The Chaconne, or Chaconne, like most of the old musical forms, was a dance, an Italian dance in 3-4 measure. Here we have a quaint theme, logically pursued and treated at great length, the violin of itself playing several real parts, and exhibiting many of the modern feats, arpeggios, &c. of the instrument. It is no mere show piece, but has meaning and consistency. We found it more interesting than the concert fantasias of the Paganini school. How lovely the cantabile melody into which the movement melts towards the end! Mendelssohn's piano accompaniments are just enough—reverent and sparing.

At present we are better pleased with the accompaniment by Schumann, which seems to clothe the work (complete in itself, no doubt, and so Joachim played it to us once) as Bach himself might have clothed it were he introducing it to an audience of our day; with Mr. Leonhard's fitting, the garment certainly set well. Mr. Eichberg was in fine mood and practice, and performed it admirably.

The second of Schumann's Sonatas for piano and violin is a work of rare power and beauty, thoroughly original and characteristic, deep and strong in feeling, free, uncontrollable and bold in its excursive development, but never violating the unity of art, and teeming with poetic fancies. It opens in wide spread chords (D minor, 3-4 measure, slow), somewhat in the manner of the Chaconne, but soon sweeps away with a swift fiery rhythm, full of syncopation and all sorts of difficulties, but also full of beauty and of meaning. The second movement, in D major, is in the six-eight rhythm of the chase, fresh, bracing and exciting. The interest is more than fully kept up through two more elaborate, yet spontaneous movements. The two artists had thoroughly studied it and played it con amore, so that it came home to all.—Mr. KREISSMANN's selection of songs was very choice and rare, and each found full expression in his fervent, chaste delivery, with such exquisite piano-forte accompaniment.

The programme of the second matinée, Dec. 1, was the following :

Trio for Piano, Violin, and 'Cello, No. 7, A major Haydn.
 Romances for Oboe and Piano, Nos. 1 and 3, from Op. 94. Schumann.
 Sonata for Piano and Violin, Op. 98. Beethoven.
 Piano Solo. a. Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 1, }
 b. Allegro vivace, Op. 51. } Chopin.
 Quartet for Piano and String Instruments, Op. 37. Schumann.

The clear, bright, happy Haydn Trio, so simple, so sincerely musical, and like ripened grapes full of the sunshine of Art, was played by artists who sincerely felt and loved its beauty. The little Romances by Schumann are charming compositions, full of poetry, and wholly in the spirit of the pastoral oboe, or hautboy, for which they were written, and which was played with much artistic feeling and refinement by Mr. KUTZLER. Many no doubt were surprised to find how beautiful a chamber instrument the oboe is, artistically played. That Sonata Duo, in G, is one of the most fascinating and unique of all that came from the imaginative brain of Beethoven; and it was finely rendered. Mr. Leonhard is always happy in his reading of Chopin; and the selections were worthy of his best interpretation.

Another noble, may we not say splendid specimen of Schumann's chamber music! One great service, if no other, are these concerts doing, in making us acquainted with so many of his creations in this form. Each of the first four ends with a great Schumann work of this kind: first a Sonata Duo; this time the quartet with piano; next time a superb Trio; then the great piano Quintet, and so on. Indeed it is a rich vein to work, and what is thus unfolded cannot fail to deepen and intensify, in all who hear, the growing faith and joy in Schumann's genius. This Quartet is in truth a great work, exciting in the highest degree, the product of a great heart and brain on fire with glorious thought and feeling. In the short brooding introduction and in the Andante, where the strings sing so humanly, it is very deep and tender; while the Scherzo has a most original and independent air in its rollicking staccato movement, alternating with more pensive, quiet moods in its two Trios. The fugued Finale, complicated as it is and difficult, is carried through with a victorious power; at least it was so carried through by the four artists (Leonhard, Eichberg, H. Suck and Hartdegen), who rendered the whole work with perfect mutual understanding and with irresistible effect.

Of the third matinée, on Thursday of this week, we must speak next time; but our readers must by this time feel with us (and we hope, feel for us) how fruitless are all efforts to find words for such impressions!

Theodore Thomas's "Eight Symphony and Popular Concerts."

The week ending with last Sunday has been one continued brilliant feast of rare orchestral music. Eight great concerts in ten days, and by the most perfect instrumental combination in America! In numbers, to be sure, the Thomas orchestra is only half the size of the Philharmonic in New York, and hardly yet as large as that of our Symphony Concerts since this has been winnowed and reduced. But it is wonderfully effective in all parts, except some falling off both in the power and quality of the violoncellos; there our own orchestra, for once, surpasses it. All that we have ever said of the beauty and richness of ensemble, the euphony, the purity of intonation, the absolute precision, the sensitive yet self-possessed regard for light and shade, the steady grasp of all the forces in crescendo and diminuendo, and the power of thrilling climax, or of the fine individuality, toned down to such good keeping with the whole, of all the several instruments, can only be repeated now. The only question can be, whether they do not play now even better than ever before; if that were possible, they should do so, being such select musicians, and kept in constant practice and rapport with one another all the year round.

Mr. Thomas's programmes this time, on the whole, have been more interesting and more serious than he has given us in any former visit. In the sense of gratification to the musical curiosity of persons much versed in the progress of orchestral music hitherto and eager to keep the run of it still farther, they have been remarkably rich. One thing about them has been singular: while the Concerts have made appeal as usual, to the "popular," as well as to the cultivated audience, they have for the most part been neither classical nor popular. The light overtures, gay waltzes, solo variations, &c., have occupied not half their wonted space in any programme; while the fine classical selections, counting up well in number, and always admirably played, have yet been overshadowed and weighed down by a vast preponderance of the very "heavy" music of the new aspirants for fame, whether professing themselves to be of "the Future" or not. The "Symphony" element has been represented by but two whole Symphonies (one classical, one new), and single movements from three others (two of which are modern). Of eight piano Concertos, or larger works with orchestra, only two were classical (one by Weber, one by Beethoven), while Liszt alone figured three or four times. Out of ten Overtures, one was by Rossini, one by Weber, one by Beethoven, one each (new) by Schubert and by Schumann, and all the rest by newer names, like Rubinstein, Hornemann, and chiefly Wagner, who appeared in this form four times, as well as in divers Marches and arrangements from his operas. In more than one concert the wild demoniac element appeared to rule,—overstrained compositions of men who came too late to sit with the serene immortals, and who therefore seem resolved to take the kingdom of this world, if not of heaven, by storm. However startling and exciting their effects may be, they soon grow fatiguing.—Moreover, while we note increase of weight and interest in the matter of these programmes, we must still repeat the criticism we have always made on them, that they are too promiscuously put together, and lack all pretension to the art of programme-making as such, which in itself should be a fine art. Each piece stands for itself, regardless of what goes before or after; they are so many specimens of styles and writers, jostling each other as on a bookseller's counter. The contrasts are too often violent, hap-hazard, out of all relation (for instance, Wagner's Kaiser March right after the divine Adagio of the Ninth Symphony); no unity of tone and character, as of a good picture, in each programme as a whole; no happy modulation out of one piece into another; no internal bond of union to justify their companionship, in spite of individualities however strongly marked. In a word, none of that art, or instinct if you please, by which a florist culls and combines the flowers and colors into one significant, harmonious bouquet.

Doubtless all these things had their influence, as well as the winter's plethora of musical and all other entertainments, or the visit of the Grand Duke Alexis, on the average attendance on these concerts, which has not been as large as in past years. Yet almost any evening one had but to look round a little to see many listeners of the most musical character, earnestly attentive, and quite constant in their coming; and few concerts here have ever been discussed in social circles with more interest. These, more or less, undoubtedly, have felt the want of unity of which we speak; yet they will be inclined, with us, to give Mr. Thomas no small credit for self-sacrifice in his enthusiastic wish to secure an ample hearing for the new composers, even at such cost of unity and of attractive sweetness in his programmes.

In making a few notes on the successive concerts, we of course find our memory failing, and our impressions quite too multifarious and bewildering, after hearing altogether more of music (and so much of it new) than it is good for any one to hear within a single week. It is the state of mind of the traveler who feels he must "improve" his only opportunity of seeing the famous galleries of Art in Europe, and who comes home every evening conscious that he has attempted to see ten times as much as he could possibly take in, or possibly retain the least impression of.

First Concert—Friday Evening, Dec. 1st.

Symphony, No. 4, D minor, op. 120. Schumann.
 Fantasia on Hungarian Melodies. Liszt.
 Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.

Kaiser March.....	Wagner.
Marchen-Ouverture, "Aladdin".....	Hornemann.
Solo for Violoncello, Souvenir de Rps.....	Servais.
Mr. Joseph Dien.
Saltarello.....	Gounod.
Etude Infernale.....	Rubinstein.
Miss Marie Krebs.
Hungarian March.....	Schubert.

The Schumann Symphony was exquisitely rendered, particularly the Romanza with its lovely oboe melody and the fine triplet passages for the violins, as well as the tender, thoughtful Trio of the Scherzo. But was it not dragging the soulful-sensitive tone-poem out into the cold, to make it the prelude to such things as followed?—The Hungarian Fantasia is one of the cleverest and most interesting of Liszt's fantastical productions, and Miss KREBS played it wonderfully well. Her clear and pearly touch, her execution altogether, were nearly as perfect as her memory was wonderful before. But in the year since she was with us, the young artist seems to have come out from technical bondage—graceful chains though they were—and to have gained greatly in expression. The "Kaiser March" may suit Emperor Wilhelm and his helmeted hosts in the broad avenue of the Linden, but it is noisy and barbaric for the concert room, nor does the occasional allusion to "Ein feste Burg" go far to consecrate such a fierce mobocratic tyranny of sound.—Hornemann's "Aladdin" overture seemed to us more odd than edifying, and to have no more to do with the Arabian tale than with anything else. Why strain to be imaginative? The wind still bloweth as it listeth.—Mr. DIEM played a Concerto (No. 2) by Goltermann, instead of the piece set down,—not very interesting either in matter or performance.—The Saltarello by Gounod shows originality and grotesque power; it was much the most interesting of the new things that evening; but this too was like a Saltarello down in the murky and sulphurous regions, something satanic in its inspiration.—The Etude Infernale came naturally next. It is the piece, full of fierce upward arpeggios, in which the accent comes constantly upon the "leading note" (or semitone below) instead of the note into which it leads, for which reason it has sometimes been called a study "on false notes." It is extremely difficult, but not so for Miss Krebs.—Any march by Schubert is a relief after a Wagnerian bombardment.

Second Concert, Saturday Afternoon, Dec. 2d.

Overture, "Dimitri Donakoff".....	Rubinstein.
Pastorale.....	Bach.
Concerto, No. 2, E flat, Op. 32.....	Weber.
Miss Marie Krebs and Orchestra.
Introduction—Chorus and March, 3d Act, Lohengrin,	Wagner.
Overture, "William Tell".....	Rossini.
Theme and Variations, Quartet, D minor.....	Schubert.
String Orchestra.
Polonaise, 1 flat, Op. 55.....	Chopin.
Miss Marie Krebs.
Waltz, "Rudolf Kienke".....	Strauss.
Rakoczy March.....	Liszt.

This was a far more edifying programme. The Overture by Rubinstein we would gladly hear again; but we forbear to characterize it.—The Pastorale, from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, was peace and loveliness itself. It is in the same broad Siciliano rhythm with that in the Messiah, more subtle and complex, and quite as beautiful.—The Weber Concerto which we heard for the first time, charmed us even more than the Concertstück, perhaps because the latter has grown somewhat hacknied. It is fresh and vigorous, full of the Weber sentiment and "Schwung," and gives a brilliant opportunity to the pianist, which was brilliantly improved.

The passages which had been put together from different scenes in Lohengrin made up a splendid characteristic whole, beginning and ending with an almost painful intensity—we will not say of noise, but of musically pure, penetrating, thrilling tone. Robert Franz in a letter, after hearing Lohengrin, wrote: "Wagner's instrumental music rests upon pure sonority. Herein he is great, here the most assiduous studies evidently have borne marvellous fruit. It is a true fable world, a true rainbow of tones. Unheard of combinations of sound, but throughout of a beauty incomparable." And this was the charm of what we here heard: the magical sonority, so powerful, so beautiful, so strangely thrilling. The Introduction is half pleasurably, half painfully exciting, the violins strained up to the highest pitch in an unceasing tremolo, while great tuba and trombone sounds reiterate with more and more earnestness some sort of announcement of a solemn pomp as on the eve of a great occasion—the marriage of Lohengrin and Elsa, we suppose. The strain of expectation, getting to be intolerable, is at length relieved by one of the few instances of regular melodic form in which Wagner allows himself to indulge,—the sweet and simple chorus of the virgins in the bridal chamber, which breathes of purity and love, a most delicious blending of the mellow, buoyant tones of harp and all soft instruments. The March is as of a gathering of chivalric hosts. Heraldic trumpets from afar advancing shiver the air with the most sweet clamor. (the whole opera is full of heralds and of trumpets), and all is bustle and excitement, pomp and splendor, working itself up steadily to a climax of such full and powerful sonority as to astonish one that it should be within the power of any orchestra to produce it, or of his own nerves to bear it. Wagner as a tone-poet is par excellence the laureate of pomp, parade and splendor.

Now, may we not ask, after all this why surfeit us with the "Tell" Overture! Was it that we might compare two blazing pyramids of gems under a Northern and a Southern sun? Or simply two heroic pomps?—But what followed was perhaps the finest revelation of pure artistic sentiment and beauty vouchsafed in all the Thomas concert: that dirge-like theme from the Schubert Quartet, with its wonderful variations, about which there is nothing arbitrary or mechanical, but each a continuous development, in the most true, poetic sense, of the germ thought. Often as we have admired these variations played by single instruments, we never realized how full of soul and poetry they were until we heard them played by all the strings of this most delicately trained orchestra. The sympathy through all the instruments was perfect; and we look upon this as the highest achievement yet of the Thomas orchestra among their many triumphs of this kind; for not only was the matter more important, but the task by far more difficult.—

Here we must pause, and, as we have no room left to go on in this way, we will present merely programmes up to the limit of our space, intending to return to them hereafter. [The limit is reached.—

PRINTER.]

Symphony Concerts.

The third of the Harvard series, Dec. 7, was mainly in a cheerful tone,—a picture bright, unique, without monotony, without strong contrasts, leaving a quiet, happy and harmonious impression. These were its elements:

Overture to "Faust." (Second time).....	Cherubini.
Symphony, in G. (Composed on receiving the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at Oxford, in 1794) Haydn.
Scherzo, from the "Reformation Symphony" Mendelssohn.
Piano-Forte Concerto, in F-sharp minor. (Second time.)	Norbert Burgmüller.
Concert ("Fest") Overture.....	Rietz.

Cherubini is more and more welcomed; this time in his most happy, playful mood. The Overture to "Faust" is simply charming, and henceforth a favorite. Every instrument had caught the spirit of it. The Symphony, not one of Haydn's greatest, but one of the most fresh and fascinating, as well as most genially artistic, is also full of sunshine and content. The playful themes are all felicitous; the leading theme, however, of the first movement, which comes in leaning on a syncopated dominant seventh tone, has a certain seriousness withal; while the little second theme is one which Rossini might have, if he actually has not, borrowed for his "Barber." But the working up (Durchführung) of the themes of the Allegro, as well as the enchanting play of color as they are passed from one instrument to another, is masterly enough to justify the statement that he composed this Symphony for Oxford honors. The Adagio breathes a devout, sweet feeling which gives place now and then to a minor passage of great earnestness and power. The Minuet, with its Trio led in by syncopated mellow horn tones, is one of the happiest of a kind in which Haydn's variety is inexhaustible even within so short and uniform a pattern; and the Finale Presto has all the careless jollity of a party of students on the homeward tramp in the short hours of the night; the homeliness of the half humdrum melody is positively transfigured by the ingenious surprises of the instrumentation. Was not this Symphony as good a novelty for Boston as the "new school" could have offered. We have only to add that it was delicately and nicely rendered.

The Scherzo from the Reformation Symphony,—the one immortal part of it—is perfect youth and Spring and sunshine; its buoyant rhythm and the dewy freshness of its tone-tints, have the irresistible spell of an art creation that came out whole and perfect at one cast. It was not played quite so faultlessly as the preceding pieces, but yet effectively; and it answered the end (for which it was inserted in the programme as an after-thought) of offsetting the sombreness and somewhat too elaborate monotony of the Concerto which followed.

This Concerto is no doubt the product of a man of genius,—at least so Schumann, Mendelssohn and others thought of him—who died before he had reached full expression,—was cut off, in fact, in very early youth. The following data, condensed by his enthusiastic young interpreter on this occasion, tell something of his promising but brief career:

NORBERT BURGMÜLLER was born in Düsseldorf, Germany, February 9th, 1810. His father, one of the chief founders of the Rhenish Musical Festivals, gave him his first knowledge of Music. Later he studied under Spohr and Hauptmann in Cassel, whither he was sent by his admirer, Count of Nesselrode-Ehrenhausen. In 1831, after completing his studies, he returned to Düsseldorf for the purpose of spending a short time with his parents. He then visited Magdeburg, Dresden, Berlin, London, and found everywhere a distinguished welcome. In London a brilliant engagement was offered him, but illness compelled him to abandon it and return home. He soon after accepted an invitation to visit Aix-la-Chapelle with Baron von Ferber from Mecklenburg for the purpose of restoring his health. May 7th, 1836, only six days after his arrival, he was found dead in his bathroom. An epileptic fit seized him while bathing and he was suffocated. Mendelssohn wrote a funeral March for this occasion, which was played alternately with one by Beethoven. Norbert was the youngest of three brothers. Franz, the oldest, joined the army and died in Greece. Frederic lived in Paris for many years and became known as an arranger of popular music for the Piano.—Both Mendelssohn and Hauptmann looked upon Norbert with the greatest expectations. Among his works, published by Kistner, Leipzig, in 1834, these are particularly interesting: a Concerto for Piano and Orchestra; Overture to the unfinished Opera "Dionys," several Songs, and his second (unfinished) Symphony in D. op. 11. The Trio to the Scherzo of the latter was all that was found of the 3d movement. It was completed by Robert Schumann. The Finale has never been written. The work has been given in Leipzig several times with great success. E. P.

The Concerto is not without invention and musician-like merits. The long orchestral introduction is rich in beauties, and themes spring up exciting fine expectation afterwards, which somehow is disappointed; for the elaboration becomes tedious, in spite of the wealth of graceful, brilliant passage work, with which it is festooned throughout, and which give to the pianist opportunities of which Mr. PERABO made certainly the most that could be made; for his performance was throughout most perfect, and in the Finale, especially, a triumphant mastery of continuous and trying difficulties. The composition is the work of a true artist, and yet the effort does not seem to have been inspired. Once, however, in the middle of the first movement, there is an uplifting (syncopated) motive, which is worthy of Schubert, but the development seems forced, so that attention is too prone to drop away. Yet after all we should be thankful for the opportunity to hear such a work, for indeed the great pianoforte Concertos can be counted on one's fingers; and there is hardly one of them that has not figured over and over, in these concerts.—The brilliant Overture by Rietz,—also cheerful and Spring like, in spite of a few clouds, and often reminding one of Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, was brought out with splendid animation and precision.

In the Fourth Concert (Dec. 28), we shall hail the reappearance of the favorite pianist, Miss ANNA MASHLO, whose arrival in New York will probably anticipate the publication of these lines. She will probably play the Chopin Concerto in E minor (instead of that in F minor as before announced.) The Symphony will be the fourth of Beethoven, in B flat; the Overtures: Gade's "In the Highlands," and Weber's to "The Ruler of the Spirits," new to at least nine-tenths of the audience of to-day.

NEW YORK, DEC. 5.—The Philharmonic Society, one of the few remnants of really good music left in New York, and the only one that has ever been a success, gave the first concert of the thirtieth season, at the Academy of Music, on Saturday evening. This Society was founded in the year 1841, by Mr. U. C. Hill. He had previously visited Europe, and thought that such a society might be formed here. It was a long time getting organized, but finally got "under way," and gave the first concert at the old Apollo Rooms, corner of Broadway and Canal street, when Beethoven's C-minor Symphony, Hummel's Septet, and other pieces were played. It was almost the first performance of a Symphony in New York. For the first twenty five seasons the society struggled hard for its existence, scarcely paying expenses. The main object of its members was the cultivation of a taste for classical music in the public, and for that they almost gave their music to the city for nothing. The Society had almost fallen to ruin, when Dr. Doremus was invited to become President. He succeeded in making the concerts and rehearsals one of the most popular things in New York, by enlarging the orchestra to one hundred, and removing the place of the concerts to the Academy of Music. A few years after its commencement, the Society established the custom of admitting such as desired to be present at the rehearsals. This custom has been kept up ever since, and to-day the rehearsals are more popular with the public than the concerts. The orchestra numbers one hundred musicians, well balanced, every member of whom thoroughly understands the part he has to play. Mr. Hill, the founder, still holds a conspicuous place among the first violins. In its completeness, this orchestra ranks first among American orchestras. It has, for several years, been conducted by Mr. Carl Bergmann. The concert of Saturday evening presented the following interesting programme:

Pastoral Symphony.....Beethoven.
Aria "Dove Sono," (Figaro).....Mozart.
Mrs. Philip Gulager.
Introduction to Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg. Wagner
Pianoforte Concerto, (E flat).....Beethoven.
Herr Dionys Pruckner.
Song: "In questo semplice".....Donizetti.
Mrs. Gulager.
Introduction and Polonaise.....Weber.
Herr Pruckner.
Overture: "Julius Caesar".....Schumann.

The Pastoral Symphony, one of the most beautiful, and the most characteristic of all symphonies, was exquisitely played. It is the most popular of the nine, with the possible exception of the fifth. What could be more descriptive than the storm, and the enchanting hymn following? If Wagner or Liszt had this storm to interpret, they would probably have used cymbals, trombones, drums, &c. It was an unwholesome dose, to attempt to digest the "Meistersinger," coming as it did after the delicate Symphony, and the Mozart song. A piece more utterly feeble in musical ideas, from beginning to end, has never been conceived. A very poor analysis was printed on the back of the programme.

Mrs. Gulager's singing cannot be called a success. Her voice is very sweet, but small in volume, in such an immense building. Scarcely any applause greeted her.

The Concerto, the noblest ever written, was undoubtedly the feature of the concert. It was fairly played by Herr Pruckner, who made his debut. His touch is excellent and execution good, but there is a monotony about his playing, which makes it very tiresome to listen to. He was very well received by the audience.

The concert closed with Schumann's very poor overture. Raff's Symphony, "In the forest," which was to have been played last season, will be the feature of the next concert. The overtures will be Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" and Weber's "Euryanthe."

The first Church Music Association concert is Dec. 19th. The programme is to contain a new overture: "Eine feste Burg," by Raff, Haydn's second Mass, and Weber's "Preciosa" (repeated by request.) A quintet club has been formed here, for the purpose of giving string quartets, and classical chamber music "of the highest order." The first is on Dec. 11th, and the others (there are five in all) will follow on the second Monday in each month. The programme for the first contains a quartet by Raff, one by Mendelssohn, and other pieces, mostly modern. They will take place at Chickering's rooms.

The Liederkreis Society gave a concert recently, at which Liszt's "Prometheus" was performed. The Messiah was very well given on Thanksgiving night by the Harmonic Society, with the same soloists as in "Elijah."

NEW YORK, NOV. 25.—Since my last letter, Mr. Strakosch has given us Opera as follows: Faust, Don Giovanni, La Sonnambula and Mignon;—with additional representations of Martha, Lucia and Traviata. In all of these works, excepting La Sonnambula, Miss Nilsson has appeared, and by her perfect art, given freshness and beauty to the least interesting of them, and to the best an added grace.

The fifteenth Opera night has gone, and the above list with the addition of "The Barber," comprises all the opera which has been given,—although Mr. Strakosch in his prospectus led his subscribers to expect more variety. This, together with some other features of his management, has given rise to considerable dissatisfaction, of which I purpose writing more fully when the season is ended: for the present, —though there may be room for fault-finding, there is certainly something to praise.

It is pleasant to find a work of art so rare and so sufficient that we forget to look for its faults; and such a work is Miss Nilsson's impersonation of Gounod's Marguerite. So fully has this been acknowledged, that little has been left unsaid in its praise. The voice and method of the singer are such that even our New York critics,—who delight in pulling down where they cannot build up,—dare not attack them. So they content themselves with vague aspersions like the following: "There is a spirituality about Gounod's music, into which she does not enter." If the writer of a paragraph like the foregoing were asked to define its meaning,—he would doubtless be puzzled to render it in terms less vague than those above quoted.

Now the truth is that Miss Nilsson's delineation is distinguished from all others by the fact that she does, most fully, enter into the "spirituality" of Gounod's music.

In Faust, more than in any other opera, everything is subordinate to the rôle of the heroine. There are no systems of philosophy to expand, as in the poem, but music, song and story are but the adjuncts of light and shade, the background for that exquisite vision, the Marguerite of Ary Scheffer.

Faust has not the continuous flow of melody which characterizes the works of Verdi and Donizetti,—and there is not that rare skill in treatment of the orchestra, for which Mozart was preëminent. Were there no Zerlina—or Donna Anna—the divine music of Don Juan would still be immortal: but Marguerite in Faust is the one vital element, without which the work would not live or be remembered.

The heroine of Goethe's poem is a simple, ignorant peasant-girl, her mind intent on homely cares, and only raised above mediocrity, at first, by the intensity of her passion for Faust and, later, by the greatness of her despair. Gounod's Marguerite is purely an ideal creation, such as can be expressed in music. Other singers have studied Goethe, and, perceiving this difference, have considered the middle ground as their property and taken such positions thereof as individual caprice, or motives of policy, might dictate. Hence we have had various heroines, most of them light and coquettish, and all more or less artificial. But a great artist could make no such mistake; and Miss Nilsson, in undertaking this rôle, took a bold step and made herself the Marguerite of Gounod's music. I say a bold step, for the French—usually so nicely discriminating in matters of art—were slow to receive this impersonation, and it was only in London—which is the best place for cool, sound judgment in such matters—that its merits were fully recognized. The fact that, in New York, it is received with faint praise will surprise no one who has observed the mysterious ways of our critics.

Of Mignon anon.

A. A. C.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Little Daisy. Song and Chorus. 2. G to c. Balfour. 35

"Her bright eyes on me beam,
Laughing like the dancing moonlight,
Beaming on the running stream."

A sweet daisy hailed that ought to please everybody.

Susan, Susan, pity my confusion. 2. F to f. Laburnum. 40

When the band begins to play. 2. F to d. Hunt. 40

Soda Water. 2. G to c. Merion. 40

Sung by Miss Ada Wray, whose smiling face adorns the pretty title-page. Come, of course.

Maidens of Jersey. 3. C to c. Eikmeier. 35

"The Maidens of Jersey are pretty and nice"

So says the song. A nice compliment skillfully presented.

Dreaming, still dreaming. F to f. Thomas. 20

Apert. 3. C to c.

Two beautiful songs, as sung by Mr. Seguin of the Parisian troupe. Fine illustrated title. Music smooth, flowing, easy for the voice and elegant in construction.

Yester-eve he was full of Devotion. (Non So). Benigni. 40

Romanza. 5. Ab to a.

Effective Italian concert song.

There's a new mound in the church-yard. Solo and Chorus. 3. Eb to c. Porter. 30

"And the village still is mourning For gentle Daisy Dean."

Popular style and pleasing.

She wandered down the mountain side. 4. C. Cloy. 30 to g

"She wandered down the mountain side
With measured tread and slow,
She heard the bell at even-tide
Down in the vale below."

Fine poem, very well interpreted by the music.

This loving Heart of mine. 3. F to f. Cobia. 40

"This loving heart of mine
Will share each thought of thine."

'Tis night when thou art gone. 3. Ab to c. Vandewater. 30

"'Tis night when thou art gone,
'Tis morning when thou art here."

Angel of thy Love. 4. F to f. Gabriel. 40

"Sweeter than rippling waves,
Or children's laughter ringing,
In 12-8 time. Exceedingly graceful, and worthy of careful study.

Instrumental.

Prince Alexis Galop. 2. F. Hart. 30

Full of sparkle. Prince Alexis should take it home to his sister.

Mountain Stream. 4 hands. 5. Db. Smith. 1.00

Well-known favorite, newly arranged.

Little Rogue. (Kleiner Schelm). Polka. 3. A. Faust. 40

Perfectly charming, and so is the picture of the little rogue on the title.

Mother's Birth-day Polka. 3. C. Wellman. 30

Good for any birth-day.

Spring Dream Waltz. 3. G. Grebis. 40

Very pretty melody.

Sophien Polka Masurka. 3. E. Conrad. 30

A little Strauss-like. Brilliant.

Go Ahead Galop. 2. C. Hart. 30

Pretty and bright for learners.

Frollic of the Frogs. Waltz. For Guitar. 3. A. Hayden. 15

Well-known favorite.

Home again. Polka Max. 3. Bb. Chassagnac. 60

Called a Masurka de Salon, and is a very graceful thing for the parlor.

Sweet by and bye. 4. Eb. Variations by Wyman. 50

The melody fits well into the variations, so that it is sweet now, and by-and-bye, and always.

Rendezvous Galop. 3. D. Zahonyi. 30

Very neat and sparkling.

Books.

BAUMBACH'S NEW COLLECTION OF CHURCH

MUSIC. Price, in Cloth, $2.50, Boards $2.00

In turning over the leaves of this fine book one finds very little to criticize and a great deal to admire.

It is among the very best, and will "go" without pushing.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 802.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 30, 1871.

VOL. XXXI. No. 20.

Dudley Buck's Second Collection of Sacred Motettes.

In the voice of sacred song the Holy Church throughout all the world doth proclaim the Goodness, the Majesty, and the Glory of God. Into this treasury poets and musicians have poured their choicest gifts. Its forms have been determined by the culture of the peoples whose worship it from age to age expressed. In the time of David, the stately antiphon was upborne by the sonorous trumpet.

"Lift up your heads, O ye gates!
And be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors,
And the King of Glory shall come in."

"O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good:
For his mercy endureth forever."

To the noble strains of the Jewish psalmists the early Christian church added those grand hymns:

"Glory be to God on high,"

and

"We praise Thee, O God; we acknowledge Thee to be the Lord."

And thereunto each successive age has added its own new experiences and nearer foretastes of the kingdom of God. About a hundred years ago, the great spiritual awakening under the ministrations of Wesley, Swedenborg, Doddridge, and Whitfield, gave rise to a hymnody beautifully lyric in its forms, and gloriously true to the phases of spiritual experience. From this recent epoch come the songs that are now dearest to the Protestant church.

Nor is the musical aspect less varied or interesting. Of the Jewish strains, nothing remains to us. The Ambrosian chants still exist, but, compared with the rich texture of modern music, they are as the Conventicle to the Cathedral. The conventicle may possess more piety; but at all events it hath no beauty that our souls should desire it. The entire creation of modern music goes back hardly more than two hundred years. Within this comparatively brief period the most expressive of the fine arts, and the one best suited to our present civilization, has been brought to its present perfection. With each successive advance in the process, the leading composer of his age has laid his noblest thoughts on the altar of the church. Palestrina, Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Beethoven: all these have wedded some of their choicest strains to sacred words. But the elaboration of these master-pieces rendered them unavailable for devotional uses. On festival occasions, with unusual resources, their production added the necessary element of triumph to the feast. But for the daily needs of devotion, they were as if they had never been. The people's worship has sought expression through the Chorales, those broad and simple melodies, the earliest specimens of which came from the Germans. On these patterns the English worked, adding to the peculiarly Teutonic structure an infusion of the pathos more noticeable in Celtic airs. Of this composite order are the old tunes called "Mear," "Avon," "Dundee," "China," and "Coleshill."

The early Methodists and Independents abolished choirs and organs, and restricted their sacred music to the limited forms of the Chorale; and in the absence of trained vocal or instrumental helps, these melodies lost the varied harmonies with which great organists had embellished them, and the people sang only such fundamental basses as could be found out by the untutored improvisation of here and there a worshipper whose deep voice forbade his participation in the melody. In this barren musical faith our Pilgrim forefathers were trained. From this abnormal and uncomfortable plainness there was necessarily a reaction toward greater elaboration. First came the Billings era—a zeal not according to knowledge. Then came Lowell Mason, who sought out bits of the works of Handel, Haydn, and Beethoven; cutting out of their musical creations four-line patches here and there. This gave more beautiful melodies and varied and musician-like harmonies. On the pattern so set worked many later comers—with the trifling exception that they discarded the "played-out" strains of the old masters entirely, and wrote new tunes of their own, by the quantity, having simple and often used melodic strains, and plain harmonies. This over-productiveness, it will be observed, was necessitated by the fact that the tunes and entire books had merely an ephemeral existence. Somehow they quickly got stale, although here and there a hale and hearty old chorale marched down a hundred years or so. The rate of infantile mortality of these psalm-tunes was far larger than any board of health would have predicted. In their structure there was a trifling omission: the creators neglected to put souls in the forms. They had no individuality of character.

For this reason they could not permanently supply the needs of the people for chorales embodying typical phases of emotion; while, on the other hand, they were too short and simple to satisfy the appetite of trained singers. Not discerning the signs of the times, the composers simply multiplied their works, without adapting them any more completely to either of the two radically different wants of the market. Had they ever heard of the animal who starved between two bundles of hay? Mr. L. O. Emerson succeeded in some degree in infusing more character into his metrical psalmody, and so attained a remarkable currency—a currency, let it be observed, almost exclusively in the choirs, and not among the people. Nor is it difficult to see the reason. Each of his tunes is a study for a fitting musical dress to a chosen hymn. Its very nicety of adaptation debars it from use among the people, while the want of musical elaboration prevents it from meeting the permanent approbation of the choir. By his personal influence in insisting on a right emotional frame in song—that the choir ought to worship God, and not seek a glorification of their musical ability, he has accomplished much good; but the fact remains that a musical formation of eight measures only stands no more chance of permanent success as a musical composition, than a poem of four lines would do. A greater development is necessary in order properly to discuss any topic. On the other hand, all the composers of psalmody have failed in the matter of anthems, and this chiefly for the want of necessary technical training properly to wield the larger forms, especially if to the purely vocal part-writing there be added a suitable organ accompaniment. Yet as musical taste increases, the demand for artistic church music becomes more imperative.

To meet this want a large number of works have been put forth, such as the Church and Home, Grace Church Collection, Baumbach's Quartettes, and Mr. Buck's former Collection of Sacred Motettes. Of all except the one last mentioned it should be said that too great a license was used in the introduction of characteristically secular music. To such an extent has this been carried that there are composers who affirm that all music is sacred. It was, doubtless, under this impression that a Chicago organist lately inaugurated the Sunday afternoon service with the Overture to "Martha;" and on a peculiarly tender and pathetic moment of religious service he poured the holy oil of this strain from "Zampa"

A composer of sacred music remarked to me recently on the "ecclesiastical character of the music in the opera of 'Martha.'" But as I had never observed it, the conversation was not animated.

Criticism likewise attaches to the introduction of pianoforte accompaniments, when the arrangement is to be played upon the organ. Were it not for personality, I could refer to a large number of examples of this kind. But after all, the gravest charge I have to make against the books of this class that have come under my notice is, that much of their contents is not church music. What music, then, is fit for the church? it is asked.

Church Music, I reply, is such as adequately portrays the spirit of the chosen passages from the Psalter or the Hymnal, and in point of elaboration is not too difficult for the class of choirs or singers for whom it is designed. The heavy choruses of Handel and others are truly sacred music, but they are too elaborate for church music. Church music implies the worship of God; if the music be of too trivial or sensuous a nature to convey this emotion, or if it be so elaborate as to fully absorb the singer in the technical act of performance, to the exclusion of any enjoyment of the act of worship on his part, it falls so far short of excellence as church music. Indeed there is reason to believe that much music that passes for sacred has nothing sacred about it. Take the so-called "Mozart's Twelfth Mass" and where in it will you find a devotional strain?

Of Mr. Buck's former collection I would say that, having used it in church for some two years, I am prepared to testify to its general excellence.

*I notate from memory.

Several of the author's own pieces grow better and better as we use them. His "The Lord is King," though marred by unnecessary difficulties in the organ accompaniment, is a most excellent motette. "Brightest and best" is another piece that always pleases. Indeed fully one half the contents of the collection has proved available for our use. Another good thing about it was its general homogeneity of material. It is possibly a mistake for an author to attempt to suit his book to all tastes. Let it be generally adapted to a certain class of wants, but make sure that it contains enough of some one kind to render it worth buying.

The present work consists of 186 pages of music. There are forty-six pieces, of which three are Te Deums, covering 29 pages. Deducting these, we have forty-three pieces of an average length of three pages and a half, two scores to the page. The first piece in the book is a setting of the words "The God of Abraham praise," a hymn terse in phraseology, poetic and scriptural in imagery, of the most elevated sentiment,—in all points one of the noblest lyrics ever written.

Mr. Buck's version ought to be peculiarly acceptable to choirs from the fact that the popular air, to which these words were originally sung, has become unknown, while no new one has been proposed to take its place. As an example of the successful musical illustration of chosen words it would be difficult to find a better than this of Mr. Buck's. Without descending to details, which would hinder us too long, we merely call attention in passing to the manner in which are treated the words: "Jehovah, Great I AM. By earth and heaven confess'd;" then, too the crescendo "Who was and is the same," with its climax at "Great I AM," and the reverential piano: "we worship Thee;" then, again, how jubilant rises the strain, "The whole triumphant host!" And how neatly an air of animation is communicated by the eighth-note motion in the accompaniment! The next piece: "Hark! hark! My Soul," is a setting of a favorite hymn from "Hymns Ancient and Modern." To this extended composition, running through four stanzas, although a different musical setting is given for every verse, a unity is imparted by the clever management of the refrain, "Angels of Jesus, Angels of Light! Singing to welcome the pilgrims of night," while the closing climax is made by a more elevated and elaborate repetition of the refrain. In passing, I ought to refer to the soprano solo to the second verse, which is beautiful and expressive, and the passage: "Far, far away, like bells at evening pealing," where a bell-like effect is attained by an easy and unexpected transition from the key of F to D flat.

And so we might go on, mentioning piece after piece: "Give unto the Lord" with its unison canon (the men following the women—a natural sequence);—"He shall come down like rain," a very lovely piece indeed, concluding with a very clever and effective fugue: "Arise! Shine! for thy light is come," a piece I have some curiosity to hear sung. On page 52 we find a nice, quiet Evening Song, in which, as everywhere else, the words are well treated, and the musical proprieties observed; and all this with no sacrifice of musical feeling or freshness of ideas. Indeed, Mr. Buck holds that whoever trusts to purely musical inspiration, will inevitably run short of ideas in time; but if one derives his melodies and harmonies from the chosen text, his musical ideas will become fresh in proportion as he seeks to illustrate rich and suggestive poems.

It is perhaps the Te Deum feature of this book which is most exposed to adverse criticism. It certainly looks bold to set this sublime hymn to a potpourri from an oratorio; yet if the selected strains happen to be the best and fittest of all musical vestures for the particular verses of the hymn, who ought to object? I confess that my conservatism was shocked by this, to me, novel proceeding. Yet a more careful examination has made me a friend to the new movement. Indeed there is no reason a priori why the hymn: "We praise Thee, O God," should be restricted to fresh custom-made clothes, while other hymns quite as good ("O come let us sing unto the Lord," etc.) borrow and lend their musical vestments with a simplicity most edifying.

The first of the Te Deums in question is from the "Creation." The words are set to the strains from "The Heavens are telling" as far as the verses: "When thou tookest upon thee to deliver man," where the duet: "By thee with bliss" comes in, and not badly. "We therefore pray thee" brings several strains from "Of stars the fairest;" at the words: "O Lord have mercy," we come back again to the original chorus.

The second is from "Elijah," embracing a good part of "Thanks be to God." The verse: "When thou tookest upon thee," is set to the bass solo and following chorus: "Look down on us from heaven O Lord." The verses: "We believe that thou shalt come," are set to music from "He that shall endure;" "O save thy people" is "Cast thy burden on the Lord;" "Vouchsafe, O Lord" gives us a taste of "If with all your hearts;" and at "O Lord, in thee have I trusted" we are led back to the original strain. This Yankee-like propensity of Mr. Buck to make both ends meet is highly commendable, and gives his works a unity we vainly seek for in many anthems.

The remaining Te Deum is taken from "Eli," but into its structure we will not enter. Of the one from "Elijah" we must testify that it is a most charming work, and makes a delightful piece for the organ, if one wanted it for no other use.

But I have already extended these comments too far. Yet I have not touched upon the choice pieces from Mozart, Liszt, Wagner, André, Haydn (the Gloria from the third mass), Beethoven, Rossini (Stabat Mater) Neukomm, Barnby, Sterndale Bennett, and others. In a somewhat careful examination I have not encountered an out and out example of bad taste, though there may be such in the book. Some things are weak. The music is not in the old ecclesiastical style, but modern,—musical. It is in almost every case exceedingly well fitted to the words. Buck's treatment of the 8th Gregorian tone will, I am sure, please the Bac's, Doc's, and Oxon's. The taste displayed in making the selections is of the very choicest; and I close this imperfect analysis with a cordial recommendation of the book to choirs who would sing reasonably Sacred Music.

W. S. B. MATHEWS.

Popular Art Education.

THE PROGRESS MAKING IN BOSTON—SKETCH OF THE INTRODUCTION OF DRAWING INTO THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS—THE NORMAL SCHOOL OF ART—SUCCESSFUL REPRODUCTION OF THE ENGLISH SYSTEM OF INDUSTRIAL ART EDUCATION—HISTORY OF THAT SYSTEM.

[From the Daily Advertiser.]

The great movement toward a popular art education, which this city has just begun, and in which all the large towns of the Commonwealth are rapidly following, furnishes a topic of really great interest. The subject is indeed one of more than ordinary importance. Nothing has been felt more keenly by educated and travelled Americans than the lack of æsthetic culture in their own country. The vast increase in material wealth during the past half-century, which has built up in the United States a large moneyed class, has been followed by no corresponding amount of development in the direction of true art. Cultivated people have grown tired of laughing at the statues set up in public places, and the display of ignorance and lack of discrimination by American picture buyers is proverbial. It is true there are great artists, who paint magnificent pictures, and in the large cities they find a constituency and make a living. But it is not there that the shoe pinches. It is "the people" who want practical knowledge of art. With as large an amount of ingenuity and inventive power as the people of other countries, the Yankees have done the mechanical part to perfection, but the infinite possibility of art in beautifying and adorning the surroundings of life have been but little understood. American manufactures, too, have needed the art element. It has been noticed that a nation so behind-hand as the English are in the subjects of common-school education have succeeded in a comparatively short time in making practical a special and technical subject, and the thought has arisen, Why should American manufactures, which need the art element as much as the manufactures of Europe, be deprived of so valuable an element through the want of a system of art education? During the past thirty-six years art education has been made general in England, and it is practically the English system which is now being grafted on the educational system of Massachusetts. It has long been felt, especially in Boston, that something else was wanted besides the general and elementary subjects, in the common schools, and the first effort made to add other subjects was in the direction of music—which has already borne such great fruits. Americans abroad have examined into the subject of art culture and have felt that their own country was far behind in this matter. There have been no more persistent and systematic observers of education in art and science in any part of Europe than American travellers. There is a class of intelligent, educated, wealthy Americans scouring the whole of Europe, knowing every picture in the galleries, attending the soirées of the artists, inquiring in the studios into the various branches of art, purchasing everything that is purchasable, and bringing home cargoes of theoretical knowledge of art and taste, and a desire to see art naturalised in the country. Out of all this has come a desire that art education should become an accomplished fact here.

ART EDUCATION IN BOSTON.

